"You shall soon have your test of skill as well as of courage," he responded; 'but if you are going back after weapons, you'd better take the lamp. I can wait without it."

"This is not a pleasant waiting-room," sneered Bauderet, again letting his eyes slowly sweep the loathsome little cell. He was still smoking the smouldering black cigar, and the pale rings of fragrance slowly strayed in the chill damp air.

"Don't stand there like that," said Verot savagely, "or I'll stamp you into the floor."

"A coward would do that," retorted Bauderet, taking two or three light, backward steps and pausing in the little doorway. "I have some doubts of your honour, or ought to have."

"Fetch the rapiers, sir," was all that Verot said. His terrible anger was mastering him.

Bauderet retreated one more step, then, with a fiendish leer, laid his hand on the heavy shutter.

"You command, but I shall take my own time to obey," he remarked, in a tone of constrained excitement. "How should you like to wait in this little boudoir until your bride came to you?"

Like a flash the meaning of the purpose of Bauderet's words and movements leapt through Verot's mind. Already the door was slowly swinging shut. So frightful was the thought, with its infinite suggestions of horror, that the tall Parisian stood for a moment paralysed.

"Good-night, for ever, Augustin Verot. May your dreams be sweet," said Bauderet.

Slowly, steadily, the door, which was in reality a hinged section of the massive wall, swung round.

Verot let fall the lamp, which, clanging brazenly on the brick floor, remained sputtering and burning there with a strange, fantastic light.

One long bound the Parisian made, uttering a low, harsh cry of rage and terror as he was caught between the closing door and the jaw of the doorway.

There was a struggle like the fighting of wild beasts, the men growling and panting in the extremity of their brutal straining and tearing.

Presently a body was heaved and flung; it fell in the centre of the cell, and lay ghastly and motionless beside the fast dying lamp flame. Then the ponderous door went to with a dull thump and a click of the hidden spring.

One of the rivals stood on the outside of the cell panting and quivering, the white froth clotted on his lips; the other lay limp and lifeless within.

The year 1759 is a golden one in British history. A great French army, that threatened Hanover, was overthrown at Minden, chiefly by the heroic stupidity of six British regiments, who, mistaking their orders, charged the entire French cavalry in line, and destroyed them.

"I have seen," said the astonished French general, "what I never thought to be possible—a single line of infantry break through three lines of cavalry, ranked in order of battle, and tumble them into ruin." Contades omitted to add that this astonishing infantry, charging cavalry in open formation, was scourged during their entire advance by powerful batteries on their flank.

At Quiberon, in the same year, Hawke, amid a tempest, destroyed a mighty fleet that threatened England with invasion; and on the heights of Abraham Wolfe broke the French power in America.

"We are forced," said Horace Walpole, the wit of his day, "to ask every morning what new victory there is, for fear of missing one." Yet, of all the great deeds of that memorable year, the victory which overthrew Montcalm, and gave Quebec to England—a victory achieved by the genius of Pitt and the daring of Wolfe—was, if not the most shining in quality, the most far-reaching in its results. "With the triumph of Wolfe on the heights of Abraham," says Green, "began the history of the United States."

The hero of that historic fight wore a singularly unheroic aspect. Wolfe's face, in the famous picture by West, resembles that of a nervous and sentimental boy—he was an adjutant at sixteen, and only thirty-three when he fell, mortally wounded, under the walls of Quebec.

His forehead and chin receded, his nose, tip-tilted heavenwards, formed with his other features the point of an obtuse triangle. His hair was fiery red, his shoulders narrow, his legs a pair of attenuated spindle-shanks; he was a chronic invalid. But between his fiery poll and his plebeian and upturned nose flashed a pair of eyes—keen, piercing, and steady—worthy of Cæsar or of Napoleon. In warlike genius he was on land as Nelson was at sea, chivalrous, fiery, intense. A "magnetic" man, with a strange gift of impressing himself on the imagination of his soldiers, and of so penetrating the whole force he commanded with his own spirit that, in his hands, it became a terrible and almost resistless instrument of war.

The gift for choosing fit agents is one of the highest qualities of genius, and it is a sign of Pitt's piercing insight into character that, for the great task of overthrowing the French power in Canada, he chose what seemed to commonplace vision, a rickety, hypochondriacal, and very youthful colonel like Wolfe.

Pitt's strategy for the American campaign was specious, not to say grandiose. A line of strong French posts, ranging from Duquesne, on the Ohio, to Ticonderoga, on Lake Chaplain, held the English settlements on the coast girdled, as in an iron band, from all extension westward. While Quebec, perched in almost impregnable strength on the frowning cliffs which look down on the St. Lawrence, was the centre of the French power in Canada.

Pitt's plan was that Amherst, with 12,000 men, should capture Ticonderoga. Prideaux, with another powerful force, should carry Montreal, and Wolfe, with 7,000 men, should invest Quebec, where Amherst and Prideaux were to join him.

Two-thirds of this great plan broke down. Amherst and Prideaux, indeed, succeeded in their local operations, but neither was able to join Wolfe, who had to carry out with one army the task for which three were designed.

On June 21st the advanced squadron of the fleet, conveying Wolfe, came working up the St. Lawrence. To deceive the enemy they flew the white flag, and, as the eight great ships came abreast of the island of Orleans, the good people of Quebec persuaded themselves it was a French fleet bringing supplies and reinforcements. The bells rang a welcome. Flags waved. Boats put eagerly off to greet the approaching ships. But as these swung round at their anchorage the white flag of France disappeared, and the red ensign of Great Britain flew in its place.

The crowds, struck suddenly dumb, watched the gleam of the hostile flag with chapfallen faces. A priest who was staring at the ships through a telescope actually dropped dead with the excitement and passion created by the sight of the British fleet.

On June 26th the main body of the fleet, bringing Wolfe himself and 7,000 troops, was in sight of the lofty cliffs on which Quebec stands, Cook, afterwards the famous navigator, master of the Mercury, sounding ahead of the fleet. Wolfe at once seized the Isle of Orleans, which shelters the basin of Quebec to the east and divides the St. Lawrence into two branches, and, with a few officers, quickly stood on the western point of the isle. At a glance the desperate nature of the task committed to him was apparent.

head; the St. Charles runs, so to speak, down its nose from the north to meet the St. Lawrence.

The city itself stands on lofty cliffs, and, as Wolfe looked upon it on that June evening far away, it was girt and crowned with batteries.

The banks of the St. Lawrence, that define which we may call the throat of the bull, are precipitous and lofty, and seem by mere natural strength to defy attack; though it was just here, by an ant-like track up 250 feet of almost perpendicular cliff, Wolfe actually climbed to the plains of Abraham. To the east of Quebec is a curve of lofty shore, seven miles long, between the St. Charles and the Montmorenci.

When Wolfe's eye followed these seven miles of curving shore he saw the tents of a French army double his own in strength, and commanded by the most brilliant French soldier of his generation, Montcalm. Quebec, in a word, was a great natural fortress, attacked by 9,000 troops, and defended by 16,000, and if a daring military genius urged the British attack, a soldier as daring and well-nigh as able as Wolfe directed the French defence.

Montcalm gave a proof of his fine quality as a soldier within twenty-four hours of the appearance of the British fleet. The very afternoon the British ships dropped anchor a terrific tempest swept over the harbour, drove the transports from their moorings, dashed the great ships of war against each other, and wrought immense mischief.

The tempest dropped as quickly as it had risen. The night fell black and moonless. Towards midnight the British sentinels on the point of the Isle of Orleans saw, drifting silently through the gloom, the outlines of a cluster of ships. They were eight huge fire-ships, floating mines packed with explosives.

The nerve of the French sailors, fortunately for the British, failed them, and they fired the ships too soon. But the spectacle of these flaming monsters as they drifted towards the British fleet was appalling, The river showed ebony-black under the white flames; the glare lit up the river cliffs, the roofs of the city, the tents of Montcalm, the slopes of the distant hills, the black hulls of the British ships. It was one of the most stupendous exhibitions of fireworks ever witnessed.

But it was almost as harmless as a display of fireworks. The boats from the British fleet were by this time in the water, and pulling with steady daring to meet these drifting volcanoes. They were grappled, towed to the banks, and stranded, and there they spluttered and smoked and flamed till the white light of the dawn broke over them.

The only mischief achieved by these fire-ships was to burn alive one of their own captains and five or six of his men, who failed to escape in their boats.

Wolfe, in addition to the Isle of Orleans, seized Point Levi, opposite the city, and this gave him complete command of the basin of Quebec. From his batteries on Point Levi, too, he could fire directly on the city, and destroy it if he could not capture it.

He himself landed the main body of his troops on the east bank of the Montmorenci, Montcalm's position, strongly entrenched, being between him and the city. Between the two armies, however, ran the deep gorge through which the swift current of the Montmorenci rushes down to join the St. Lawrence. The gorge is barely a gunshot in width, but of stupendous depth. The Montmorenci tumbles over its rocky bed with a speed that turns the flashing waters almost to the whiteness of snow.

Was there ever a more curious military position adopted by a great general in the face of superior forces?

Wolfe's tiny army was distributed into three camps. His right wing on the Montmorenci was six miles distant from his left wing at Point Levi, and between the centre, on the Isle of Orleans, and the two wings ran the two branches of St. Lawrence. That Wolfe deliberately made such a distribution of his forces under the very eyes of Montcalm showed his amazing daring. And yet beyond firing across the Montmorenci on Montcalm's left wing and bombarding the city from Point Levi, the British general could accomplish nothing. Montcalm knew that winter must compel Wolfe to retreat, and he remained stubbornly, but warily, on the defensive.

On July 18th, the British performed a daring feat. In the darkness of the night, two of the men-of-war and several sloops ran past the Quebec batteries and reached the river above the town. They destroyed some fire-ships they found there, and cut off Montcalm's communication by water with Montreal. This rendered it necessary for the French to establish guards on the line of precipices between Quebec and Cap-Rouge.

On July 28th, the French repeated the experiment of fire-ships on a still more gigantic scale. A vast fire-raft was constructed, composed of some seventy schooners, boats, and rafts, chained together, and loaded with combustibles and explosives. The fire-raft is described as being one hundred fathoms in length, and its appearance as it came drifting on the current, a mass of roaring fire, discharging every instant a shower of missiles, was terrifying.

But the British sailors dashed down upon it, broke the huge craft into fragments, and towed them easily ashore. "Hang it, Jack," one sailor was heard to say to his mate, as he tugged at the oar, "didst thee ever take hell in tow before?"

Time was on Montcalm's side, and unless Wolfe could draw him from his impregnable entrenchments, and compel him to fight, the game was lost.

When the tide fell a stretch of shoal a few score yards wide was left bare on the French side of the Montmorenci. The slope that covered this was steep, slippery with grass, crowned by a great battery, and swept by the cross-fire of entrenchments on either flank. Montcalm, too, holding the interior lines, could bring to the defence of this point twice the force with which Wolfe could attack it. Yet to Wolfe's keen eyes this seemed the one vulnerable point in Montcalm's front, and on July 31st he made a desperate leap upon it.

The attack was planned with great art. The British batteries thundered across Montmorenci, and a feint was made of fording that river higher up, so as to distract the attention of the French, while the boats of the fleet threatened a landing near Quebec itself. At half-past five the tide was at its lowest, and the boat-flotilla, swinging round at a signal, pulled at speed for the patch of muddy foreshore already selected.

The Grenadiers and Royal Americans leapt ashore in the mud, and—waiting neither for orders nor leaders nor supports—dashed up the hill to storm the redoubt They reached the first redoubt, tumbled over it and through it, only to find themselves breathless in a semicircle of fire. The men fell fast, but yet struggled fiercely upwards. A furious storm of rain broke over the combatants at that moment, and made the steep grass-covered slope as slippery as mere glass. "We could not see half way down the hill," writes the French officer in command of the battery on the summit. But through the smoke and driving rain they could still see the Grenadiers and Royal Americans in ragged clusters, scarce able to stand, yet striving desperately to climb upwards.

The reckless ardour of the Grenadiers had spoilt Wolfe's attack, the sudden storm helped to save the French, and Wolfe withdrew his broken but furious battalions, having lost some 500 of his best men and officers.

The exultant French regarded the siege as practically over, but Wolfe was a man of heroic and quenchless tenacity, and never so dangerous as when he seemed to be in the last straits. He held doggedly on, in spite of cold, and tempest, and disease. His own frail body broke down, and for the first time the shadow of depression fell on the British camps, when they no longer saw the red head and lean and scraggy body of their General moving amongst them.

For a week, between August 22nd and 29th, he lay apparently a dying man, his face, with its curious angles, white with pain and haggard with disease. But he struggled out again, and framed yet new plans of attack.

On September 10th, the captains of the men-of-war held a council on board the flagship, and resolved that the approach of winter required the fleet to leave Quebec without delay. By this time, too, Wolfe's scanty force was diminished one-seventh by disease or losses in battle.

Wolfe, however, had now formed the plan which ultimately gave him success, though at the cost of his own life.

From a tiny little cove, now known as Wolfe's Cove, five miles to the west of Quebec, a path, scarcely accessible to a goat, climbs up the face of the great cliff, nearly 250ft. high. The place was so inaccessible that only a post of 100 men kept guard over it.

Up that track, in the blackness of the night, Wolfe resolved to lead his army to the attack of Quebec.

It needed the most exquisite combinations to bring the attacking force to that point from three separate quarters, in the gloom of night, at a given moment, and without a sound that could alarm the enemy.

Wolfe withdrew his force from the Montmorenci, embarked them on board his ships, and made every sign of departure. Montcalm mistrusted these signs, and suspected Wolfe would make at least one more leap on Quebec before withdrawing. Yet he did not in the least suspect Wolfe's real designs. He discussed, in fact, the very plan Wolfe adopted, but dismissed it by saying: "We need not suppose that the enemy have wings!"

The British ships were kept moving up and down the river front for several days so as to distract and perplex the enemy.

On October 12th Wolfe's plans were complete, and he issued his final orders. One sentence in them curiously anticipates Nelson's famous signal at Trafalgar. "Officers and men," wrote Wolfe, "will remember what their country expects of them."

A feint on Beauport, five miles to the east of Quebec, as evening fell, made Montcalm mass his troops there; but it was at a point five miles west of Quebec the real attack was directed.

At two o'clock at night two lanterns appeared for a minute in the maintop shrouds of the Sunderland. It was the signal, and from the fleet, from the Isle of Orleans, and from Point Levi, the English boats stole silently out, freighted with some 1,700 troops, and converged towards the point in the black wall of cliffs agreed upon. Wolfe himself was in the leading boat.

As the boat drifted silently through the darkness on that desperate adventure Wolfe, to the officers about him, commenced to recite Gray's "Elegy":

The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
Await alike the inevitable hour,
The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

"Now, gentlemen," he added, "I would rather have written that poem than take Quebec." Wolfe, in fact, was half poet, half soldier.

Suddenly from the great wall of rock and forest to their left broke the challenge of a French sentinel: "Qui vive?" A Highland officer of Fraser's regiment, who spoke French fluently, answered the challenge:

"La France."

"A quel régiment?"

"De la Reine," answered the Highlander.

As it happened, the French expected a flotilla of provision boats, and after a little further dialogue, in which the cool Highlander completely deceived the French sentries, and the British were allowed to slip past.

The tiny cove was safely reached, the boats stole silently up without a blunder, twenty-four volunteers from the Light Infantry leapt from their boat and led the way in single file up the path, that ran like a thread along the face of the cliff. Wolfe sat eagerly listening in his boat below. Suddenly from the summit he saw the flash of the muskets, and heard the stern shout which told him his men were up.

A clear, firm order, and the troops sitting silent in the boats leapt ashore, and the long file of soldiers, like a chain of ants, went up the face of the cliff, Wolfe amongst the foremost, and formed in order on the plateau, the boats meanwhile rowing back at speed to bring up the remainder of the troops.

Wolfe was at last within Montcalm's guard!

When the morning of the 13th dawned, the British army, in line of battle, stood looking down on Quebec. Montcalm quickly heard the news, and came riding furiously across the St. Charles to the scene of danger.

He rode, as those who saw him tell, with a fixed look, and uttering not a word. The vigilance of months was rendered worthless by the amazing night escapade. When he reached the slopes, Montcalm saw before him the silent red wall of British Infantry, the Highlanders with waving tartans and wind-blown plumes all in battle array. It was not a detachment, but an army!

The fight lasted fifteen minutes, and might be told in almost as many words. Montcalm brought on his men in three powerful columns, in number double that of Wolfe's force. The British troops stood grimly silent, though they were tormented by the fire of the Indians and Canadians lying in the grass.

The French advanced eagerly, with a tumult of shouts and a confused fire; the British moved forward a few rods, dressed their lines, and when the French were within forty paces threw in one fierce volley. Again, again, and yet again, the flame ran from end to end of the steadfast line!

When the smoke lifted the French column were wrecked. The British instantly charged. The spirit of the clan awoke in Fraser's Highlanders! They flung aside their muskets, drew their broadswords, and with a fierce Celtic slogan rushed on the enemy. Never was a charge pressed home more ruthlessly!

After the fight one of the British officers wrote: "There was not a bayonet in the three leading British regiments, nor a broadsword amongst the Highlanders, that was not crimson with the blood of a foemen."

Wolfe himself charged at the head of the Grenadiers, his bright uniform making him conspicuous. He was shot in the wrist, wrapped a handkerchief round the wound, and still ran forward. Two other bullets struck him—one it is said fired by a British deserter, a sergeant reduced by Wolfe for brutality to the rank of a private.

"Don't let the men see me drop," said Wolfe as he fell, to an officer running beside him. An officer of the Grenadiers, a gentleman volunteer, and a private, carried Wolfe to a redoubt near. He refused to allow a surgeon to be called. "There is no need," he said, "it is all over with me."

Then one of the little group, casting a look at the smoke-covered battlefield, cried:

"They run! See how they run!"

"Who run?" said the dying Wolfe, like a man roused from sleep.

"The enemy, sir," was the answer.

A flash of life came back to Wolfe; the eager spirit thrust from it the swoon of death; he gave a clear, emphatic order for cutting off the enemy's retreat; then, turning on his side, he added:

"Now, God be praised; I die in peace."

That fight determined that the North American continent should be the heritage of the Anglo-Saxon race.

"When we first heard of Wolfe's glorious deed," writes Thackeray in "The Virginians," "of that army marshalled in darkness, and carried silently up the midnight river—of those rocks scaled by the intrepid leader and his troops—of the defeat of Montcalm on the open plain by the sheer valour of his conqueror, we were all intoxicated in England by the news."

Not merely all London, but half England flamed into illuminations. One spot alone was dark—Blackheath, where, solitary amidst a rejoicing nation, Wolfe's mother mourned for her heroic son, like Milton's "Lycidas," "dead ere his prime."

"LOOK BEFORE YOU LEAP."

Two travellers bold, whose destination
Lay far above all habitation,
Meet unexpected oppugnation
From "Leo," lord of brute creation.

Leo feels mad with indignation
(Such fearlessness needs reprobation),
Springs forth in joyful expectation
Of feasting without limitation.

Leaping in unpremeditation,
He finds, much to his consternation,
That anger, race, and disputation
Are sometimes met by condemnation.

Having attained their elevation
By pluck and cool determination,
They now descend by slow gradation,
Bearing their spoil with exultation.

THE BOOTLACE.

AN EX-DETECTIVE'S STORY.

"I suppose you have had a great many interesting experiences?" I remarked to an ex-detective, now a great friend of mine.

"Yes," he replied, "I must say that I have solved a few mysterious cases in my time. There was one in particular which puzzled me tremendously, and was so clever a dodge as to seem almost incredible. It was at a little country village. There had been a murder with extensive robbery. I was wired for, and hastened to attend with all promptitude. I was cordially welcomed by the local inspector, who informed me that they had arrested a man on suspicion, and that the evidence was black against him. He then related all the particulars of the case to me, which were as follows:

"The murdered man was a very eccentric character, aged about fifty. With the exception of an extremely old man who waited on him, he lived alone, being a confirmed woman-hater.

"'The old man,' I asked, 'have you arrested him?'

"The inspector shrugged his shoulders. 'He is eighty years of age; it is not possible for him to kill a man in his prime; besides, there are signs of a severe struggle. No, we have not arrested him.'

"'How long has he been in the murdered man's service?'

"'About a year and a half.'

"'Thank you.' I jotted that down. 'Pray continue.' He did so.

"'We know nothing more about him except that he was reputed wonderfully rich. On the morning his old servant, as was his custom, took his master some hot water. He knocked twice, but finding there was no response, opened the door, intending to stand the jug inside. An awful sight met his eyes. On the floor lay his master, stone dead, while everywhere were signs of a severe and protracted struggle. Chairs, tables, boxes, everything was topsy-turvy.'

"'One moment,' I broke in. 'Does it not seem strange to you that the old man should have slept through it all?'

"'Not at all. He is as deaf as a post; besides, their rooms are far apart. But to continue: The old man communicated with us, and I wired to you. I carefully searched the house and grounds. In the library there was a rather superior-looking man of the mechanic class. He was lying unconscious. On the table stood a decanter of wine. "Hallo, my man," thought I, "what does this mean?" We raised him up and examined him. On the back of his head was a terrible bruise, most likely where he had fallen. He showed no signs of returning consciousness, and I sent for the old man. I told him how matters stood, and the old chap shouted out: "He's been at the wine; master always keeps a decanter of drugged wine on the table." There was nothing to be got out of him yet, though, so I went and examined the garden. I found footprints leading to a window which had been forced, and closely examined them. Then I went back and measured the arrested man's boots; they corresponded exactly with the footprints. That's my case; what do you think of it?'

"'Well,' I admitted, 'it seems very strong against the suspected man. Still, I cannot understand him drinking wine after committing murder.'

"'Well, you see,' said the inspector, 'one glass is enough to drug a man for hours.'

"'I see,' I replied, 'that alters the case. By-the-bye, does he plead innocent or guilty?'

"'Innocent. He has some faked story about receiving a blow on the head and remembering nothing more.'

"'Ah,' I said, 'you never know in such a case as this what's true or not true; however, we shall see. I should like to have an interview with the arrested man.'

"Fortunately I was allowed to go and examine him, and form my own opinion. I found him an ordinary type of the better class British workman. Somehow the moment I set eyes on him I felt sure he was innocent. I explained who I was to him, and that if he was innocent it would be my endeavour to prove it. He swore that he had no knowledge of the crime, nor of how he entered the room.

"'Well,' I said, 'you must tell me everything you know. I shall possibly be able to arrive at some conclusion.'

"'I know but very little, sir. I was walking along the road in front of the house, when, without a second's warning, I received a severe blow on the head. I remember nothing more.'

"'Were you quite sober?' I asked.

"'Yes, sir; I had only one pint of beer.'

"'What seems strange to me,' I said, 'is the fact of your footprints right across the garden.'

"'My footprints, sir? What do you mean?'

"I told him that he had been traced over the garden, and he looked rather perplexed; then he looked down at his boots, and blurted out:

"'Sir, someone has taken my boots off and put them on differently.'

"'How?' I said.

"'I tied them in a bow—now they are in a hurried knot. See.' And he held them up for my inspection.

"He was quite right; they were tied in a knot, as he said.

"'Are you sure you tied them differently?' I enquired.

"'Positive. I could swear it in a law court.'

"I put that down in my note-book; it was one point in his favour. Another thing that impressed me was where he could have put the stolen property if he had fallen suddenly after partaking of the drugged wine? The spoil ought to have been in that room. It was not, for I had examined the apartment.

"All this time the man had been silently engaged in thinking, now he said:

"'Look here, sir. In front of the house the grass is rather long. I was walking on it at the time, and when I received the blow I was right in front of the gate. You examine that grass and see if there are any signs of a fall on the grass, or if anyone has been dragged along it, for I feel sure that I was carried from that spot into the house.'

"'I will go and examine it,' I said, much struck by his intelligence; 'and now good-bye for the present, and don't get downhearted.'

"'Good-bye, sir! God bless you!' he cried, and then I left him and went towards the house.

"On the way I met the Inspector, who enquired if I had learnt anything.

"'Yes,' I replied, 'a good deal. I think I can almost prove the arrested man's innocence.'

"He looked rather disappointed, but did not ask for any particulars. I believe he thought I was mad. I reached the front of the house, and carefully searched the grass. Soon I found a place where it looked disarranged, and, getting out my lens, I carefully examined it. Yes, there was the mark of the fallen man. A little farther back was the mark of another man, who had evidently stood there some time. But, search as I would, there were no signs of anyone being dragged along. But stay; I suddenly alighted on a deep footprint, then another, and another right up to the gate, then across the garden, till they ended close by the forced window. Suddenly an idea struck me; the footprints seemed very deep. I made one or two beside them; mine were not nearly so deep. What did this point to? The maker of them had been heavily laden. There could be no doubt of it, the villain had taken off his own shoes and put on those of the arrested man; then he had carried him across the garden and thrown him through the window unconscious, pouring a glass of the drugged wine down his throat; then he had robbed the dead man and departed.

"First: How did he know the wine was drugged?

"Second: How was it there was no signs of his departure?

"Third: How could he carry the valuables away? For I had been informed they were very heavy. In my own mind I had proved one man's innocence; but a harder task lay before me—to prove another's guilt.

"Search as I might, I could find no more traces, and the matter became all the more puzzling. The burglar seemed either to have flown away or to be still in the house. This feeling was augmented later on, when I went to the nearest station and enquired if any strangers had been about. To my surprise, they positively affirmed that I was the only stranger that had come or gone for the last few days. The next station was some ten miles off; it was not likely they would have carried their spoil that distance. When I reached my lodging and thought the matter over, there was only one possible conclusion. The murderer must be still in the village, and some of the stolen property must be still hidden in the house or grounds, and in the evening I determined to watch the house, for there I was convinced lay the key to the mystery.

"About ten o'clock I cautiously crept into the garden and scaled a tree which stood in a direct line with the old man's bedroom. I have been in a few strange positions, but never in such a one as that, before or since. For there I sat, perched in that tree for two mortal hours, in the most uncomfortable of positions, and nothing occurred.

"Presently I saw the light in one of the bottom rooms go out, and soon after the old man himself came up to bed. First he very carefully drew his window curtains together, which shut me out from all view. But I meant to see somehow, and noticing that the ends were left uncovered, I cautiously descended from my perch, and after taking off my boots, began to climb up the creeper which covered the house, and was as thick as a man's wrist in some places.

"My heart beat violently as I neared his window. The stem of the creeper was getting thinner, and one false step might ruin all; but I reached it at last, and by bending under the window had a fine view. The first thing that surprised me was that he had not begun to undress; but a greater was in store, for, after walking across the room and locking the door, he touched a board in the wall—which was of panelled oak—and it came open, revealing a small secret chamber. It might have been Aladdin's cave, for it glittered and shone, even in that pale light. It contained the stolen property!

"What happened during the next few minutes I cannot tell; my brain was too dazed to observe. All I knew was that the old man had the stolen property. When next I looked, he was packing the things into parcels, wrapped in rags and old paper, so that they looked like rubbish. As I watched him I observed that he no longer painfully hobbled about, but rather flew over the floor in his joy. Soon they were all wrapped up, and the secret panel was slid noiselessly into its place. I watched with great interest for the next development, but I am bound to admit that it almost staggered me. The old man fumbled about his beard for some time, when it suddenly fell off, revealing the face of a man about forty; then the wig followed suit, and the metamorphosis was complete. It was a young man in disguise. The mystery was solved. Soon after he extinguished his candle, and I went to my lodgings to ponder over the strange case.

"In the morning we arrested him, to his great surprise; but after having his beard and wig removed, he was too astounded to lie, and confessed his guilt. Needless to say, the suspected man was released at once."

A TEST OF LOVE.

At that time I was engaged (and very pleased to be) to a most enigmatical young person. She spoke rarely and in a way always a little mysteriously, making voluntarily secrets of a hundred little actions of life, and loving solitude in an alarming manner.

All this was off-set by eyes so beautiful, by a colouring so marvellous, by an expression so divine, that I had not the courage to reflect on the singularity of her character. I loved her, and I often passed hours of the night sitting before her doorstep, simply dreaming "that she lived here," and meditating on her Presence as does the believer on the Transubstantiation.

I did not know, in the first place, whether she loved me or not; she always refused to answer that question, referring to the wishes of her parents and her confidence in their wisdom. If I insisted, she generally ended by saying "that she knew nothing about it, but that she felt no antipathy towards me, and that, according to her ideas, was enough to decide a young girl on marriage! In vain I supplicated, in vain I tried to animate this enigmatical being; she remained as distant as the manner in which she loved, as unknown as she was dominating.

One evening as I was dreaming a little sadly of these things, alone on the Terrace of the Syrtes, a commotion was heard in the house. I returned to the salon, where everything was in disorder, my hosts were distressed, their friends embarrassed and troubled, and old Madame Desparcs horribly pale and trembling.

"What in the world has happened?" I asked. They explained incoherently that Madame Desparcs' diamonds were stolen—old family diamonds of great value. All the servants had been summoned into an adjoining room, in short a formal search was to be instituted. An old gentleman, Monsieur de la Hestre, had been unanimously selected to direct this investigation, just as I was entering, and his first proposition was that everyone submit, or rather offer himself to be searched. Although the thing was rather offensive, no one protested, and it was decided that, after the servants, each one present should be examined.

To tell the truth, all this seemed of small importance beside my personal cares; and, with several others, I awaited the end of the adventure, while M. de la Hestre, his two witnesses and our host, began the inspection of the domestics.

Very soon I fell again into my meditation, my eyes fixed on the fireplace as though there were a fire, when suddenly I felt a slight touch on my elbow. I raised my head with a start to see my fiancée looking at me, most beseechingly. We were alone near the fireside and could talk in low tones without being overheard. She murmured very low:

"If you love me, arrange that they search you first—then try to be near me and, without being seen, try to conceal the object that I shall pass you from behind."

My blood ran cold. This annoying incident became terrible, filling me with the most passionate trouble. I looked at the girl in agony, but forced myself to smile, and whispered:

"It shall be done as you wish!"

My knees trembled, my mouth was dry and hot. The feeling that overwhelmed me was inexpressible. It was a strange mingling of bitterness and pleasure, that my loved one should be weak to such a degree. I forced myself to have a sort of disdainful pity, and in reality love beat ardent, strong, stern in my breast. I understood, in a flash, how beauty could become divine above baseness of soul, how one could respect it even in his honour—and a hundred other things in which were confused, fervent love, devotion without limit, a desire noble and perverse.

Jeanne had thanked me with hardly perceptible movement of the lips; she stood by the wall with an air of indifference and pride!

"They are very long about it!" she said sternly. "M· de la Hestre is a man of method," someone replied. And a silence followed which told more and more on one's nerves, for even the waiting in a peaceful frame of mind finished by disturbing and empting the brain, like a pump. However, the moment arrived when, the searching of the servants ended, the door opened, disclosing our host, the two witnesses, and the old gentleman.

My heart beat furiously; I felt myself become terribly pale; but, concealing my agitation and steadying my voice, I asked to be searched first.

M. de la Hestre smiled at what he considered the whim of a young man, and proceeded methodically to my examination. I blushed, I became pale, without anyone finding that peculiar under the circumstances. When it was over, I made two or three steps backward and I found myself near Jeanne. She lowered her fan and handed me something with a coolness that was only equalled by my calmness in seizing the object and placing it in a pocket of my coat. After which I leant against the fireplace, being now merely a witness and above all suspicion.

M. de la Hestre's search was unproductive of results. There remained nothing to do but to visit all the rooms and then inform the police.

Still my trouble of mind increased as I remained standing by the fireplace. My brain was in a whirl, and I felt the crime weigh on me as though I were indeed the thief!

Jeanne at last came towards me, with that undulating step of hers, and gave me a look of such passionate gratitude that it almost seemed to scorch me. Then in an imperative low tone she said:

"Do you still love me?"

I did not hesitate. I replied firmly:

"Yes."

"In spite of all that I have done?"

"In spite of everything!"

"Will you marry me?"

"I will marry you."

She enveloped me with the same look, still warmer and more lingering. I fully comprehend the power of woman, above all law, human or natural, drawn from the fountain-head and against which nothing ought to prevail.

I felt strangely happy in this equivocal adventure, and I could not throw off this happiness for which I reproached myself and of which I was terribly ashamed.

As I was struggling with these contending emotions, exclamations were heard and I saw M. de la Hestre reappear holding a little box.

"We have the jewels and the guilty one!" he said very calmly.

I had only time to hear this much and to see the livid face of the valet—the guilty one—when I found that Jeanne was gently urging me out into the terrace where the shadows lay thickly. There I felt my head seized with two hands, while two pure lips were pressed to mine, as Jeanne murmured:

"The thief adores you! She has tricked you! To test your love she gave you her own box!"

GILBERT ANSTRUTHER'S REVENGE.

"Confound it!" muttered Commander Robinson, R.N., of H.M.S. Minerva. "I believe it's getting thicker," and indeed the fog had now settled down like a wall around the vessel, while the damp, cold, drizzling rain only added to the discomforts of the impenetrable atmosphere.

Suddenly the Minerva seemed to give a mighty shudder. The sound of splintering timbers and the agonised wail of human beings in distress rang out into the darkness. In a moment all was confusion. Loud shouts from the cruiser answered the shrieks from the unknown vessel with which she had collided.

But the steel ram had done its deadly work. The inexorable fog shut in the catastrophe. A cry, a confused scurry of awe-struck sailors—and yet another vessel had been claimed by the cruel Fog Fiend.

And with her bows in a shattered condition, the Minerva put into the nearest port for repairs.

Ill luck had followed the Minerva from the first. On her trial trip she had broken a propeller shaft. A brief space and one of her quick-firers had jammed and killed a marine. And now she had rammed some unfortunate barque beating up Channel in the dense fog.

Dry-docked, it was found that some little time must elapse before she could be again fit for sea.

It was no use for Commander Robinson to rave and storm at the catastrophe. The official enquiry was annoying enough in all conscience. To make his annoyance more, the vessel was to be over-run with convicts, for it so happened that the only labour available at the port was that which Portland could supply—small wonder, then, for the commander's fury.

But he made himself as unpleasant as he could. The goal-birds should be given no chance to make themselves objectionable. A strong guard of marines was posted ashore, and the soldiers were given strict orders to fire should any necessity arise for their so doing.

Thus Private John Jenkins found himself on sentry-go, an interested spectator of the hideously-garbed convicts who sullenly and silently moved about in the occupation of their enforced labour.

A smart, well-set-up young fellow was Private Jenkins. His face, too, seemed strangely refined for a common soldier's. For though he had changed his name he could not eradicate the mark of breeding which was his birthright, and Gilbert Anstruther had at one time had a fairer future before him than that of a private of marines.

It was the old story. He had fallen into bad hands at the outset of his career. Six years ago he had been standing in the dock, charged with forgery. Thank goodness the charge was a false one; thank goodness, too, the right man had been brought to book; but Gilbert Anstruther was ruined.

So Harold Delton, his false friend, had gone into penal servitude, and he himself had enlisted into the marines under an assumed name.

Small wonder, then, that as he gazed at the convicts a shudder shook his frame. He might have come to that himself. He pulled himself smartly together and resumed his monotonous march up and down.

A convict was working some yards away from him, who was softly whistling to himself. The tune was "Home, Sweet Home"! Private Jenkins could not see the fellow's face, but the back that was turned towards him was square and straight. "A good figure," thought Jenkins. Suddenly the man turned, and the blood rushed from the marine's face, for in that cruel, dark face he recognised the man who had wrecked his life—Harold Delton.

But the convict's face wore no expression of recognition. He merely stooped again as if to pick up a spade that lay at his feet. "Have you a plug of tobacco?" he muttered eagerly.

Jenkins turned abruptly on his heel, and continued his march. His brain was in a whirl. Delton! He could have killed the fellow—yet he turned again, and, as he passed the man for the second time, pulled out a cake of tobacco, and began to cut it in half.

Then he glanced carelessly at the convict, whose eyes were glittering wolfishly at sight of the longed-for weed. Jenkins hesitated. Then he dropped a portion of his tobacco, and continued his walk.

Delton pounced on the fragment like a hawk! Pah! what a tiny piece it was, and that hulking marine could get as much as he wanted, while he—the sentry again approached him.

Jenkins' fury had given way to a deep exultation. He thought of the last occasion on which he had seen the man, smiling, cool, collected in the crowded court, and now he was a common convict. Triumph had——

"Give me that other piece, or, as I live, I report you!" The words fell on the soldier's ears like a thunderbolt.

Delton's face was more like that of a beast than a human being. For a moment Jenkins was staggered. Could it be that the convict recognised him? But, no, that was impossible. And then hatred of the man took possession of him again. Oh! to be revenged—for it was no revenge to see him as he was now—oh, for some even greater disgrace to fall upon the villain who had cost him so much.

Then, swift as a flash, an idea seized upon the marine. He would lay a trap for his foe, and perhaps luck would favour him.

"In my great-coat pocket in the sentry-box," he said hoarsely, "you will find a large plug of tobacco. Slip in there and take it, only look sharp."

In a moment Delton's face changed its ferocity. He muttered something inarticulate. As the sentry, apparently dismissing the subject from his mind, sauntered on, the convict turned round, and began quietly stealing forward towards the sentry-box.

The marine watched him, however, like a cat. He saw the man reach the box, fumble in the great-coat pocket, and noted the malignant look of joy with which the fellow slipped something into the breast of his coarse shirt; then suddenly the soldier wheeled round.

"Hands up, you blackguard!" he roared, "or I fire!"

With an invective, Delton stopped still and faced his foe.

The sentry's rifle was pointed full at his chest. His face turned an ashen hue beneath its sunburn. Another moment and a couple of warders were upon the convict.

"Hullo!" cried one of them. "295 showing fight?"

"No," answered Jenkins curtly, "but he has been collaring something out of my coat pocket from the sentry-box. You will find it in his shirt! A plug of tobacco, and I expect a two-shilling piece!"

For Jenkins, with commendable astuteness, had remembered the existence in his coat pocket of not only the tobacco but the piece of silver. He had, moreover, correctly gauged the cupidity of the convict. So in spite of Delton's protestations, he was hauled off to the guard-room, and Gilbert Anstruther had revenged himself.

Nor was that all. As the convict was being led away the sentry stepped up to him.

"Delton," he muttered.

The convict caught the word. An oath escaped his lips, and his black eyes flashed out a terrible look of recognition. And that was the last meeting between the two.

SHOULD STOUT PERSONS STARVE THEMSELVES?

We are afraid that semi-starvation as a cure for corpulency prevails very much to a dangerous degree. Mr. Archer, the late well-known prominent jockey, was in the habit of going without food for a long stretch in order that he could ride a certain horse at its weight, and there is not much doubt that the debility resulting from this habit of abstemiousness was certainly not conducive to combating the dire attack of fever which was perhaps indirectly responsible for the untimely end, in the zenith of his fame, of this unfortunate but accomplished horseman. Even Mary Jane in the kitchen will eat sparingly of the food allowed her, while she will seek to reduce her fat by copious draughts from the vinegar cruet, and succeeds only in injuring the coats of her stomach—the forerunner of dyspeptic trouble which will be difficult to overcome. The Continental medicos seem to advocate this great reduction of ordinary foods, but one of these savants suggests that the stout person should eat considerably of fatty meats, in order that the appetite be appeased, and consequently less food required, so that practically this is indirectly advocating semi-starvation. On the other hand, Mr. Russell, the British specialist, takes a different course. He says: "Eat as much as you like," and as it is an acknowledged fact that under his treatment persons lose from 2lb. to 12lb. per week, it beyond doubt stands out pre-eminent against those so-called starvation cures "made in Germany." Some claim that Mr. Russell has to insist upon his patients drinking hot water every morning; but, on the contrary, he avers that it is dangerous to do so, and has, of course, never advised it. No; the success of Mr. Russell's treatment is incomparably beyond other specialists, for he resorts to no stringent dietary, and simply prescribes a harmless vegetable tonic combination which is the outcome of years of study and botanical research. We advise all those interested in this question to get this book, the price of which is only twopence. It is entitled "Corpulency and the Cure" (256 pages), and is published by him at Woburn House, Store Street, London, W.C. It can be had direct.—Ilfracombe Gazette and Observer, January 12th, 1897.

IS OBESITY THE RESULT OF RICH DIET.

Fat begins to accumulate as soon as the system has attained its full development, and will go on increasing, if not checked, until the decline of life; then it ought again to decrease. Independently of the importance of fat as a non-conducting substance in impeding the too rapid escape of animal heat, it may be regarded as a store of material to compensate for waste of tissue under sickness or other circumstances entailing temporary absence from food. Most writers consider that obesity is promoted by a rich dietary, corporeal inactivity, tranquility of mind, etc.; and, although admitting these to be conducive to the formation of fat, "I am of opinion," writes Mr. F. C. Russell, the eminent specialist on "Corpulency and the Cure," which is the title of a book (256 pages) now going through the Press with the eighteenth edition, "that obesity arising from such causes solely is comparatively rare. There is a diseased state of the system which, independently of all these influences, will increase the production and deposition of fat." We are of this gentleman's opinion. Mr. Russell, however, does not leave his readers who suffer from obesity "in the lurch," for he prescribes a remedy, and a most effectual one, too, consisting solely of herbs which do not contain a particle of any deleterious ingredient, and yet he can reduce a person's weight from 2lb. to even 10lb. a week, without having to swallow nauseous physic or resort to drastic measures. This successful combination of vegetable extracts was not obtained without considerable research and painstaking investigation. It is rather pleasant to take. Three small doses will in many instances reduce from 11b. to 3lb. in the short space of twenty-four hours. However, the cost of the book is only two stamps, and can be obtained direct from Mr. Russell, Woburn House, 27, Store Street, London, W.C. There are matters highly interesting to stout persons to be gleaned from his book, also hundreds of letters (reprinted) from persons describing the particulars and various fluctuating weights after taking so much of the compound. These are not the ordinary stereotyped sort of quack testimonials, but really from intelligent persons who certify to the extraordinary results of the medicine, in many cases to invite public attention to the marked effects demonstrated.—Montrose Review, January 8th, 1897.

A POSITIVE REMEDY FOR CORPULENCE.

Any remedy that can be suggested as a cure or alleviation for stoutness will be heartily welcomed. There has recently been issued a well-written book, the author of which seems to know what he is talking about. It is entitled "Corpulency and the Cure" (256 pages) and is a cheap issue (only twopence) published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. It appears that Mr. Russell has submitted all kinds of proofs to the English Press. The editor of the Tablet, the Catholic organ, writes: "Mr. Russell does not give us the slightest loophole for a doubt as to the value of his cure, for in the most straightforward and matter-of-fact manner he submitted some hundreds of original and unsolicited testimonial letters for our perusal, and offered us plenty more if required. To assist him to make this remedy known, we think we cannot do better than publish quotations from some of the letters submitted. The first one, a marchioness, writes from Madrid: 'My son, Count ——, has reduced his weight in twenty-two days 16 kilos=i.e., 34lb.' Another writes: 'So far (six weeks from the commencement of following your system) I have lost fully two stone in weight.' The next (a lady) writes: 'I am just half the size.' A fourth: 'I find it is successful in my case. I have lost 8lb. in weight since I commenced (two weeks).' Another writes: 'A reduction of 18lb. in a month is a great success.' A lady from Bournemouth writes: 'I feel much better, have less difficulty in breathing, and can walk about.' Again, a lady says: 'It reduced me considerably, not only in body, but all over.'" The author is very positive. He says: "Step on a weighing machine on Monday morning, and again on Tuesday, and I guarantee that you have lost 2lb. in weight without the slighest harm, and vast improvements in health through ridding the system of unhealthy accumulations."—Cork Herald.

Answers to Correspondents.

I wish here to call the special attention of readers to the series of stories now appearing in S.S. under the general heading: "Deeds that Won the Empire." The statements made in these narratives are historically correct, and, in view of this fact, surely no more stirring reading matter could well be found. I should count it a great favour on your part if you called the attention of at least one friend to their publication.

Seaman.—The flags to be hoisted at one time in signalling at sea never exceed four. It is an interesting arithmetical fact that, with eighteen various coloured flags, and never more than four at a time, no fewer than 78,642 signals can be given.

J. S.—Leave your nose alone. If Nature intended it to be broad and fleshy at the point, do not attempt to make it otherwise. Nothing can be gained by meddling with your physiognomy.

Jeweller.—Provided that you can produce evidence of the regular and previous purchase of the current and two previous weeks' issue of P.W., there is no reason why you should not purchase your copies from a bookstall every week.

R. N. and Minnie.—You will possibly be able to obtain particulars of the Canadian North-Western Mounted Constabulary from the office of the Canadian Government, 17, Victoria Street, Westminster, and particulars of emigration from the Emigrants' Information Bureau, 31, Broadway, Westminster.

Nicotine.—I agree with you that in many instances it is a very unwise thing for a physician to insist upon a patient abstaining from smoking with a jerk, as it were. At the same time, in your case it may be absolutely necessary; but if you have no faith in your medical adviser, of course you had better try someone else.

J. P. L. appears to be subject to most curious dreams. Whenever he goes to sleep and dreams at all, the picture that presents itself to his mental vision takes the form of his body in a dying condition. Amongst many other things, he has been shot in battle, has broken his neck by tumbling off a bicycle, has fallen off a four-hundred feet chimney, has tobogganed down the stairs, and has got entangled in the paddle-wheels of a steamer, and he always wakes up at the moment of his death. He is getting very morbid about it, and altogether the young man is in continual dread of meeting with an untimely end. Consequently, he takes all sorts of stimulants to prevent sleep, with the result that his health is giving way.——In this respect you are not alone. The mere fact of your dwelling upon the incidents—at the moment of falling asleep—is conducive to a repetition. There are no grounds for believing that any significance can be attached to the experience. There is no necessity here to go into details with regard to the psychological phenomena known as dreams, but you may take it for granted that they have no bearing whatever upon future events. If one dreams of a tom-cat and one's friend or lover is afterwards discovered in some act of treachery, the person dreaming immediately jumps to the conclusion that the fact of having dreamt of a tom-cat brings about this most unpleasant result. There is no more truth in this than there is in the fact that the moon has an effect upon the weather.

Joshua.—Short Stories is printed much more slowly than P.W., owing to the care needed in reproducing the illustrations.

Grampus.—Elephants were last used in battle in 1601. This is not taking into consideration their employment by the British in India at the present time.

Flipper.—Your suggestion is an excellent one—very excellent, in view of the fact that it was adopted in P.W. four years ago.

E. J. (Ravenscourt Park).—Thanks for conundrum. I have an idea, though, I have seen it somewhere before.

C. B.—I regret that it is impossible for me to answer your enquiry, as it is of a legal tendency, and I never give advice on subjects of this description.

Anent a recipe which appeared a week or so ago in Short Stories, U. R. C. writes: "For chilblains on the hands and feet, there is a most excellent recipe from the pen of a celebrated Parisian doctor, which will be found to succeed after a few applications: Take a piece of alum about the size of a nut, and melt it in enough hot water to cover the hands. When the alum is melted, soak your hands in the liquid for nearly a quarter of an hour, then cover them at once with gloves, which you keep on all night, and as long as you can during the day. The feet should be treated in a similar way to the hands, drawing on thin cotton stockings over them.

Farmer.—It is estimated that twenty-two acres of land are necessary to sustain one man on fresh meat. The same space of land if devoted to wheat culture would feed forty-two persons; if to oats, eighty-eight; potatoes, Indian corn, and rice, one hundred and seventy-six, and if to the plantain or bread tree, over six hundred people.

The Shadder.—The summary has two uses: it enables a new reader to pick up the thread of the story, and, at the same time, refreshes the memory of the regular reader. Glad you like the "S.-H." so much.

E. J. (Upper Norwood).—Thanks for the suggestion. For several reasons, however, it cannot be carried out.

Constant Subscriber.—You will find a lot of pretty serviette designs in the early numbers of Home Cookery. The excursions to the Continent will be commenced in connection with P.W. very shortly.

P. N.—The railways of the world carry forty millions of people weekly.

H. T. L.—Yes. British warships are always fitted with lightning conductors.

S. P.—So far as I know, the front heading of Short Stories will be changed every week. There will be no more Jumbled Stories.

H. L.—You can put a fine gloss on glass by rubbing it with a piece of newspaper.

Hero Worship.—Your remarks on the Nansen "boom" cover the opinions of many of my readers. Nansen is the author of several works of travel and scientific research, all of which, with other Nansen literature, may be had through any bookseller. As to the relative merits of "Darkest Africa" and "Farthest North," my opinion is that Nansen's work will prove the more popular. Of course, the price of the work is heavy, and many people who might purchase it if issued at a fourth of the price are prevented from so doing. There are the libraries, however, for you, and I may add that if you write the Glebe Sugar Company, 86, Wilson Street, Glasgow, they will inform you of an inexpensive way in which you may obtain from them a reading of "Farthest North."

EXCESSIVE TEA-DRINKING.

A REALLY NOURISHING BEVERAGE OFFERED FREE.

To the sedentary brain-worker who sits hour after hour in a stuffy room, coining his thoughts into current literature; to the lawyer poring over his brief, or reading hard; to the quill-driver, we say take Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa. Give up drinking tea, which, even if properly infused, is only a stimulant and not a nourishing beverage. As usually decocted, it is washy and deleterious; and the experience of Mr. L. Caselton, which has recently been published throughout the United Kingdom with such remarkable effect, is the experience of hundreds of thousands of people. Mr. Caselton, in the first place, wrote from 16, George Street, Greenwich, London, S.E., as follows: "I have derived so much benefit from the excellent Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa that I feel I must write and tell you. I have been for years a martyr to a very bad form of headache, which attacked me nearly every day, sometimes quite prostrating me. I was advised to give up drinking tea entirely, and take cocoa as a beverage. I decided to try Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, which I commenced taking some months ago, and I am glad to say that since then I have been quite free from my dread enemy, headache. I feel confident that this was brought about by Vi-Cocoa, for I had tried numerous remedies without success. I find nothing picks me up so quickly as a cup of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa after I have had a stiff day's work in school. You are at liberty to make what use you like of this letter, and I shall be glad to testify personally to anyone what a real boon your excellent food-beverage has proved to me."

Yours faithfully
Leonard Caselton

Now, it should be remembered that the man or woman with the strongest nervous system wins in the battle of life, for the nervous system controls and directs all the powers of a vigorous existence. This being the case, the duty of all is to strengthen this controlling power, and it has been proved by the experience of Mr. Caselton that nothing has been so effective in doing this as Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa.

Another letter just to hand from this gentleman says that all his friends whom he has induced to give Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa a trial have invariably "stuck to it," as have many thousands of others. Hence the phenomenal success of this wonderful Food Beverage. "I am still remarkably free from headaches, and am still letting the teapot severely alone. If at any time a representative would like an interview with me I should be happy to grant same, as I feel I could tell him much more about my case and the happy results of taking on Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, and you would be at perfect liberty to use any information I might give him. I am constantly being questioned—I might say 'heckled'—as to the bona-fides of my unsolicited testimonial; but in every case I think I have succeeded in convincing my friends. I am sure you would be of the same opinion as myself did you but know all I have suffered in the past."

The replenishing of the system from the wasting of tissues which is going on every day can only be accomplished by the proper assimilation of food. It cannot be done with medicine. It can, however, be accomplished with a perfect flesh-forming, palatable, and agreeable Food Beverage. Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa is such a Food Beverage, possessing, as it does, wonderful nourishing, strengthening, and stimulative powers, unsurpassed by any other Food Beverage. Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa is not a medicine. It does simply what it is claimed to do, and its strengthening powers are being recognised, as we have said, to an extent hitherto unknown in the history of any preparation.

Merit, and merit alone, is what is claimed for Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, and the proprietors are prepared to send to any reader who names Short Stories (a post-card will do) a dainty sample tin of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa free and post paid.

Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa is made up in 6d. packets and 9d. and 1s. 6d. tins. It can be obtained from all Chemists, Grocers, and Stores, or from Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa (Limited), Suffolk House, Cannon Street, London, E.C.

The following unsolicited testimonial from the well-known Evangelist, H. POWERS, the "English Moody," 1, Fountain Villas, Fountain Road, Hull, confirms the above statements:

"I desire to add my testimony to the splendid qualities of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa. For many years I have been taking tea three and four times daily, but for several months I have taken Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa in the place of tea, with the result that my nerves are stronger and I am better able to do my work and with less fatigue. I hold, as a rule, three services every Sunday, and preach almost every night in the week, and since I began to take to Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa I can do my work with perfect ease. I can highly recommend Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa to ministers, evangelists, and all public speakers. I take Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa only."

DEEDS THAT WON THE EMPIRE.

III.—THE GREAT LORD HAWKE.

"THE great Lord Hawke" is Burke's phrase, and is one of the best-earnt epithets in literature. Yet what does the average Englishman to-day remember of the great sailor who, through the bitter November gales of 1759, kept dogged and tireless watch over the French fleet in Brest, destroyed that fleet with heroic daring amongst the sands of Quiberon—while the fury of a Bay of Biscay tempest almost drowned the roar of his guns—and so crushed a threatened invasion of England?

Hawke has been thrown by all devouring Time into his wallet as mere "alms for oblivion," yet amongst all the sea-dogs who ever sailed beneath "the blood-red flag," no one ever less deserved that fate.

Campbell, in "Ye Mariners of England," groups "Blake and mighty Nelson" together as the two great typical English sailors. Hawke stands midway between them, in point both of time and achievements, though he had more in him of Blake than had Nelson.

He lacked, no doubt, the dazzling electric strain that ran through the warlike genius of Nelson. Hawke's fighting quality was of the grim, dour, home-spun character; but he was a true genius for battle. And as long as Great Britain is a sea-power the memory of the great sailor who crushed Conflans off Quiberon deserves to live.

Hawke, too, was a great man in the age of little men. The fame of the English navy had sunk to the lowest point. Its ships were rotten; its captains had lost their fighting tradition; its fleets were paralysed by a childish system of tactics which made a decisive battle almost impossible.

Hawke describes the Portland, a ship of which he was in command, as "iron-sick"; the wood was too rotten, that is, to hold the iron bolts, so that "not a man in the ship had a dry place to sleep in." His men were "tumbling down with scurvy"; his mainmast was so pulverised by dry-rot that a walking stick could be thrust into it.

Of another ship, the Ramilies—his favourite ship, too—he says: "It became water-logged whenever it blowed hard." The ships' bottoms grew a rank crop of grass, slime, shells, barnacles, etc., till the sluggish vessels needed almost a gale to move them. Marines were not yet invented; the navy had no uniform.

The French ships of that day were better built, better armed, and sometimes better fought than British ships. A British 70-gun ship in armament and weight of fire was only equal to a French ship of 52 guns. Every considerable fight was followed by a rank crop of court-martials, in which captains were tried for misconduct before the enemy, such as to-day is inconceivable.

Admiral Matthews was broken by court-martial for having with an excess of daring pierced the French line off Toulon, and thus sacrificed pedantic tactics to victory. But the list of court-martials held during the second quarter of the 18th century on British captains for beginning to fight too late, or for leaving off too soon, would, if published, astonish this generation.

After the fight off Toulon in 1744, two admirals and six post-captains were court-martialled. Admiral Byng was shot on his own deck, not exactly as Voltaire's mot describes it, pour encourager les autres, and not quite for cowardice, for Byng was no coward. But he had no gleam of unselfish patriotic fire, and nothing of the gallant fighting impulse we have learnt to believe is characteristic of the British sailor.

He lost Minorca and disgraced the British flag because he was too dainty to face the stern discomforts of a fight. The corrupt and ignoble temper of English politics—the legacy of Walpole's evil régime—poisoned the blood of the navy. No one can have forgotten Macaulay's picture of Newcastle, at that moment Prime Minister of England; the sly, greedy, fawning politician, as corrupt as Walpole, without his genius, without honour, without truth, who loved office only less than he loved his own neck. A Prime Minister like Newcastle made possible an admiral like Byng.

Horace Walpole tells the story of how, when the much enduring British public broke into one of its rare but terrible fits of passion after the disgrace of Minorca, and Newcastle was trembling for his own head, a deputation from the city of London waited upon him, demanding that Byng should be put upon his trial.

"Oh, indeed," replied Newcastle with fawning gestures, "he shall be tried immediately. He shall be hanged directly."

It was an age of base men, and the navy—neglected, starved, dishonoured—had lost the great traditions of the past, and did not yet feel the thrill of the nobler spirit soon to sweep over it.

But in 1759 the dazzling intellect and masterful will of the first Pitt controlled the fortunes of England, and the spirit of the nation was beginning to awake. Burns and Wilberforce and the younger Pitt were born that year; Minden was fought; Wolfe saw with dying eyes the French battalions broken on the plains of Abraham and Canada won. But the great event of the year is Hawke's defeat of Conflans off Quiberon.

Hawke was the son of a barrister; he entered the navy at fourteen years of age as a volunteer, was a third lieutenant at twenty-four, and became captain at thirty.

He knew the details of his profession as well as any sea-dog of the forecastle; was quite modern in the keen and humane interest he took in his men; had something of Wellington's high-minded allegiance to duty; while his fighting had a stern but sober thoroughness worthy of Cromwell's Ironsides.

The British people came to realise that he was a sailor with the strain of a bulldog in him, an indomitable fighter, who, ordered to blockade a hostile port, would hang on, in spite of storms and scurvy, while he had a man who could pull a rope or fire a gun; a fighter, too, of the type dear to the British imagination, who took the shortest course to the enemy's line, and would exchange broadsides at pistol-shot distance while his ship floated.

In 1759 a great French army threatened the shores of England. At Havre and Dunkirk huge flotillas of flat-bottomed boats lay at their moorings; 18,000 French veterans were ready to embark. A great fleet, under the command of Conflans—one of the ablest seamen France has ever produced—was gathered at Brest. A French squadron was to break out of Toulon, join Conflans, sweep the narrow seas, and convey the French expedition to English shores. The strategy, if it had succeeded, might have changed the fate of the world.

To Hawke was entrusted the task of blockading Conflans in Brest, and a greater feat of seamanship is not to be found in British records. The French fleet consisted of twenty-five ships, manned by 15,200 men, and carrying 1,598 guns. The British fleet numbered twenty-three ships, with 13,295 men, and carrying 1,596 guns. The two fleets, that is, were nearly equal, the advantage, on the whole, being on the side of the French.

Hawke, therefore, had to blockade a fleet equal to his own, the French ships lying snugly in harbour, the English ships scourged by November gales and rolling in the huge seas of the Bay of Biscay.

Sir Cloudesley Shovel, himself a seaman of the highest quality, said that "an admiral would deserve to be broke who kept great ships out after the end of September, and to be shot if after October." Hawke maintained his blockade of Brest for six months. His captains broke down in health, his men were dying from scurvy, the bottoms of his ships grew foul; it was a stormy season in the stormiest of seas.

Again and again the wild north-west gales blew the British admiral off his cruising ground. But he fought his way back, sent his ships, singly or in couples, to Torbay or Plymouth for a moment's breathing space, but himself held on, with a grim courage and unslumbering vigilance which have never been surpassed. On November 6th a tremendous westerly gale swept over the English cruising-ground. Hawke battled with it for three days and then ran, storm-driven and half-dismantled, to Torbay for shelter on the 10th.

He put to sea again on the 12th. The gale had veered round to the S.W., but blew as furiously as ever, and Hawke was once more driven back on the 13th to Torbay. He struggled out again on the 14th, to find that the French had escaped! The gale that blew Hawke from his post, brought a French Squadron down the Channel, which ran into Brest and joined Conflans there; and on the 14th, when Hawke was desperately fighting his way back to his post, Conflans put to sea, and, with the gale behind him, ran on his course to Quiberon.

There he hoped to brush aside the squadron keeping guard over the French transports, embark the powerful French force assembled there, and sweep down on the English coast. The wild weather, Conflans reckoned, would keep Hawke storm-bound in Torbay till this scheme was carried out.

But Hawke with his whole fleet, fighting his way in the teeth of the gale, reached Ushant on the very day Conflans broke out of Brest, and, fast as the French fleet ran before the gale, the white sails of Hawke's ships, showing over the stormy rim of the horizon, came on the Frenchman's track.

Hawke's frigates, outrunning those heavy sea-waggons, his line-of-battle-ships, hung on Conflans' rear. The main body of the British fleet followed, staggering under their pyramids of sails, with wet decks and the wild north-west gale on their quarter. Hawke's best sailers gained steadily on the laggards of Conflans' fleet. Had Hawke obeyed the puerile tactics of his day he would have dressed his line and refused to attack at all unless he could bring his fleet into action. But, as Hawke himself said afterwards, he "had determined to attack them in the old way and make downright work of them," and he signalled his leading ships to attack the moment they brought an enemy's ship within fire. Conflans could not abandon his slower ships, and he reluctantly swung round his van and formed line to meet the attack.

As the main body of the English came up, the French admiral suddenly adopted a strategy which might well have baffled a less daring adversary than Hawke. He ran boldly in shore towards the mouth of the Vilaine. It was a wild stretch of most dangerous coast; the granite Breton hills above splinters of rocky islets, on which the huge sea rollers tore themselves into white foam below; and, more dangerous still, and stretching far out to sea, wide reaches of shoal and quicksand.

From the north-west the gale blew more wildly than ever; the sky was black with flying clouds; on the Breton hills the spectators clustered in thousands. The roar of the furious breakers and the shrill note of the gale filled the very air with tumult. Conflans had pilots familiar with the coast, yet it was bold seamanship on his part to run down to a lee shore on such a day of tempest.

Digitized by Google

Hawke had no pilots and no charts; but he saw before him, half hidden in mist and spray, the great hulls of the ships over which he had kept watch so long in Brest harbour; and he anticipated Nelson's strategy forty-years afterwards.

"Where there is room for the enemy to swing," said Nelson, "there is room for me to anchor."

"Where there is a passage for the enemy," urged Hawke, "there is a passage for me. Where a Frenchman can sail, an Englishman can follow. Their pilots shall be ours. If they go to pieces in the shoals they will serve as beacons for us."

And so, on that wild November afternoon, with the great billows that the Bay of Biscay hurls on that stretch of ironbound coast riding shoreward in league-long rollers, Hawke flung himself into the boiling cauldron of rocks and shoals and quicksand. No more daring deed was ever done at sea.

Measured by mere fighting courage there were thousands of men in the British fleet as brave as Hawke. But the iron nerve that, without an instant's pause, in a scene so wild, on a shore so perilous, and a sea sown so thickly with unknown dangers, flung a whole fleet into battle was probably possessed by no man but Hawke amongst the 30,000 sailors who fought at Quiberon.

The fight, taking all its incidents into account, is perhaps as dramatic as anything known in the history of war. The British ships came rolling on, grim and silent, throwing huge sheets of spray from their bluff bows.

An 80-ton French ship, Le Formidable, lay in their track; and each huge British liner, as it swept past to attack the main body of the French, vomited on the unfortunate Le Formidable a dreadful broadside! And upon each British ship, in turn, as it rolled past in spray and flame, the gallant Frenchman flung an answering broadside! Soon the thunder of the guns deepened, as ship after ship found its antagonist.

The short November day was already darkening; the thunder of surf and of tempest answered in yet wilder notes the deep-throated guns, the wildly-rolling fleets offered one of the strangest sights the sea has ever witnessed.

The green waters rushed through, quenched the fire of the guns, and swept the sailors from their quarters.

Soon Hawke himself, in the Royal George of 100 guns, came on, stern and majestic, seeking some fitting antagonist. This was the great ship that afterwards sank ignobly at its anchorage at Spithead, with twice "four hundred men," a tale which, for every British boy, is made famous in Cowper's immortal ballad. But what an image of terror and of battle the Royal George seemed, as in the bitter November storm she bore down on the French fleet.

Hawke disdained meaner foes, and bade his pilot lay him alongside Conflans' flagship, Le Soliel Royal. Shoals were foaming on every side, and the pilot warned Hawke he could not carry the Royal George further without risking the ship.

"You have done your duty," said Hawke, "in pointing out the risk; and now lay me alongside Le Soliel Royal."

A French 70-gun ship, La Superbe, threw itself betwixt Hawke and Conflans. Slowly the huge mass of the Royal George bore up, so as to bring its broadside to bear on La Superbe, and then the English guns broke into a tempest of flame. Through the spray and mist the masts of the unfortunate Frenchman seemed to tumble; a tempest of cries was heard; the British sailors ran back their guns to reload.

A sudden gust cleared the atmosphere, and La Superbe had vanished! Her topmasts gleamed wet for a moment through the green seas, but, with her crew of 650 men, she had sunk, as though crushed by a thunderbolt, beneath a single broadside from the Royal George.

Then from the nearer hills, the crowds of French spectators saw Hawke's blue flag and Conflans' white pennon approach each other, and the two great ships, with slanting decks and fluttering canvas, and rigging blown to leeward, began their fierce duel. Other French ships crowded to their admiral's aid, and at one time no fewer than seven French line-of-battle ships were pouring their fire into the mighty and shot-torn hulk of the Royal George.

Howe, in the Magnamine, was engaged in fierce conflict meanwhile with the Thesée, when a sister English ship, the Montague, was flung by a huge sea on the quarter of Howe's ship, and practically disabled it. The Torbay, under Captain Keppel, took Howe's place with the Thesée, and both ships had their lower deck ports open, so as to fight with their heaviest guns. The unfortunate Frenchman rolled to a great sea; the wide-open ports dipped, the green water rushed through, quenched the fire of the guns, and swept the sailors from their quarters. The great ship shivered, rolled over still more wildly, and then, with 700 men, went down like a stone! The British ship, with better luck and better seamanship, got its ports closed, and was saved.

Several French ships by this time had struck, but the sea was too wild to allow them to be taken possession of. Night was falling fast; the roar of the tempest still deepened, and seven huge French liners, throwing their guns overboard, ran for shelter across the bar of the Vilaine, the pursuing English following them almost within reach of the spray flung from the rocks. Hawke, then, by signals, brought his fleet to anchor for the night under the lee of the island of Dumat.

It was a wild night, filled with the thunder of the surf and the shriek of the gale, and all through it, as the English ships rode, madly straining at their anchors, they could hear the sounds of distress guns.

One of the ships that perished that night was a fine English seventy-four, the Resolution.

The morning broke as wild as the night. To leeward two great line-of-battle ships could be seen on the rocks; but in the very midst of the English fleet, its masts gone, its hull battered with shot, was the flagship of Conflans—Le Soleil Royal.

In the darkness and tempest of the night the unfortunate Frenchman, all unwitting, had anchored in the very midst of his foes. As soon as through the grey and misty light of the November dawn the English ships were discovered, Conflans cut his cable and drifted ashore.

The Essex was ordered to pursue her, and her captain, an impetuous Irishman, obeyed his orders so literally that he, too, ran ashore, and the Essex became a total wreck.

"When I consider," Hawke wrote to the Admiralty, "the season of the year, the hard gales on the day of action, a flying enemy, the shortness of the day, and the coasts they were on, I can boldly affirm that all that could possibly be done has been done."

History confirms that judgment. There is no other record of a great sea-fight fought under conditions so wild, and scarcely any other sea-battle has achieved results more decisive.

Trafalgar itself scarcely exceeds it in the quality of effectiveness. Quiberon saved England from invasion. It destroyed for the moment the naval power of France. Its political results in France cannot be described here, but they were of the first importance.

The victory gave a new complexion to English naval warfare. Rodney and Howe were Hawke's pupils; Nelson himself, who was a post-captain when Hawke died, learnt his tactics in Hawke's school. No sailor ever served England better than Hawke.

And yet, such is the irony of human affairs, that on the very day when Hawke was adding the thunder of his guns to the diapason of surf tempest off Quiberon, and crushing the fleet that threatened England with invasion, a London mob was burning his effigy for having allowed the French to escape his blockade.

A GAME OF BLIND MAN'S BUFF.

"What creatures they are—those women! A glance of an eye, a chance touch of a soft little hand, a little ear peering out beneath shining bands of brown hair, a twinkling mouse of a foot in its satin slipper, and it's all over with a man. But, if he just chance to get a kiss in the dark, he's lost for ever, carried off by enchantment."

"Hush, Jean!" here up spoke the pretty little lady sitting opposite Mr. Laroque, at his own table, Mrs. Laroque by name; and a blush that made her prettier and more piquant than ever crimsoned her somewhat pale cheeks, and even the pearly tips of her ears that just showed themselves beneath "shining bands of brown hair."

"It is true, is it not, m'amie?" persisted Mr. Laroque laughing at the pretty threat of that upraised finger. "Here's Besnon, almost bursting with curiosity to know how I, Jean Laroque, six months ago, when he went to Paris a sworn bachelor and bon camarade, should have been entrapped, bewitched, inveigled by the arts of an enchantress, and transformed into a sober husband and master of a household. I must tell him, petite, and if you would not listen you must run away."

"I found there was a large party."

With a defiant shake of the little hand, and a pout of the red lips that only made them more tempting, Mrs. Laroque rose from the table. As her husband held the door for her to pass, he said: "It will be told when thou hast prepared for the opera. Adorn thyself, ma belle, and in one little half hour return to us magnificent and ravishing."

A wealthy bachelor, of quiet habits, and, unlike the majority of his countrymen, shrinking from society, Mr. Laroque was quite the last man I had expected to find, on my return from a half-year's sojourn in France, married and settled in a handsome but unostentatious household. Where had he found this beautiful, piquant, dark-haired girl of twenty, who presided so gracefully at his table, and was evidently very much in love with her shy, stately, middle-aged husband?

This was just what he was about to tell me. Mr. Laroque, having been resident in England since his boyhood, spoke good idiomatic English, with only a slight accent, interspersing his conversation usually, however, with a good many French words. As these are far from being essential to the narrative, we will not record them.

"Tom Hungerford—you know Tom?" he began, "spent a month with me a year ago last autumn, at my little place at the north, where I go always for the shooting; and in return he exacted from me a promise that I would go down with him to his father-in-law's house in the country, for the Christmas holidays.

"'Only a family party,' said Tom, and I was foolish enough to take him in a literal sense. I knew Tom's wife, and had been introduced to that wonderful boy of his that transcends all other children, and I fancied I was to meet just them and the papa and mamma. I thought I might endure that for a few days, especially as Mrs. Tom Hungerford is only a pretty statue, and never annoys one with small talk.

"Fancy my astonishment, then, when I found there was a large party—Mrs. Tom's married sister and husband, and her married brothers and their wives, and a host of babies and nurses, and—ah, what was worst of all!—a half score of girls. Think, my friend, of that! Jean Laroque, bachelor and woman-hater, trapped and imprisoned in a country house, with at least ten girls with bewildering eyes, and curls, and voices, and hats and dresses, all levelled at me because I was the only single man of the party, excepting always a lad of sixteen who was brother or cousin to every one of them.

"We arrived on Christmas eve, and as I took Mrs. Sheldon, Mrs. Tom's mamma, in to dinner, and talked politics with the Judge all the evening, I managed to survive the hours pretty well. Next day we all went to church, I still in attendance on Mrs. Sheldon, who was a little old lady, very grand and stately, like the picture of a marquise of the ancien régime. Afterwards came a long walk with Tom, then dinner, and I had been twenty-four hours in the house without speaking to a girl. Of course there had been a general introduction the previous evening, but to have saved my life I could not have told the name of one of them.

"But in the evening we must needs have games for the children, so they said, and blind man's buff among other things. I soon found that I was not able to escape my share of it.

"I give you my word, I could not see a particle, except a glimpse straight downward of my chin and the side of my nose. I had been blind-folded carefully by the aid of two or three pairs of hands, and then twirled three times round, and set off on my journey by a push.

"Here was a dreadful embarrassment—blind—yes, blinded with a handkerchief—and set to catch somebody—one of those girls, or a married sister or aunt, who could tell? and oh! fearful task! to tell the name or kiss the one I should catch.

"That was the penalty of being introduced as Tom's friend. 'We are quite a family party,' they said; 'we will not make a stranger of Mr. Laroque.' And so I must be blindfolded and set to catch somebody; and if I could not guess who I had caught—and how could I where all were strangers?—I was to pay the forfeit of a kiss.

"I knew most of the names, but it was quite impossible that I should identify the individuals to whom they belonged, even with the help of my eyes. How then was I to do it by the touch alone? The kiss was already a foregone conclusion.

"I groped about with little alacrity, and of course caught nobody—just what I had intended. Garments rustled near, and even brushed me as their wearers leisurely moved out of my way. I had only to reach out my hands to catch some of these languid beauties, but I knew very well what must follow, and had not courage for the feat. If only the children had not been sent to bed, I would have brought that fact to an end very soon! I did not see then how right it was that I had not been drawn into the game while they stayed.

"Presently they seemed to read my thoughts, or perhaps Tom Hungerford gave them a hint, for they—those girls, I mean—began to inflict intolerable abuse upon me. They pinched my arms, they pulled my hair and my coat, and then, hoydans that they were, ran away tittering and jeering.

"'It was quite time to end this,' I said, for I was aroused to retaliation. The catching and, and—which was to follow—should soon be over. Suddenly I began to dart about, and the fluttering and musical little screams increased. There was frantic haste, and sundry crashes and collisions that convinced me that the 'play' had become extremely earnest.

"Looking straight downward I could sometimes catch a glance of a stooping figure gliding past me; but presently I lost the power of seeing even so little. I was groping in a narrow passage, for my hands touched the wall on either side, and probably a dark one. Before me I could hear a soft rustle of garments, and a low hurried breathing. Probably one of my tormentors was hidden there, and could not make her escape. If so the game was nearly ended.

"Pressing forward, as I expected, my hands soon came in contact with the head of a crouching figure drawn closely into a corner.

"I felt smooth strands of hair, a little wreath or bunch of ribands, a warm, satin-like cheek. The hair might have belonged to any of the younger ladies, with the exception of two or three who wore ringlets, and their cheeks were all round and smooth with health. Of course, I could not guess who this was.

"If she would only speak; I knew the voice of Tom Hungerford's wife, and it might be she. But not a sound issued from her lips—the figure trembled violently and breathed hurriedly, but gave no other sign of life.

"'Rise up, mademoiselle,' I said at last. 'Tell your name, and then I shall announce it, and go away at once.' I thought I had hit on a brilliant expedient, and the lady, rising, seemed about to give me the required explanation, when with a great shout, three or four persons entered the other end of the passage.

"'Mr. Laroque has caught someone,' I heard them say. 'Who is it? Tell us whom you have caught!'

"'Yes, Laroque,' shouted Tom, 'give us the name, or honestly pay the forfeit.'

"'Speak,' I whispered to the lady whose arm I held, but, trembling, she remained silent.

"'Indeed, I cannot tell,' I said, and then another great shout rose from rosy lips. I was angry and desperate. I drew the slight figure towards me. I tore the handkerchief from my face, and, bending down, I pressed a resounding kiss upon a pair of lips that pouted with annoyance as their owner struggled to release herself.

"There was another shout, but I was scarcely conscious of it. In my own country I have dark, rare wines which seem to send an electric thrill, as of new and abundant life, through my veins. In effect like this, but a thousand times more intoxicating, was the draught I had just tasted. Elate, triumphant, yet half giddy under the new exhilaration I experienced, I advanced towards the group that thronged the entrance to the drawing-room. I had drawn within my arm the hand of the lady I had caught and—but no matter. I was recalled to myself by the sound of angry voices, and by feeling the little figure trembling and swaying by my side.

"'Go to your room at once, Miss Ray,' old Mrs. Sheldon was saying, while angry exclamations burst from the lips of the younger ladies—'astonishing assurance!' 'such impertinence!' 'prowling in the passage on purpose!'—all directed apparently to the little creature I was supporting.

"Before I could find words to express my surprise at a scene I was far from comprehending, Miss Ray had quietly withdrawn from my arm. Facing the group that frowned upon her, she spoke with spirit, though with a piteous tremour in her sweet, clear voice.

"'Indeed, Mrs. Sheldon and ladies, I assure you I had no intention of committing an impertinence. I came down to speak to Mrs. Charles Sheldon about Bella, who is very restless and feverish. While I was endeavouring to attract Mrs. Sheldon's attention this gentleman came out, I moved back, but he followed me up the passage, and I could not escape. For what has passed further, I am not responsible.'

"'Indeed, madam, she is not,' I found voice to say. 'I caught her fairly, and was, of course, unable to name a lady I had never seen. If, however, in my ignorance of your customs, I have done wrong, I trust to be pardoned by all present, especially by this lady, who, it seems to me, has been the greatest sufferer.'

"'No pardon is required by you, Mr. Laroque,' replied Mrs. Sheldon coldly; and she added, return to your room, Miss Ray, and if you want anything in future, please ring or send Miss Bella's nurse.'

"Miss Ray bent her head and turned away in silence. I gave her my hand to lead her to the stairs, but she declined it with thanks, and I heard a low sob as she went wearily up the long flight.

"'I beg you will forget the impertinence of that girl,' said Mrs. Hungerford, as we all returned to the drawing-room. 'She is my sister's nursery governess, and though generally well-behaved has probably enough of the curiosity of her class to lead her to intrude here. I hope Sarah will dismiss her at once. Nothing is more destructive to household quiet than the slightest insubordination of dependents. Miss Ray must be taught her place.'

"'But what, then, is her place, madam?' I asked, I fear not very politely, for, with the intoxication of that kiss lingering about me, these remarks jarred painfully upon my feelings. 'She surely has the manners and refinement of a lady.'

"'No one could expect a lady to make a companion of her nursery governess, or introduce her as an equal to her friends,' said Mrs. Hungerford; and her mother, who had been listening, explained further:

"'Miss Ray has been well and carefully educated. Her father once held a high position, and her mother was a well-bred and pleasing woman. Their daughter, an orphan and poor, sinks to a lower sphere. It is an undoubted impertinence in her to venture beyond its confines.'

"I listened with deference to these ladies, but I was not satisfied. How could I be when all my memories of Miss Ray were so fresh—her gentle young beauty, her spirited, yet lady-like manners, her quiet dignity, and, above all, the kiss that yet thrilled like fire along my veins? I felt the spirit of a champion aroused within me. I had brought this trouble upon the unoffending girl—was I not bound to protect her? Yet I had the tact to see that it were better for me not to plead her cause at present.

"There were no more games after this—the excitement of this scene had destroyed all desire for them. Mrs. Charles Sheldon withdrew to look after her sick child, possibly to scold Miss Ray, the ladies drew into groups, whispering of what had occurred, and the gentlemen went away to slippers and cigars.

"All but myself. I could not pollute the lips that had touched Miss Ray's with the vile weed. I went to my bed in a delirium, half induced by the ecstasy of my new sensation, half by impotent anger against those I named my persecutors.

"These thoughts pursued me through my dreams and were with me when I awoke. From my window, in the early morning, I saw Miss Ray with the children in the grounds, and I hastened to join her, that I might seek forgiveness for the unintentional wrong I had done her. The presence of the children removed all impropriety from the act, and I thought I should feel more in charity with myself if I assured this young lady that, let her position here be what it would, I felt for her as much respect as for the highest lady in the land.

"When I had returned to the house, half-an-hour later, I had made a discovery, and that was that I should never be quite happy until I had the right to repeat the kiss I had stolen as often as I chose—and, further, that that was likely to be very often indeed. If Miss Ray had looked very pretty, delicate, and refined under the advantageous circumstances attending our first meeting, all these attractions were enhanced by the clear morning air, her own modest self-respect, and the charming embarrassment which the sight of me caused her. I had come down to the Elms priding myself on my confirmed bachelorhood, and contrasting my free, 'unhoused condition' most favourably with that of my friend Tom, who was the salve of the multitudinous fancies of a capricious wife. But all was changed! That kiss had wrought the miracle of revitalising the heart which I thought was dead to all tender emotions. I was as desperately in love—I at thirty-five—as any boy of twenty with his earliest flame.

"I did not see Miss Ray many times at the Elms. My respect for her, her own sense of propriety, alike forbade clandestine meetings. Sometimes she came into the drawing-room to play for the children's dances, when I always showed her marked deference. Once or twice I encountered her abroad. I learnt she had been discharged, and was about to go to London. I obtained her address there, and pleased myself with the thought of meeting her.

"I was disappointed in this. Only one night she spent with the relative to whose house I had been directed, and then went away to a distant situation which Mrs. Sheldon had procured for her. For a whole year—(do you not recall the restlessness that used to excite your mirth?)—I wandered about, my soul disquieted with an intense longing to see her once more, to snatch her from a life of toil, to claim her as mine, to make the kiss which was such a delicious memory, a sweet, ever-renewed reality.

"At last, when I had come almost to despair of the realisation of this intense desire, I suddenly and all unexpectedly encountered her one day in a public street. She had returned, and was staying with the relation of whom I knew. She met me with a blush and a smile, and a timid pressure of the hand that I interpreted as favourable to my hopes. And she did not deny me the pleasure of meeting her at her house.

"Encountered her one day in a public street."

"There is not much more to tell. I have told you about the kiss, and its consequences were for me the dearest, sweetest, brightest of pretty little wives—for her a home where she is cherished and beloved, and where I believe my efforts to make her happy have been entirely successful.

"Her only fault consists in the bit of sly malice with which she sometimes insinuates how different the consequences must have been had I chanced to catch and kiss somebody else on that memorable occasion—for instance, one of those black-eyed or flaxen-haired girls, who are now the very dear friends of Mrs. Laroque, once the poor Miss Ray."

A Deferred Duel.

We were stationed at a small town. The life of an officer of the line is well known; exercise and review in the morning, dinner at the captain's or at the tavern, in the evening a bowl of punch and cards. In the whole town there was no one who even dreamt of such a thing as receiving company. We used often to meet at a brother officer's in the evening, and only there caught sight of an epaulette.

In our little circle there was one Russian, a man about thirty-five years of age, and therefore considered quite a veteran among us. His greater experience gave him a certain authority, and his habitual serious, almost gloomy aspect and sharp tongue awed us. His very existence was enveloped in mystery. Although a typical Russian, his name was a foreign one; he had distinguished himself as an officer of the Tenth Hussars, and no one could imagine why he had left that regiment to live in a wretched little place, where life was not only monotonous, but costly.

He always went on foot wrapped in his black cloak, and though always cordial and pressing in his invitations to dinner, that meal consisted of merely two or three dishes, prepared by an old retired soldier; champagne, however, was poured forth freely. No one really knew whether he was rich or poor, but neither did anyone dare question him thereupon.

We had the freedom of his library, consisting almost entirely of military and romantic works. If perchance we forgot to return a borrowed book, we were never reminded to do so, but, on the other hand, I never knew him to return a book borrowed from us. His principal occupation was practising pistol-shooting; the walls of his room were literally honeycombed with pistol shots. A magnificent collection of pistols seemed to be the one luxury he allowed himself, and his skill in the use of the weapon was such that if he had proposed to shoot an apple off our very heads, not one of us would have hesitated to allow it.

Duels were often the theme of our conversations, but Sylvio, as we called him, never took part in such discussions; and if asked whether he had ever fought in a duel, would drily answer "Yes;" but the details of his encounter never followed, and it was well known that such questions were extremely disagreeable to him. We all felt certain that some victim of his fatal skill lay heavy upon his conscience.

Never was he suspected of cowardice; there are some men who carry in their very aspect a refutation to any such suspicion. Yet something occurred that greatly astonished us. One day there were ten of us dining at Sylvio's, and, as usual, drinking hard. After dinner we asked our host to take a hand at cards. Although contrary to his custom, he yielded to our entreaties, and throwing fifty ducats in the pool, began to deal. We all crowded round the table, and the game began. He played in silence, never raising a question nor asking an explanation. If the marker made a mistake he made good the deficiency, and if the error were in his favour, at once made a note of it.

We knew his ways of old, and let him alone; but this time there was present a comrade who had but lately joined us, and he, in a moment of distraction, doubled his bet. Sylvio made a note of it. The officer, thinking he had made a mistake, tried to explain, but Sylvio went on cutting the cards without heeding him. Losing patience, the officer seized a pencil and crossed out the extra sum: Sylvio took up the pencil and re-wrote it. Excited by drink and goaded by our laughter, his antagonist thought himself insulted, lost his temper, and catching up a candelabrum which lay near to his hand, hurled it at Sylvio's head, who dodged, narrowly escaping the dangerous missile. Rising, white with ire, and his eyes flashing:

"Leave the room!" he cried, "and thank God this has happened beneath my roof."

It was easy to foresee the result of such an encounter, and we all looked upon our comrade as a doomed man.

He left the room, saying that, having insulted his host, he was ready to give him any satisfaction he demanded.

We went on playing for a few moments, but seeing that Sylvio's mind was no longer on the game, we left for our respective lodgings, discussing the impending vacancy in our regiment. Next morning, at review, we were wondering whether the poor lieutenant was still alive, when he himself appeared on the scene. He had not yet heard from Sylvio. Going to the latter's house, later in the day, we found him in the yard, pistol in hand, shooting bullet after bullet into an ace of spades stuck on the back door. He received us as usual, and made no allusion to last evening's occurrence.

Three days went by, and our lieutenant was still in the flesh. We wondered if Sylvio would not fight. He did not, contenting himself with a slight excuse on the part of his opponent. This event cost Sylvio much of his prestige. At a certain age nothing is harder to forgive than cowardice, valour being considered the highest of all virtues and an excuse for all vices.

However, little by little the incident was forgotten, and Sylvio regained part of his ascendancy over us. Only I could never feel the same towards him, for more than all others had I been fascinated by him, my youthful imagination endowing him with all the attributes of the mysterious hero in a novel. I think he in turn liked me, for only when alone in my company did he forego his cynical manner, and talk openly, simply, and agreeably.

But, after the above incident, when, in my eyes, his honour had received a stain which he did not remove, I could not be the same with him, and found it perfectly impossible to meet his eye fairly. Sylvio was too clever not to perceive this change and divine its cause—indeed, he made several advances towards an explanation, which I refused to meet, until at last he apparently gave up. From that time I never saw Sylvio alone, and all intercourse between us ceased.

Inhabitants of great cities know nothing of the sensation caused by post days in a little town like ours. Tuesdays and Fridays, the officers' headquarters were filled with eager, expectant faces; one expects money, another letters, another newspapers. Letters are devoured at once, and the news goes the rounds, and is discussed on the spot. On such days headquarters present an animated appearance.

Sylvio received his letters through the military post, and was always with us on post days. On one such occasion he was handed a letter. I watched him as he tore it eagerly open and perused its contents with flashing eyes. His strange manner passed unnoticed, each one being absorbed in his own affairs.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I am obliged to leave here at once—to-night, in fact—but beg you will all previously dine with me for the last time. And I expect you, especially, without fail," he added, turning to me. He then hurriedly left us.

When I reached Sylvio's lodgings in the evening, my fellow-officer had preceded me. The furniture had already been removed, leaving nothing but the bare walls, so curiously honeycombed with bullet-holes. Our host was in good spirits, and we soon all followed suit; champagne-corks flew about, glasses were filled and refilled, and we heartily bade our friend God-speed. It was when we rose to go, when my turn came to say good-bye, Sylvio seized my hand and whispered:

"I must have speech with you."

I remained with him. When the last guest had left, he seated himself opposite me, and for some time we smoked in silence. Sylvio was deep in thought; not a sign remained of his nervous gaiety. As I looked at his pale face and eyes, encircled by the thick smoke of our pipes, he had the appearance of a spirit of the nether world. At last he broke silence:

"We shall probably not meet again. I wish to speak a few parting words. You may observe that I care little for public opinion, but I like you, and would regret leaving you under a false conception of my character."

He stopped to refill his glass. I remained silent.

"You have thought it strange I did not exact satisfaction from that drunken idiot who insulted me at cards. Having the choice of weapons, his life was in my hands, and mine in comparative security. I might attribute my behaviour to grandeur of soul, but disdain to lie; could I have punished him without risking my life, he would not have escaped."

I raised my eyes to Sylvio in horror.

"Yes, that is the truth," he continued. "I had no right to risk my life. Six years ago I received a blow, and the man who struck me still lives."

My curiosity was quickly excited.

"You did not fight?" I asked.

"We fought and here is the proof," he answered, at the same time taking up a soldier's cap and placing it upon his head. I noticed a small round hole just above his forehead. "I served in the Tenth Hussars. You know me, and perhaps have seen that I am used to be first in everything. In my youth it was to me an absolute necessity that it should be so. In my day it was fashionable to be fast; I was the wildest youngster in the regiment—in the army, I might say. Hard drinkers were much applauded. I could out-drink the famous Dobroski, whose prowess in that line was celebrated. In our regiment duels were of more than daily occurrence, and in each one I was either principal or second. My brother officers worshipped me, and my superiors let me alone as an incurable case.

"I was enjoying my laurels when a young man, rich and of illustrious lineage—permit me to withhold his name—joined us. Never had I met a more gifted man—young, talented, handsome, gay to excess, brave as a lion, of unbounded wealth—all these advantages were his besides his great name. You can well imagine the place he at once took among us. My sway was over. He at first sought my friendship, but was repulsed and drew back with indifference. I hated him; his popularity filled me with rage. I tried to draw him into a quarrel, but his answer to all my sarcastic speeches were so much wittier than mine that my rage and jealousy grew apace, for I felt his superiority.

"At length, one night at a ball, seeing him courted by all, and specially by a young lady I greatly admired, I approached him and whispered a bitter insult in his ear. This was too much, and, losing his temper, he struck me full in the face. We drew our swords. The ladies fainted! and although bloodshed was prevented on the spot, a duel was arranged that very night.

"At daybreak I was at the appointed place with two seconds, awaiting my rival with much impatience. It had been a sultry night, and the sun, just rising, was oppressively hot. In a few moments I saw him coming leisurely towards me, on foot, and with only one second. I advanced and saw he held his cap, which was full of cherries, in his hand. I had the right to shoot first, but my pulse beat so that I could not be sure of my aim, and therefore insisted that he should shoot first. He refused. We then agreed to draw lots. Fortune favoured her darling. He shot, and the bullet pierced my cap.

"It was my turn now—at last his life was in my hands. I looked eagerly at him, trying to find the slightest sign of fear. He was quietly awaiting my shot, eating cherries, the stones of which he threw at my feet. It was exasperating. 'What is the good,' thought I, 'of taking a life so little valued?' A devilish thought struck me. Dropping my hand I said:

"'Since you are breakfasting so calmly, you are scarcely prepared to die. Allow me to wait until you have finished your cherries.'

"'Do not distress yourself, sir, I pray,' he answered. 'You have one shot at me. At present, or at any time, I am at your service.'

"I turned to my seconds, saying: 'I will not shoot to-day.'

"The duel was over.

"I asked for leave of absence, and came to this little town, where revenge has been my daily thought. The time has come."

Sylvio handed me the letter he had received that day. Someone—an agent, I believe—wrote to say that the "individual in question was about to marry a beautiful young girl."

"You know," continued Sylvio, "who is the 'individual' alluded to. Well, I go to Moscow, and we will see if to-morrow or the day after he will be as indifferent to death as the morning he was eating cherries."

Sylvio stood up and paced up and down the room like a caged tiger. I watched him intently, and could see the fierce struggle the conflicting passions held in his breast.

In a moment the servant entered to say the horses were ready. Sylvio grasped my hand, we embraced, and, hurriedly seizing a travelling bag and a brace of pistols, which proved his only luggage, he sprang quickly into the carriage and was gone.

Many years after, business made it imperative for me to settle in the little town of Staroduv. In spite of steady occupations, I often missed the careless, happy life of former years. I never could get used to the long, companionless spring and winter evenings. The days were well enough spent, talking to my overseer, looking over the crops, or attending to the buildings I was having erected, but after sunset I was at a loss what to do with myself.

The few available books I knew by heart, my old housekeeper Nerolowna's stories wearied me, and the labourers' songs gave me the blues. I tried brandy, but "melancholy drunkards" abounded. My only neighbours were of this number, and their constant complaints and dullness were too much for me. Thus my sole refuge was to dine late and retire early, in this manner I could shorten the days and lengthen the nights.

Within four miles of my house lay a fine property belonging to the Countess Bercheneff. No one but the overseer lived there—the Countess had spent only the first month of her marriage on her beautiful estate. About two years after my coming to Staroduv, it was rumoured that the Countess and her husband would come to spend the summer at their beautiful country-seat. In fact, they arrived at the beginning of June, and, as was to be expected, their advent caused quite a commotion in our little town.

For my part, the coming of such charming neighbours made quite a change in my life. I was especially anxious to meet the Countess, and, accordingly, the first Sunday after their arrival I called to present my respects. As being their nearest neighbour I was shown into the Count's private sitting-room, which was luxuriously furnished—books, bronzes, rugs, bric-à-brac, an immense mirror over the mantelpiece, etc. It was so long since I had seen any finery of the kind that a strange shyness came over me, and I awaited my host's entrance with feelings akin to the trepidation of an office-seeker.

The door opened to admit a handsome, noble-looking man, about thirty-three years of age, who advanced and held out his hand with a pleasant smile. His frank and cordial reception somewhat restored my equanimity, and I was beginning to regain my usual manner, when the Countess entered and I at once relapsed into my former shyness. A truly beautiful woman! The Count presented me, and I floundered about trying to appear at ease, but in reality feeling very hot and uncomfortable. Perceiving my embarrassment, and with true tact and good breeding, the Count and Countess conversed between themselves, treating me as they would an old acquaintance.

As my eye wandered round the room it fell upon a picture hanging opposite me. It was not the painting itself—a Swiss landscape, I think, that arrested my attention, but two small round bullet-holes which pierced the picture, one immediately above the other.

"Humph! that was a wonderful shot," I could not help remarking.

"Yes, indeed," said the Count. "And you, are you a good shot?"

"Middling; with a pistol I am used to I can hit a card at thirty paces."

"Pretty good," said the Countess; then, turning to her husband: "Could you do as well?"

"I doubt it," he answered. "I used to be a good shot, but have not tried my hand for over four years."

"In that case, I'll wager you could not even hit a card at twenty paces. Without constant practice, one loses all dexterity. The best shot I ever knew split three bullets on the edge of a knife every day before dinner—but the practice was as great a necessity to him as the meal. Why, if there were a fly on the wall—you smile, Countess, but I swear 'tis true—he called to his servant: 'Cousma, a pistol!'—and bang! scarcely taking aim, there was the fly flattened out on the wall."

"Wonderful!" ejaculated the Count. "And what was your friend's name?"

"Sylvio."

"You knew Sylvio!" exclaimed the Count, excitedly starting up. "You knew Sylvio!"

"I more than knew him—we were friends. In the regiment he was considered one of us. I have not heard of him for five years: but to judge from your exclamation, Count, you also knew him?"

"Right well. If you were his friend, he must have told you a somewhat singular story——"

"About a blow received at a ball?"

"Yes; and did he tell you who struck him?"

"No." I glanced at the Countess. "It was you, Count?" I said.

"Yes, it was I," exclaimed he, much agitated; "and that picture there is a memento of our last interview."

"Oh, dearest," pleaded the Countess, "do not tell that story. I cannot bear it."

"I must. This gentleman knows how I insulted his friend. Let him now hear how that friend was revenged. I was married," he proceeded, "five years ago. The first month of our honeymoon was spent here. This house holds the happiest and saddest memories of my life. One evening, returning late from a ride, I found before the door a travelling chaise, and was told that a stranger, who had refused to give his name, was awaiting me in my study, having come on business relating to myself alone. I entered, and saw a tall, bearded man, dusty and travel-stained, leaning on the mantelpiece. I stood for a moment, gazing at him.

"'You do not know me, Count?' he asked.

"'Sylvio!' I exclaimed, and confess that my hair stood on end.

"'It is my turn to shoot,' he said; 'are you ready?'

"There was a pistol in his belt. I bowed in recognition of his right, and stood fronting him, only requesting him to shoot at once, before my wife came in.

"'I cannot see clearly,' he said, 'send for lights.'

"This was done, and I returned to my place, again asking him to be quick. He took aim, and I counted the seconds. My thoughts dwelt on my bride; it was a frightful moment. He dropped his hand and remarked:

"'Pity this pistol is charged with a bullet instead of a cherry stone.' Then, after a moment's pause, which seemed a century: 'Truly, I am not in the habit of shooting at a defenceless man; that would be more like a murder than a duel. We will draw lots again, and see who is to shoot first.'

"I think at first I refused, but remember finally loading my pistol. We then wrote our names on slips of paper, and drew lots from the very cap my ball pierced in our first duel. Fortune favoured me again.

"'You are very fortunate, Count,' said Sylvio, with a smile I shall never forget. I know not how it happened, but my ball struck that picture. Sylvio raised his hand and took aim. The expression on his face told me that I had no mercy to expect. At that supreme moment the door opened and Maria rushed in, and with a cry of horror threw her arms round my neck. Her entrance restored my equanimity. Laughing gaily, 'You foolish girl,' I said, 'why are you so frightened? Do you not see it is a joke—a wager? Come, now, go and drink a glass of water, and come back to be introduced to my old friend.'

But she did not believe me.

"'In Heaven's name, sir,' she said, turning to Sylvio, 'is this true? Is it only a wager—a joke?'

"'Of course—oh, of course,' answered he, 'it is only a joke. The Count likes to joke. He once, in joke, struck me a blow; again, in joke, he put a bullet through this cap, and now, of course in joke, he missed killing me for the second time. It is now my turn to joke.' So saying, he levelled the pistol at my breast.

"Maria understood, and cast herself at his feet.

"'Oh, for shame!' I cried; then turning to Sylvio: 'Come, sir, enough of this. Will you shoot—yes or no?'

"'No,' he returned; 'I am satisfied. Twice have I made you shoot at me, and twice have you missed. I have seen your fear, your anguish, your terror. Remember, I leave you to your conscience.'

"He turned towards the door to leave, but wheeling suddenly, almost without an instant's aim, fired and went out. To mark his skill he had put a ball through that picture immediately above mine.

"My wife had fainted. Sylvio passed out unmolested, the servants who saw him go not daring to interfere. He was off before I had recovered my surprise."

The Count was silent.

I had heard the end of a story, in the beginning of which I had been so deeply interested.

The Count had never seen Sylvio again. Later, in 1820, when Alexander Ipsilanti gave the signal for the uprising in Greece, it was surmised that Sylvio was in command of a Greek regiment, and met his death in the battle of Drazachan.

The Shadow-Hand

By Louis Tracy.

SUMMARY.

Prologue.—The Hon. Ernest Wentworth lies dying at his estate, Chisholme Park. His wife, a light, pleasure-loving creature, falls under the mesmeric influence of Armand Lemaitre, who, by force of will power, compels her to rob her husband. While in the act of extracting a bundle of notes from a bureau she is interrupted by the appearance of her husband, who enters the room in his bed-clothes, silently points at her with his fore-finger, and then falls down dead. She shortly afterwards leaves for Paris to join Lemaitre.

Captain Arthur Musgrave: In love with Edith Wentworth.
Doctor Danton: Armand Lemaitre, a mesmerist, in love with Edith Wentworth.
Professor Queech, Jack Heathcote. } Friends of Musgrave.
Tom Wilson: Servant to Arthur Musgrave.
Hawke: Danton's accomplice.
Edith Wentworth: Daughter of the late Hon. Ernest Wentworth.
Cécile Delisle: A young French girl with detective proclivities.

CHAPTER XII.

How the Debt of Honour was Paid.

Among the clapping of hands on the Grand Stand, as Lancet with her aristocrat-jockey forged past the winning-post a neck in front of Bon-gré, were the hands of Cécile Delisle. She was here with the rest of the house-party of the St. John-Heygates from Giltwood Towers. Wild with excitement, Cécile cried:

"Did I tell you not so? Tarare! From the first leap-off I knew the winner. I have gained three thousand pounds!"

Away she went flying down the stairs, across the swarming course towards the weighing-shed, where Musgrave, in the middle of a flushed and jabbering crowd of officers, stood in a long overcoat reaching to his spurred heels, smoking a cigarette.

Jack Lascelles had him by one hand, Evelyn Hardy was shaking off the other with congratulations.

"It's the most heroic piece of fighting that was ever done!" rose the voice of Lascelles above the noise.

"Thank you, my dear boy, but really—oh, confound it! let me go, there's a lady!"

It was Cécile. In a moment Arthur was bowing before her like a palm-tree courtly to the simoon. His face was no longer the "piece of white iron"; its colour had come back freshly, and it wore an amused and rather bored expression.

"I present you all the compliments," said Cécile. "You did that grandly."

"Thank you. I am glad you were not bored."

"I gained three thousand pounds."

"Excellent!"

"I knew you would win. I shall always believe in your luck now. You are sublime."

Arthur laughed.

"And you know there was a report that Lancet was hip-strung? Guess who caused it to be put out."

"I can't, really."

She put up her mouth to his ear.

"I!"

At this unblushing avowal of feminine immorality Arthur was pierced with laughter.

"That was naughty," he said, between his spasms.

"Oh, I don't think. Good-bye! Heard from Edith this morning."

She was gone.

Arthur's eyes, following her, fell upon the face of Lemaitre standing near. Lemaitre was looking steadily upon him. As he encountered Arthur's eyes, he beckoned to him with his forefinger.

For one instant Arthur paled to the lips. His life was in this man's hand—this man whom he had just made a beggar.

Lemaitre remained master of the situation. He was Arthur's god. Arthur walked towards that beckoning finger as though it were the summons of doom.

"I received your letter, Captain Musgrave," said Lemaitre; "but did not reply to it, knowing that I should meet you here. I congratulate you on your victory with Lancet. It was rather well done."

"Do you wish to speak to me now, on the subject of my letter, Dr. Danton?" said Arthur.

"Yes."

"Then if you will be good enough to follow me, I will lead you to a private room."

Arthur went elbowing a lane through the crowd, followed by Lemaitre. In one of the plank rooms of the saddling shed they sat on two cane-bottomed chairs, alone, facing each other: both quite placid in manner; both with hatred boiling in their bosoms.

Lemaitre began:

"So you have broken your word, then?"

"Yes."

"That was singular conduct, Captain Musgrave."

"I was drunk, to tell the truth. Drunken men act singularly."

"That is no answer."

"No?"

"Are you now 'engaged' to Miss Wentworth?"

"Practically."

"But so am I."

"That is nothing. She would not marry you. I think not."

"Why?"

"Her affections appear to be given to me."

"We shall see. But as to this conduct of yours, it would look bad—nasty—among gentlemen, I think."

"Dr. Danton, you perceive this whip? I shall flog you to the bone if you speak in that tone to me."

Dr. Danton, the chair creaking beneath his weight, smoothed down his imperial, looking up with an amused, open-mouthed speculation at the planking. But his pasty face was somewhat haggard from the ruin which had that day befallen him.

"But you admit," he said, "that your life is mine?"

"Fully," replied Arthur. "But you are not allowed to speak to me as if you were my equal. In spite of my broken pledge, I remain a gentleman, a man of honour. If you forget it, I shall be obliged to flog you again."

"I see." Danton gently stroked his imperial. "What penalty, may I ask, do you anticipate for your broken pledge?"

"It is of no importance what I anticipate. It is for you to direct. I am prepared to obey."

"I think, in honour, you should take your own life," said Danton musingly. "It is hard to expect one man to kill another in cold blood. And there is the chance of detection—afterwards."

"I do not consider that I am bound in honour to take my own life. I have told you so. I refuse to do that. And the danger of detection to you could be reduced to a minimum by a little ingenuity."

"Suppose you live. You must never see Miss Wentworth again."

"Yes, I shall see her—if I live. I am as much bound to her now as I am to you. I can never desert her—if I live."

"So you refuse at least two of my directions."

To this point Danton had cunningly and designedly brought the dialogue. Everything that he said was with a purpose. He smoothed his imperial, looking up, musing, speculating. A grand scheme had matured in his brain.

"At least two of my directions," he repeated. "And yet you profess to hold yourself at my service."

"Those two I refuse," said Arthur. "In any other points I am willing to obey you."

"In any other points, you say?"

"Yes."

"But I can't think of any other points. Except I take your life with my own hands."

"Then that you must do."

"'Must' is the right word," said Danton. "There remains nothing else. You yourself have pushed me, as you say, 'into a corner.'"

"I am prepared—at whatever time is most convenient to yourself—with whatever weapon you will. My address for some weeks will be The Barracks, Ilminster. Or, I am ready at this moment, if it suits you."

"Very well, Captain Musgrave. I shall write to you. You cannot yourself suggest any other way out of the difficulty?"

"No."

"There is perhaps the pecuniary——"

"So you refuse at least two of my directions."

Arthur burst into a laugh. The idea of money occurring to the mind of the man in such a question between gentlemen inexpressibly tickled him. Then, all of a sudden, his laughter ceased, he turned utterly white—sick with hope—with the sudden sweet hope that perhaps he might be able to purchase Edith, to purchase happiness, life itself, from this man, with gold coin of the realm.

Danton was looking away from him.

"There is the pecuniary motive," he repeated, "which we have not referred to. It is the only one left."

"Yes—yes," said Arthur, tingling with hope. "Let me hear. I am, you know, a fairly rich man to-day."

"Just so. I won the duel; you the race——"

"Yes, yes; let me hear."

"As you have deprived me of the fruits of my victory at the duel, which I fairly won, perhaps we might compromise, if you repay me with the fruits of your victory at the race, which you fairly won."

In an instant, as the words passed Danton's mouth, Arthur was himself again. A new youth seemed to laugh in him, and the burden of a world was lifted from his shoulders.

"Dr. Danton," he said laughing, "you are a sad ruffian, but you are a brilliant genius. I am perfectly at your disposal, and I shall thank you most awfully."

"Stay, Captain, not too fast. Your allusions to my character do not, you see, trouble me. I regard you, believe me, as a mere brainless soldier, beneath the contempt of a serious man of the world. First of all, let me hear how much you are worth at this moment."

"As nearly as possible about £100,000."

"Not more?" Danton glanced sharply at him.

"You see the whip. I shall not fail to use it if you express doubt of my word. You are, really, a frightful ruffian, Danton!" laughed Arthur.

Danton scratched his bald temple a little.

"A £100,000," he said; "that, I take it, represents the amount of your gains to-day?"

"No. I won £50,000 more to-day."

"Are you prepared to part with the £100,000?"

"No. That is not what you proposed. It is no good my purchasing my life if I am to be a beggar. But I am prepared to part with my gains. I don't care a hang for money.

If your voracious maw can take it all in I will give you £75,000, my win to-day and the money I put up to win it. I think that should satisfy even you."

Danton was looking upward smoothing his imperial with a beatific smile.

"Well," he said, "I do not wish to be hard. It is only a question of when. I am about to leave the country immediately. If you can give me the amount at once I agree."

"I can't, of course, give it you at once. But I dare say I could manage it in a couple of hours."

"How will you give it me?"

"In cheques, notes, and the like."

Danton looked at his watch.

"It is now nearly two. Shall we say four?"

"Very good."

"I am at the Bear Hotel in the town. Will you send me the amount?"

"Yes. And now let us distinctly understand the conditions. I purchase my life from you; and I am henceforth free of the promise to which I bound myself—free to speak to Miss Wentworth, to visit her, to marry her?"

"I agree."

"And you, on your part, cease wholly from the absurd solicitations with which I suspect you have hitherto pestered Miss Wentworth?"

Danton smiled benignly upon him.

"That was no part of my proposal," he said; "why do you drag in that stipulation? I do not at all accept it."

"But you must."

"Why so?"

"I may reconsider my decision, otherwise."

"There is no fear of that, I think. And are you so jealous of me?"

"You are a frightful wretch, Danton. Imagine my being jealous of vermin like you."

"Well, the condition you name," said Danton, "is not worth talking over. I agree. I give Miss Wentworth to you. You can have her. I shall never see her again, most likely. You have my benediction."

"At four, then. At the Bear," said Arthur, rising.

"When, by-the-way," said Danton, "will you see Miss Wentworth again?"

"To-morrow. Why?"

"To-morrow! You leave for London to-night, then?"

"No. To-morrow by an early train. Why?"

"Nothing. I wished to know if you would be in Drayton to-morrow in case I wished to see you about any detail. I suspected you would be anxious to hurry to the presence of the lady."

Arthur was gone. The face of Danton wore a broad and beaming smile of beatitude.

CHAPTER XIII.

The Flight from Home.

Danton had to meet Hawke at three at the starter's shed.

From two to three he sat dreamily looking upward where Arthur had left him, as though he had not a care in the world, but immediately before three he was up with a brisk jerk, and walked rapidly forth to the shed.

"I told you the darned horse would lose," said Mr. Hawke, coming to meet him in a horsey-looking grey overcoat and soft hat.

"Hold your tongue, Hawke," said Lemaitre.

"Oh, that's all very fine, mate ——"

"Hawke, I think I told you to hold your tongue. You are a lucky man. I have got a job for you."

"But about this horse business ——"

"A job for you. What do you think is the figure you will get?"

"A job? Are you in funds, then, after all?"

Lemaitre winked.

"Good biz!" exclaimed Hawke. "Well, you are a one, I must say! A job, is it? I am your man."

"What do you think is the figure?"

"Two thousand?" said tentative Mr. Hawke.

"Say ten," hinted Lemaitre.

Hawke made a twist of joy with his elbow and clenched fist into the air, looking as if he wanted to cut capers.

"When can you let us have it?"

"To-morrow."

"What, not to-day?"

"Some of it to-day. Be at the Bear Hotel, in Drayton at four sharp. And meanwhile—no drink, remember! We have to leave for London to-night."

"I told you the darned horse would lose."

"Oh, I say—not to-night, mate."

"To-night, Hawke."

"Can you let us have a quid now? I'm broke."

Lemaitre handed him a sovereign, turned away, and jumped into a cab.

The first thing he did on reaching the inn was to search the railway-guide for the trains leaving Drayton for London. He dashed it down with an oath.

"Spoiled! foiled! ruined!" he hissed between his teeth. "Curse the trains!"

He had found that the last train for London left Drayton at five minutes to four, and he was bound to wait till four, or after for the money.

Presently he took up the guide again. At his second glance his face brightened.

"One leaves at six in the morning," he muttered, moving his big, fat finger along the line; "he will not go by that. Flaccid, lackadaisical British officers do not rise at six in the morning. I will go by that. The next does not leave till eight. Good! I shall have two hours' start of him. Two hours is the universe. I am safe. But stop! the eight train is an express; the six train is not. I shall not have two hours! That is abominable luck. Still—still—we must see! Edith, you are mine, my child!"

Sharp at four Tom Wilson was ushered into the presence of Lemaitre in a private room of the hotel.

"Hoo am A to know that thoo's t'right man?" said Tom, in his over-cautiousness, though Arthur had described Lemaitre to him.

Lemaitre handed him a card. Tom began fumbling in an inner pocket, and presently drew out a packet bound with elastic.

Lemaitre took a sheet of paper, and began totting up the amounts registered on all varieties of paper-money, as, one by one, he examined the documents.

"It is right," he said at last. "Here is a duly stamped receipt."

"Thank 'oo," said Tom.

"What time does your master leave for London in the morning?" asked Lemaitre.

"He did na' tell me to say," replied Tom.

"That is right," said Lemaitre. "You are a good servant. Never blab too much, my boy. Here's half a sovereign for you. You do not know, for instance, if he is going by the six o'clock train?"

"A know. But he did na' tell me to say. All the gold A want A get from Cécile Delisle, thank 'oo."

"From whom?"

"Cécile Delisle."

"Why, I know that lady—intimately. I am sure she would be so angry at a servant of hers who refused to answer a question which I put to him."

"Well, she did na' say that, 'oo see," said Tom. "A will ask her."

Tom turned and walked away.

As soon as he reached Arthur's inn, he sought him out and said:

"T'gent'eman wan'ed to know if you're going by t' six o'clock train, t'morn, sir."

"Did he, Tom?" yawned Arthur. "It is of no importance."

"He seemed gar anxious to know, sir."

"Did he? Very well. Do not trouble yourself, Tom."

The next morning, while it was yet dark, Hawke and Lemaitre stepped into the early train. Arthur and Tom, in a far swifter train, were flying towards London at a few minutes past eight.

It was a mad race—a race far more momentous than the last which Arthur and Lemaitre had run on the course at Drayton Common; a race in which minutes were to decide the fate of several lives.

The two men in the front train knew that they were running it. At every stoppage at a station, Lemaitre groaned inwardly. In the train behind, Arthur lounged with half-closed eyes, which only opened with an occasional flash of interest when he now and then realised that he was about to see her—his life; was about to explain the strangeness of his conduct in constantly shunning her; to clear up the mystery of the statements which Danton had made about him to her.

At the time Lady Hilton had not yet returned from Cannes. The London season was hardly begun. Two days later Cécile was to leave the St. John-Heygates and join Edith at the Hilton town-house at Hyde Park, whither Edith had come in advance, in order to spare Lady Hilton the trouble of making certain domestic rearrangements.

They were half-way to London before Lemaitre explained to Hawke the object of their flight.

"But how are you going to prove it?" said Hawke.

"Hawke, you are a fool," replied Danton. "Can't you guess, without being told, that in that class of life people are not for ever doubting what other people of the same class tell them? They simply accept the facts of which they are informed as true—and they are usually right. Besides, we must find proofs."

"You find them, then; I can't."

"I told you that I knew something of her mother from her own lips. She already has a suspicion that her mother was not all she should have been. And it was my knowledge that she has this suspicion that put the scheme into my head. As she already has the suspicion, it will not be difficult to make her believe that her mother was even worse than she thinks her. You see, Mr. Hawke, you see?"

"But you want some proof, mate. Listen to me: I know my way about better'n you. You must have proof. What was the mother's name?"

"Juliet—was it Juliet she told me?—yes, Juliet."

"And what did she look like?"

"I have no idea. But it is of no consequence. She never saw her mother."

"Why, your wife was named Juliet, or something similar, wasn't she?"

"Mr. Hawke, be quiet," said Lemaitre.

The train drew up at a station. Lemaitre fidgeted in his seat, and impatiently scratched his temple, crying out at last: "Oh, curse the slow train!"

"But how of these proofs?" said Hawke, when they were once more in motion; "don't go dragging me in anything that you don't see the way out of, mate."

Lemaitre undid his huge fur-lined overcoat, then the undercoat, than the mauve waistcoat, and from an inner pocket of this he drew a small photograph.

"Take this, Hawke," he said, "and show it to her as the portrait of her mother. It isn't unlike herself about the eyes, now I look at it; and it is something tangible—what you call a proof. She will not stop to think that that might be *any*body's likeness. Young ladies are not als gaol-birds, Mr. Hawke."

While the train was moving Lemaitre continued to speak in this half-playful way, as if utterly unconcerned about anything. The moment it stopped, he was like a restless lion.

Hawke took the photograph and glanced at it.

"Golly! but this here is the portrait of your own old girl, ain't it?"

"Silence! Silence, you elephant!" cried Lemaitre angrily.

"But suppose she's got an old portrait of her mother? You don't know, you know," said Hawke.

"It is highly improbable," answered Lemaitre. "We must risk that. For the rest, you must trust to me. I will manage."

When the train drew up at the London terminus, the two men instantly pelted themselves into a cab and drove in the direction of Hyde Park. They had little time to spare. The train, which, with flying shrieks, was sweeping Arthur to the rescue of his beloved, was due in London in half-an-hour's time.

Lemaitre and Hawke alighted before the Hilton mansion overlooking the Park from the east side.

"Is Miss Wentworth at home?" asked Lemaitre of the footman, with hurried breath.

"Yes, sir."

"Give her this card—quick."

It was five precious minutes before Lemaitre was standing in the drawing-room, waiting, waiting, counting the ticks of the clock. Hawke he had asked permission to leave below in the breakfast-room. And, indeed, Mr. Hawke had by no means the physiognomy and appearance of them who frequent the drawing-rooms of Vere de Vere.

Edith sailed in—rather white and scared of face.

"Edith—dear child——" Lemaitre had her hand. "My poor girl—I come to-day an ominous visitor. I have no time to talk. You must nerve yourself to hear something not pleasant—poor—poor—little Edith!"

"What is it? Speak."

She had gone utterly pallid.

"A misfortune—a calamity has befallen me—and you. There is a man—a dreadful being—how can I tell my child?—who claims to be your father——"

"My father?"

She tittered a little frightened laugh.

"Yes. And undoubtedly his claim is well-founded. That is the worst of it. He has been seeking you, he says, for five years. A month ago, just as he had discovered your whereabouts, and was about to claim you, I ran across him by a series of extraordinary chances. Since then, by means of bribes, threats, cajoleries, I have succeeded in keeping him away from you. But I can no longer control him. To-day he broke from me, and started to come to you. I thought it better to come with him, to break the news to you. Poor Edith—my little child!"

"But," she cried, gazing wildly round, "am I mad? or are you? My father is Ernest Wentworth, brother of Lord Hilton."

"No. Ernest Wentworth was your mother's husband, but not your father. Your mother was not—was not—a correct lady, Edith. You guess how I pity you—pity myself—for you are me—but it is useless to kick against the pricks. You must envisage facts, my poor child The brute below is your father. He has shown me proofs which no mind can resist."

"Below you say? He is here?" she whispered, a mortal ashen terror overspreading her face.

"Yes. He could not be kept out. But do not be frightened. He is locked into the breakfast-room. My proposal is that you fly with me at once."

"With you?" She repeated the words mechanically after him, without meaning.

"Yes. Or would you care to see your father first, and examine his proofs."

"His proofs?" She repeated the words absently, and stood with open lips, blanched and dry, all stunned and powerless.

"Will you see him? He is your father, you know."

"My father — I know?"

"Come, Edith—dear—collect yourself — one minute," he said, frowning deeply upon her with his old intense frown. "He is your father. Will you see him?"

"You know this—yes or no?"

"Yes—if he is my father—I will see him," she said in a sort of trance.

Lemaitre touched a bell.

"Show the stranger up here," he said to the footman.

Edith stood with open, white lips, amazed and stupid.

Hawke's broad mass rolled into the room.

"Oh, not he!" burst in a shrill shriek from Edith.

"None of that!" said Hawke in a deep bass of paternal authority. "Learn to respect your parents, or I'll teach ye! Do you know this?"

Edith had backed in shrinking panic to the furthest corner of the room. Hawke, step by step, followed her, holding before her the photograph of Julie Lemaitre.

"You know this—yes or no?"

The hard heart of Lemaitre could not bear to witness this awful scene. He had walked out of the room, and stood waiting in the corridor outside.

"Why don't you answer me? Don't you know the face of yer own mother?"

Edith glanced at it, cringing in her corner.

"Yes," came in a faint whisper from her.

"You do know it?" asked Hawke, surprised.

"Yes."

"You have a photo of her, then?"

"Yes."

"Well, I've come for yer. You b'long to me. Will you come?"

"Oh!—call Dr. Danton for me—will you, like a good—a good father? Call him for me—pray—he has deserted—he has left me——"

Her voice broke down in a long wail.

"Here, Doctor!" called Hawke in a harsh voice.

Danton came in hurriedly, and Hawke retired.

Edith put her hand on Danton's shoulders.

"Oh, save me from him!" she whispered—"save me!—see if you can get him down again—pray do! Take me away—I will go with you—anywhere——"

"Now, look here, my man," said Danton roughly to Hawke, "you will have to wait, and behave yourself. You will make your daughter ill. Go downstairs for a while."

Hawke rolled away, and left the two together.

"Now," said Danton, "while he is in the breakfast-room we shall be able to slip out. I promise you to rid you of him for ever. Go—put on your hat quickly. I will wait here."

She cast a scared glance at him, a hunted dismay in her face, like the hopelessness of a deer surrounded by hounds. She ran from the room, flew up to her chamber, put on a hat and cloak, covered her face with a thick veil, and threw the contents of her jewel-box in a pocket. She seemed now, once freed from the proximity of Lemaitre, to have acquired an intense collectedness of mind. She forgot nothing; she took her purse, a small travelling-bag with a few things crammed into it. Then she sat at a desk and scribbled three notes—one to Arthur, one to Cécile, one to Lady Hilton, three lines each to each, in the same words:

I am gone for ever. I am not what you think me. I am no fit companion for you and yours. Do not try to follow.

Love! love! from EDITH.

She enclosed and directed the three notes, then slipped quietly down the stairs, out into the garden at the back, out by a gate in the garden wall to a small lane, out from this to crowded Piccadilly, and into a passing cab. She drove away towards Victoria.

Lemaitre was waiting with feverish anxiety for her in the drawing-room, Hawke in the breakfast-room.

At this time Arthur had arrived in London, and, with Slipped out by a gate in the garden wall.

Tom Wilson, was driving westward in a cab. A strong impatience to be with Edith had seized upon him, and the horse was tearing through the streets.

Lemaitre looked at his watch in a madness of uneasiness as the time dragged bitterly on. He saw that his half hour of grace was gone. What should he do? He rang, and sent the servant post haste to look for Edith.

"Say that one minute more will be all too late!" he hissed with distorted face.

The servant was away more than two minutes, and returned with astonished face. She found Lemaitre nearly frantic.

"Miss Wentworth is certainly not in the house, sir," she said. "I have looked for her everywhere."

With a gurgled oath, Lemaitre dashed down the steps. He wanted no more duels in England. He looked in at the breakfast-room an instant with a "Come, you ass!" and hurried by the astonished footman through the front door.

As Arthur drove up to the door, Tom Wilson caught sight of Lemaitre's broad spread of back hastening away some distance to the north. Hawke had gone another way.

"There's the Frenchman who wanted to know what train 'oo left by, sir," said Tom.

Arthur glanced and saw him. In a moment he was inside the house.

"Miss Wentworth seems to have gone out, sir," a servant said.

"Vile luck, that's all," said Arthur. He returned to his cab, and drove to his hotel.

He thought that Edith had gone out for an hour or two. The apparition of Danton suggested nothing to him.

Within twenty minutes from the time Edith had left the house, Lady Hilton arrived. She was expected, and was astonished at the absence of Edith. Looking about in much wonderment, she found the three notes on the escritoire in Edith's boudoir.

The old lady fainted in the arms of a maid.

Half-an-hour later she opened her eyes, and sat up in the bed, an eager straining look in her eyes.

"My child! my child——" she moaned. Then, stretching out her arms in wild appeal:

"Oh, Cécile! Cécile! if you were only here to get me back my child!"

TELEPHONE COMPETITION.

The following is the attempt sent in by winner, whose name appeared last week:

"Are you there? Number 46,532, please. Hurry up."

"Ah! That you, Charlie?"

"Yes, who are you?"

"Jack."

"Just the fellow I want to see. How do you feel after last night?"

"First-rate, thanks."

"I wish I did. I'm in the deuce of a scrape."

"No; really?"

"Fact. It's all through that beastly ball."

"Oh, I say, you had it pretty hot last night, old man, didn't you?"

"Never such a fool in my life, I'm in danger of an action for breach. I'm afraid——"

"Eh, what?"

"It's a fact. I actually proposed, and you know I am engaged to the dearest little girl in the world."

"By Jove! I'm glad it wasn't me. Tell me all about it."

"She didn't come in till late, and I don't think you saw her. A fetching little woman in red."

"No, I didn't; I got home fairly early."

"Wish I'd gone with you. She quite turned my head."

"Poor beggar, I pity you; go on."

"Well, we danced once, and then sat out all the rest."

"Good gracious! You don't say so!"

"Fact. And the champagne was heady and—and she was so pretty and—well, before we parted we got quite confidential."

"What in the world did you say? I hope to goodness you——"

"I talked no end of nonsense, and you'll have to get me out of the scrape. You see I gave her one of your cards instead of my own."

"Great Scott! whatever shall I do. She'll, she'll——"

"Oh, no she won't, for when she saw the card she went into fits of laughter, and called me an imposter. I ought to have remembered that she heard my name when we were introduced. I got out of it by saying you were my dearest friend, and a perfect Don Juan."

"Hang you! What a fool you are."

"Not a bit, she wasn't the sort to be shocked, and directly she heard the character I gave you she said she'd call upon you, just as I knew she would. When she does so you must tell her I have been called away to Jericho or Timbuctoo. By-the-bye, of course your wife hasn't got home yet from her mother's?"

"No, no, not yet."

"Then it's all right. You are just the man to console her for my absence. You admire little women, don't you?"

"Yes."

"Well, then she's just your style, and the task won't be difficult, for I rather think in spite of all that she's married."

"Well, you are——"

"Nonsense. It was only a lark and she's a fearful flirt. She told me her name was Nellie Brown, but the letters on her bangle were N. J., and I fancy I heard the hostess call her Mrs. Jones. I shouldn't like to be her husband, and, by Jove, I feel so sorry for him that I'm half inclined to think I behaved badly."

"You did."

"I don't know. She deserved it, and her husband ought to look after her better. I don't think I did him such a very bad turn."

"But I say you did."

"Oh, it's all very well for you to be a St. Anthony. You don't know what a syren she is. Black eyes, black hair——"

"Oh, be quiet."

"What's the matter? Good gracious. Your name's Jones? You don't mean to say——?"

"I do, and I never want to hear of you again."

"Oh, Lord—upon my word, old fellow—I'm very sorry—but—"

"Oh, you——"

DENNY.

The incident was told to me years ago, when I was second assistant engineer with the Golden Crown Mining Company at Red Dog. At the time it raised by several notches, in my opinion, those rough miners with whom I was so constantly associated; and in later years I have often recalled it when the course of events has brought me face to face with the hypocrisy of a large city.

It was told me the eve before St. Patrick's Day, for I remember having started for a ball given by the Irish element. The night was clear and cold, but the wind was so sharp that I was chilled through, and stopped at the Traveller's Rest for a warming glass of stimulant.

I pushed the door open—the old bullet-scarred door with its heavy hinges—and entered the bar-room. The usual crowd was not in evidence, and of the five occupants, four were in the act of taking their departure. They carried their shovels with them, and as they passed me and went out on the windy street they wished me a good evening. The door closed behind them and I was left alone with Parson Sam.

I walked to the big stove, and while warming my hands asked if the boys were going that night.

Sam pulled at his pipe, and replied, "No."

I remarked the fact that they had their shovels with them, and asked for what use they were intended. Sam took the pipe from his mouth, expectorated in the direction of the base of the bar, and replied:

"Goin' to give Denny an airin'."

"And what is the matter with Denny? Where is he?" I asked.

"Nothin' at present," he replied; "he's in the cemetery on the hill."

"Dead?" I asked.

"Yes," he replied.

"And who was Denny?"

A look of surprise came over his face as he asked:

"You haven't heard of Denny, Mr. Hopkins?" and then, after a moment's pause, he added: "Well, maybe that ain't so strange, after all. You've only been in Red Dog some six or eight months, and Denny died just five years ago, comin' to-morrow."

"And why do they remember him so well now?" I asked.

Sam removed his arm from the back of his chair, rested his elbows on his knees, and, gazing through the open door of the stove at the flickering flames, told me the story of Denny:

"You see, Denny was sorter mild like, awfully gentle and quiet spoken, you know, so the boys didn't pay much attention to him, 'cept when they were in bad humour, and wanted someone to take it out on. He took it all in a quiet, good-natured sort of way, never thinkin' of hittin' back, so we all thought he didn't have no sand. At least that's what we thought until that St. Patrick's Day about which I'm tellin' you.

"There was a good deal of drinkin' goin' on the night before, and four patriotic Irishmen kept it up until they were regular blind. They were a sorry lot when they showed up for work the next day, and the boss gave them a regular rakin' down.

"That mornin' was the first time I ever saw Denny show any temper. He was mad clear through at the thought of workin' on St. Patrick's Day, and refused to take his pick out of the tool shed. When the boss comes up to him and asks what's the matter, Denny just points to the green ribbon pinned on the front of his shirt, and says: 'It's St. Patrick's Day, and I don't work.'

"Any other man would have been given his walkin' papers as quick as shootin', but, somehow or other, the boss always made an allowance for Denny.

"'But we can't stop work, Denny,' he says.

"Denny stood sort of stubborn-like and replied: 'Well, you oughter have some sort of celebration, or, at least, run up a green flag over the office.'

"The boss was for humourin' him, and says: 'And we are goin' to celebrate. At ten o'clock we be a-goin' to fire off a blast in honour of old St. Pat that will blow all the snakes out of Ireland.'

"'At ten?' says Denny.

"'Yes, at ten,' replied the boss.

"That sort of satisfied him. Without another word he seized his pick and went after the boys, a-singin' some Irish song.

"The boss wasn't jokin', for just about the time he said, he called for all hands to leave work, and the engineer came in, and placed the dynamite cartridge and the machine for settin' it off.

"We all got at a safe distance, and stood there awaitin' the explosion. Denny was almost beside himself with delight, and steppin' out a little in advance, he called out for his pal, Jim, to join him, and see the snakes come wrigglin' out of the shaft. But Jim didn't answer, for he wasn't there.

"The engineer, who was a-holdin' his watch, seein' that things went off in time, turned round when he heard this, and got awful white. It didn't take no time for us to find we were four short, and them four the ones that had been so drunk the night before. Not a man spoke, 'cept the engineer, and he just said: 'good Heavens!' We all knew them fellows were still in the mine.

"Then it was that Denny made the sixty of us out to be cowards, and him a hero. Without a word he ducked his head atween his shoulders, and set off for the shaft as fast as his legs could carry him, the green ribbon a-flutterin' over his shoulder.

"One or two of us made a move as if to follow him, but the engineer threw out his arm to stop us, and his voice sounded mighty strange when he yelled: 'It's death—forty seconds.'

"We all knew then that the cartridge would go off in forty seconds, and that we had seen the last of Denny. It sort of paralysed the boys, and they just stood round like so many statues.

"To me it seemed as if there was something closin' in on all sides of me—a sort of interferin' with my breathin'—and for the life of me I couldn't take my eyes off the engineer as he stood there holdin' his watch. He was as white as a piece o' paper, and the moisture was runnin' down his face just like it was mid-summer.

"Forty seconds ain't much, Mr. Hopkins, but it seemed like a year to me. I was just beginnin' to think that maybe Denny had got there in time after all, when the engineer let go his watch, and sort o' slipped down, prayin' like. The time was up, and the cartridge exploded.

"They say that drunken men has luck, and I reckon it's so, for them four drunken Irishmen weren't hurt at all. They were lyin' flat in the side tunnel when the cartridge went off, and aside from bein' nearly smothered, got off without a scratch. But it wasn't that way with Denny. He must have been right by the machine when the explosion took place, for he was all sort o' caved in, and his green ribbon was as black as a piece of coal.

"Men had been killed in the mines afore, but never like this, and for the first time there was a complete shut-down—all in the honour of Denny. He had the biggest funeral that ever took place in Red Dog.

"We all felt as though we should like to do somethin' for him, for you see we hadn't treated him just right when he was with us; but we didn't know just what to do, until the engineer purposed that we plant grass on his grave. There wasn't no grass in the graveyard, you know, and we thought it would please him to have somethin' green growin' over him. You see, it was green he was a-wearin' when he died tryin' to save the boys.

"So we had the engineer sent to Chicago for the best grass seed that could be had, and when spring arrived we hauled dirt from the valley and planted it.

"Ever since then, on the night before St. Patrick's Day, a committee—one man from each workin' gang—goes up and shovels away the snow and makes things ship-shape. So when the sun comes a-peepin' and a-smilin' over Balden's Ridge, a-lightin' up St. Patrick's Day, there'll be one little spot of green in the big white wilderness, and the ribbons will be a-flutterin' from the stakes as mark out Denny's claim.

"That's what the boys be a-doin' now."

A WALK WITH ISHBEL.

"I DON'T mind talking to you, you know," said Ishbel—she insists on being spelt that way—"because you're not a stupid boy, and you have a nice, detached point of view; but you must promise when I tell you things not to imagine I mean myself."

"How could I imagine you a thing?" I asked reproachfully.

"You know what I mean," said Ishbel with severity. "When I was quite young," she pursued—she is twenty-two—"I used to fancy that authors put themselves into their stories. Now I know they never do."

"Well, I am not quite young," I said crossly. "Go on."

"But you didn't promise."

"I promise."

Ishbel adjusted her hat-pin. "Once there was a girl," she began, "who, at the age of seventeen, was sent to Scotland to visit her father's people. That's rather a nice beginning, isn't it?" she interrupted herself. "It sounds as if it might be print. Do you think if you saw a story with a beginning like that you would read it?"

"Candidly?"

"Of course."

"I don't think I should."

There was a dangerous glitter in her eye.

"But," I hastened to add, "reading a story is very different to having you tell it, you know. I could listen to you for a thousand years."

She was mollified. "It won't take that long," she assured me with a smile. There is no word for her smile but delicious.

"Do go on," I said. "Did she like the people?"

"Well, some of them," doubtfully. "You see they were Scotch and she was English."

"Yes."

"And—and young, and they bullied her a little. The next time"—with animation—"I mean—when I go, I don't think they'll bully me."

"I don't fancy they will."

"And so, you see, she didn't have as good a time as she might exactly. But she did have a love affair."

"Oh," said I.

"Yes," said Ishbel, poking the ground with her parasol, "with a detrimental."

"Oh," said I again.

"Yes," said Ishbel. "He was a sort of distant connection of hers, a solicitor, you know. He—he said he was very much in love—and so was she."

"Confound——" I begun.

"I beg your pardon!" said Ishbel.

"I mean," I said sternly, "it is very wrong of detrimentals to make love to girls."

"It is," agreed Ishbel. "But he was very—oh, very honourable. Things had gone, well, they had gone rather far, you know, but the week before she returned,

She had a love affair.

when he proposed—at least, he didn't exactly propose, but he told her he had only three hundred a year, and that, of course, it was out of the question to marry on that, and he couldn't bear the idea of hampering her with a long engagement, and—what did you say?"

"Oh, nothing!"

"Are you sure? You put me out. Well, he said she must not be engaged to him, but he would hold himself engaged to her, and some day when the senior partner dropped off—I do wish," petulantly, "you wouldn't mutter like that!"

I grovelled.

"Where was I?" demanded Ishbel. "Oh, well, then they said good-bye, you know, and she was perfectly miserable—if you look so horribly cross I shall send you home—oh, dreadfully miserable! She felt that she didn't care a straw about other men. Balls and parties had no attraction for her, and fancy, for ever so long she hardly took any interest in her frocks! Oh, it was horrid! She only lived for his letters—and somehow they—well, they were not exactly satisfactory. She supposed it was because he was so very honourable, and they were not exactly engaged, you know. But one day she thought it all over, and decided that sort of thing would have to come to an end. She knew she would never be really happy for a moment till he came, as she knew he would some day, to claim her; but she made up her mind to stop thinking about him as much as possible, and to be a little nice to other men, and try to seem happy, no matter how perfectly miserable she was in reality. The idea was, you see—I think she got it out of a poem—to lock his image up in her heart."

"I see," said I. "And how did it work?"

"It worked very well," said Ishbel reflectively. "She knew she was wretched, but she didn't allow herself to think about it."

"And what happened?" I asked briskly.

"Well, after three years he came."

"Oh! he did!"

"Of course!" said Ishbel sharply. "Did you imagine he didn't?"

I coughed. "And she unlocked her heart?" I enquired.

"Yes," said Ishbel.

"And the image?"

"It's a very odd thing," replied Ishbel slowly, "but it wasn't there!"

I coughed again. "Was her heart—did she find the receptacle—er—empty?" I asked.

"She didn't tell me that," said Ishbel.

We walked on.

"So that," I remarked presently, "was the reason why that long-legged Scotch fellow——"

"But you promised!" cried Ishbel.

A. G. Warwick.

The Incendiary.

I.

BORN on Saffron Hill, her mother English, her father an Italian, handed over for a consideration to a padrone when seven years old, married at eighteen to a brute, Lucrezia Batti could scarcely be expected to develop angelic attributes. This is the story of her career:

When a compatriot stabbed her ruffianly husband to death in a drunken brawl, Mrs Batti was left with a couple of wheezy organs, a small quantity of battered furniture, and a two-year-old daughter. The funeral expenses swallowed up the organs; her landlord seized all the furniture of any value for rent. Not being strong enough to drag a heavy organ about, even if she had been able to hire one, she and her little Lucia soon found themselves face to face with starvation. In searching a broken desk which had belonged to the murdered man, she came across a document, partly printed, with a red stamp in the left-hand corner, and "£100" written very large, in the right. Hopefully she carried it to Moses Levi.

"I can't lend nodings on dis," he said, a grin of amusement wrinkling his yellow face. "It's an insurance policy—of no value votefers at present. If your 'ouse vas to gatch fire," he went on, "den you could claim money for all dot vas lost and a few tings perhaps dot you nefer had. Dot's vat de paper's for. Idt's a goot shance for a poor woman."

Mrs. Batti began to understand.

"Then if my sticks was burnt," she rejoined eagerly, "and I claimed twenty pounds, would they pay it?" Twenty shillings would have been an excessive valuation of the little furniture her landlord had left behind, but she did not tell the Jew that.

"Perhaps," he replied, with a knowing wink, "I tells you vot—if you brings me dot paper and agrees to pay me fifty per shent, most likely I'll get you t'irty pounds. You can't get noddings yourself, because you don't know the vay. But I warns you—if dey find out you set de place afire, you gets six monts."

Mrs. Batti understood.

"Do many do it?" she asked.

"Hundreds. Idt's a goot business."

When the reckless woman reached her miserable home.

little Lucia was crying for food. Few mothers can stand that test and remain honest in thought and deed, even when they have been brought up in a strictly moral atmosphere. Mrs. Batti stole a pair of boots from a shop door, pawned them for two shillings, and bought a loaf. The theft might be extenuated; she had not a penny. But she expended the balance in naptha, and that night the wretched home in which she dwelt was gutted, and the broken, unsaleable furniture wholly destroyed by fire.

Early in the morning, before her tempter, Moses Levi, had opened his shop, she was arrested and charged with arson. Little Lucia was taken from her and sent to the workhouse. The Jew trembled in his dirty carpet slippers when her trial came on, but he was quite safe. His name was not mentioned. The jury found Lucrezia Batti guilty, and the judge sentenced her to twelve month's imprisonment.

II.

In gaol her conduct was almost as bad as it could be. "Give me my child!" she cried, when bidden to perform her allotted task. "I won't do a stroke till you bring me my Lucia!" Starvation and the dark cell were tried in vain. She remained rebellious to the end of her time.

When set free she walked to the workhouse and demanded her child. Lucia, pale and fragile, with black eyes that seemed at least two sizes too large for her small head, was brought to her. She took her in her arms and pressed her to her bosom, cried and laughed over her by turns, nearly suffocating her with kisses. In savage natures, such as hers, the maternal instinct is often strongly developed. Presently the pair set out for the old neighbourhood, where the newly-released prisoner hoped to meet a padrone who would let her have an organ. She did not succeed. Night found little Lucia again crying for food, and her mother, who had not earned the customary prison pittance, half frantic. Lucrezia Batti's evil genius impelled her to visit Levi's shop. The Jew stood at the door.

"I never said a word," she whispered. "Give me something to buy bread."

Levi was not benevolent by nature, but gratitude, or something else, prompted him to present her with a shilling.

"I vas glad you did not shplit," he muttered. "Idt proved dat you can be trusted. Come in. I vant to talk."

He led the way to an evil-smelling parlour behind his shop and bade her sit down.

"Idt vas vant of egsperience," he resumed. "S'elp me, it vas! You know nodt de safe vay. Now I tells you——" sinking his voice to a whisper. "You makes a rope of paper dot reaches all oop de shtairs, a t'ick, loose rope. You soaks dot rope in naptha, and you ties a fuse to de bottom end. De oder end you carries oop to de garret. Den you lights de fuse and goes away. Dot does de trick. De shtaircase ish a flue: de ashes of dot rope are blowed away, and nobody knows how it vas done."

"What's the use of telling me that?" she rejoined. "I want to know how I can keep my child."

For the space of half a minute the Jew watched her without speaking.

"I tells you," he said at length. "A frent of mine will give five pounds to anybody dot vill burn down his shop agsidentally. Five pounds ish a lot of money. Mit five pounds you could furnish a room for de liddle von and keep her mit you till you gets anoder job."

Mrs. Batti did not hesitate a moment. "I'll do it!" she cried. "Tell me where——"

"Not so fast," interrupted Levi. "Dis business must nodt be done in dot hurry. I must talk to mine frent."

He gave her another shilling, and she went away with Lucia. Two nights afterwards there was a great fire in the neighbourhood of Houndsditch. No suspicion attached to anyone, and the insurance was paid. But an epidemic of fires set in with characteristics so similar that the insurance companies were convinced of foul play. Consultations took place, and in the end Tonio Batti's widow was caught again. Journals announced the fact in the biggest and blackest type: "Capture of an incendiary." But this time Mrs. Batti had a companion in the dock—the proprietor of the premises she had burnt down. Eighteen months' hard labour was the sentence passed on both.

The incendiary, however, was not now penniless. Her solicitor advertised for a respectable woman to take charge of Lucia. A Mrs. Cuthbert replied, and had an interview with the child's mother before the latter was sentenced, with the result that Lucia went to reside with her at Camberwell.

III.

The eighteen months passed, and a desperate woman—a human tigress, destitute of pity, except for her own offspring—was let loose upon society. She hastened, almost flew, to Camberwell. The house Mrs. Cuthbert had occupied was vacant—to be let. The neighbours knew the little "furrin kiddy" well enough, but no one was able to tell the mother whither Mrs. Cuthbert had removed.

"I reckon her got fond o' the child," one woman said, "and her was afeared you'd take her away when you come out. Her said as much, missus, and that's all as I knows."

Mrs. Batti raged, threatening awful things. When she grew calmer she inserted advertisements in various newspapers. No success attended this course, she consulted a private detective, who speedily drained her of the little money she had left. Continue the search she could not without means, so once more she visited Moses Levi, and this time for employment.

The Jew shook his head. "Too risky," he said. "De bolice know you are out. If dere's a fire you'll be arrested on suspicion. Bedder lie low a few monts."

"I should go mad," rejoined the desperate woman. "Besides, the risk is my affair. You don't run any."

"Dot's true. Vell, I vill see two or t'ree clients and find out how t'ings are mit them."

In his business capacity, Levi had a large number of acquaintances, all more or less permanent residents in Queen Street, many of them in terrible straits.

Mrs. Batti went away and returned the following morning.

"Well?" she said.

"Dere ish some business," replied the Jew, in a wary whisper, "but idt's dangerous. Idt's a lock-up shop mit two families living ofer. If anybody was burnt and you vas caught, idt vould be a hanging matter."

"That's my look out," was the curt rejoinder.

"But idt's my frent's ash vell. I tells you vot," the Jew went on after a pause, "you can do idt and rouse de peoples oop ven de fire ish vell on. If you vas to discover de fire de bolice vould nefer sospect dot you had a hand in idt."

Mrs. Batti nodded. "Where is the place?" she asked briefly.

"No. 6, Ellaby Street—a tobaconnist's shop. Mishder Green ish de proprietor."

"Where can I see him?"

"Here. At eight o'clock."

At the hour named, Levi introduced the woman to a pale-faced, haggard man of forty, or thereabouts, who seemed in a de perately nervous state. It was clear that he did not like the business at all, but his financial difficulties drove him on. All arrangements were made at Levi's. He explained that it was Mr. Green's custom to shut up his shop at eleven o'clock every night and go home to Bloomsbury; he suggested that Mrs. Batti should call at a quarter to that hour and make her preparations, which would only occupy a few minutes. As soon as the fuse had been ignited, she would leave, and the tobacconist would follow almost immediately. When sufficient time had elapsed for the shop to get well alight it was arranged that the incendiary should return and raise an alarm. Having arrived at this understanding the conspirators separated.

IV.

The plot was carried out. Mrs. Batti lit the make-shift fuse and hastened away. Twenty minutes afterwards she returned. The inflammable stock was blazing. The shop was a fiery furnace. But passers-by were few at that hour, and no one had observed the flames.

"Fire! Fire!" she shouted, at the top of her shrill voice. A boy took up the cry. The policeman on point duty at the street corner blew his whistle and ran up, while the officer hammered at the side entrance with his baton, a man threw stones at the bedroom windows. A boisterous, excited crowd collected as by magic. Over all the uproar rang the piercing cry: "Fire! Fire!"

At last a window was opened. A man looked out.

"What's up?" he shouted.

"Your place is on fire!" roared the constable. "Rouse all the inmates and get out as quickly as you can!"

The man disappeared. As the flames burst through the shutters and the first floor casements, the officer ran off to summon the fire brigade. A moment afterwards the street door opened, and a man rushed out, carrying a child, followed by a woman in her nightdress, similarly burdened. Presently another woman, sobbing hysterically, came out, and then an old man, half clad, with garments smoking. A bystander took off his coat and extinguished the smouldering flames.

"Are you all out?" shouted the constable, who had returned.

The hysterical woman looked about her.

"Yes, yes; I think so," she answered, and fell in a faint at the incendiary's feet. Mrs. Batti was about to slink away. She paused and bent over the fainting woman. A wild cry of terror and dismay burst from her lips. Then she cried:

"It's Mrs. Cuthbert."

"That's her name," said the old man, who was on his knees. "Help me to lift her."

For answer she seized him by the hair and shook him frantically.

"Lucia. Where is Lucia Batti?" she screamed.

The old fellow did not answer immediately. He gazed about him in a bewildering manner, without rising.

"Good Heavens. She's forgot," he cried at last. "She's asleep in the second floor back, and the stairs are afire."

With another scream such as a tigress fighting for her whelps might utter, the incendiary burst through the crowd and dashed into the burning building, just as an engine drove up and the men sprang to the ground.

"After that woman. Fetch her back!" yelled the chief, and two brave fellows plunged through the smoke into the passage that led to the staircase. But the flames drove them out, scorched and half-blinded.

"The stairs are alight from top to bottom, but she has gone up!" shouted one. "Where's the escape?"

There was no witness to that wretched criminal's desperate battle with the fiend she had aroused, and it cannot be described. But her feelings may be imagined. If Lucia died, then she, her mother, would be her murderess—she who, to provide means to recover the only creature she loved, had not only endangered the lives of others, but would have doomed that loved one to the most awful of all deaths.

Before the escape arrived she was seen at a window on the second floor.

A cry of warning had scarcely been uttered when the glass crashed out and fell to the pavement. Smoke and flames burst after it—a fiery cloud, surrounding and enveloping the figure of a woman, who held in her blackened, scorched arms, something wrapped in a blanket.

"Catch!" she screamed hoarsely.

A hundred hands were uplifted. The bundle dropped and was caught safely, its contents, little Lucia, wholly unharmed. Then the straining watchers saw the woman reel back and disappear. The next instant the roof of the old building fell in, and a shower of sparks shot up towards the sky.

"God have mercy on her soul!" said a fireman reverently. "She was a good plucky 'un, and deserved a better fate."

There is little to add. The remains, when discovered, were charred beyond identification. Neither Mrs. Cuthbert nor her husband doubted that the woman who had given her life for little Lucia's was the child's mother, but fearing to lose their charge they said nothing at the time. Of course, Moses Levi took care not to come forward as a witness at the inquest. So what remained of the incendiary was consigned to an unnamed grave.

A STORY WITHOUT WORDS.

On page 379 several sketches are given in their proper order. £2 is offered to the reader who sends us the most appropriate wording to go under each sketch, the whole to form a story descriptive of the illustrations, and a bottle of Home Notes Bouquet will be given to each of the senders of the next best five attempts.

It is not necessary for competitors to have any literary ability. If you have a good idea, surely there should be no difficulty in putting it down in words. The whole of the story is limited to one hundred words, which may be distributed under the sketches according to the judgment of the competitor.

All that you have to do is to write in the order of the sketches the wording that you think most appropriate, enclose your attempt in an envelope (which should be marked "Picture Story"), and forward it to this office before Monday, March 22nd.

THE MOUNTAIN KING.

Far away in Lapland, at a place called Aïmïo, near the river Jana, there lived in a little hut a Laplander and his wife, with their small son, Sampo.

Sampo Lappelill was now between seven and eight years of age. He had black hair, brown eyes, a snub nose, and a wide mouth, which last is considered a mark of beauty in curious Lapland. Sampo was a strong child for his age; he delighted to dance down the hills in his little snowshoes, and to drive his own reindeer in his own little sledge. The snow whirled about him as he passed through the deep drifts, until nothing of him could be seen except the tuft of his black forelock.

"I shall never feel comfortable while he is from home," said the mother. "He may meet Hisü's reindeer with the golden antlers."

Sampo overheard these words, and wondered what reindeer it could be that had golden antlers. "It must be a splendid animal," said he. "How much I should like to drive to Rastekaïs with it!" Rastekaïs is a high, dreary mountain, and can be seen from Aïmïo, from which it is five or six miles distant.

"You audacious boy!" exclaimed the mother. "How dare you talk so? Rastekaïs is the home of the trolls, and Hisü dwells there also."

"Who is Hisü?" enquired Sampo.

"What ears that boy has!" thought the Lapp-wife. "But I ought not to have spoken of such things in his presence. The best thing I can do now is to frighten him well." Then she said aloud: "Take care, Lappelill, that you never go near Rastekaïs, for there lives Hisü, the Mountain-King, who can eat a whole reindeer at one mouthful, and who swallows little boys like flies."

Upon hearing these words, Sampo could not help thinking what good fun it would be to have a peep at such a wonderful being—from a safe distance, of course!

Three or four weeks had elapsed since Christmas, and darkness brooded still over Lapland. There was no morning, noon, or evening—it was always night. Sampo was feeling dull. It was so long since he had seen the sun that he had nearly forgotten what it was like. Yet he did not desire the return of summer, for the only thing he remembered about that season was that it was a time when the gnats stung very severely. His one wish was that it might soon become light enough for him to use his snowshoes.

One day at noon (although it was dark) Sampo's father said: "Come here; I have something to show you."

Sampo came out of the hut. His father pointed towards the south.

"Do you know what that is?" asked he.

"A southern light," replied the boy.

"No," said his father, "it is the herald of the sun. To-morrow, maybe, or the day after that, we shall see the sun himself. Look, Sampo, how weirdly the red light glows on the top of Rastekaïs!"

Sampo perceived that the snow upon the gloomy summit, which had been so long shrouded in darkness, was coloured red. Again the idea flashed into his mind what a grand sight the terrible Mountain-King would be—from a distance. The boy brooded on this for the remainder of the day, and throughout half the night, when he should have been asleep.

He thought, and thought, until at length he crept silently out of the reindeer skins which formed his bed, and then through the door-hole. The cold was intense. Far above him the stars were shining, the snow scrunched beneath his feet. Sampo Lappelill was a brave boy, who did not fear the cold. He was, moreover, well wrapped up in fur. He stood gazing at the stars, considering what to do next.

Then he heard a suggestive sound. His little reindeer pawed the ground with its feet. "Why should I not take a drive?" thought Sampo, and proceeded straightway to put his thought into action. He harnessed the reindeer to the sledge, and drove forth into the wilderness of snow.

"I will drive only a little way towards Rastekaïs," said Sampo to himself, and off he went, crossing the frozen river Jana to the opposite shore, which—although the child was unaware of the fact—belonged to the kingdom of Norway.

As Sampo drove he sang a bright little song. The wolves were running round his sledge like grey dogs, but he did not mind them. He knew well that no wolf could keep pace with his dear, swift little reindeer. Up hill and down dale he drove, with the wind whistling in his ears. The moon seemed to be racing with him, and the rocks to be running backwards. It was thoroughly delightful!

Alas! at a sudden turning upon the downward slope of a hill the sledge overturned, and Sampo was pitched into a snowdrift. The reindeer did not observe this, and, in the belief that its master was still sitting behind it, it ran on. Sampo could not cry "Stop!" for his mouth was stuffed with snow.

He lay there in the darkness, in the midst of the vast, snowy wilderness, in which was no human habitation for miles round!

At first he naturally felt somewhat bewildered. He scrambled unhurt out of the big snowdrift. Then, by the wan moonlight, he saw that he was surrounded on all sides by snowdrifts and huge mountains. One mountain towered above the others, and this he knew must be Rastekaïs, the home of the fierce Mountain-King, who swallowed little boys like flies!

Sampo Lappelill was frightened now, and heartily wished himself safe at home. But how was he to get there?

There sat the poor child, alone in the darkness, amongst the desolate, snow-covered rocks, with the big, black shadow of Rastekaïs frowning down upon him. As he wept his tears froze immediately, and rolled down over his jacket in little round lumps like peas, so Sampo thought that he had better leave off crying and run about in order to keep himself warm.

"Rather than freeze to death here," he said to himself, "I would go straight to the Mountain-King. If he has a mind to swallow me, he must do so, I suppose; but I shall advise him to eat instead some of the wolves in this neighbourhood. They are much fatter than I, and their fur would not be so very difficult to swallow."

Sampo began to ascend the mountain. Before he had gone far, he heard the trotting of some creature behind him, and a moment after a large wolf overtook him. Although inwardly trembling, Sampo would not betray his fears. He shouted:

"Keep out of my way! I am the bearer of a message to the King, and you hinder me at your peril!"

"Dear me!" said the Wolf (on Rastekaïs all the animals can speak). "And, pray, what little shrimp are you, wriggling through the snow?"

"My name is Sampo Lappelilli" replied the boy. "Who are you?"

"I," answered the Wolf, "am first gentleman usher to the Mountain-King. I have just been all over the kingdom to call together his subjects for the great sun festival. As you are going my way, you may, if you please, get upon my back, and so ride up the mountain."

Sampo instantly accepted the invitation. He climbed upon the shaggy back of the Wolf, and they went off at a gallop.

"What do you mean by the sun festival?" enquired Sampo.

"Don't you know that?" said the Wolf. "We celebrate the sun's feast the day he first appears on the horizon after the long night of winter. All trolls, goblins, and animals in the north then assemble on Rastekaïs, and on that day they are not permitted to hurt each other. Lucky it was for you, my boy, that you came here to-day. On any other day I should have devoured you long ago!"

"Is the King bound by the same law?" asked Sampo anxiously.

"Of course he is," answered the Wolf. "From one hour before sunrise until one hour after sunset, he will not dare to harm you. If, however, you are on the mountain when the time expires you will be in great danger. For the king will then seize whoever comes first, and a thousand bears and a hundred thousand wolves will also be ready to rush upon you. There will soon be an end of Sampo Lappelill!"

"But perhaps, sir," said Sampo timidly, "you would be so kind as to help me back again before the danger begins?"

The Wolf laughed. "Don't count on any such thing, my dear Sampo; on the contrary, I mean to seize you first myself. You are such a very nice, plump little boy! I see that you have been fattened on reindeer milk and cheese. You will be splendid for 'breakfast to-morrow morning!"

Sampo began to think that his best course might be to jump off the Wolf's back at once. But it was too late. They had now arrived at the top of Rastekaïs. Many curious and marvellous things were there to be seen. There sat the terrible Mountain-King on his throne of cloudy rocks, gazing out over the snowfields. He wore on his head a cap of white snowclouds; his eyes were like full moons; his nose resembled a mountain ridge; his mouth was an abyss; his beard was like tufts of immense icicles; his arms were as thick and strong as fir-trees; his coat was like an enormous snow mountain. Sampo Lappelill had a good view of the King and his subjects, for a bow of dazzling northern lights shone in the sky and illuminated the scene.

All round the King stood millions of goblins, trolls, and brownies; tiny, grey creatures, who had come from the remotest parts of the world to worship the sun. They did it from fear, not from love; for trolls and goblins hate the sun, and always hope that he will never return when they see him disappear at the end of summer.

Farther off stood all the animals of Lapland, thousands and thousands of them of all sizes; from the bear, the wolf, and the glutton, to the little mountain rat, and the brisk, tiny reindeer flea. No gnats appeared, however; they had all been frozen.

Sampo was greatly astonished at what he saw. Unobserved, he slipped from the Wolf's back, and hid behind a ponderous stone to watch the proceedings.

The Mountain-King shook his head, and the snow whirled about him. The northern lights shone round his head like a crown of glory, sending along red streamers across the deep blue sky; they whizzed and sparkled, expanded and drew together, fading sometimes, then again darting out like lightning over the snow-clad mountains. This performance amused the King. He clapped with his icy hands until the sound echoed like thunder, causing the trolls to scream with joy and the animals to howl with fear. At this the King was still more delighted, and he shouted across the desert:

"This is to my mind! Eternal darkness—eternal night! May they never end!"

"May they never end!" repeated all the trolls at the top of their voices. Then arose a dispute amongst the animals. All the beasts of prey agreed with the trolls, but the reindeer and other gentle creatures felt that they should like to have summer back again, although they disliked the gnats that would certainly return with it. One creature alone was ready to welcome summer quite unreservedly. This was the reindeer-flea. She piped out as loudly as she could:

"If you please, your Majesty, have we not come here to worship the sun, and to watch for his coming?"

"Nonsense!" growled the Polar bear. "Our meeting here springs from a stupid old custom; the sooner it ends the better. In my opinion, the sun has set for ever; he is dead!"

At these words the animals shuddered, but the trolls and goblins were much pleased with them, and reiterated them gaily, shaking with laughter to such an extent that their tiny caps fell off their heads. Then the King roared in a voice of thunder:

"Yes! Dead is the sun! Now must the whole world worship me, the King of Eternal Night and Eternal Winter!"

Sampo, sitting behind the stone, was so greatly enraged by this speech, that he came forth from his hiding-place, exclaiming:

"That, O King, is a lie as big as yourself! The sun is not dead, for only yesterday I saw his forerunner. He will be here very shortly, bringing sweet summer with him, and thawing the icicles in your funny, frozen beard!"

The King's brow grew black as a thundercloud. Forgetful of the law, he lifted his tremendous arm to strike Sampo; but at that moment the northern light faded. A red streak shot suddenly across the sky, shining with such brilliancy into the King's face that it entirely dazzled him. His arm fell useless at his side. Then the golden sun rose in slow stateliness on the horizon, and that flood of glorious light caused even those who had rejoiced in his supposed death to welcome his reappearance.

But the goblins were considerably astonished. From under their red caps they stared at the sun with their little grey eyes, and grew so excited that they stood on their heads in the snow. The beard of the Mountain-King began to melt and drip, until it was flowing down his jacket like a running stream.

By-and-bye, Sampo heard a reindeer say to her little one:

"Come, my child, we must be going, or we shall be eaten by the wolves."

"Such will be my fate also if I linger longer," thought Sampo. So he sprang upon the back of a beautiful reindeer with golden antlers, which started off with him at once, darting down the rocks with lightning speed.

"What is that rushing sound that I hear behind us?" asked the boy presently.

"It is made by the thousand bears; they are pursuing us in order to eat us up," replied the reindeer. "You need not fear, however, for I am the King's own enchanted reindeer, and no bear has ever been able as yet to nibble my heels."

They went on in silence for a time, then Sampo put another question.

"What," asked he, "is that strange panting I hear behind us?"

"That," returned the reindeer, "is made by the hundred thousand wolves; they are at full gallop behind us, and wish to tear us in pieces. But fear nothing from them. No wolf has ever beaten me in a race yet."

Again Sampo spoke:

"Is it not thundering over there among the rocky mountains?"

"No," answered the now trembling reindeer; "that noise is made by the King, who is chasing us. Now, indeed, all hope has fled, for no one can escape him!"

"Can we do nothing?" asked Sampo.

"There is no safety to be found here," said the reindeer, "but there is just one chance for us. We must try to reach the priest's house over yonder by Lake Enare. Once there, we shall be safe, for the King has no power over Christians."

"Oh, make haste, make haste, dear reindeer!" cried Sampo, "and you shall feed on golden oats, and out of a silver manger."

On sped the reindeer. As they entered the priest's house, the Mountain-King crossed the courtyard, and knocked at the door with such violence that it is a wonder he did not knock the house down.

The King is chasing us.

"Who is there?" called the priest from within.

"It is I!" answered a thundering voice; "it is the mighty Mountain-King. Open the door! You have there a child, whom I claim as my prey."

"Wait a moment!" cried the priest. "Permit me to robe myself, in order that I may give your Majesty a worthier reception."

"All right!" roared the King; "but be quick about it, or I may break down your walls!" A moment later he raised his enormous foot for a kick, yelling: "Are you not ready yet?"

Then the priest opened the door, and said solemnly "Begone, King of Night and Winter! Sampo Lappelill is under my protection, and he shall never be yours!"

Upon this, the King flew into such a violent passion that he exploded in a great storm of snow and wind. The flakes fell and fell, until the snow reached the roof of the priest's house, so that everyone inside it expected to be buried alive But as soon as the sun rose, the snow began to melt, and all was well. The Mountain-King had completely vanished, and no one knows exactly what became of him, although some think that he is still reigning on Rastekaïs.

Sampo thanked the priest heartily for his kindness, and begged, as an additional favour, the loan of a sledge. To this sledge the boy harnessed the golden-antlered reindeer, and drove home to his parents, who were exceedingly glad to see him.

How Sampo became a great man, who fed his reindeer with golden oats out of a silver manger, is too lengthy a tale now.

THE PURLOINING OF RUTH ALLEN.

Tigerford is the name of a little village in the West of England, snuggled at the bottom of a deep valley, as if hiding from curious eyes. The road leading to it comes down a steep hill, winds in and out among the houses, and, finding nothing of importance to warrant its staying, scampers up the hill on the opposite side and is lost to sight over the top. Viewed from either hill, the road might easily be regarded as a mammoth string which drew the houses together and held them in a tight bunch.

Half way up the hill, south of the village, stood a small cottage. This tiny house, with its acre of ground, was known as the "old Barber's place," and was the home of two maiden sisters, Ruth Allen and Sarah Barber.

The two women had a small income, to which each added according to her strength and talent. Sarah was a large-framed woman, strong and masterful, and took the entire management of the place upon herself. She diligently cultivated the acre of ground and from it supplied the villagers with cabbage and tomato plants in the spring, vegetables and fruit in the summer, and seed cucumbers, cauliflowers, and onions for their autumn pickling.

Ruth Allen was the elder, but as she was a small, delicate woman, and slightly lame from an accident in her babyhood, she was regarded by her more robust sister as little more than a child, and looked after and admonished accordingly. Ruth Allen—she was always called Ruth Allen—being a most unassuming body, never questioned Sarah's ways, but meekly submitted to her discipline even in the matter of the dresses she wore and the food she ate. Ruth Allen did the tailoring for the village mothers, cutting down the garments of the elder male members of the family for the younger, cleaning, piecing, and pressing till they "looked as good as new."

"Now, Ruth Allen," said Sarah, as they rose from the breakfast table one wet June morning, "you sit down and finish them trousers of Johnny Gaskill's, for I told his mother on Sunday she would have them to-night, and you'll have to work 'ard to get 'em done. I've got enough to keep me goin' this mornin', with hangin' out the clothes an' killin' caterpillars on the bushes."

"I did think I'd take a little walk round the garden 'fore I begun sewin'," said Ruth Allen. "It would freshen me up a bit. I didn't sleep very well last night."

"Nonsense!" cried Sarah. "You slep' all night as good as I did, an' you ain't no business traipsin' 'round the garden this wet mornin', either. Like's not you'd step on something an' spile it. 'Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do,' and feet, too, for that matter."

Ruth Allen took her work and sat down by the kitchen window, but she could not suppress a sigh as she looked out on the dewy freshness of the garden. Sarah bustled about, washing the breakfast dishes, then, drawing a tub of clothes from under the table, began to wring them out. The window by which Ruth Allen was sitting overlooked the village, and she glanced out now and then.

"You'll get your clothes out before anyone in the village," she said, as Sarah took up her basket. "There ain't anybody got theirs out, not even the Widow Filkins."

"You better be tendin' to your work 'stead of watchin' the neighbours," was all the reply that Sarah vouchsafed.

Thus rebuked, Ruth Allen plied her needle so industriously that Johnny Gaskill was in a fair way to get his trousers before the time promised. Sarah's washing was soon swinging on the line.

"It's a purty hot mornin'," she said, as she came back into the kitchen. "You ought to be thankful you can sit here where it's cool, instead of breakin' your back over caterpillars in the hot sun."

"Yes, I know it, but I ain't thankful."

Sarah tied on her sun-bonnet preparatory to her raid on the ill-fated caterpillars.

"I wish you'd look down in the village," said Ruth Allen. "There isn't a livin' soul got any clothes out, and there's lots of folks in the street. I wonder what's happened."

Sarah came to the window, but it was to examine the progress Ruth Allen was making on the nether garments of Johnny Gaskill.

"Now, if you don't 'tend to your work you'll go and sit in the outhouse," she said. "You ain't done two dozen stitches this morning."

This was a situation not at all desirable, so Ruth Allen sewed swiftly, but her thoughts were busy with the possible happenings in the village. What could be the matter? Something startling, or the Widow Filkins would never have neglected her washing. By-and-bye her curiosity got the better of her discretion. Seeing Sarah down on her knees among the gooseberry bushes, apparently oblivious to everything except the wholesale slaughter of her garden enemies, she laid down her work and stole softly into the sitting-room, where from the wall she took an old spyglass that had been her father's. She hurried back. Sarah was still bending over the bushes. She had not been missed. In her fear of being discovered by Sarah, it was some time before she could adjust the glass to her vision.

"Good gracious!" she said, as soon as she could see clearly. "Somethin' has happened. The Widow Filkins's yard is full of folks. Looks as if everybody in the village was there. There's someone stoppin' at the gate. It's the constable, sure's I'm alive. He's gettin' out and goin' in. My, how I wish I could hear what they're talkin' about. Goodness, here comes another person—a stranger. I wonder——"

So engrossed had she become with the exciting scene, she quite forgot to watch for Sarah. She was suddenly reminded of her by having the glass taken away and hearing a stern voice say:

"Ruth Allen Barber, I am ashamed of you. What do you mean by spyin' on the neighbours with a glass? I have to watch you more than I would a child. You take your work and go and sit in the outhouse."

Ruth Allen said not a word, but humbly obeyed. Sarah hung the glass on the wall and went back to her gardening.

"I've got the trousers most done," said Ruth Allen, when Sarah came in to get the dinner. "Is Mrs. Gaskill comin' after 'em, or have you got to take 'em down there?"

"She's comin' after 'em," replied Sarah. "I'll set on an iron so I can press 'em after dinner."

The simple meal was soon prepared, and the two women sat down to their dinner. They did not linger over it, but ate as a matter of duty. Sarah finished first and rose without ceremony, brought out the press board, and began pressing the trousers. Her back was towards Ruth Allen. Suddenly she turned round and looked at her.

"You was tellin' fortunes, Ruth Allen. Don't deny it; there's the tea grounds in the saucer. A body would think you were fifteen instead of nigh fifty."

"I ain't but forty-one, come August," said poor Ruth Allen. "I wasn't tellin' fortunes, either. I was seein' if I'd get my wish."

"If wishes were fishes we'd have some fried, 'stead of eatin' salt ham half the year. Now soon's I clear off the table I'll bring down that old lilac muslin of yours, an' you can rip it up. I want to make a new 'tack,' and that'll do for the cover."

"Oh, dear!" cried Ruth Allen, "you ain't goin' to cut that up. I want to keep it."

"What for, I'd like to know. You're too old to wear such a dress, and it might be doin' some good if 'twas made into a 'tack.'"

"I wanted to keep it 'cause 'twas the last dress mother bought me."

Now if Sarah had a soft spot in her heart it was for the memory of her mother, and with a short "keep it, then," she turned to her work. After the dishes were washed they exchanged their dark cotton gowns for stiffly starched print dresses, and sat down to sew in their tidy kitchen. They would have thought it immodest to sit out in the cool shade of the mammoth elm that spread its green umbrella over their front garden.

The long June afternoon wore away. They sewed diligently, and talked little. Sarah's thoughts were on her work, but Ruth Allen's were straying back into her girlhood days, lured there by the sight of the stranger who had been the last she saw enter Widow Filkin's gate.

He had somehow reminded her of her one lover, Harry Chadwick; indeed, in every gathering of men she was sure to see someone who reminded her of him, and she was living over again the delightful days which had ended so suddenly. When Harry Chadwick had won her promise to be his wife, she had added to her softly spoken "yes," "if Providence is willing." If Providence was willing, Sarah was not; and while Ruth wavered between her love for Harry and her fear of disobeying Sarah, Harry grew angry and left Tigerford.

He had never returned, and Sarah was sure that the fire of love that had burned so fiercely in Ruth Allen's heart had long ago turned to ashes. She was mistaken. The coals were there, and the slightest breath from the olden days was sufficient to kindle them into flame, but Sarah never saw their glow.

When Sarah was watering her spinach after supper, Mrs. Gaskill came through the gate.

"It's very warm," she said, sitting down in the doorway and fanning herself with her sun-bonnet. "I'm tired out climbin' that hill, but it's nice and cool up here. Have you heard of the trouble down in the village?"

"No," said Ruth Allen, coming to the door; "is anybody dead?"

"Worse than that," said Mrs. Gaskill. "Folks has got to die, but they ain't got to be robbed. Somebody broke into Widow Filkins's house last night and stole her silver spoons and her mother's old silver candlesticks and four pounds in money."

"Goodness me!" cried Sarah, setting down her watering-pot. "You don't mean to say that robbers have been in Tigerford. There won't be no safety sleepin' nights after this. How'd they get in?"

"Took a ladder and clim' up the back bedroom winder. The money was under a hollow chiny dog on the front mantel. Her spoons was sewed up in her best feather bed, and the bed was cut open, and the room's just full of feathers flyin' about everywhere. I don't b'lieve she'll get them feathers cleaned up all summer."

"Have they ketched the robbers?"

"No; they got away, fer they never found the things had been stole till this mornin'. I tell you we ain't none of us safe now. You'll have to keep locked up pretty tight livin' up here alone as you do. An' what do you think? Harry Chadwick's come back, an' ——"

"Ruth Allen," said Sarah quickly, "you go down into the cellar and fetch up a bottle of that ginger pop fer Mis' Gaskill. She's so warm 'twill cool her."

"Don't say anythin' 'bout him before Ruth Allen," said Sarah as soon as her sister was out of hearing.

"You don't mean she's hankerin' after him yet?"

"I don't mean anything," said Sarah with dignity, "but I don't want Ruth Allen to go thinkin' of those old times. I didn't mean she should know he was here, and—— Yes," she said as Ruth Allen came in with the beverage, "I'm free to confess if there's one thing I'm 'fraid of more than fire, it's burglars. When I've read of folks robbed and murdered in their beds in Lunnon, I've always been thankful that I lived where there was nothin' to molest or make me afraid, but now I shan't take a mite of comfort till that robber's ketched and shut up."

"I ain't a bit afraid of their comin' here," said Ruth Allen; "we have nothin' they'd want to steal."

"Humph, Ruth Allen, they're just as likely to come here as anywhere, and more, too, seein' we're alone. If they didn't find anything to steal, they'd murder us in our beds, and then how'd you feel, I'd like to know?"

Not having had any experience in that line, Ruth Allen was not able to describe her possible sensations.

"Seems to me, if I was goin' to steal anything from you," said Mrs. Gaskill, "it 'ud be your ginger pop. It's very good; the best I ever drank."

As soon as Mrs. Gaskill went away Sarah closed the windows and drew the curtains.

"What makes you shut up so early?" said Ruth Allen. "And I never knew you to draw the curtains till we went to bed."

"Well, I ain't goin' to have any bloodthirsty villains peepin' in the windows at us, and I'm goin' to lock the doors now, too."

"I'd just as soon sleep with the doors and windows both open."

"Them that know nothin' fear nothin', I've always heard say," returned Sarah, pushing the bolt of the kitchen door into its socket.

The kitchen was hot and close, and Ruth Allen was glad when the clock struck nine. Sarah took the candle and went upstairs.

"I declare, Ruth Allen," she cried, stopping short at the top, "if I didn't forget all about shuttin' these bedroom windows. There may be forty thieves in here for all we know," and she peered timidly into the dark rooms, where the flickering candle cast strange shadows.

"Let me come," said Ruth Allen. "I ain't afraid. Nobody'd carry off an old women like me."

"I ain't worryin' 'bout your gettin' carried off," said

Sarah; "but there's pa's silver watch, and ma's cameo brooch; they'd take them in a minute."

A diligent search failed to unearth any intruder, and Sarah turned to shut the windows.

"We'll smother if you shut the windows," said Ruth Allen.

"I'd rather smother than be murdered," said Sarah, as she pushed the nails into the holes over the lower sash.

It was a very warm night, and Ruth Allen, never a good sleeper, tossed and turned on her bed. If she fell into a light slumber, it was only to be aroused by Sarah's whisper, "What's that, Ruth Allen? I'm sure I heard somethin'."

A few nights of this wakefulness began to tell upon Ruth Allen, and robust Sarah confessed that she felt out of sorts herself.

"I tell you what it is," said she. "We'll both be ill if we don't get our sleep."

"I know it," replied Ruth Allen. "I don't rest hardly any nights, but I could if you'd have the windows open and not keep waking me up."

"Well, I can't sleep," said Sarah, "just as long as that robber is roamin' about; but I've thought of a way so we can both get our sleep. One of us can sleep daytimes, and sit up nights. It can't be me, for I've got the garden to tend to, so it'll have to be you. When it comes nine o'clock you can go to bed and sleep all day, and get up 'bout supper time. I'll have supper ready, and that'll be your breakfast. Then I'll go to bed at night, and you can sit up, and sew, and keep watch. If burglars see a light burnin', they won't come near the house."

"Why not leave a light burnin', and both go to bed?"

"Yes, and waste candles, and set the house on fire. Ruth Allen, there's no knowin' what you'd do if I didn't look after you. I can't sleep till that robber's caught, and till they do catch him you've got to sit up nights."

Ruth Allen, with a meekness born of long submission to a stronger will, gave in, as she always did. That morning at nine o'clock she went upstairs to bed.

She slept till after five o'clock. When she went downstairs Sarah was pouring hot water in the teapot. A plate of toast and a dish of baked potatoes stood on the hearth.

"I'm just puttin' the tea to draw," she said. "As soon as it's done your breakfast'll be ready."

When they sat down to breakfast, Sarah drank a cup of tea, and ate a piece of bread.

At nine o'clock she went to bed, and left Ruth Allen to her watch. Sarah had another reason for keeping Ruth Allen in bed daytimes. Harry Chadwick had been to the house, and asked to see her; but though Sarah told him that her sister would have nothing to say to him, she had caught a glimpse of him two or three times strolling in the field below the house.

Ruth Allen really enjoyed her nightly vigils. For the first time in her life she had a taste of freedom. Sarah slept soundly, as was attested by her cheerful snore; and as soon as Ruth Allen heard it she opened the doors and let in the sweet night air. She hurried through the task which Sarah always set her, and spent the rest of the time in whatever way pleased her fancy.

The moon was at its full, and she wandered through the garden, stooping now and then to caress the blossoms or to pass her hands softly over the dewy leaves. Sarah always reproved her for touching the plants. "She'd spile 'em, handlin' 'em," she said. Sometimes she pulled down her hair and waved it a little on her forehead and coiled it in a loose knot, the way she had worn it when a girl.

"Harry used to call my hair his Golden Fleece. It will soon be a silver fleece," she said to herself.

July had come, and the weather was unusually warm. The nights were not much cooler than the days. One afternoon Ruth Allen came downstairs, dressed in her lilac muslin.

"What have you got that on for?" said Sarah.

"Because it's so hot," said Ruth Allen. "There won't anybody see me. I don't have many callers."

The night was very warm. Just as the sky began to grow light in the east, Ruth Allen blew out her candle and went down the walk to the gate.

"I've a good mind to go up to the oak spring and get a drink. Sarah won't be up for an hour yet."

She opened the gate and went up the hill. As she went she pulled two or three late wild roses and stuck them in her dress. The oak spring—so called because a great clump of oaks grew close by it—was near the top of the hill. There was a trough where horses might drink, but in order to reach it one must make a slight détour from the main road. Ruth Allen made a cup of her hands, and filled it at the stream that ran into the trough. She dabbled the cool water on her face. She had not been to the spring for a long time.

All at once she heard the faint sound of hoof-beats.

"It's probably old Mr. Purdy on his way to town," she thought.

She shrank back among the bushes. The horseman drew rein at the spring, and the horse plunged his nose into the water.

"He can't see me unless he turns right round," thought Ruth Allen.

She was leaning on a little clump of bushes that grew on the side of the hill. All at once she felt it giving way. She made a frantic effort to save herself, but the branch to which she clung cracked with her weight. She slipped from her hiding-place. The horseman looked round. It was not Mr. Purdy—it was the stranger whom she had seen at Widow Filkins's gate on the day of the robbery.

"Ruth Allen! Ruth Allen!" cried a familiar voice.

She gazed bewildered. Who was this bearded stranger?

"Ruth Allen, don't you know me?"

"Oh—it's Harry."

"Yes, it's Harry, Ruth Allen. I've stayed here over a month tryin' to get a glimpse of you. I've been back twice since I left you, and both times Sarah has told me you wouldn't so much as look at me. Ruth Allen, I've come back once more to you. Can you forgive?"

"Ruth Allen! Ruth Allen! Come here to me this minute!" Ruth Allen stopped with her hand half extended towards her lover. Sarah was coming swiftly up the hill.

"Is it to be me or Sarah?" demanded Harry, reaching down and clasping her hand. Ruth Allen gave one frightened glance over her shoulder, but her nights of freedom had had their effect.

"You, Harry," she said faintly.

Harry leant from his saddle and lifted the light form of Ruth Allen and set her before him on the horse. Then he turned back into the road from whence he came.

"I'd rather 'twould 'a' been pa's silver watch," said Sarah, as she saw them disappear over the top of the hill.

NANSEN'S "FARTHEST NORTH."

DO YOU WANT TO READ IT?

Without doubt Nansen is the hero of the day, and no one can read his "Farthest North" without feeling that you have here a man of indomitable pluck, whose patience and perseverence under most awful and trying circumstances are phenomenal. "Farthest North" is of immense and lasting interest, and should be read by every man, woman, and child; no doubt through time it will be, but its cost (two guineas) places it beyond the reach of the many. Members of circulating libraries who get it this year may think themselves lucky.

HOW TO GET IT.

How few housewifes are aware of the superior merits of over the ordinary foreign beetroot. If people really understood the difference in sweetening power, purity, economy, and wholesomeness, "Glebe" Pure Cane Sugar (4lb. and 7lb. cotton bags) would be in every household.

Again, syrup is used in many households, and the same ignorance is here displayed by the housewife. Why does she not insist on getting the best?

"Glebe" Pure Cane Syrup, packed in tins of various sizes, is the purest, most wholesome, and most luscious in the market. Being in colour like honey it retains the delicate aroma of the West Indian sugar cane—a perfect luxury on the breakfast table.

Both "Glebe" Sugar and Syrup are guaranteed free from beetroot and chemicals.

WE know the merits of the goods we write about, and ask you only to give them one trial—quality will do the rest.

We want everybody to try "Glebe" pure cane goods, and struck us to invest in a large number of Nansen's new book, "Farthest North," and we are now giving a reading of it, for seven days, to our customers in rotation, on the understanding that they pay postage of it one way. Therefore all that you have got to do in order to get a reading of

Nansen's "Farthest North"

is to get your grocer to supply you with "Glebe" Cane Sugar (4lb. and 7lb. original cotton bags) and "Glebe" Cane Syrup (in tins), cut out the word "Glebe" (in red) from off the empty bag and syrup label, and send three of EACH (syrup and sugar) such cuttings, with your full postal address, to and you will in return receive in rotation a copy of "Farthest North." FIRST COME, FIRST SERVED.

IN SCOTLAND "GLEBE" IS A HOUSEHOLD WORD.

Answers to Correspondents.

Skipper.—I should think that the largest amount spent in yachting by one individual is the £32,000 a year got through by Mr. Vanderbilt.

Enquirer wishes to know what is the highest rank in the British peerage. ————The Archbishop of Canterbury takes rank immediately after the members of the Royal Family in preference to every other peer.

H. L. T.—A swallow can fly about 600 miles a day, and can swallow 6,000 flies in the same time.

R. N.—Seathwaite, in Cumberland, is generally considered to be the wettest place in the British Isles, its annual rainfall being about 154 inches.

H. P.—There are thousands of people in our large cities who never saw a mushroom growing in their lives, and their ignorance is taken advantage of by unscrupulous hawkers, who cut turnips into imitation mushrooms and sell them at a big profit. The ones you speak of were doubtless made in this way.

J. P.—Birmingham is the greatest brass-making town in the world. Paris comes in a good second. The watch competition will probably continue for some time yet.

Housekeeper.—The best way to ascertain if coffee is adulterated or not is to pour cold water on it. If pure, it will colour the water very slightly; if there is any chicory present the water will become brown.

G. L.—I should think that Japan has developed in the journalistic line more rapidly than any other country. Twenty-five years ago it had only one newspaper. Now it has two thousand.

W. K.—The Bible you speak of is in the Vatican Library. It weighs 520lb.

Subscriber wishes to know the comparative extent of the land and water on the globe.————If the whole of the land above water-level were shovelled into the Pacific Ocean, it would only fill one-seventh of it.

Ernest.—The story of which you speak was sent to us by a contributor as original. You may rest assured that his name will not again appear in S.S.

R. D. B.—The title of "mayor" comes from the French, and originally signified "one who keeps guard."

H. T. wishes to know if black is the universal mourning colour.———— Not by any means. On the occasion of a death, the Chinese don white apparel, the Egyptians yellow, and the Turks blue or violet. Even in Europe, in every country except England, violet is the sign of mourning employed by the Court.

I should like to ask my readers to tell their friends about the Watch Competitions now running through S.S. Judging from the number of attempts which have come to hand in the first competition at the moment of going to press, they are likely to prove immensely popular.

Walter asks which of Scott's works are considered the finest.————This is rather a difficult matter to decide. Sir Walter himself believed "Waverley" to be his best novel, and "The Lady of the Lake" his best poem, and I fancy most people are of the same opinion.

Guard.—Excursion trains make the greatest profits. Some of these on the Midland Railway nett nearly £200 in one journey.

H. S. T. wishes to know whether I consider soldiers desirable husbands.———— It depends entirely upon the soldier himself. You might as well ask: "Do men make desirable husbands?"

L. J.—A man should have attained his maximum height at the age of twenty-five years.

Farmer wants to know the average number of eggs laid annually by a hen.————I should think from ninety to ninety-five would be a good average.

F. L. D. has heard that the English are the best correspondents in the world, and writes to ask if such is the case. ————It would appear so, when we consider the fact that nearly two-thirds of the letters carried by the postal service of the world are written, sent to, and read by English-speaking people.

B. B.—The world's coal output in 1895 was 288,805,229 tons.

N. W.—Thanks for the letter. In none of our papers, however, do we publish such misprints as that which it contains.

A. M. G.—The flesh of the seal is not at all palatable. An effort was made some years ago to popularise this dish, but it failed. It tastes something like a mixture of pork and kippered herrings. Thanks for the book.

E. M.—It is estimated that in England one woman in every six earns her own living.

L. P. S.—It is practically impossible to give you the exact number of fog-signals used throughout the country during the year. Perhaps you will be able to gather some idea for yourself when I say during one fog alone, of thirty hours' duration, no fewer than 40,000 signals were exploded by one company.

Stoker.—A good railway engine will travel about 1,000,000 miles before it wears out. It depends a good deal, however, upon the kind of treatment it receives. With ordinary service an engine should last twelve years.

Antiquarian.—Denmark owns the oldest national flag in the world. It has been in use since the year 1219.

E. B.—"No Man's Heath" is the name given to nine acres of land situated in four counties—Leicestershire, Warwickshire, Staffordshire, and Derbyshire. It was formerly the favourite resort of prize-fighters, because the police of one county were unable to make an arrest in another.

Sally.—There are 325,000 servant girls in London alone.

Incredulous.—Your friend is quite right. There was, and may still be, in Milan, a clock made of bread. It was made by a very poor Italian, who, being unable to purchase the necessary materials for its construction, set apart a portion of his bread each day, eating the crust and saving the soft part. To solidify this he employed a certain salt, and when the various parts were dry they became perfectly hard. This marvellous timepiece is said to have kept good time.

THE WIRT FOUNTAIN PEN CO. LTD., 1, GRESHAM BUILDINGS, LONDON, E.C.

It is an old, and to some extent true saying that "every man has his price." Most of us that we are above being bribed, but when sufficient inducement is put forward we have a propensity for seeing a tempting proposal in a favourable or flattering light. It is not always for monetary considerations that we bend our principles—desire fame, glory, and popularity; eagerness for revenge; jealousy and dislike may get the better of our higher prudence and cause us to ignore the scruples of conscience and take the opportunity offered. But greed of wealth is the greatest factor in blinding our sense; not only, sometimes, closing our eyes to duty and self-respect, but too frequently causing us to neglect our vital and physical well-being. For after all, what is wealth without health? While we join in the rush and bustle of this busy world, over-taxing our energies racking our systems, many of us are morally culpable of reckless disregard of bodily strength and fitness. Then, perhaps, the health breaks down and we seem doomed to long periods of pain and depression. Our very moral and natures are under a cloud. Our whole life is darkened. Yet there is a remedy at hand. Hundreds of thousands of ailing men and women have found that Beecham's Pills verily "make life worth living." They purify the blood, set right the disordered stomach, arouse the sluggish liver, dispel sick headaches, build up the nervous system, and repair the caused by overwork and brain worry. Their genuine worth and never-failing efficacy have been fully proved during a period of upwards of fifty years, and they are still recognised as the best safeguard against all bilious and nervous attacks. The most satisfactory evidence of the universal esteem in which Beecham's Pills are held is found in the fact that the number of boxes sold annually now exceeds 6,000,000.

CHAPTER I.

DESPITE THE WORLD.

A cosy villa stood in one of those old-fashioned winding roads to the north of Regent's Park, where town and country dispute supremacy. Here the buzz of the mighty city sounds but dimly, and yet a whistle blown shrilly will bring a hansom to the garden gate almost before the echoes have died away. It lay back some distance from the road, shadowed by spreading trees, encased in shrubs.

The tiny garden in front was gay with bright geraniums and calceolarias planted in prim rows. The patch of grass by the trimly-kept gravel path was still green and bright, and overhead the pale, full moon shed silver gleams upon leaf and stem, upon flower and weed alike. No town garden looks so well as by moonlight, and on a fair June evening this made-up townly plot vied with its wilder country cousins in beauty.

Within the villa, in a comfortable if small room on the ground floor, a man and woman were seated at the dinner table, from which Thomas, most discreet of men, had just removed the plates and dishes of a more than usually elaborate meal.

It was to be the last these two would enjoy there. The remembrance of many a pleasant meal came to him as absently he sipped his coffee, and, staring straight before him, doubted the possibility of carrying out his resolve.

She was very beautiful, masses of auburn hair graced a well-poised head, large dreamy brown eyes, which upon occasion would flash darkly, but which could, as he well knew, kindle with the warm glow of love, a graceful figure, a good presence—yes, he knew it all; he delighted to call it all to mind, though he dare not meet her eyes. Another charm was hers, that of a sweet, deep, musical voice—a voice as limpid as falling water, a voice once heard never forgotten. Involuntarily a sigh escaped him.

"Why, Roy!" she laughed, "why that sigh? It was quite tragic. Do you meditate some dark deed? What murder is afoot? Ha, ha!"

"You know, Nelly, how I loathe this parting. You know how you have grown into my life, but you do not care as I do. If I sighed it was because I wish this thing had not to be—wish it, aye, with all my heart! But you mock me, chaff about tragedy, and cry: 'Ha, ha!'"

"You are to be married," she interrupted, stealing a glance at him sideways.

"Exactly. I am to be married. I must, I am told, or be ruined."

"And this lady, this Miss Arbuthnot—your cousin, is she not?—has lots of money, and they say is simply lovely."

He laughed vexedly. It was bad enough to marry to order, but to be jeered at, and by her of all people, made it worse.

"You know she is plain in my eyes," he said bitterly. "I have no voice in the matter. The governor says—oh, you know what he would say, and there is an end of it!"

"Yes, I suppose so," Nelly answered wearily; "and an end of our friendship."

"Our what, Nelly?" he asked in wonder.

"Best call things by their true names. Friendship in these days means something to exist so long as is convenient. I had a friend once, Roy, a school chum; we vowed eternal love; by-the-way, you and I did that! She and I never speak now. When I came here, she—well—you know—her people. Of course, they could do nothing else."

"And I have taken you from friends, ruined your life."

"Now, my dear Roy, how many times have I told you not to talk to me in that strain. Ruin! nonsense! Where was I when we met? You remember, left dependent upon the charity of distant relatives who grudged the daughter of a spendthrift the slight assistance they gave. My life—I shudder when I think of it. No encouragement, no help, no love, but poorly-veiled sneers, covert sarcasms; possibly well meant, but none the less cold lectures on the necessity of strict economy. And each time ending with: 'My dear, thank God we can help you, even if we stint ourselves to do it. It is our duty.' It was that last, that pharisaical patting on the back, that made my blood boil—stint themselves! Not they; there was no need. It was what Charley Duff calls 'kid.' And then the family prayers, the daily church, parish visiting, intruding upon those who did not want us, but did want blankets and soup for nothing, and who laughed behind our backs. It was too humdrum, too irksome, oh! it was hideous. And then, Roy, I met you. I was taken from it all. I saw life free from conventional trammels. And here I am. Free! think of that—the hideous past is past. Do not go back to it at our last meeting. This remember: that whatever happens, I will never say, or think, you ruined me."

"And you do love me, Nelly?"

"You know I do, but what is the use of that? We part to-night."

"Unless when I am married——"

"No, no, for your sake, Roy—we must be strangers. You and I strangers, Roy!" and she laughed lightly. What it cost her to do so he never knew.

"You don't seem to care much," he muttered as he had done before.

"We must look the inevitable in the face. You must marry, we must part."

"The force of that remark is evident, if unpleasant," he answered shortly.

"Now do not embitter our parting; let us remain friends, Roy."

Absently to appearance, but, perhaps, with design, she took a rose from a magnificent cluster before them, and fixed it in her dress, where its deep red colour burned in glowing contrast with the delicate white of her shoulders.

"Who gave you those roses, Nelly?"

"Charley Duff."

"You see him often, it seems. It is always Charley Duff. Do you like him?"

"Yes," she answered simply, as she drew the epergne towards her and pressed her face against the flowers.

There was a pause, he hesitated to ask the question which trembled on his lips. He glanced across the table, but she busied herself in deftly rearranging the roses and would not look up.

What delicate taper fingers she had, he mused, what well rounded arms, what a goddess upon earth, as she sat toying with the flowers. It pained him, for she was going out of his life. Impatiently he asked: "And when I am gone?"

"Perhaps! He is going round the world in his yacht. He has money and is a gentleman. What can I do?"

"You make your arrangements quickly," he said bitterly.

"You leave me, Roy. I do not blame you. Why should you be angry with me?" she answered in dead, dull tones.

He drummed the table angrily with his fingers, but did not answer. Perhaps he did not hear the question, the tone of voice struck him, the words were unheeded. There was a heavy despair in her face, her arms rested listlessly on the table, that joyous ring in her voice, which he knew so well, was absent. The thought of what she was about to do hurt his vanity, cut him to the quick; it was a stab indeed.

Never had she been so dear as now, and he had lost her. The coming separation was his doing, to advance his interests. He cursed the necessity, but recognised the force of circumstances. He could not blame her and would not. He knew she did not wish to leave him, the sad yearning in her eyes told him that, but it must be.

The end must come, and he thought bitterly, the sooner the better. Pride came to his rescue, an ungovernable cruelty for the moment mastered his better instincts. He ignored the hopeless tone, the unshed tears, and caught at the cold words.

"And you learn to forget quickly, too," he said with a harsh, bitter laugh.

"Roy!"

It was all she said, but the anguish it conveyed made him shiver. It made him feel, as no passionate outburst could have done, what a cad he had been. He sprang from his chair and wound his arms round her, pressing her head against him as he kissed her passionately.

"Nelly, I am mad—I did not know what I said. Forgive me, darling. The thought of losing you makes me a brute. Heavens! what am I to do?"

Nelly quivered in his embrace, and, as he released her and walked up and down the room with quick, impetuous steps, sank her head upon her arms and burst into tears. The high tension at which her nerves were strung gave way; she had played a part, assumed an indifference, at what mental agony he did not guess even now. But she could keep it up no longer. His taunt had broken down her self-control. She had passed from one extreme to the other, and was now but a sobbing, broken-hearted woman.

And fixed it in her dress.

Roy Arbuthnot paused in his tramping, and looked across at her grievedly. He had brought on this scene, he had made this parting, for parting it must be, so bitter. It was his folly, his stupid vanity. He saw now, when it was too late, how true she was to him, and how she would have saved him pain. And now she had given way, she was crying as if her heart had broken, as indeed it had. She would never love another man. He could bear it no longer. Few men can bear to see a woman cry. He crossed to her side, and again drew her to him.

"Nelly, my darling, look at me. Say you forgive. I was not sane when I said that."

She smiled through her tears; she could not resist.

kill me. Stay with me. I will be your slave. I will work. I will earn money. You know I have talent. I will do anything to keep you by my side. In other lands, Roy, away from old associations, I will prove what a woman's love can do. You and I will go together through life. I love you. Ah! Roy, I can say no more than that. I love you. You must not leave me. My heart is breaking."

He was carried away. "No," he said, "whatever happens, no!"

The colour mounted to her cheeks once more, she stood on tiptoe, and as the old saucy smile came back to her lips, she drew his head down and kissed him again and again.

Then she plucked Charlie Duff's rose from her bosom and threw it in the fire grate with a gesture of disdain.

"And the others also," laughed Roy, suiting the action to the word and flinging them, stand and all, into the hearth, where the glass shivered into fragments.

CHAPTER II.

Love and Interest.

Seated upon the balcony at White's, behind the gay lines of Marguerite daisies and glowing red geraniums, Roy Arbuthnot absently sucked the stump of a cigar which had been out some minutes.

His thoughts were far away, the passing traffic had no interest for him. He saw a tear-stained but radiant face looking up to him, he felt soft arms round his neck, he heard a tender voice cooing love, but he was miserably, utterly wretched.

A letter lay open in his hand. His father had written to say that failing to catch him at his chambers he would look in at White's at one o'clock, and requesting that Roy would lunch with him, as there were several things he wished to discuss.

Roy knew what that meant—he must marry. The bride-to-be was ready, and he was expected to fall in with an arrangement already cut and dried. The world would say it was a good match. He, the heir to large estates—if encumbered—and to the baronetcy; she, possessed of great wealth, an amiable woman, well born, of equal rank; he had no excuse. But how unattractive she was!

How unlike Nelly! There was the rub. Nelly with beauty and ruin, Mary with—well—money; and money he must have. But a few hours ago and he had sworn, come what might, he and Nelly should go hand in hand through life, and now his father's note brought him up with a run. So, round and round, his thoughts sped. Passion, love on the one hand, prudence, self-interest on the other. He was in a mood to be swayed. He felt he was weak, vacillating.

Had Nelly been by his side, her voice, her presence would have been decisive. Little pleading on her part would have been necessary. He would then and there have cast the future to the wind, and she and he would have started for the other side of the world. But she was not, and he unwillingly weighed possibilities.

It all came back to one point, Nelly and ruin, Mary and respectability. And he must choose to-day. He must think, and he hated thought. It made him feel old. He could get no further, the position was hopeless. In extremity he turned with pleasure as an old friend stepped out on the balcony.

"Ah! Jack, the very man of all others I would like to talk to. Sit down, old man, and give one the benefit of your varied experience. I am in a hole."

"What is it, Roy? You are demonstrative this morning."

"Simply this," Roy answered quickly. "You know Nelly, yes, of course you do. The governor knows nothing of that—eh? why do you laugh?"

"Does he not? Why, he chuckled about your friendship—as he was pleased to call it—only yesterday—laughed, and said of course such a friendship was part of the being of every young man. A natural result of having nothing much to do in the world."

"The old rip!' But here is the trouble. The dad now insists that I must marry. I tell you, Jack, I love her and cannot marry."

Jack Sinclair laughed a low, amused chuckle as he blew a cloud of cigarette smoke from his lips.

"The old, old tale, Roy. The lady must go out of your life. She won't break her heart, my boy. Your heart, doctored with seven thousand a year—that is about the figure, is it not?—will not cease its beating."

"I did not expect this cheap cynicism from you, Jack. I asked you as a friend, what am I to do? And you answer me with aphorisms replete with the wit of the halfpenny evening journal."

Jack Sinclair laughed delightedly.

"Really, Roy, you are amusing this morning. I wish Bathurst were here; your tragic air would afford him a story at many a table. He would find himself possessed of a really humourous idea, which, to do him full justice, is not often his lot, and he would make the most of it. I can see him now spreading the news broadcast. Scene: Roy, despondent; enter irate parent; the fair Nelly—clever actress—in tears, the ingénue in the background, who advances to the footlights; they—that is, you and she—embrace; exit Nelly, melodramatically; curtain. My dear Roy, it would bring down the house. He would introduce that sentence about the halfpenny evening journal with great effect."

"Ridicule then, and nothing but ridicule," Roy said vexedly.

"From me, now, nothing else. It won't do, Roy. You have in this to fall into line. You are on the coach, but your father drives. You've got to submit. For the lady, well, she must shift for herself. Don't you worry about that. She will do it."

Blew a cloud of cigarette-smoke from his lips.

"That is all very well, but I tell you again, I love Nelly, and have no wish to marry. Life as it has been, has satisfied me. Why should I marry?"

"Necessity, my boy. You've got to the end of your tether. You know that. Creditors are, to those in our position, most accommodating, foolishly so perhaps, but when the dun fails to get the bit on account for which his soul longs, he, like the proverbial worm, turns at last. You know, Roy, several have turned already, have in fact become sea-serpents in voracity. And really the lady is very charming."

"That is the worst of it, Jack. Mary is such a charming girl that when I think of her sacrifice I know I am a brute. I can never feel to her as to Nelly, it is no use trying to persuade myself, and the worst of it is, her glorious voice reminds me so of Nelly. Never did two women speak so alike. I shall always hear Nelly and see Mary. And then Nelly will break her heart. For Heaven's sake tell me what I am to do. I revile myself and everybody when I try to think."

"You know what I think—marriage. I mean no disrespect to Nelly when I say she will find consolation. Many another has been similarly placed. Not one has broken her heart. They cry, may be act the heroic, but acquire a new possession, and in conquest find recompense. Why, she may have someone in view already. Eh! you start—tell me!"

Roy started vexedly, and then as the other pressed for an explanation, told how Nelly had mentioned Charley Duff and his proposed trip, and how it had piqued him.

"A lesson for you, Roy; take it to heart," sneered Jack Sinclair. "Charley knows his book, and she would, I am sure, be a charming companion for a trip of that sort. She played her cards well and she held the fifth honour."

"Don't tell me she was not in earnest," Roy answered hotly. "I will not believe it."

Jack laughed. "All right, as you will. But here comes your father. He won't want me. He wants to talk to his dutiful son. If I can help, let me know; I mean it. I am at your call, but I say do not thwart the old man."

"A bit brutal, I fear," muttered Sinclair to himself, "but I had to hit hard."

As he disappeared through one of the windows which opened on to the balcony, Sir Richard Arbuthnot advanced with sprightly steps to where his son was sitting.

The baronet was a well-groomed man of fifty, who looked from his glossy silk hat, set jauntily on the side of his head, to his shiny boots, what he was—a blasé, cynical man of the world. Roy got from him his good looks, for Sir Richard, or Dick, as his intimates called him always, had been in his younger days a distinctly handsome man. Even now his iron grey hair was abundant, his eyes still retained their fire, and if his face was lined and tired-looking, he aged well. Slim in figure, holding himself erect, he stepped through life briskly, and cast off easily the worries which came his way.

"Well, Roy, I have run you to earth at last," he said smilingly, showing a set of white, even teeth, of which many a younger man might well have been proud. "And I am hungry; let us have some lunch. Breakfast with me this morning consisted of one piece of dry toast and a B. and S. We were late last night."

"And the usual luck?" asked Roy, with some little disdain, for, like many a son, he thought his father should long ago have ceased to sow those oats which bear no crop.

"Yes, luck has been with me lately what you neatly describe as usual. It will change, no doubt, but last night it was—well, the English language is singularly deficient—let it pass."

"And this has prompted you to tell me once more that I must marry Mary," Roy put in hotly. "You have lost, and I am to square accounts."

"Do not state things so bluntly, Roy. It is vulgar. Nothing is so misleading as a fact, and generally a fact unnecessarily irritates; it requires to be handled with some skill. Now put it in a different setting. You are heir to large estates, an old name. You may say that the property is mortgaged to the hilt. You may even say that I am responsible for that. You seem in a mood to do so. By-the-bye, you should not sup so late, it warps one's judgment in the morning. I speak from experience, and for once you might admit I may be right. But to return, when your grandfather died he left the estates as—as in fact they are now. I married, married well, and in consequence have had a good time. Your good mother occupied the eminently useful position of being a woman with money. And she had more to recommend her than that. She was a woman of the world, she did not expect me to remain tied to her side like a lap dog by a string. As a consequence, you know that we have sailed through life pleasantly, not expecting too much and so not disappointed. I only ask you to profit by my experience. As I have been happy, why should not you? Mary is a charming girl."

"But I do not wish to marry."

"Neither did I, Roy. I thought as I dare say you do, that I was well content. Debts would be paid—some time. Things would right themselves—somehow. Why worry about it immediately? 'Enough to the day is the evil thereof,' and so on. The old, old complaint, my boy. My life had no attraction for me. Still, he was right, as I soon found out. I married for money and have never regretted the step. Your mother is a woman in a thousand and——"

"But I tell you I love Nelly."

"Now, Roy! ask yourself what do you mean by love? Do you know any case, outside a novel, where man, for years, finds one woman perfect? In my reading days the hero and heroine were always left in the happiness of anticipation upon the altar steps. No account was given of the trials of every-day married life. The author dare not. The romance would be lost in the inability to pay expenses, or in the thousand and one events which make love, as the idealist writes of it, a dream of the past. Now if you marry without this so-called love, which after all only blinds you to the imperfections of one woman in particular, you do not start from so high a platform, and the descent to every-day common-sense is gradual and easy—love is imaginative and seldom outlasts many years of cold reality. Sincere affection and honest admiration will; and your cousin is a most charming girl."

"I know that, and there is the trouble. She is in every way too good for me."

"Tell her so, Roy. She will like that. Women can always appreciate praise, flattery. They may protest, but they like it all the same. And, seriously, something must be done. Creditors are pressing on all hands. If it were known that you were about to contract a wealthy marriage, the cormorants would cease to be voracious. Now, they would try to digest even the stone and mortar of our old home; all our difficulties would be at an end. I have not stinted you in the past, Roy, and you must admit you have drawn upon me freely. Now I appeal to you. It is not as if I asked you to marry an impossible woman; Mary is fond of you, she is charming, has all the good qualities, and so on. There is no reason why you should not be happy. Ruin, Roy, ruin; think of it for your mother's sake—even for mine."

"And Nelly, what of her?" Roy asked helplessly.

"I think we may leave that lady out of the account," his father answered drily, as if that side of the question were not worthy of discussion.

Roy rose hurriedly from the table, and paced quickly up and down the balcony outside. He felt stifled indoors. His father's mixture of cynicism and worldly common-sense disgusted while it convinced him. He would have liked to have hurled reproaches at his head, to have laid bare the selfish indifference to his feelings, the better instincts which he possessed; but he knew his father had acted a part, prompted by necessity which must be faced. It could only end in a row, what was the use? He knew his father well enough to realise that he would throw off with an easy indifference any reproaches levelled at him. His answer would be: "Go and do as I did." Again, what was the use? Poor Nelly! He had already in his mind called her poor Nelly, and it broke from him involuntarily. Must she be put aside that he might live in ease and comfort? But then, his mother! that gentle woman whose life, as he knew, had been not entirely free from trouble, who had, for the name of the family into which she had married, submitted to many slights, who loved him with a mother's love for an only son—her future, her happiness, depended upon his decision. It was maddening.

He strode up and down angrily. He had forgotten his father, who still sat at the luncheon table and watched keenly the figure of his son as he passed the window time and again with bowed head and contracted brows.

Sir Richard waited, but still Roy walked the balcony with quick, impatient strides.

At last he left the room silently, but he mused: "It is a facer for the lad. I went through it, so must he. Curious how events repeat. We Arbuthnots have lived for generations by marriage."

RESULT OF ASTERISK LETTER COMPETITION.

No. 2.

Several competitors correctly filled in the letters omitted in this competition, and the prize has consequently been forwarded to the sender of the first to hand, who is Miss E. Corbett, The Cottage, Little Park, Enfield. The sentence is appended:

Anon, however, when of a sudden they all came upon Damaris herself, seated with her woollen work in a grassy hollow, with rocks between her and the sun, the Layton youth had to change his mind abruptly. The light of recognition in the girl's fair face made him think the king's commissioner might even be his rival.

Result of Watch Competition.

No. 1.

The correct time in the Watch Competition, No. 1, was 1hr. 27min. Mr. W. Mottershead, 17, Norfolk Street, Hyde, Cheshire, alone correctly named this time, and the Five Guinea Watch has consequently been forwarded to him.

On the mountain of the prairie;
By the great pipestone quarry.

Longfellow could not have expressed the truth in fewer words than he did in his poem "Hiawatha," in describing this great plateau or coleau in the southern part of Minnesota. This rocky ridge extends from a north-easterly to a south-westerly direction and forms a great watershed, the Big Sioux river draining it from the west and small tributaries of the Mississippi from the east. The sacred pipestone found only at this point made it the Mecca of all the Indian tribes once inhabiting that vast region of the West and North-West Territory.

During the warm months of June, July, and August of each year scenes of great festivities were held on and about this sacred spot by the various tribes which assembled there to obtain supplies of this wonderful and precious stone; at which time all nations, from the crafty and treacherous Blackfeet, who then inhabited the vast plains of Kansas and Nebraska, to the more phlegmatic Sioux, Dakotas, and Flandreaus, whose home was in Minnesota and Dakota, were gathered here on terms of friendship.

On these occasions all feuds and animosities were laid aside, and with the "calumet," or "pipe of peace," fashioned from the stone to be found only at that point, they pledged a temporary peace to be broken only when they again separated and returned to their distant hunting grounds.

Stretching up and down the gently sloping valley, round the beautiful little lakes, were orderly-arranged villages; each tribe occupying a separate location, but all being so arranged in a circle as to leave an unobstructed tract of ground in the centre, on which festivities, games, and sports of all kinds were held, as well as the graver councils of the great chiefs.

Among the many tribes gathered on this occasion was a branch of the Dakotas, under the chieftainship of Bison Head, an Indian noted throughout that territory as a man of great bravery, and who had received his appellation from the fact that he constantly wore the skin of a buffalo with the horns intact, as a trophy of a hand-to-hand encounter he once had with the owner, a huge bull, and in which he came out victorious.

But the fame of Bison Head was second only to that of his daughter, Wahoe, whose beauty and accomplishments had set the hearts of many young braves of his own people, as well as those of surrounding tribes, in a flutter. Up to the present time, however, no dusky warrior had succeeded in winning more than a smile from the maiden.

As the days went by and the younger portion of the inhabitants of that little temporary village spent their time in sports, while the older heads sat round the camp fires and told of deeds of valour done by them in days gone by, it became evident that there would be trouble among some of the more ardent admirers of the fair Wahoe, who as yet received all the attention lavished upon her by the different youths, but had shown no preference, unless it was for the society and attentions of Fleetfoot, a young chief of the Blackfeet tribe, and Big Wolf, chief of the Sioux.

As was to be expected, a fierce rivalry soon sprang up between the two impetuous chiefs, which, but for the interference of more sober heads, would have led to open hostilities between them on many occasions.

It is not to be supposed that Bison Head was ignorant of what was going on, but up to this time he had only been an interested observer, knowing full well that his daughter was capable of choosing for herself, and would tell him of her decision when it was made. But as the open hostility of the two chiefs became more evident each day, and knowing full well what dire results would follow any conflict between the two, he at last addressed Wahoe:

"Does the daughter of the great Bison Head desire to make trouble between the two young chiefs, by giving neither an answer to his suit?"

"No, great chief, my father; but Wahoe does not know to which she will give her heart. Both chiefs are brave, and Wahoe does not wish to wound the heart of one by leaving the lodge of my father and going to that of the other. Will my father tell Wahoe how to decide?"

"My daughter must do that for herself, Bison Head will not command his daughter. Both Fleetfoot and Big Wolf are brave young chiefs, and worthy to enter the lodge of Bison Head and bear away his child to their own people. The Blackfeet are no more our friends than are the Sioux, and both are powerful tribes. If any daughter wants to depart to the distant lodge of Fleetfoot, 'tis well; but if she would prefer to remain nearer to her own people, and enter the lodge of the Sioux chief, Bison Head would be pleased. Your father has now spoken; his daughter must decide."

After her father's departure, Wahoe sat for a long time without any visible signs of life, except an occasional sigh which escaped her. Finally an idea seemed to have gained possession of her; for she suddenly rose, passed quickly from her lodge to that of her father. On entering the tent of Bison Head she immediately said:

"My father, I have decided. Do you see the high rock which stands near to where the water falls over the ledge, and which looks so much like the face of a great chief?"

"Yes, my daughter; but what does my child expect to do; throw herself from its top into the water below, and in that way end the strife between the two young chiefs?"

"No, my father; Wahoe loves life too well to hurry herself to the land of the Great Spirit by doing anything so rash. But Fleetwood and Big Wolf are both brave and daring, and have told me they would do anything to show how much they love me, and as your daughter's heart cannot decide which chief she will go with, I have come to tell my father that I will test the love of both. You can tell them that Wahoe will go to the lodge of the brave who will leap from the big rocks to that lone rock and return my moccasin, which I will have my brother place there. Does my father like the plan of his daughter?"

"'Tis well," replied the chief, "I will tell Fleetwood and Big Wolf how my daughter has decided."

It took but a few hours for the news of the test given by Wahoe to be carried throughout the numerous tribes on the plain, after Bison Head had called the two chiefs before him, and given them his daughter's ultimatum.

Both gallant braves acquiesced in the plan of the maiden, although they knew it might mean death or terrible injuries to them to attempt the feat, should they fail to accomplish it, as the leap had never yet been made by man.

The rock in question was a tall piece of granite standing like a lone sentinel about fifteen feet from the main ledge, overlooking the falls, and was about thirty or forty in height, having evidently been detached from the main ledge by some volcanic convulsion of past ages. As the space on top of this boulder was only about a foot square, it will be readily seen that a man must be sure-footed if he landed on its top and retained his footing. This fact, more than the distance, made the jump so dangerous.

It was decided by the Bison Head that the contest should take place at the going down of the sun on the following day.

As the attentions of the two young chiefs to Wahoe were well known to all the Indians assembled, the announcement of the dangerous contest between the two was the one exciting theme talked of that night and next day in the tents of the red men.

The Spring Double Number of Home Notes appears on Saturday, March 27th. In it will be found an article on "The Queen's Religion and Sunday Observances"; and particulars of a Grand Competition, in which a bicycle is given away. A Paper Pattern will be presented with each number.

As a possible safeguard to the future of the untutored savage, both young chiefs spent the entire night alone in their tents, chanting their death song, that they might be prepared to enter the happy hunting grounds should they meet their death in attempting their love test.

On the following day, as the sun began to sink towards the home of Fleetfoot, the plain below the falls and the space on the rocks above were lined with the various Indians, all excited and interested in the result of the contest.

As the hour for the trial drew near the excitement increased; but when the two chiefs came up from their tents, followed by Bison Head and Wahoe, a silence as of death pervaded that vast multitude.

When they arrived at the scene of the contest, Bison Head thus addressed the young chiefs:

"Fleetfoot, chief of the daring and swift-footed Blackfeet, and Big Wolf, chief of the great and powerful Sioux, you both desire that the daughter of Bison Head shall leave the lodge of her father, and enter yours to cook your food, and care for you when you return from the chase. The daughter of Bison Head is greatly honoured that she should win the love of the two such brave and powerful chiefs; but she is young, and does not know her heart. Knowing of your bravery and great abilities, she decided to give you this test. He who shall succeed shall take Wahoe to his lodge. Bison Head has spoken. Let each chief prepare to take the trial."

An arrow was shot into the air by one of the other young chiefs assembled, it being agreed that should it fall point downwards, Fleetfoot should be the first to attempt the feat; if otherwise, Big Wolf should be the first. The arrow fell at a short distance, and struck the ground, penetrating it several inches, where it stood, quivering in the earth, with the feather pointing upwards.

No sooner was its position announced, when Fleetfoot prepared to make the leap to either a bride, dishonour, or death. He walked to the brink of the precipice, and measured with his keen eye the distance from where he stood to the small space on top of the rock, on which lay the object of his leap, the beautifully embroidered moccasin of Wahoe.

Then, with one glance into the depths below, as if to see where he would strike should he fail to secure a foothold, he gradually stepped backward a few feet in order to give his body a little impetus before attempting the leap.

Not a sound could be heard from that vast multitude gathered on the rocks above or the plain below; the occasion seemed too solemn, all present knowing full well the result of the young chief's leap should he not calculate correctly the distance, and jump either too far or fail to jump far enough.

The suspense was of but a moment's duration, however, as the body of the young chief was seen to shoot out into space, after a short run, as he made the leap.

He had judged the distance correctly, and landed fairly and squarely on the small space on the rock. A mighty shout went up from those assembled, which was immediately followed by a cry of horror, as the form of the young chief was seen to sway backwards and forwards, and suddenly plunge headlong down among the sharp and jagged rocks forty feet below, where he lay a mass of broken bones and quivering flesh.

Before assistance could reach the unfortunate chief, a cry went up from those on the rocks above, caused by the form of Big Wolf, which shot down to the brink of the precipice and out towards the fatal rock. He had failed to gauge the distance as accurately as his rival; and this fact, together with the fearful and as yet unknown results of Fleetfoot's leap, caused him to just strike the edge of the rock, but not sufficient to gain a foothold. His body swayed backwards!

He endeavoured to grasp the edges of the projecting rock with his hands, but his efforts were in vain, and with an agonising cry he fell through the air and struck on the rocks below, only a few feet from where his rival lay quivering in the agonies of death.

The cry that now went up was heartrending, and a rush was made by those on the plain below, who were near where the two chiefs had fallen, to assist them if possible.

But the awful tragedy was not yet ended. When Fleetfoot had made his fearful jump and his body was seen to plunge into the depths below, Wahoe had uttered an agonising cry and hidden her face in her hands, to shut out the sight of anything so fearful. She only uncovered her face when the second awful shout went up at Big Wolf's unsuccessful attempt, only in time to see him vainly endeavouring to gain a foothold, and then with his despairing glance disappear from sight.

In an instant her shrieks could be heard by everybody, and before those near her divined what her intentions were, she had rushed to the edge of the precipice and, after gazing for an instant into the depths below, she plunged headlong from the rocks.

Those near rushed to where she had stood but a moment before, only in time to see her body strike on the cruel rocks below, directly between the bodies of the two chiefs.

The uproar among those wild savages was something terrible and appalling. Bison Head would have leaped after his daughter had he not been restrained by some of his band.

It was but a few moments before a surging mass was surrounding the fatal spot where lay the two chiefs and the maiden. Wahoe and Big Wolf were both dead, the latter having struck on the back of his head, crushing the skull, while the former fell with such force on the sharp rocks that the life was literally knocked out of her body.

Fleetfoot was still found breathing, but his body was such a shapeless mass of bruised flesh and broken bones that he died before they could remove him to his own lodge.

To the rocks upon which the fatal leaps were made was given the name of "Lovers' Leap," a name which it still retains, although a thriving young city has now grown up only a short distance from the spot, while a great railway system carries hundreds of people daily along the brink of the precipice from which those three each made their fatal leap.

The three boulders that marked their graves have correctly been termed the "Maiden and Her Lovers" by the many curious visitors who have since visited the spot, and wondered how they came there at that distance from all surrounding rocks.

The Outlaw's Daughter.

'Cencion Lopez, daughter of Cenaga, the outlaw, paused on the brink of the stream, casting a quick glance down its scarred bed; then she threw back her head and scanned the hill above her. She laughed out merrily at the dancing flutter of scarlet, as a gay breeze caught the curtain in her cabin window, and, steadying her deftly-poised olla with one brown hand, darted, lithe and swift as a young panther, across the plank and up the well-trod trail.

She placed her burden on the table, and, setting plates and cups for two, turned hastily to the stove again to spread tortillas on the hissing lids.

Just as the last cake found its place, a fugitive step rattled the pebbles before the door.

The flush on the girl's face deepened, and her full eyes widened expectantly; she sprang to meet the newcomer's warm caress, took his rifle and sombrero from him, and hurried to serve the meal, while he unwound the folds of his dun serape.

"I saw thy signal, querida," he said, in musical bass, flinging down the wrap and moving to the cradle side. "How fares my son? Is all well with ye since I last came?"

The baby slept; 'Cencion laid her eager face on the man's shoulder, smiling down at the wee, dark profile.

"All is well," she answered.

"And Juan?"

"Comes not till Monday; you have four days of safety, mi muy caro." A little frown drew between her brows, but her lips still smiled. "Come, señor, the supper cools."

* * * * *

Smarting under his ill-fortune and fiercely angry at his false comrade, Juan Lopez gathered together the wreckage from his outfit and set his face towards home. It had been a disastrous trip from the very start; he might have known, when Atar refused to budge from the corral and only passed the gate protestingly under the quirt, that the expedition was destined to failure.

"Madre de Dios," he muttered stormily, "much good may his burros do him! May they stumble in the stream and drown; may they stampede and lose him in the desert! As for me, my load floats down the cañon, and I go home. Again I shall know not to travel with one under an evil star!"

All day Atar and Selin plodded with drooping heads under the glaring sun! The chalky powder rose like smoke under their steady hoof-falls; the fever of his hurt grew in his blood, and resentment consumed him.

Superstitious foreboding haunted his tortured senses as he brooded over his loss and desertion. Misfortune had followed him from the cabin. Had he cast off the incubus with his ill-starred friendship, or was some fell spirit still tracing his movements? Insensibly, as the return road shortened, and no further evil marred his journeying, the evanescent dread took the shape of a nameless fear for 'Cencion and the child.

His head throbbed, the breath of evening floating down the cañon could not ease his sick discomfort; the weary pace nettled him! When at last the frowning walls around him lowered, and, turning from the main trail, the heavy cart lumbered over the baked earth along his own stream, Juan urged his horses into a trot, in spite of the pain in his left arm, and, with a final malediction on the recreant Manuel, rattled quickly over the last bare hillock, and sprang down by the corral gate. In a few minutes he was following his wife's footsteps up the steep ascent to the cabin door.

It struck him with a creepy chill that no 'Cencion stood on the threshold, calling down her welcome; then he laughed aloud at his foolish fear. His eyes twinkled in a momentary revulsion of feeling. How fine a surprise would he be to his prima querida! He stole upward silently. The fever flush caught him with his hand on the latch, the sound of a voice fell upon his ear—a musical, mellow tone—then madness surged into his brain.

This, then, was the meaning of his disasters, this the crowning trick of his evil genius! His pulse scorched.

He had never doubted her, never for one instant dreamed that her isolation was not complete on his long monthly trips to Vallecita—he had forgotten, fool that he was, that strain of lawless blood—secure in his infatuation, but now—now—he did not feel the wrenching of his hurt as he swung the rifle into position and moved noiseless, cat-like, under the opened window.

Crouching under the casement like a puma, lips snarled apart over glistening, cruel teeth, Juan Lopez waited; his eyes blurred, he brushed an impatient hand to clear them, listening.

The baby's gurgling laughter quivered through him. 'Cencion's light step sounded on the earthen floor, and she seemed to start up before him in all her palpitating womanhood. He choked a groan.

Then the voice! "Bring here the boy, carina."

Juan struggled with the sound's vague familiarity. "Carina," he groaned, and ground his teeth impotently. Soft swishings and rustlings and 'Cencion's quick, gay treble: "Here, then. Take your boy. He grows more like you daily, caro mio." Through this deadly pain, the bowed listener felt one keener pang for his son—his beloved. He must see! Could the fellow be José or Stefan? Did the boy look like Stefan?—that elusive familiarity of tone——

Dragging himself up cautiously, he peered into the dim room, trusting to the swift-drawing night's protection. 'Cencion—his heart yearned to her, even in her falsity—stood by the couch, bending over the dark form of the intruder with the child in her arms; her dusky hair fell round her like a veil, intercepting the coveted view of his rival.

This was his time; one bullet now and vengeance!

Juan reeled faintly, and then grew rigid. With deliberate, silent care, he placed his weapon, and drew his bead; just here the woman's sash-line, and here, beyond, the head of her paramour—but the child?

The homely house furnishings seem to leap out of the darkness; the stove, the littered table, and the couch, the iron crucifix, and the carved cradle in the corner—all his life long Juan will see them so—and 'Cencion turned; the dusky veil was blown and rent like the sea-mist, revealing—Holy Mother of Heaven! her father, Cenaga, the outlaw!

Juan Lopez fell on his knees below the window, the smoking rifle clattered from his broken grasp, and the missile sped, aimless and harmless, high into the adobe wall.

Hand to hand, and foot to foot:
Nothing there, save death, was mute:
Stroke, and thrust, and flash, and cry
For quarter or for victory,
Mingle there with the volleying thunder,
Which makes the distant cities wonder
How the sounding battle goes,
If with them or for their foes;
If they must mourn or must rejoice
In that annihilating voice,
Which pierces the deep hills through and through
With an echo dread and new.

From the point of encountering blades to the hilt,
Sabres and swords with blood were gilt;
But the rampart is won and the spoil begun,
And all but the after carnage done.

Byron.

It would be difficult to find in the whole history of wars a more thrilling and heroic chapter than that which tells the story of the six great campaigns of the Peninsular War.

This was, perhaps, the least selfish war of which history tells. It was not a war of aggrandisement or of conquest; it was waged to deliver not merely Spain, but the whole of Europe from that military despotism with which the genius and ambition of Napoleon threatened to overwhelm the civilised world. And on what a scale Great Britain, when aroused, can fight, let the Peninsular War tell.

At its close the fleets of Great Britain rode triumphant on every sea; and in the Peninsular between 1808-14 her land forces fought and won nineteen pitched battles, made or sustained ten fierce sieges, took four great fortresses, twice expelled the French from Portugal and once from Spain. Great Britain expended in these campaigns more than £100,000,000 sterling on her own troops, besides subsidising the forces of Spain and Portugal.

This "nation of shopkeepers" proved that, when kindled to action, it could wage war on a scale and in a fashion that might have moved the wonder of Alexander or of Cæsar, and from motives, it may be added, too lofty for either Cæsar or Alexander so much as to comprehend. It is worth while to tell afresh the story of some of the more picturesque incidents of that great strife.

On April 6th, 1812, Badajos was stormed by Wellington; and the story forms one of the most tragical and splendid incidents in the military history of the world. Of "the night of the horrors of Badajos," Napier says, "posterity can scarcely be expected to credit the tale." No tale, however, is better authenticated, or, as an example of what disciplined human valour is capable of achieving, better deserves to be told.

Wellington was preparing for his great forward movement into Spain, the campaign which led to Vittoria, the battle in which "40,000 Frenchmen were beaten in forty minutes." As a preliminary he had to capture, under the vigilant eyes of Soult and Marmont, the two great border fortresses—Cuidad Rodrigo and Badajos. He had, to use Napier's phrase, "jumped with both feet" on the first named fortress, and captured it in twelve days with a loss of 1,200 men and 90 officers.

But Badajos was a still harder task. The city stands on a rocky ridge, which forms the last spur of the Toledo range, and is of extraordinary strength. The river Rivillas falls almost at right angles into the Guadiana, and in the angle formed by their junction stands Badajos, oval in shape, girdled with elaborate defences, with the Guadiana, 500 yards wide, as its defence to the north, the Rivillas serving as a wet ditch to the west, and no fewer than five great fortified outposts—Saint Roque, Christoval, Picurina, Pardaleras, and a fortified bridge-head across the Guadiana—as the outer zone of its defences.

Twice the English had already assailed Badajos, but assailed it in vain. It was now held by a garrison 5,000 strong, under a soldier, General Phillipson, with a real genius for defence, and the utmost art had been employed in adding to its defences.

On the other hand Wellington had no means of transport, and no battery train, and had to make all his preparations under the keen-eyed vigilance of the French. Perhaps the strangest collection of artillery ever employed in a great siege was that which Wellington secured from every available quarter, and used at Badajos. Of the fifty-two pieces, some dated from the days of Phillip II. and the Spanish Armada, some were cast in the reign of Phillip III., others in that of John IV. of Portugal, who reigned in 1640; there were 24-pounders of George II.'s day, and Russian naval guns, the bulk of the extraordinary medley being obsolete brass engines which required from seven to ten minutes to cool between each discharge.

Wellington, however, was strong in his own warlike genius and in the quality of the troops he commanded. He employed 18,000 men in the siege, and it may well be doubted whether—if we put the question of equipment aside—a more perfect fighting instrument than the force under his orders ever existed. The men were veterans, but the officers on the whole were young, so there was steadiness in the ranks and fire in the leading.

Hill and Graham covered the siege, Picton and Barnard, Kempt and Colville led the assaults. The trenches were held by the third, fourth, and fifth divisions, and by the famous light division. It has been said that the Macedonian phalanx of Alexander the Great, the Tenth legion of Cæsar, the famous Spanish infantry of Alva, or the iron soldiers who followed Cortes to Mexico, did not exceed the latter in warlike quality.

Wellington's troops, too, had a personal grudge against Badajos, and had two defeats to avenge.

Perhaps no siege in history, as a matter of fact, ever witnessed either more furious valour in the assault, or more of cool and skilled courage in the defence. The siege lasted exactly twenty days, and cost the besiegers 5,000 men, or an average loss of 250 per day. It was waged throughout in stormy weather, with the rivers steadily rising, and the tempests perpetually blowing. Yet the thunder of the attack never paused for an instant.

Wellington's engineers attacked the city at the eastern end of the oval, where the Rivillas served it as a gigantic wet ditch; and the Picurina, a fortified hill fringed by a ditch fourteen feet deep, a rampart sixteen feet high, and a zone of mines, acted as an outwork.

Wellington, curiously enough, believed in night attacks, a sure proof of his faith in the quality of the men he commanded; and on the eighth night of the siege, at nine o'clock, 500 men of the third division were suddenly flung on the Picurina.

The fort broke into a ring of flame, by the light of which the dark figures of the stormers were seen leaping with fierce hardihood into the ditch and struggling madly up the ramparts, or tearing furiously at the pallisades. But the defences were strong, and the assailants fell literally in scores. Napier tells how "the axemen of the light division, compassing the fort like prowling wolves," discovered the gate at the rear, and so broke into the fort.

The engineer officer who led the attack declares that the place would never have been taken had it not been for the coolness of these men in absolutely walking round the fort to its rear, discovering the gate, and hewing it down under a storm of bullets.

The assault lasted an hour, and, in that period, out of the 500 men who attacked, no fewer than 300, with nineteen officers, were killed or wounded. Three men out of every five in the attacking force, that is, were disabled—and yet they won!

There followed twelve days of furious industry, of trenches pushed tirelessly forward though mud and wet, and of cannonading that only ceased when the guns grew too hot to be used.

Captain MacCarthy of the 50th Regiment has left a curious little monograph on the siege, full of incidents, half tragic and half amusing, but which show the temper of Wellington's troops.

Thus he tells how an engineer, when marking out the ground for a breaching-battery very near the wall, which was always lined with French soldiers in eager search of human targets, "used to challenge them to prove the perfection of their shooting by lifting up the skirts of his coat in defiance several times in the course of his survey; driving in his stakes and measuring his distances with great deliberation, and concluding by an extra shake of his coat-tails and an ironical bow, before he stepped under shelter!"

On the night of April 6th, Wellington determined to assault. No fewer than seven attacks were to be delivered. Two of them—on the bridge-head across the Guadiana; and on the Pardaleras—were mere feints. But on the extreme right Picton, with the third division, was to cross the Rivillas and escalade the castle, whose walls rose, time-stained and grim, from eighteen to twenty-four feet high.

Leigh, with the fifth division, was to attack the opposite, or western extremity of the town, the bastion of Saint Vincente, where the glacis was mined, the ditch deep, and the scarp thirty feet high. Against the actual breaches Colville and Andrew Barnard were to lead the light division and the fourth division, the former attacking the bastion of Santa Maria, and the latter the Trinidad.

The hour was fixed for ten o'clock, and the story of that night attack, as told in Napier's immortal prose, is one of the great battle-pictures of literature; and anyone who tries to tell the tale will find himself slipping insensibly into Napier's cadences.

The night was black, a strange silence lay on rampart and trench, broken from time to time by the deep voices of the sentinels, that proclaimed all was well in Badajos. "Sentinelle garde à vous," the cry of the sentinels, was translated by a British private as "All's well in Badahoo!"

A lighted carcass thrown from the castle discovered Picton's men standing in ordered array, and compelled them to attack at once. MacCarthy, who acted as guide across the tangle of wet trenches and the narrow bridge that spanned the Rivillas, has left an amusing account of the scene.

At one time Picton declared MacCarthy was leading them wrong, and drawing his sword, swore he would cut him down! The column reached the trench, however, at the foot of the castle walls, and was instantly overwhelmed with the fire of the besieged. MacCarthy says we can only picture the scene by "supposing that all the stars, planets, and meteors of the firmament, with innumerable moons emitting smaller ones in their course, were descending on the heads of the besiegers!"

MacCarthy himself, a typical and gallant Irishman, addressed his general with the exultant remark: "'Tis a glorious night, sir, a glorious night!" and rushing forward to the head of the stormers shouted: "Up with the ladders!"

The five ladders were raised, the troops swarmed up, an officer leading, but the first files were at once crushed by cannon fire and the ladders slipped into the angle of the abutments.

"Dreadful their fall," records MacCarthy of the slaughtered stormers, "and appalling their appearance at daylight." One ladder remained, and, a private soldier leading, the eager, red-coated crowd swarmed up it.

The brave fellow leading was shot as soon as his head appeared above the parapet, but the next man to him—again a private—leaped over the parapet, and was followed quickly by others, and this thin stream of desperate men climbed singly and, in the teeth of the flashing musketry, up that solitary ladder, carried the castle.

In the meanwhile, the fourth and light divisions had flung themselves with cool and silent speed on the breaches. The storming party of each division leaped into the ditch. It was mined, the fuse was kindled, and the ditch, crowded with eager soldiery, became in a moment a sort of flaming crater, and the storming parties, 500 strong, were in one fierce explosion dashed to pieces.

The Night Attack on Badajos.

The stubborn soldiers, however, discovered a low spot in the rampart, placed three ladders against it, and climbed with reckless valour. The first man was pushed up by his comrades; he in turn dragged others up, and the unconquerable British at length broke through and swept the bastion.

In the light of that dreadful flame the whole scene became visible—the black ramparts, crowded with dark figures and glittering arms, on the one side; on the other the red columns of the British, broad and deep, moving steadily forward like a stream of human lava. The light division stood at the brink of the smoking ditch for an instant, amazed at the sight.

"Then," says Napier, "with a shout that matched even the sound of the explosion, they leaped into it and swarmed up to the breach." The fourth division came running up and descended with equal fury, but the ditch opposite the Trinidad was filled with water; the head of the division leaped into it, and, as Napier puts it, "above 100 of the Fusiliers, the men of Albuera, perished there."

The breaches were impassable.

Across the top of the great slope of broken wall glittered a fringe of sword-blades, sharp-pointed, keen-edged on both sides, fixed in ponderous beams chained together and set deep in the ruins. For ten feet in front the ascent was covered with loose planks, studded with sharp iron points. Behind the glittering hedge of sword-blades stood the solid ranks of the French, each man supplied with three muskets, and their fire scourged the British ranks like a tempest.

Hundreds had fallen, hundreds were still falling; but the British clung doggedly to the lower slopes, and every few minutes an officer would leap forward with a shout, a swarm of men would instantly follow him, and like leaves blown by a whirlwind they swept up the ascent.

But, under the incessant fire of the French, the assailants melted away. One private reached the sword-blades, and actually thrust his head beneath them, till his brains were beaten out, so desperate was his resolve to get into Badajos.

The breach, as Napier describes it, "yawning and glittering with steel, resembled the mouth of a huge dragon, belching forth smoke and flame."

But for two hours, and until 3,000 men had fallen, the stubborn British persisted in their attack. Currie, of the 52nd, a cool and most daring soldier, found a narrow ramp beyond the Santa Maria breach only half ruined; he forced his way back through the tumult and carnage to where Wellington stood watching the scene, obtained an unbroken battalion from the reserve, and led it towards the broken ramp. But his men were caught in the whirling madness of the ditch and swallowed up in the tumult.

Nicholas, of the Engineers, and Shaw, of the 43rd, with some fifty soldiers actually climbed into the Santa Maria bastion, and from thence tried to force their way into the breach. Every man was shot down, except Shaw, who stood alone on the bastion.

With inexpressible coolness he looked at his watch, said it was too late to carry the breaches, and then leaped down.

The British could not penetrate the breach; but they would not retreat. They could only die where they stood. The buglers of the reserve were sent to the crest of the glacis to sound the retreat; the troops in the ditch would not believe the signal to be genuine, and struck their own buglers who attempted to repeat it.

"Gathering in dark groups, and leaning on their muskets," says Napier, "they looked up in sullen desperation at Trinidad, while the enemy, stepping out on the ramparts, and aiming their shots by the light of fire-balls, which they threw over, asked as their victims fell: 'Why did they not come into Badajos?'"

All this while, curiously enough, Picton was actually in Badajos, and held the castle securely, but made no attempt to clear the breach. On the extreme west of the town, however, at the bastion of San Vincente, the fifth division made an attack as desperate as that which was falling at the breaches. When the stormers actually reached the bastion the Portuguese battalions, who formed part of the attack, dismayed by the tremendous fire which broke out on then, flung down their ladders and fled.

The British, however, snatched the ladders up, forced the barrier, jumped into the ditch, and tried to climb the walls, these were 30ft. high, and the ladders were too short. A mine was sprung in the ditch under the soldiers' feet; beams of wood, stones, broken waggons, and live shells were poured upon their heads from above. Showers of grape from the flank swept the ditch.

The stubborn soldiers, however, discovered a low spot in the rampart, placed three ladders against it, and climbed with reckless valour. The first man was pushed up by his comrades; he in turn dragged others up, and the unconquerable British at length broke through and swept the bastion.

The tumult still stormed and raged at the eastern breaches where the men of the light and fourth division were dying sullenly, and the men of the fourth division marched at speed across the town to take the great eastern breach in the rear.

The streets were empty, but the silent houses were bright with lamps. The men of the fourth pressed on; they captured mules carrying ammunition to the breaches, and the French, startled by the tramp of the fast approaching column, and finding themselves taken in the rear, fled. The light and fourth division broke through the gap hitherto barred by flame and steel, and Badajos was won!

In that dreadful night assault the English lost 3,500 men. "Let it be considered," says Napier, "that this frightful carnage took place in the space of less than a hundred yards square—that the slain died not all suddenly, nor by one manner of death—that some perished by steel, some by shot, some by water; that some were crushed and mangled by heavy weights, some trampled upon, some dashed to atoms by the fiery explosions—that for hours this destruction was endured without shrinking, and the town was won at last."

Let these things be considered, and it must be admitted a British army bears with it an awful power.

And false would it be to say the French were feeble men. The garrison stood and fought manfully and with good discipline, behaving worthily; shame there was none on any side.

Yet who shall do justice to the bravery of the British soldiers or the noble emulation of the officers?

No age, no nation, ever sent forth braver troops to battle than those who stormed Badajos.

The Mystery of the Mines.

Far in the Lamb's Flat mining region, where the town of Warra now stands, was a hill, beneath whose crust of earth a vast treasure of ore lay buried, that was being mined by a community that numbered about sixty men, under the supervision of two overseers and an experienced and practical chemist and engineer.

It was on a dark night in July, when it happened that one of the overseers and a miner, having been engaged for some time in repairing a drill, seated themselves near a wall of rock in the quarry. The two men were on intimate terms of friendship. The overseer, Charles Bancroft, by name, said to his friend, George Reynolds:

"George, let's stay out here a while. It's terribly hot in the shanty, and I don't want to turn in yet. There isn't a breath of air stirring, but I think there'll be a storm pretty soon. Light your pipe."

"'Tis cooler out here," said Reynolds, as both men lighted their pipes and settled themselves against the wall of a rock, "and, besides, I have something curious to tell you. Why, what's that? Look, Charlie!"

He started to his feet and pointed into the darkness at the opening of the quarry. Bancroft sprang up and strained his eyes in the direction indicated.

"I don't see anything," he said.

"I saw a woman, or a girl, run like a deer under the trees yonder, and am going to see what it means."

He sprang into the darkness, leaving Bancroft seated on the rock smoking and laughing at him.

Five minutes passed, and Reynolds returned.

"I couldn't find anything; but there is a mystery about this quarry that I shall solve some time," said Reynolds seriously. "Do you remember, about three weeks ago, when I came to camp and sounded the alarm, and we all turned out, near midnight, and heard the sound of galloping horses rushing through the forest?"

"Yes, that was a genuine fright. But what has that to do with to-night's ghost?"

"Nothing, perhaps, but I will tell you what led to the discovery of that band of riders. That night, before I gave the alarm, I was sitting, just as I am now, smoking my pipe. I was amusing myself by picking up small pieces of ore and throwing them against the opposite wall. I reached over and picked from the ground a little piece, and then began beating the sharp points on the rock just here behind me. I struck the rock perhaps a dozen times, when I heard against the rock a noise as of someone hammering it from the other side, and as if proceeding from within the rock a loud, though muffled, 'Hello! Hello!'

"Could I be dreaming? I remained quiet for half a minute, when the pounding was repeated and the voice came again: 'Hello! hello! Don't you hear me?' I can hardly describe my feelings. The voice was that of a woman, and I thought of all the stories I had heard of haunted woods, and spirit-caves and ghosts and fairies, as I answered in a loud tone:

"'Yes, I hear. Where and who are you?'

"Clear and distinct came the answer:

"'I have come to warn you. The Night Riders are out, and will attack and rob your camp unless it is aroused. Go and give the alarm at once.'

"'Who are the Night Riders?' I asked.

"'A band of robbers and cut-throats, whose hiding-place is in these hills. Come here every night, and I will warn you of intended raids.'

"I asked another question but received no reply, neither could I recall my mysterious visitor by hammering on the rock. I yet had a notion that someone was playing me a trick, and that if I should arouse the camp I should be heartily laughed at. So I waited to see what would happen. I had not long to wait, for when I slowly walked through the woods just outside there, the moon being full up, I saw down in the defile a band of twenty horsemen riding cautiously towards me. You know the rest. How the camp was aroused and armed, and how, when the riders came within shooting distance, they suddenly turned back over their own trail, and when we followed they had disappeared."

"Yes, their seeing the camp aroused, and knowing our strength, probably were afraid to venture at attack. But why did you not tell me of this before?"

"Because I wanted to verify the occurrence, and I have come to this spot every night. Nothing has happened since then. Now, I don't believe in ghosts, but if my mysterious visitant is one, I believe in her, and I shall make mighty endeavours to—There! Do you not hear it?"

While George Reynolds was talking, a mysterious knocking was heard at the rock behind them. Both men sprang to their feet. Reynolds picked up a heavy piece of ore and struck half-a-dozen blows against the wall.

Instantly came a woman's voice, seemingly from within the rock:

"Hello! hello!"

"You see, it is as I told you," said Reynolds.

"Yes, I see. Answer the voice."

Both men pressed their ears to the wall, and Reynolds called:

"Hello! I hear you."

"The captain has learned that the miners were paid off to-day, and there will be another raid as soon as the storm breaks. Go back to your camp immediately."

"But tell me what and where you are."

"That is of no consequence. Enough that I know your camp well, and if you will come here every night I will always give you warning in time to prepare for an attack. I am going now."

"Well, what do you think of it?" asked Reynolds.

"That's no ghost! or, if it is, it's a very sensible sort of spirit, and evidently bent on doing the right thing by us. Guess we'd better follow its suggestions and alarm the camp. We'll get all the men into Redfield's shanty, and leave the others just as they are, making it appear that the men have all turned in; then, when the horses are within gunshot, we'll send in a volley and begin business. The wonder to me is how they find out about pay-day. They must have spies posted, or we have a traitor in camp. If the latter is true, and we find him out, we'll make short work of him, I warrant. Are you armed?"

"Yes; I always carry my revolvers at night."

"Then let us start."

The two friends started cautiously through the opening of the quarry. A vivid flash of lightning leaped athwart the sky, and a heavy volley of thunder echoed through the hills. Then followed flash on flash. The storm would soon be on them, sending down a torrent of rain. The darkness was intense, save when the lightning flashed. The two men followed a road cut through the forest for the use of the men and working horses and mules to and fro from the iron mine.

The distance from the mine to the shanty village was about three-quarters of a mile. The little cluster of houses stood in a piece of cleared ground, nearly circular in form, containing, perhaps, forty acres. The shop and log-house of James Redfield, the chemist, engineer and superintendent of the mine, stood in the centre. The house was strongly built, and was intended as a place of protection and defence of the little community. The men reached the camp in a violent storm.

The miners, already awakened from their sleep after the day's work by the terrible storm, needed no rousing. There were even lights in several cabins as the two men entered the clearing. The alarm signal that all understood was the easily-imitated cry of the mocking-bird. As our friends entered the circle of shanties they stopped, and in a loud voice sounded the signal.

Lights were quickly extinguished as the call went through the camp, and through the dark night and heavy rain, men, armed to the teeth, went hurrying to the log-house. All within the little fortress was darkness. James Redfield, who had been working at his books when the alarm was sounded, had closed the heavy wooden shutters to the four windows, and opened the slides of the loop-holes. In ten minutes from the first alarm all the miners, with their valuables on their persons and their weapons ready for action, were in the log-house, the men ranged round the walls, peering through the loop-holes.

The lightning flashed almost incessantly, revealing all outside clearly to the gaze of the watchers. Suddenly an exclamation broke simultaneously from the lips of the men stationed at the front wall of the building:

"There they are!"

James Redfield rushed to a loop-hole. A vivid and prolonged flash of lightning revealed to his gaze fully thirty horsemen scattered about the clearing among the shanties.

Another vivid flash of lightning showed the band of horsemen riding slowly and cautiously towards the log-house.

"Did you see them, boys, and could you see to shoot at another flash?"

"Yes!" came from twenty voices.

"Then do it."

A prolonged flash of lightning, and before the thunder was heard, twenty rifles had sent their deadly missiles into the approaching band of horsemen. A wild shout of dismay went up from the Night Riders.

"Once more, boys!" shouted Redfield. "Shoot just as you did before. Don't wait for the flash. Shoot anywhere."

At that moment a volley from the riders rattled harmlessly against the log wall of the house.

"Now!" cried Redfield, as he threw open the door of the log-house. "Their rifles are empty. Quick! with your revolvers at 'em. Every man follow me, and shoot where you saw their guns flash. Shoot anywhere in that direction. We'll dress them out in a few minutes. After me, boys!"

He sprang through the doorway into the rain and darkness, firing his heavy pistols as he went. Sixty men followed him, spreading themselves in a semi-circle and shooting in the direction of the robber horde. Each man was armed with two heavy revolvers, and as a flash of lightning revealed the confused band of Night Riders, the miners opened a fusilade that scattered them in all directions.

"Follow them up," cried Redfield, as he dashed with his blazing pistols into the gloom. With a wild shout the men followed him, keeping up their terrible fusilade. The rout was complete and the miners were victorious.

The storm was subsiding and the lightning had passed far to the west. Only faint gleams now and then lighted up the scene for an instant. But the darkness was intense, and it would have been folly for the miners to attempt following the riders on foot.

A body of the miners remained on the field, while the rest ran for torches. In a few minutes the clearing was ablaze with a light from fifty pine knot torches, and the ground was thoroughly searched. Eight lifeless bodies were found, and, strangely enough, only one wounded man. He was nearly dead, but as the light was flashed into his face he made a feeble effort to conceal his features with his hands. A cry of astonishment broke from the men as they recognised the face of a miner.

"Tom Murphy!"

"Yes," said the wounded man with a sickly attempt at a laugh, "Tom Murphy."

"But how do you come out here wounded among the dead robbers?" asked Redfield.

"I will tell you," said Charles Bancroft, stepping forward. "I made up my mind to-night that we had a traitor in camp who was giving information to the band of Night Riders. You all remember that last pay-day they appeared, and here they are again at pay-day. In order to avoid the possibility of loss by robbery, I requested the firm in Sydney to forward the funds so that they will reach here only on pay-day morning. These Night Riders, as they call themselves, are fools to suppose they could go through the camp and rob the men separately; and I think their course of action was advised by the arch-fool, Tom Murphy, who lies before us. He is the traitor."

"Murphy, is this true?" asked Redfield.

"Well," said the dying man, weakly, "they say that silence gives consent, so if I keep still you'll believe it of me. I'm a-dyin', an' I don't want to die with a lie on my lips. I'll say that it is true. I want to die alone."

The bodies of the robbers were carried into a tool shanty, where they were left until the morning, when they were buried in one grave half-a-mile away in the thickest part of the bush. Pickets were stationed about the camp, and the miners again returned to their shanties, but few eyes were closed in slumber that night.

The morning dawned brightly clear, and the men, after burying the dead, among which was the body of the traitor, Tom Murphy, went to the mine.

George Reynolds, having received leave of absence from the quarry, began his investigations, but the night fell, and he had learned nothing. When the darkness settled down, he, with Charles Bancroft and James Redfield, came to the spot from which the warning voice had been heard. The superintendent had been made acquainted with the facts.

"Now, boys," he said, "the mystery is simply this: There is a cavern in this hill, and we have quarried near to it. This morning, after I had heard your story, I examined the wall behind us, and I found a small rift in the rock. Reach up with me, and I will show you. It is wide enough to put your finger in."

The three men stood up, and Redfield guided their hands to a narrow crack in the rocky wall.

"That crack goes into a cave, and the person who gave the warning spoke through it. Ah, what is that?"

A violent knocking was heard on the rock behind them, followed by a muffled "Hello! hello!"

"Hello!" cried Redfield. "Where are you?"

"In the cave," cried a woman's voice. They have left me here to die."

"Who have?"

"The Night Riders. I was in the woods last night, just before the storm, and when the band returned after their defeat, they accused me of having warned the camp, and kept me in the cave at the point of their pistols, while a few of them gathered up all that was valuable, and carried it outside, leaving me not a morsel of food, nor a weapon. Then they closed the opening with a pile of rock that I cannot break down, and left me here to die as a punishment for betraying their plans."

"Where is the opening to the cave?"

"On the other side of the hill—more than a mile from here. There is a deep defile, almost impassable, and the filled-up opening is in the hill."

"Well, we don't go round there. They may be lying in ambush for us, and have used you as a means of sending us to our death. If you want to get out we'll blast the rock here and release you. Can this be blasted without hurting you?"

"I can go to the far end of the cavern, behind a point of rock, and your blast cannot harm me."

"Reynolds, go and get ten men and a couple of drills and powder and torches. We'll blast the rock."

The men whom Reynolds brought went to work with a will by the light of a big wood fire, and in less than three hours the prisoner was freed. She was a young, handsome woman; she clambered over the sharp, rough rock through the newly-made opening. Then she stood in a half-shy manner for a moment, and essayed to speak, but could only utter:

"You are good to me, and I thank you for the pains you have taken. I—I——"

"Now, boys," said Redfield, "our unknown friend, who has saved us from a certain danger and loss needs food and rest after the ordeal through which she has so bravely passed. So then we will start for camp at once."

Handsome, indeed she was, under the glare of the torches, and as James Redfield brought up a horse, she sprang into the saddle with the grace of a trained horsewoman. All returned to camp. She told her story in Redfield's shanty.

From her narrative it appeared that this was the remnant of a once powerful band of bushrangers, that had operated with much success in a region further south. The band had rescued her when she was twelve years old from a marauding party of aborigines that had destroyed her home and murdered all belonging to her. So she had been in the band for six years, loved by all as a good and true friend.

The band to a man would lay down their lives in her defence, and it had been understood that none should seek to win her regard other than the mere feeling of friendship that she gave to all. The men were on the point of disbanding, and would have done so, had it not been for the influence of Tom Murphy, who had been with them before.

She had warned the camp, because she was tired of the lawless life with which she had never been in sympathy.

And returned to her room
Alone, to sup.

So many of my readers are already familiar with the objects and manner of working of the Fresh Air Fund, that it is only necessary here to mention the fact that the subscription list is now open, for them to at once send in their contributions.

There are, however, on the other hand, an enormous number of present subscribers to S.S. who last year took no interest in the paper or the F.A.F. It is for their benefit that I give a short résumé of the work in connection with the F.A.F. which has been carried out during the last five years.

In 1892 the first list opened in Pearson's Weekly, and at the end of the summer 20,500 of the very poorest and most destitute children of the slums of our great cities were given the opportunity of taking a day's journey into the country and of enjoying a sufficiency of wholesome and substantial food.

In the second year 40,230 children were dealt with, while the liberal support afforded by readers to the movement enabled me to extend the work to the provinces, with the result that in 1894 the number of children sprang up to over 74,000.

In 1895 a small army of 96,000 children had cause to bless the generosity of our readers, while last year were added the heartfelt thanks of another 5,000, making the total of 101,000.

The amount collected in 1896 was £4,100, every penny of which was expended on the little ones themselves, S.S., P.W. and the Ragged School Union sharing between them all the expenses connected with the management and organisation of the Fresh Air Fund.

Poverty is the only qualification necessary to make a child eligible to enjoy one of these outings. The selections are made irrespective of creed or denomination, and the little Protestant joins hands with the baby Roman Catholic in a merry-go-round or a scramble for sweetmeats.

I should like to take you personally through some of the slums that exist in London, and to show you just exactly the style of heart-breaking poverty and suffering you are asked to alleviate. As this is impossible, I can only ask you, through these columns, to at least contribute nine pennies to the Fund. These nine pennies will cover the entire expenses of a day's outing for one child, and will give this one child a taste of the sweets of life which will hover in its memory for weeks and weeks.

So you see that the greatest amount of enjoyment possible is got out of this modest sum, a fact which makes the Fresh Air Fund the most practical of charities. Let it be understood that the smallest contribution will be accepted with the same gratitude as a big one. It is not everybody who can give away a ten-pound note in charity, but everybody in ordinary circumstances can afford a shilling.

Moreover, those whose hearts are thoroughly in accord with this scheme are given an opportunity of showing their practical appreciation by collecting sums on forms to be obtained from this office.

As to what an enormous aggregation of people like the readers of P.W. may do if they worked together may be judged from the fact that if each of those who every week see a copy of the paper is worth on an average £100, the total capital of this colossal body would be £500,000,000.

All that we ask is but a little over 1-100,000th part of this stupendous amount. While, if each person sent one penny stamp, the amount required would be subscribed more than four times over, and make it possible to bring happiness into the lives of no fewer than 500,000 children, and it would be no difficult task to find them either.

As regards the programme, however, as at present arranged, every town in the United Kingdom with a population of over 200,000 inhabitants will have its own committee for the purpose of arranging these outings, particulars of which will be found in P.W. There are altogether twenty-two of these cities, and I do not for one moment doubt that those readers residing in every other part of the country will respond as heartily to this appeal as those who are enabled to see with their own eyes the excellent work carried out as a result of their thoughtful generosity.

As it has been necessary to guarantee £2,025 before entering into arrangements with those who have been kind enough to offer their services of superintending in the provinces, I hope that my readers will get to work at once and do as they have done in the past.

I am going to worry you with articles and notices and subscription lists and things of that sort all through the summer; but I have no fear of appearing aggressive to the right-minded individual. It is only the person who does not fork out his mite that looks upon the F.A.F. as a bore.

CHAPTER XIV.

Cécile Knits her Brows.

Edith was gone!

The day after, Cécile, summoned by telegram by Lady Hilton, arrived from Shropshire. With a very pale face she read the note left for her by Edith. She laid it down with lips pressed tightly together.

"It is all right," she said, and threw herself into an arm-chair, sitting with far-away, dreaming eyes.

Jack Heathcote was standing in his stables.

Soon she sprang up, all vigour, and wit, and action. She took a pencil and some telegraph forms, and filled up two of the forms. The first was as follows:

To Jack Heathcote,
Westmore Manor, near Seaboro'.
"I am in trouble.
Cécile Délisle."

The second telegram read:

To Inspector Wheeler,
Scotland Yard, Whitehall.
"Pray come to me at once.
Cécile Délisle."

These she sent off immediately. "I wonder which of the two will come to me first," she said, with a sad, pale smile. "The Inspector is a mile away, Jack is three hundred; but I think I can bet on Jack."

"I am in trouble." Jack Heathcote was standing in his stables, discussing with some grooms a swelling on a hunter's fetlock, when the words were handed to him: "I am in trouble!" The next moment he was dashing at full speed towards the manor, and the next was bawling orders through the house like a madman to his scurrying servants. In half-an-hour he was hastening up to London.

But the Inspector beat him by a good many hours. Love cannot drive a train, and, as a motor, is considered inferior to petroleum. If space yielded to the yearning heart, we should all dwell in the stars.

"How of the case, Mr. Inspector?" said Cécile, sitting before Wheeler.

"Ah, miss, don't ask," said Mr. Wheeler; "it's a tangled business. But I think I've hit on the right man at last. I shall soon clap him on the back, if I'm not mistaken."

"That is good. Who is it?"

"Oh, an old hand. He's done three terms of penal servitude already. His appearance exactly corresponds with your description of the man you saw in the train at the journey's end, though, of course, he has disguised himself a bit since, I suppose. However, I found that he was prowling about that part of Yorkshire just then. His name is Duncan, alias Hawke, alias Lewis—no end of aliases."

"What was he convicted for before?" asked Cécile.

"Theft, burglary—that kind of thing."

Digitized by Google

"Then he is not the man who did the murder," said Cécile. "The man who did the murder did not rob the body; you remember we settled that before. He was not a burglar."

"It was Hawke, miss, with all due respects to you. Something must have prevented him from taking the jewellery from the body, that's all. It was Hawke right enough; it couldn't have been anyone else."

Cécile said nothing, but her lips curved a little with disdain.

"By-the-way," she said, "you never found out who did steal the lady's jewellery? You have not recovered the jewellery, I think?"

"No, miss, no," said Mr. Wheeler; "all that part of the matter is still wrapped in mystery. I did go back again to Wilson's farm, you know, in Thorgill Beck, to make sure that he didn't have the things. But it's quite certain that he didn't. I don't know what to make of it."

Cécile smiled. The jewellery, about which Inspector Wheeler was so much at a loss, was in her trunk upstairs. She said nothing about this fact, however. The locket contained a likeness of a member of the Wentworth family; the murder was, in reality, a Hilton scandal. In the hopeless confusion of Mr. Wheeler's mind as to the whole mystery of the murder, she saw no advantage in revealing what she had discovered. But she said:

"I have reason, Mr. Wheeler, for believing that the murderer was the husband of the lady. Such a man as the Hawke you describe would hardly be that, I think?"

"Well, no, miss — he would not. But, with due respect to you, I stick to my view. Hawke was the man right enough. I shall soon have my hand on his shoulder."

"You have not recovered the jewellery, I think?"

"Very well, Mr. Wheeler. But now I have a far more important matter to lay before you. Look at this note. It was left for me by my friend, Miss Edith Wentworth, Lady Hilton's niece. She has run away from home."

Mr. Wheeler read the note, and pondered.

"This is queer," he said. "I suppose there's some love affair at the bottom of it—some secret passion?"

"But, no!" said Cécile. "You reason well when you have a clear clue; but you do not guess well, Inspector. You do not see well in the dark. You lack divination—the instinct of the unknown. You note that my friend says here: 'I am not what I seem.' What do you think she means by that?"

"Clearly, she has done something wrong—something which her conscience cannot endure to think of among her friends," said Mr. Wheeler.

"Good!" said Cécile. "She—or her father. She—or her mother! You know, Inspector, in the aristocrat classes in this country the children in very truth bear all the social sins of their parents in full measure, is it not?"

"But are her father and mother alive?"

"No—they are dead. Her father died long ago. Her mother only a few weeks ago. But it is not necessary that they should be alive for her to be ashamed of them. An old sin is not less shameful than a new. It is an old sin which has banished her now. Of this old sin she has only just heard; and it was on hearing it that she decided that she was unfit for the society of pure and gentle people."

"How do you know that she has only just heard it?" asked the Inspector.

"Because I saw her a week ago. Her heart was perfectly light and careless; she did not know it then."

Cécile was looking upward, with her far-away gaze, the left eye half closed.

"And do you know, miss, by what means she could have suddenly learnt this secret?" asked the Inspector.

"Yes. I will tell you. On the day of her flight she was visited by two men, here. They came together. One of them was a gentleman—a Dr. Danton. The other was well dressed, but not, the servants say, a gentleman. Dr. Danton is in love with Miss Wentworth; is very like her in face, and has a peculiar influence over her mind. I cannot explain it—but it is so. She, however, is in love with someone else—an officer, the nephew of Lady Hilton. Now, my belief is, that in order to induce her to fly with him, Dr. Danton, during that visit, revealed to her some disreputable fact connected with her parents, or one of her parents; and that the other man acted in some way as a proof of the assertions he made."

"I follow you, miss. Which one of the parents do you think—father or mother?"

"Her father was a man of honour—a Wentworth. If he had ever done anything dishonourable he would have committed the suicide; but he died a natural death. Edith's mother, on the other hand, was, it is supposed, a person of doubtful character. The disclosure of Dr. Danton therefore, had reference to her."

"Dr. Danton must have known her then during her life?" observed Mr. Wheeler.

"Yes—that is the one grand fact which fills my mind, Inspector. Dr. Danton must have known her, if the facts which he disclosed to Edith were not pure invention; or, if he did not know her, he knows one or more persons who knew her. Dr. Danton is therefore the clue to Julie Wentworth and her life—and, Inspector, her death."

"Did she die mysteriously?"

"Yes."

"Well, but it ought not to be so difficult to find him. What sort of man is he?"

"A very tall and big man; sallow, with a moustache and large imperial; with a high, slanting, shining forehead, bald at the temples."

"If he hasn't left the country, we should soon find him," said Wheeler, "and Miss Wentworth with him."

"I am not sure," answered Cécile; "he was seen alone in the streets by Captain Musgrave just after his interview with her; she was not then with him; but she may have arranged to meet him somewhere afterwards. I am not sure. We may be sure, however, that they will not be found in the same house until there has been time for a marriage to take place between them. I can tell you that from my knowledge of Miss Wentworth's character."

"And what kind of looking man was the other fellow?" asked the Inspector.

"He was a short, massive man, with bronzed shaven face."

The Inspector started.

"Your description puts me in mind of my friend Hawke, the man you noticed standing in the railway compartment. He had a long beard when I last saw him. But that's nothing at all."

"And I you!" she whispered into his ear.

"I have had the same thought," said Cécile, with closed eyes. "We shall see. At any rate, Inspector, you will do your best to find Miss Wentworth for us, is it not? Many hearts are breaking for want of her. Oh, use your wits and find her for me! Meanwhile, mine will not be idle, my faith!"

"Oh, you can rely upon me, miss, as far as that goes," said Mr. Wheeler. "My opinion is that the man we've got to find is — Hawke. Hawke's at the bottom of a good deal of the mischief that's done in this world, I assure you!"

Hawke was rather a fixed idea with the Inspector. Cécile's lips again took on their slight curve of disdain; but she held out her hand to the Inspector, who took it, and then creaked with respectful step towards the door.

Dr. Danton had known Julie Wentworth! That was the thought that haunted Cécile; and yet not Julie Wentworth, but Julie L! "J. L." were the initials on the handkerchief of the murdered woman. The photograph in the locket told her that the "J." meant "Julie." Her next care would be to find out what "L." meant; to discover the man whose name began with "L."; to discover whatever relation subsisted between this man and Dr. Danton, and so, in all probability, to discover the secret of Edith's flight. The secret of her flight might give some clue to her whereabouts. She spent a night of sleepless agony waiting for Jack Heathcote.

By eleven the next morning he was with her. She was alone in the breakfast-room when he was ushered in to her. Lady Hilton was ill in bed.

"Ah, you have come!" she said.

She rose to meet him with frankly happy face, and held out her hand.

Jack was all redness and dismay and downcast eyes.

"I—I was rather sorry that you were in trouble, you know," he stammered.

"Only 'rather'?"

"Well—very—intensely—I mean."

"Ah! That was good. And you took all this long journey on my account, is it not?"

"Oh, no, not at all. I had some little trifling business in London of—of very great importance, to see to. Horses, you know; that kind of thing."

"But what am I to do?" said Cécile to herself. "The man can't expect me to 'propose' to him, and he will never do it." She added aloud:

"But—you are not complimentary. I was sure when you entered the room that it was my telegram which had brought you. And that would have made me feel so pleased. Is it nothing to you that I should be pleased, then?"

"It is everything to me—that is, you know, I am rather pleased to see you pleased."

"And when I am in trouble, don't you care at all?"

"Oh, then I'm in trouble, too. No one likes to see another one in trouble, does he?"

"No. But you are very provoking and hard-hearted."

"Who?"

"You, sir."

"I hard-hearted? Quite a mistake, I assure you. My heart's made of wax."

"Bee's-wax?"

"Well—ha! ha! you know what I mean. People think I'm hard-hearted—got no feeling—made of stone—that kind of thing. But it isn't so. Sometimes I have a little feeling."

"You should show it, then."

"Well, one doesn't like to, does one?—before everybody."

"Am I 'everybody'?"

"Well, no—I don't exactly mean that."

"An Englishman should be frank and bold, and say out what he means."

"Do you like an Englishman?" asked Jack with quick interest.

"Very much," confessed Cécile.

"A Yorkshireman, now—what is your opinion of a Yorkshireman?"

"I like him." Her eyes looked downward. She was smiling with a sweet, cunning meaningfulness.

"You like a Yorkshireman better than a Frenchman?"

"A lot better," she said.

A bitter-sweet pain like honey and peppermint began to work and wankle in his secret heart.

"Well! That is wonderfully decent of you!" The words heaved forth from his labouring breast. "I am a Yorkshireman, you know."

"Yes, I know. I like them immensely. There is nobody in the whole world that I like half so well as them."

"Well, now! and I like you for saying it. I think it most awfully sweet of you."

"Do you? But you don't like me half as much as I love them."

"You think not?" cried Jack Heathcote with wild eyes. "Oh, that is perfect nonsense, you know! Why, I love the very house you live in—I love you so madly and awfully!"

In a moment she was on his breast.

"And I you!" she whispered into his ear, biting it. "I love—I love—oh, Jack! I can't tell you how much—always from the first, you silly—better than anybody—better than Edith!"

Jack kissed her rapturously. She pushed him away, laughing.

CHAPTER XV.

Cécile on the Track.

"But you understand," she said, "that I shall never marry until she is found. Never, remember. And the reason I sent for you was to tell you that, and to get you to help me to find her. Have you got a lot of money?"

"Oh, rather," said Jack.

"I have sent to the Paris bank for an amount for myself," proceeded Cécile. "I have won £3,000, but have it not yet. Meanwhile I want some, which you must give me. And you have to come a railway journey with me into Dorsetshire this very day. If I take you about with me, will you promise to be good, and not kiss me?"

"Quite so. I promise anything you like," said Jack.

He and Cécile accordingly left Waterloo at about two o'clock, though Lady Hilton looked with wonderment on this quixotic travelling about the world of a young unmarried lady and her lover together. She knew Cécile's wayward will too well, however, to make any audible protest; and Cécile, for her part, knew her man in Jack Heathcote. Jack was not so much her lover as her slave.

By midnight of that day the two had taken three rooms at a rustic inn in a Dorsetshire village, called Crossley. It was the village nearest Chisholme Park, the small estate where, twenty years before, Ernest Wentworth, the husband of Julie, and the father of Edith, had breathed his last.

"Are we going to be here for long?" asked Jack Heathcote, just before they parted for the night.

"I hope not, dear," she said. "It may be a week, or more. Oh, I am very sleepy!"

"What is it we are come after?"

"Something connected with Edith. It is no good telling you. You will not understand. Good-night."

"We are not supposed to kiss at all, are we?"

"Yes, dear. Once at night, when we are going to bed. Once in the morning. Good-night."

She held up her lips, sleepily, and Jack put his on them; a chaste and brotherly kiss. Their two bedrooms were on each side of a large, low-ceilinged sitting-room, provided with two ivy-clad oriel windows.

She spied an old man raking a garden bed.

In the morning, early as Jack was up, Cécile had gone out before-hand—on foot, the landlord told him. The hedges were just beginning to mantle with a flush of green, and the rooks in the trees were cawing the advent of spring. The bees were out in foraging parties, and all the land looked alive, getting ready for the big dinner and lord-mayor gluttony of the long summer. On and on, for four miles through the hedges, along the meadow-paths, walked Cécile with brisk, light step, drinking in the fresh balm of the morning air.

She came at last to the outskirts of the estate of Chisholme, and passed through the open lodge gates. On the previous night she had heard from her landlord that the house was now occupied by a retired merchant from Taunton. The blinds were still drawn, and the family in bed.

But she spied an old man raking a garden-bed on the lawn, and approached him with her most conciliating smile.

"I want to see a servant who was employed at this house about twenty years ago," she said. "You may, no doubt, be able to put me on my track."

The old man wore an early-morning face, and kept on sourly raking his flower-bed, as he replied:

"'Taint likely as I can. Times be hard enough as they are, without troubling yer head——"

She interrupted him with the cold touch of half-a-sovereign on his hand.

"I think you can tell me," she said. "I see you are a native of these parts."

"How the bloomin' do you know that?" said the old man sourly; but his tough old face wore the semblance of a smile.

"That blue worsted cap on your head tells me all about you, you see. The women of these parts make them, I think? My landlord at the inn wears one and his son another. But the colour of yours is so faded that it must be twenty—forty—years old. You are certainly native here, my friend."

"Well, I'm darned if you ben't right!" said the old fellow with a knowing head-shake. "Who's it you say you want?"

"A servant. She worked here twenty years ago. I do not know her name."

"Then I'm blowed if I know it for you."

"But, yes, I understand that. What I want you to tell me is whether you know anybody who was a servant here when the Hon. Ernest Wentworth, who once owned this property, lived here."

"Now, he wur a fine free-handed man, if you like," mused the old boy; "they were better days nor these, mum!"

"But about the servants? See if you cannot remember. Do try!"

"There wur Em'ly Bowden. Her lived with them a year or two."

"Very good. Where can one find Emily Bowden?"

"Her's under the ground safe enough."

He digged in a downward direction with his gnarled forefinger.

"Then she won't help me at all," said Cécile with a woe-begone vacancy of expression. "Anyone else?"

"There wur Nancy Hawley, if I rightly remember."

"And she?"

"Oh, her! Don't talk of her. Her run away to Lunnon with Jim Richards many a year a-gone. A report went that Richards wur drownded."

"But no. I do not desire to hear the history of Richards. I have not so much time, you see. Any other servant?"

"I forgot Annie Hall. Her should be alive somewhere abouts. Is her the one you're after?"

"But yes—the very one. You must help me to find her."

"That's just what I can't do. I've lost track of her this many a year."

Digitized by Google

"Was she married?"

"Aye—twice."

"Was Hall the name of the second husband?"

"No—the first. That's the name I always knew her by. I don't recollect the name of the second."

"Is she in the neighbourhood at all?"

"Don't think so. She went away somewhere. I did know, but I misremember where. It wurn't fur, though."

That day Jack Heathcote spent in making enquiries on horseback far and near for Annie Hall. He returned late at night dispirited, with no further information than that the second husband's name was West.

The next day Cécile and Jack parted on two horses at the inn, and went out in different ways, seeking for information; at eleven in the night Cécile returned to find Jack just come back. He had no news. But she had discovered that Annie Hall had married West at a village twenty miles away called Wixford.

On the third day she took Jack with her to Wixford, seeing how he pined and moped when separated even for a few hours from her. With intense interest, in the gloomy little vestry of the parish church, they pored together over the register of marriages.

They learned that West was by trade a carpenter, and was born in the Cornish town of Quiltering.

In the hope of finding out his life's history, all trace of him having been obliterated in that part of Devonshire, they set out the next day, by train, for the neighbourhood of Quiltering.

Meanwhile, into nearly every newspaper in the three kingdoms, an advertising agency in London had inserted, at the bidding of Cécile, an announcement to Annie West, that, if she would but write, she would hear of something to her advantage.

CHAPTER XVI.

Tracked.

The Rue Morcello is situated in one of the meanest and most squalid parts of Paris in the environs of the Marais. It is a bye-street leading out of the Rue de Retour, and is in the centre of quite a hive of manufacturing industries, toy-factories, feather-factories, book-binding establishments, depôts and large-fronted warehouses, all mingled with big dwelling-houses of the congregating working-class, in a network of narrow streets.

In her little top room.

Paris, which was the city of her childhood, was more like home to Edith Wentworth than any other city out of England. Her very first instinct, therefore, as soon as she had determined on flight, was to make for Paris. At first she lived in a very good sort of environment in lodgings in St. Germain; but finally she gravitated downward to the depth of the Rue Morcelle.

She felt herself an outcast. The child of impossible parents, and she fully realised that their debasement, their vulgarity, their sin, was hers. She had no hope, no wish to disassociate herself from them; her candid nature felt it to be impossible. For such as her, with her stained birth, her unspeakable father, to marry an aristocrat, to live with aristocrats, was out of the question. For the totally hopeless, for the infinitely separated and unrelated, Paris, even more than London, is the place for a living burial.

She resolved to make sufficient struggle in order to continue to breath, and lived in a languid pain, waiting for death.

She had never dreamed, really, what it is for a human being to suffer the want of plenty; that had been far from her; and in resolving "to struggle to continue to breathe," she thought as a child. The struggle to do even so much was very much harder than she supposed.

The value of the few things she had brought with her was soon exhausted. One by one they disappeared into the Mont de Piété; and the cruel day came nearer.

She knew the French language with perfect fluent accuracy, and had a certain cleverness and acquaintance with the literary trick. In her St. Germain weeks, she wrote hard, day and night, for the weekly journals. But everything she wrote was returned to her unused. Then in despair, feeling the pinch of want, she descended as low as the Rue Morcelle.

No. 13, where she found a room, was a vast five-floored pile, boasting a courtyard, and a concierge. It was sordid, but hardly squalid. The crowds of humanity which thronged in every corner of it were all of them persons in the lower depths of shabby-gentility, faded and wretched, but not desperately debased. Edith had obtained a tiny room, high at the top and back, a garret with bare sloping roof for ceiling, for which she paid three francs a week.

For ten days she wandered in search of manual work of some kind, and, during that time, sharply realised the great vacuum on the edge of which she stood. She had no knowledge or suspicion of the agencies which exist for the procuring of work for the "seekers." It did not enter her mind to be a bonne, or a clerk. She saw the grisettes of Paris tripping to and from the factories or shops, and their contented, limited life grew to be her ideal of attainment.

She remembered with horror that she had not cultivated any of the clever knacks in which even some high-born ladies excel. Could she sew, embroider? Hardly sufficiently well to earn a living. But she had been rather skilful in drawing as a girl, and could trace out a decent curve with tolerable steadiness of hand. She was, moreover, not without a certain amount of invention, and thus she came to obtain a footing at a modiste's, as a designer of ladies patterns.

The work she did at home in her little top room. There were two wooden chairs, a deal table, and deal wash-hand-stand. In the corner was the narrow bed, which she daily made with her own hands. This was all the furniture she had been able to procure. The only window was very small, and was brightened by the presence of a single flower-pot.

By working all the day, designing and cutting out, inventing, and going to and fro between her lodging and the modiste's, she was able to earn about sixteen francs a week, sometimes a little more, sometimes less.

Her brilliant colour faded, and purplish semi-circles formed beneath her eyes.

To her other self—to Cécile—she was sometimes tempted to write for money. Cécile was an heiress, with unlimited supplies. But she feared. A letter would reveal the fact that she was in Paris. With a desperate cringing sensitiveness, she clung to her unknown retreat and seclusion; it was her little warmth in the bitter cold of the world.

One night a man looked in at the window of the concierge's lodge at No. 13, and asked in very bad French:

Digitized by Google

"Is there among your tenants an English lady?"

"No, m'sieur, I think not," said the man.

No one knew Edith as an Englishwoman, for she spoke the perfect French of a cultured Parisienne.

The man—he had the burly figure of Mr. Hawke—went out, and walked down the street; round a corner, he stopped where another man was waiting for him.

Saw Edith walk out of the modiste's.

"She ain't there," said Mr. Hawke wearily. "My belief is she ain't in Paris at all. I'm sick of this jolly job, mate."

"You can be as sick as you like, Hawke," said Dr. Lemaitre, "but you do not touch the funds until you find her. She is in Paris."

"You don't know that."

"I feel that she is here——"

"Ah, that's all very well, mate, but——"

"Be silent. She is here. It is the place she would naturally come to. If you cannot find her, I shall."

They walked away together.

The truth is not always in a well. We seek her deeply, and cannot find her, and presently, of her own accord, she reveals to us her smiling face.

But her taste is sometimes questionable. Mr. Hawke, for instance, was one of her favourites.

Lounging listlessly about at a street corner a few days after, thinking that it was time to go and have something to eat, he saw Edith walk out of the modiste's, a bundle of tissue paper peeping from under her cloak.

He coolly walked behind her to No. 13, Rue Morcelle, and saw her disappear within the house.

He heard from the concierge that she occupied room No. 165, at the top of the building.

Dr. Lemaitre, living in princely style on the fatness of Musgrave's thousands, occupied at this time a mansion in the fashionable Rue de Rome. That night as he walked with Hawke towards the Marais, he was as gay as a schoolboy.

He kept clapping Hawke on the back.

"Mr. Hawke," he said, "I congratulate you. You are formed for Fortune. You were born to Empire. To-morrow, at this time, you will have £10,000 in your pockets. But beware of the gaming-table, Mr. Hawke——"

"Oh, shut it, mate," interposed Hawke.

"The gaming-table and the drink. Paris is full of far keener wits than yours, Mr. Hawke. And when this is gone you will get no more sums like it, I promise you. I am going to be married, Mr. Hawke."

Presently they stood together in the dimly-lit street watching the dark exterior of No. 13.

"I think," said Lemaitre, "that it would be better for you to present yourself before her first. Then I will appear in the character of deliverer and liberator. Your daughter, I fear, does not regard you with the filial feelings due to your merits, Mr. Hawke."

"Why can't you shut it?" said Hawke. "I don't suppose she thinks much more of you."

"Yes!" cried Lemaitre, his eyes flashing with sudden passion and desire, "she does! Edith! Edith! You are mine—at last—my love."

THE MONSTER.

One or two miles from Coventry, on a hill overlooking the pretty River Sherborne, stands the residence of Thomas Corbins, a very honest man, who has accumulated his money in manufacturing revolvers—or perhaps it was bicycles.

Thomas Corbins has one misfortune and one quality—the misfortune of being a widower and the quality of living quite simply. One would be far from guessing the truth to measure his fortune by the size of his house or the luxury of his retinue.

He has only one child, a daughter of twenty, and a beauty, but he has two younger sisters, each blessed with two children. During holiday time these kinsfolk spend two weeks with him, so the small house, at the time that this story opens, was as full as a Swiss hotel.

It was a frightfully hot morning last July when Miss Corbins at an early hour descended to the kitchen to give her orders. She was rather shocked to notice that the Irish cook did not rise from her chair as she entered. We all know, however, that we must be indulgent, even to the point of cowardice, to a cook, especially at a time when the house is full of company. Dorothy Corbins contracted her pretty eyebrows at this impertinence, but pretended to find the attitude natural, and said meekly:

"It is warm, isn't it, Bridget?"

"Warum?" replied the Irish girl. "Sure and it's only warum ye find it, miss? Well, be jabers, it's hot I call it, infernally hot. I shall be afther laving."

"But, Bridget, your month is not up for eight days."

"And ye think I make that a difficulty? An' faix, ye can kape a week's wages. My hilth is more than money. It wad be betther to lose twinty shillings than ye should be makin' ov me an ould woman at thirty."

An hour later Erin's daughter had disappeared, and Dorothy Corbins, not without baking herself, had cooked the breakfast for ten people, or rather for nine, as her father always breakfasted in town a few paces from his office. While serving the dishes she notified the "family boarding house" of the catastrophe which had overtaken her.

"As for the cooking, that I shall do until I can replace Bridget, but if at the same time I must play lady, preside at table, and entertain in the parlour, I shall go crazy. So please don't expect to see much of me until someone is found; and that won't be an easy matter considering the season."

Dorothy proved herself up to the mark. Besides Bridget, who had just deserted, the housework was done by a single maid. After considerable coaxing, she consented to do extra work provided she was not asked to approach the range. According to her story she was subject to sick headaches; the fact was she feared to spoil her complexion, which her "young man" declared was incomparable.

A few days later a foreign friend arrived. His moustache was blonde and his eyes were blue, but of a blonde and a blue with which the Anglo-Saxon race had nothing to do. Although carefully dressed, his clothes had not that stiff, impersonal style of the English swell for whom to be well dressed apparently means to be christening a new suit. Moreover, the cut of his linen, and still more, the form of his cravat, bespoke the Parisian. In fact Max de Résal had but recently arrived in England.

After opening the wicket gate, the stranger studied the house as he walked up the path, which took a sharp angle, picturesquely softened by thick growth of ivy.

A retriever dog, asleep on one of the porch chairs, woke up and began to bark furiously at Résal's approach, and in the death-like silence which reigned the barking served as a signal of alarm. A servant maid with flaxen hair appeared on the balcony of one of the Queen Anne windows on the second floor, and evidently awaited some questions from the visitor.

"Mrs. Corbins?" asked and repeated the young man, with a desperate effort towards the right pronunciation.

He tried Corbins, Courbins, then Keurbins, and finally Corbince, without success. Proper names are the stumbling-blocks to a new-comer in a country—and in a language.

"The devil," he cried in good French, "this must be Mr. Corbins' house, the cabman told me so."

The flaxen-haired girl made a circular movement with her thumb, and called out something of which Résal caught but one word, "kitchen," after which she disappeared.

While skirting the side of the house, Max glanced into the parlour through a large bow-window. The room seemed deserted. The chandelier, dreadful in its form, was enough to make a man of taste faint. But some canvases from the brush of well-known painters decorated the walls. It was quite evident that Thomas Corbins had a fine fortune and spent it intelligently.

He approached a large awning beneath which he saw a door open, and without further ceremony he entered.

A feminine form was moving in the room, the blinds of which were half closed to keep out the sun and the flies. The cook turned round, but he could only distinguish the outlines of a slender and elegant figure in the shadow.

"Is that you, Willie?" she asked in her mother tongue.

"I regret to say that I am not Mr. Willie," replied Max in his best English, which was not good. "I am a stranger who wishes to see Mr. Corbins, and, by Jupiter, it is not easy to find someone to speak to in this house."

Dorothy was breaking her eggs, carefully separating the yolks from the whites, and took no notice of this complaint.

"The family have gone off for the day. As to Mr. Corbins, naturally he is at his factory. You must go there to find him, or rather you ought to have stopped there, as you passed by it."

"How did I know that? Besides, I did not come to see Mr. Corbins on business."

"Maybe you have a letter of introduction to him then?"

"Yes, I have; here it is."

Miss Corbins took the unsealed envelope and drew out the card which it contained, and read it to the immense stupefaction of Résal, who never imagined that the free and easy manners of English servants could go so far.

The letter was short—only three lines. The Marquis de Saint-Cybars begged to recall himself to the memory of Mr. Thomas Corbins, and present to him his best friend, the Vicomte Max de Résal, who would travel in Great Britain for some months. It is necessary to explain that Saint-Cybars had crossed the Channel two or three months before, without concealing from his friends that he consented to brave sea-sickness in the hopes of marrying a bag of gold. The said bag had been found at Brighton, and belonged to an heiress far from pretty, whose conquest had not cost much effort to a practitioner of Pierre's merits.

Married on the spot, poor Lily Emerson was not happy, as it was easy to see from her letters. Without being an intimate friend of the young Marquise, Dorothy had been told of the bad conduct of Saint-Cybars, who had been presented as a future model husband.

This is the reason why, after having placed the letter from the odious man on the table, she continued to break her eggs, at the same time laughing in her sleeve at the funny side of the situation. Her mouth drawn up at the corners by a half smile rendered her still more fascinating as she indulged in these reflections: "Here is a young Vicomte who appears to me to be looking for a bag of gold also. I am sure that this dreadful Saint-Cybars has made out a list for him. How shameful it is to think that this intriguer will find a Vicomtesse among us all the more readily because he certainly is a handsome fellow. But Dorothy Corbins is not for him. She is not such a silly as to make one more unhappy woman in the world for the satisfaction of having embroidered coronets on her linen."

Alas! It was quite an easy affair for Dorothy not to marry Max de Résal, but it was indeed too bad to be compelled to cook his dinner. Should he find Mr. Corbins at his office, most assuredly they would return together for dinner. A fine pleasure in truth to receive a stranger, a Frenchman, a Vicomte at a time when one has not a cook.

As the young girl was thus reflecting, Max's eyes having grown accustomed to the dim light of the kitchen, he said to himself that English cooks were still more remarkable for their beauty than for their free manner. Although his tastes as well as his education had preserved him from certain flirtations, he did not seem disposed to take his departure, and he asked nothing better than to enjoy a chat with this pretty creature. But what in the world to talk about?

It was she who resumed the conversation. Without stopping the mixing of her cake, she had thought of a means to prevent Max from growing old in Coventry, and in advance she was amused at the device which she was going to employ to put this dot-hunter to flight before he should wish to carry the acquaintance farther. Suddenly employing the French tongue, which she spoke in a praiseworthy way, she asked:

"So it is on business that you desire to see Mr. Corbins?"

Max, dumfounded, raised his hands.

"Now just hear her speak French! Mademoiselle, were you in my country I should declare that you were a princess in disguise. But ever since I reached England I have sworn never to be astonished at anything. Did I learn that it was required for a good cook in Great Britain to possess the brevet of sea captain in her letter of recommendation, I would say the thing is quite natural, I have had so many puzzling experiences for the past month. In spite of all, if I dared to employ an expression of your language, I should say that the cook of Mr. Thomas Corbins was 'holding the record.' We will add, then, if a spark of intelligence is left in me, that I wish to make to this gentleman simply a visit of politeness."

"But he does not wish to be disturbed when he is at his factory by 'simple visits of politeness.'"

"Nothing could be more natural," said the young man, "only, as apparently he is at his factory all day, we must conclude that he is not visible to tourists like myself."

"We see very few tourists here," insinuated the pseudo cook. "Frenchmen, particularly, seldom come here for the mere pleasure of travelling."

"On my word," said Résal, seating himself on a chair, "I am not an engineer, a painter, a singer, nor a novelist."

"So I guess why you visit England," continued Dorothy, beating her eggs. "You are looking for an heiress. Oh, you need not be afraid to admit the fact to a poor servant girl like myself."

"Young, marriageable men are always on the look-out for heiresses," admitted Max as a sort of axiom.

"During the season it is at Brighton the heiresses are to be found; you must go there."

"I have come from there. I spent fifteen days and fifteen nights, if such can be called nights. I am worn to the bone with fatigue; another week would have killed me. I left that delicious but infernal spot this morning. Of course, you know Brighton?"

"The Corbins spent last season there," explained Dorothy, who, to say the least, was as much amused as Max. "And did you not meet with any success?"

"Not the smallest in the world, and, goodness knows, I have lunched, dined, danced, yachted, played tennis, swallowed concerts, and undergone excursions. But not one of these young ladies paid the slightest attention to me."

As if to console him, she said: "The 'dots' to be found at Brighton are too big for a mere Vicomte. Now, if you had only been a Marquis! Monsieur de Saint-Cybars arranged his affair very quickly. I almost saw the—bargain completed. Poor Lily Emerson, she has found out that a coronet is not sufficient to produce happiness."

"Saint-Cybars behaved like a brute," said Max. "To begin with he never loved his wife. As for myself I would never make a marriage of that kind."

"What, monsieur, you are hunting for a poor

English girl? Oh, well, sir, you will find them; there are some!"

"I am poor myself," replied Max quite simply, "and I cannot earn my living. So I must needs have a rich partner. But I wish to love her and wish her to love me. I desire above all things that we may be a happy couple. In truth I do not think that that will be a difficult thing with me."

"These are very fine phrases, monsieur," said Dorothy, with a mischievous twinkle in her black eyes. "They have not fallen on deaf ears. I know what there remains for me to do."

"What?" protested Résal. "You believe——"

"I believe nothing at all. You would like my help—rest easy; Miss Corbins will receive your little profession of faith with not even a comma left out. In the meantime go to see the father. Do not fear to disturb him. Poor man! It is not every day that he is asked for his daughter, and still less by a Vicomte. Gracious goodness; it is not he who will throw stumbling-blocks in your way."

For a quarter of an hour Max believed that he had been dreaming; at this insinuation, full of danger, he woke up:

"What do you mean? Is Miss Corbins——"

"Oh, she is a model of virtue and goodness. If only the physical were equal to the moral."

"What, is she a monster?" asked Max, drawing nearer.

"Well, that depends on what you mean by a monster. Some people will tell you that she is humpbacked. In my opinion that is going too far. I admit that her neck is in her shoulders, and her figure—is sadly wanting. Unfortunately, her complexion is like her figure, wanting also. Remember, however, that with us men are hard to please. The girls are not married for their money. That is why I say it again, you have every chance of being received by the father, at least."

The shrewd girl never doubted but that Max would reply: "It is a shame that she is so ugly, but in as much as she is a model of virtue—and, since there are other advantages to compensate for this ugliness—one has to sacrifice something when it comes to a marriage." Then what embarrasssment for this intriguer when she would reply: "Monsieur, you are speaking to Dorothy Corbins." Poor Vicomte, if he stayed to dinner after that, really he had a strong nerve.

Instead of replying Max drew a louis from his pocket. Did he intend to bribe her? That would be even worse than cynicism. Dorothy had already raised her hand to show him to the door.

"Young woman," said he, "will you do me a service? Do not mention one word about my visit."

"Why not? What do you intend to do?" stammered the beautiful Dorothy, greatly troubled by this unexpected request.

"I intend to sleep in London. It is only a few hours' journey from here, is it not?"

The young heiress would not believe her ears. Wishing to push the test as far as possible, she said:

"But, monsieur, do not lose sight of the fact that Father Corbins will give one hundred thousand cash. There is no knowing but what he would give two if pushed."

"You pain me," said Résal, laying his louis on the table. "I would have thought you higher-minded. But that is your business. Only be discreet, for I do not wish to pass for a cad in Miss Corbins' eyes."

He looked again at Dorothy, then with a heavy sigh he turned away, leaving his gold-piece on the table.

When he entered his room at the hotel he made an effort to collect his ideas, but feeling that he would not succeed, he went out. The woman who filled his mind, who haunted his curiosity, who astonished, amused, and was not far from charming him, this woman was a cook. It is true that her figure, her eyes, her smile, her white arms, might serve as an excuse for any madness. But after all, she was a cook. She wore an apron and beat eggs like every other cook in the world. And he, the correct man, the nobleman of good descent, was wasting three days of his life, because, by chance, he had fallen across this Circe of the saucepan.

Of what use was it to deceive himself? If he were delayed in his departure, it certainly was not because of the Corbins' dinner, which in fact he could refuse if he wished—it was to give himself the chance of seeing again the apparition which filled his memory.

When the next day Max turned up Dorothy was quite content to see him, but in no wise surprised.

"Well," she said, "you have come for an answer to your card. Here it is, from Miss Corbins' hand, who has been obliged to go out again to-day. Indeed, ill luck pursues you."

"Less, perhaps, than Miss Corbins supposes," said the Vicomte, putting the note in his pocket.

"What! You are not going to read what she has written?"

"Confound the 'monster,' I have plenty of time for that. There is something else that interests me more."

Dorothy gave him a peculiar look, less limpid than usual, and then, choosing her words, she said:

"You do me an honour that I do not deserve. What I am now, I shall be all my life. But after all," she added, laughing, "does it count for nothing to be a good cook?"

This consolation scarcely appealed to Résal, who muttered, unaware that he was doing so aloud:

"It is a shame!"

"Why is it a shame?" asked this princess in disguise.

With the sorrow and wrench of an inevitable parting he kept his own counsel, and replied:

"I had hoped that you had been created for another destiny. At least you are happy here?"

"Quite happy, perfectly happy," said Dorothy, her cheeks brightened by a rosy tint.

"Then it is all right—and what are you making now?" continued the young man, who tried to put the conversation on normal ground.

"Sherry wine jelly," she replied, endeavouring to steady her voice. "By-the-way, what are your favourite dishes, for this note which you will not read invites you to dinner to-morrow."

"Confound the dinner, it's a nuisance! I will go back to the hotel and write to the 'monster' that I am inconsolable, but urgent business prevents my accepting. I ought to have followed my first impulse and gone away yesterday. Life is too short to waste it in waiting the Corbins' pleasure."

"Monsieur, they mean it for the best. This evening you would have stumbled across a family of not very amusing sisters and cousins. To-morrow you will be alone."

"With the 'monster'? Very kind, I am sure. That decides me. I only wish I were already in the train, and still more I wish that I had never seen Coventry!"

He stood up ready to take his departure, for in fact it was necessary to cut short this situation, which was contrary to good sense, when Max saw something which he could not endure. Bending her pretty figure, stiffening her body in one convulsive effort which justified rather late, 'tis true, her fine colour, Dorothy was vainly endeavouring to uncork a bottle of sherry for which her jelly was waiting. Almost angrily the young man snatched the bottle from her small hands, which were none too strong. When the cork was out, he said:

"You were never intended to do such work, my poor child. It would be so easy for one possessing your intelligence to find some better situation. Permit me to tell you that you are absurd."

"You would appear scarcely less absurd in the eyes of society could you be seen at the present moment, monsieur. But one thing is sure, you are very good."

"I?" he groaned, shrugging his shoulders. "I am not good. I am a man, that is all. If you were ugly and humpbacked as this Corbins girl, do you think that I would help you to do your cooking? And yet you are right to say I should be subject to ridicule; that shows how society has perverted the laws of Nature. Once upon a time a brilliant beauty in a woman was enough to raise her to a throne. What is the use of being handsome to-day? Should I return to France with an heiress on my arm, even though she were a perfect scarecrow, there would be a tussle amongst my neighbours to be the first to congratulate me. But should I marry Venus herself in the garb of a servant, the world would forget my name, and my children would not be able to marry. Ah! the world—it is stupid, cowardly, unjust, odious!"

Dorothy stood with her two hands on the back of a chair, her figure slightly bent, looking at Max with eyes which finished by completely turning the young man's head.

"I implore you not to go away without having dined here with my employers."

"So that I can test your cooking? I should find it detestable—you a cook! I can never, never accustom myself to such an idea."

"Do what I ask, monsieur, for if you think so much of me you ought to find pleasure in eating of my cooking."

Several voices were heard in an adjoining room.

"Go quickly," cried Dorothy. "The family have returned."

Max had already reached the garden, and was creeping behind the bushes in order that the "monster" should not see him; so true it is that heroes are rarely found when it is a question of facing social prejudices.

* * * * *

An hour later Miss Corbins received a polite though formal note that the Vicomte de Résal would accept her gracious invitation.

He walked about all the next day, and while returning to the hotel he met a man in the street. The stranger stared at him for a second with sympathetic interest; then said to him in French:

"Monsieur Vicomte de Résal, I believe."

"Perhaps," said Max. "Have we met somewhere?"

"No, but I am aware of your being in this town. I am Thomas Corbins. An hour ago I heard that my daughter had invited you to dine this evening. Will you come to the house now? You can have a chat with my daughter, who is well acquainted with your country. She is showing the new cook her duties."

"It is possible," exclaimed Max with an interest which, to say the least, was odd, "the other has gone away?"

"Oh, I did not regret her. Too fine a lady. A. poseuse, as you would call her in your country. Monsieur, if you want to know how a servant in England gives herself airs you must study the type in the country. If only I could follow the example of certain Parisians and pass my life at a hotel so as not to see this sort of cattle."

Max longed to beat him for his stupidity. Here was he condemned to dine at this house without the possible chance of seeing the dismissed cook, perhaps dismissed because of him. This was the last straw.

After a few words he took leave of his host, pretending, which was true indeed, that he was worn out and wished to rest a little at his hotel. Rarely since he had attained the age when most of our joys and sorrows are caused by women had this good fellow experienced such depression of spirits. Thus far his love affairs, or rather escapades—for his heart had never been seriously affected—had always shown himself to be a refined, poetical and sentimental man, so much so indeed that often he had been ridiculed by his friends as not being up-to-date.

He put on his evening dress and wended his way to the Corbins. Naturally it was the maid with the flaxen hair who answered the bell. The double doors of the drawing-room were opened wide, so with firmness and resignation he penetrated into the monster's den.

At the first glance the room seemed deserted and he fancied he was before time; but on closer examination he saw there was a lady seated in the shadow of the bow-window. Never doubting that he was in the presence of Miss Corbins, he advanced, resolved to introduce himself. But at the fourth step he stopped abruptly. The unknown person was evidently of remarkable beauty, though he could not perfectly distinguish her features.

At the same time the sound of male voices reached him from the smoking-room, and clouds from redolent Havanas were floating through the half-open door. Without doubt this unknown lady was the wife of one of the smokers. That she was married her rich toilet and the diamonds sparkling in her ears left no shadow of a doubt to a man accustomed to French usages. So Résal contented himself with a simple bow, all that the situation demanded, and said to himself:

"Miss Corbins might have taken the trouble to be dressed in time to do the honours."

And once more he reviled the "monster." He had directed his steps towards the smoking-room to seek support from Mr. Corbins. But the mysterious lady had turned her face towards him and he stopped petrified, wondering if a certain cook of his acquaintance did not have a twin sister who had had better success in life. There were the same adorable eyes, the same mouth, ready to smile, and the gentle mockery beneath its serious expression. In a word, it was the same beauty enhanced by flowers, jewels, the décolleté dress made by a grande contourière.

"Great Heavens," sighed the young man almost in a whisper, "I imagine I see her everywhere."

Feeling that he was growing ridiculous in his too evident perplexity, he tore himself from this dream of contemplation and fled hastily to the smoking-room where the gentlemen were talking—Mr. Corbins and a clergyman, who could not be, without breaking all human and divine laws, the legitimate possessor of this beautiful woman.

The host welcomed Résal with British hospitality. After presenting him to the clergyman, he said:

"I ought to have been in the drawing-room to have received you, but you saw my daughter whom you already know. Why, here she comes."

The beautiful creature whom Résal had saluted a moment before appeared upon the threshold of the smoking-room.

"Well, shall we go to dinner?" she said gaily. Dorothy had extended her hand to the guest as she would have done to one whom she had seen the evening before, and marched him through the drawing-room, for he would have been unable to budge himself.

"Cheer up," she said in a low voice, laughing. "Am I not loyal? Did I not promise 'to leap the barrier'; and did I not also promise that we should see each other again? Have I not kept my word?"

"Yes," replied the unhappy Max, "you have kept it so well that I long to leap from that window and drown myself in the river."

Perhaps the round white arm which clasped his own was more efficacious in preventing him from flight than handcuffs of the strongest steel. At all events, he was led to his chair, into which he literally fell inert and silent.

Leon de Tinseau.

MONA'S MISTAKE.

A water-lily fell at Mona's bare feet. She knew quite well what it meant. She knew whose boat was coming round the bend in the river, but she did not stir nor look up.

She was leaning against the old oak tree at the water's edge, and idly picking to pieces a spray of golden rod. The sunbeams sifted through the tree, and flickered over the dusky head, slipped down past the lowered lashes, kissed the dimples on the bare elbows.

The oars in the water ceased their regular splash, and the boat glided to where she stood.

The bits of golden rod floated by on each side.

"An', Mona, did ye have no greetin' for me? Why did ye come?"

Mona drops the last scrap of flowers and looks at him.

"Is it that you think I have come here to you?" she laughs. "Gerald, sure ye don't think that?"

"And why not?" he says, in an injured way. "I told ye Sunday I was goin' to the Shallows; didn't I ask ye thin to come down?"

"Perhaps," she says. "I have forgot. I came down to pick the cress; 'tis busy I am."

So she flashes one glance at him, and picks up her basket, as yet empty.

"Cress! Why, Mona," he says, "come, get ye into the boat. This cress is not half so lush as some a bit further. Come on," he urges.

"Well," she says slowly, "well." In reality she is longing to go, but, of course, it would not do to let him see it. "Ye needn't help me. I can get in."

Lightly he dips his oars, and they glide down the river. Mona laughs.

"They will be after me soon," she says. "Aunt Mollie will be a-callin' me, but she won't know, will she, Gerald?"

"No, colleen," answers Gerald in delight at the smiling face she turns on him. He rests his oars in the rowlocks and lets the boat drift.

"Mona," he says, bending towards her, "Mona, listen——"

"An' won't I catch it, too!" she says with a peal of laughter, as though catching it would be a festive occasion. "Here's the place; yes, Gerald?"

"Yes," he answers moodily. "Wait, I'll get the stuff; ye needn't move."

She catches hold of the bending branch of willow and draws the boat close inshore. One small, bare foot swings back and forth in the water as she balances herself on the prow and hums softly to herself. She knows he is angry; she guesses what he had started to say to her a moment ago, but what does she care for that? The lips are demure and serious as she thanks him, but the violet eyes are laughing.

"Gerald," she says when the oars commenced to move, "Aileen's here."

"Aileen?"

"Yes. She has the chance to see us now while Lady Lindores is at home. She is still my lady's maid, ye know. Aileen is, and it's myself would like to be in her place."

"Mona! Ye would like to go away from—from Kilgarnock?"

"Yes," she cried, "surely."

The boat's keel ran up to the landing place. She jumped out and then turned away with the basket in her hand. One glance she gave him over her shoulder.

"An' would ye care, Gerald?"

"Faith, 'tis not the likes of me she would be afther plasin'," he said to himself as he watched the little figure trip up the green sward and over the stile.

He forgot about the fishing expedition he had planned. He leaned back in the boat and fell to thinking. All the witches in the world are not yet suppressed; there are still some few left to tangle up the senses of a man and leave him in bewilderment.

The witch in Kilgarnock must have taken up her abode in Mona Carey's small head. To torment the lads of the village, to beguile and capture each unsuspecting heart, were accomplishments in which long practice had made her perfect.

Unlucky Gerald! All her life he had known her, even back to the time when she had begun to talk in broken baby phrases.

Although he was years older than she, Mona treated him in the same careless, laughing way in which she did all the other suitors. And though not one of them could boast of any especial mark of favour, yet each one believed himself to be ahead in the race—each one except Gerald Sheen.

Daily he questioned himself, tried to understand her; "but no," he thought bitterly, "it's an omadhaun I am; she laughs at me."

With all the love of his passionate Irish nature, he worshipped pretty Mona, who would look at him so roguishly from under long lashes and would not listen. And now he heard her voice calling:

"Lightfoot, Lightfoot, come up, come up; come to me, accushla!" and the twinkle of the cowbell echoed back again.

He pictured her sitting on the little stool and milking the cow; he knew how she would look—he had often watched her. The sleeves of her frock would be pushed up over her round arms; the dark rings of her hair would lie loosely over her head, and float against the dull dun of the cow's side. He imagined he could hear her talking and cooing to old Lightfoot, who seemed to him so unappreciative.

He remembered Aileen. She and Mona were about the same age, but so unlike in appearance that kinship would have never been suspected. While Mona was rather below the average height, Aileen was above it; Mona's curly tresses were black as midnight, and Aileen's bronze gold.

Lord Lindores, by whom Aileen was employed, one day announced that he would give a dance and bountiful supper to the people of the village.

Mona slipped down to the river in glee at the good news Aileen had just brought to her. She swung herself up to a limb that reached half way over the water, and scrambled recklessly out upon it till the bough swayed.

"Come here, Gerald, jist as quick as ye can!" she calls, quivering with excitement and splashing the water below with impatient heels.

"Comin'," he answers. "Sure, Mona, what is it? Is the cow after dyin'? Or the pigs stole? Tell it, colleen."

"The cow!" she says, her eyes dancing. "Oh, Gerald, it's me feet I can't kape sthill long enough to spake wid me tongue. The dance we're goin' to have in the new barn to-morrow night; ye didn't know that now? I have come jist to tell ye uv it."

"And is that all?" says Gerald, as he rests his oars and looks at her surprised. "An' I thought, Mona, ye had a thing to tell and afeared the news. A big bite I lost, too, for whin ye called so fast I didn't bide to finish."

"Well, ain't ye glad now, Gerald, for me to tell you?"

"Faith an' I knew that same already. It was no news to me, Mona."

Mona's red lips pouted.

"Go back then, Gerald, to your fishin'; 'tis not for me to bother ye."

Gerald surveyed her with an odd expression on his face.

"Look, Mona," he said, drawing a little bundle from the pocket of his corduroy trousers.

"See what I am goin' to ask the purtiest gurrl in Kilgarnock to wear to-morrow night." And he carefully unrolled a wide pink silk handkerchief, and held it up for Mona's inspection.

The little maid clasped her hands in admiration. She had nothing like it, and never doubted that it was intended for her.

"'Tis beautiful, sure, Gerald."

He craned his neck round to one side to behold the kerchief from her point of view.

"Yes," he said calmly, and then folded it up very carefully in its tissue wrappings, and put the bundle back into his pocket.

"Good-bye, Mona," he called, bending over his oars again.

She did not answer, but stared rather blankly at the little boat till it disappeared.

"Indade, thin, I don't care if it's not for me. I wouldn't have it," shaking her head, and speaking emphatically, "I wouldn't have it at all, at all."

When the next evening came the barn was full of life and laughter.

Mona looked in one direction and then another for Aileen, and at last found her sitting close to a window, and near by stood Gerald, gazing at her.

Mona turned a little pale. She did not see Patsy and Barney and Farron edging up to her; she never even thought of any of them. In her eagerness to make no mistake she stood up on tiptoe to see the better. Yes, it was Aileen, and now Gerald was leading her out to dance. The pink silk handkerchief was round her neck!

Something seemed to shoot across Mona's eyes with a blinding pain. When Barney begged her to dance she answered a little sharply, and he went away again.

"It is too warm here, aunt, just now," she said to Mrs. Kelly.

"Go stand in the cool a while, child," said her aunt. "There's Aileen coming over here; bide a bit."

But Mona was gone. Not under the trees did she stop, not by the little gate. Swiftly she passed out the side way, over the dusty road and into her own road. Here she paused a moment and, catching her breath with something that sounded like a sob, passed round the tiny thatched hut, and so over the stile to the river.

Down on her face upon the grass she threw herself, careless of the yellow sash of which she had been so proud. The yellow beads burst their string, and some rolled down the bank into the river. She lay very still and quiet, that a nightingale gave her no heed, and began to sing.

A whip-poor-will called on the opposite bank, and far off in the woods came the answer of his mate. The gleaming moon rolled slowly into view, and silvered each branch and blossom.

The birds sang on, but Mona heard them not. She was thinking—one hand on the heart that beat so fast, the other arm pillowing her head. She did not try to analyse her feelings; she would not have known how. There was a dull ache in her breast, and memory was torturing her.

"Holy Mother," she began, whispering, and could get no further.

She thought how unkindly she had always treated Gerald, and she laughed then to herself.

"Och, wirra, wirra," she ejaculated.

And now Aileen had taken him. It was Aileen's fault, not Gerald's. How could she do it, how could she?

"And wear his kerchief—the prettiest girl in Kilgarnock." Those were his words; and now she knew what he had meant. Oh, why had not Aileen stayed away! And now Gerald was gone from her entirely.

Slowly she made up her mind that she would be brave; no one—not Aileen nor Gerald—should ever know the truth. Gerald should never know she was sorry now, and so he would be happy. She murmured him a farewell in soft Irish words:

"Gerald, anoon, ma Gerald."

Then she fell asleep, worn out with her misery.

The bird at last hushed his sweet treble and flew away. He had heard a hasty step over the grass. But Mona heard not, saw not.

Somebody came down to the river bank almost on a run, and stopped short at sight of the little figure lying there so motionless. He knelt down beside her. With a quick eye Gerald noted the tear-stained cheek, the parted lips, whence came a long, long-drawn sobbing breath.

Without a word he gathered her up in his arms, asleep as she was, but Mona stirred, and then started from him wide awake.

"I—you—oh, Gerald!"

"They are all huntin' for ye," he answered. "Ye have scared the heart 'av me. An' why did ye come down here?"

"Don't," she whispered, trying to remember her resolution. "I will go back now."

She stood up, and then swayed a little dizzily.

"Mona, mavourneen!" said Gerald, holding her close.

She struggled to release herself, and stood back from him pitifully defiant.

"Ye shall not touch me!" she cried. "Go back to Aileen; go back to her and spake your words. Tell her that same mavourneen story; she will believe ye. Let me pass; I can go home; I'll not need ——" but the proud curve of the lips weakened, and the eyes commenced to brim with tears.

She turned away her head, and tried to spring past him. Gerald stood motionless at first, looking at her in surprise, and then he caught her by the arm.

"Mona, stop a bit," he said, almost sternly. "What is this come to ye? What is Aileen to me? Are ye dhramin', child?"

"Let me go," she whispered, "let me go."

"No, I'll not let you go. Spake to me, Mona. What is it? Nay, ye cannot go. Tell it to me!"

She faced him then, and her eyes flashed through the tears.

"An' ye would talk to me, would ye? An' ye would wait for me to market; an' ye would sing to me under the thatch at night; an' ye would tell me ye loved me! Och, it is not thrue at all, at all. Ye knew I am spakin' but the truth, an' ye will make me say it. Ah, but the heart of ye is black. Aileen is there dancin', to-night; Aileen is there waitin' for ye with your kerchief round her neck—the pink kerchief ye showed me and said 'twas for the purtiest gurrl in Kilgarnock; go to her, go!"

The little figure was quivering with wrath and emotion, then she remembered all at once that she had broken her promise to herself, but having broken it she was not going to yield an inch.

"Shure, 'tis not that I care for ye, 'tis the base desate I hate. Let me pass now, if ye please!"

"An' I don't plase, Mona," he said. "Is that all? Now ye shall listen to me. Ye would never hear to me afore, Mona, 'tis not my fault. I do love ye, an' ye wrong me when ye say no. Shure, mavourneen, I love the very ground ye walk on, an' the sound of your voice is a music to meself. The kerchief—aroon, are ye angered with the poor purty thing? See, I have it yet for the purtiest and smartest gurrl in Kilgarnock. An' won't ye wear it now? I knew not even did Aileen wear one, an' 'twas not mine she had on her neck. Aye, bide your head; 'tis here on my heart is the right place for it. No tears, Mona; Mona, mavourneen; 'tis all right now. An' won't ye wear the poor kerchief, colleen?"

He drew it round her neck and held the ends close up under her chin. Presently she looked at him shyly from under lowered happy lashes.

"Ah, Gerald, 'tis too beautiful for me!"

AN EASY WAY TO EARN A WATCH.

On March 11th we wound up a watch and placed it in a safe. It was wound up somewhere between the hours of four and six in the afternoon. It is supposed to run down in about thirty-six hours. If you want this watch, which is a superior article, manufactured by Mr. HENRY E. PECK, of 71, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and sold by him at five guineas, all you have to do is to mark the time at which you think it will stop on the clock face herewith, and on the line left for that purpose. You may make any number of attempts for this prize, but each one must be on a separate clock-face.

It is an English Lever Watch, ¾-plate movement, jewelled in eight holes, chronometer balance, plain or engine-turned cases, crystal glass, and five years' warranty is given with each watch.

The prize will be awarded to the competitor who draws the hands pointing most nearly to the hour and minute at which it is found the watch in our safe has stopped. To prevent mistakes, put the time also on the space provided.

There is no entrance fee required, but no competition will be accepted unless traced on the diagram herewith.

In the unlikely event of two competitors being correct, the watch will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt first reaches this office.

Competition closes Monday, March 29th. Address attempts:

Answers to Correspondents.

With the opening of Spring comes the opening of the Fresh Air Fund. An article on the subject appears on p. 401, and I would draw the attention of my readers to this, and ask them to tell their friends about the fund and its object. All subscriptions sent will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly, and the senders of sums over a sovereign will be presented with a pencil-case, if they wish. I hope that you will do your level best to assist the scheme this year, both by contributing yourself and by inducing others, equally generous, to do so.

Psyche.—Yes; it is quite true that priests have been forbidden to ride the bicycle in Paris. The reason is that on account of their ecclesiastical robes they rode ladies' machines and did not appear sufficiently dignified.

Peter J.—Queen Victoria rules over more Mohammedans than the Sultan of Turkey, over more Jews than there are in Palestine, and over more negroes than any other sovereign who is not a native of Africa.

L. T. P.—If horse-racing were abolished quite 20,000 people would be thrown out of employment.

F. G. K.—The British have won 82 per cent. of the battles they have fought. This is a better percentage than that of any large nation.

R. S. G.—Sounds can be heard distinctly twice the distance on water that they can on land.

Gertrude.—No; the orange blossom is not at all universally worn by brides. In Italy and some parts of Switzerland white roses are worn, in Spain red roses and pinks, and in Greece brides adorn themselves with vine-leaves.

D. G.—A healthy man to be correctly proportioned should weigh twenty-eight pounds for every foot of his height.

M. M.—There are three places in the world possessing the phenomenon green snow. One of these is near Mount Hecla, in Iceland, another fourteen miles east of the mouth of the Ohio, and the third, Quito, in South America.

W. H.—France is the greatest snuff-taking country in the world. I am glad to say this habit is fast dying out in England.

Gardener is anxious to know if there are any means by which he can arrest the ripening of fruit.———Experiments have been made to accomplish this by means of the refrigerating process. Apples were the only fruit, however, in which the experiment was successful.

J. M.—The Forth Bridge is constantly being repainted. So vast is the structure that it takes fifty tons of paint to give it one coat, and the area dealt with is something like 120 acres.

Furrier.—The reason that the skin of the Polar bear is mutilated in the way you mention when sent to England to be cured is owing to a superstitious belief among the Esquimaux, that, if when a Polar bear is killed his nose is not cut off and thrown upon the ice, bad luck will be sure to follow the hunter.

H. G.—It is the skin of the fruit which gives colour to wines. In the case of white wines, the skins are removed before fermentation.

D. W. B.—To find out if you are well formed, you should stand close up to a wall with your face towards it. The chest should touch the wall, the nose should be four inches away, the thighs five, and the tips of the toes three.

Clerk.—A good way to soften new pens is to hold the nib over a flame of some description for a few seconds and then dip it into water.

Eugene asks: "Is it possible that the smell of flowers could have the effect of making one hoarse?"———The fact has, I believe, been noticed by singers. The smell of freshly-cut flowers and artificial perfume in a much smaller degree will often produce temporary loss of voice. The violet, of all flowers, is supposed to be the worst offender, while tuberose, mimosa, lilac, and hyacinth, are all bad. A bouquet composed of these blossoms might, if presented at the end of a performance, make some prima donna hesitate whether to regard it as a compliment or otherwise. This would be very funny.

P. C.—The coldest hour of the day is generally considered to be five o'clock in the morning.

Ethel.—Tea is not so injurious when made from hard water as when made from soft.

Postman.—About forty tons of letters pass daily through the hands of the officials of the General Post Office.

Nellie.—(1) Yes. Most nations have a typical national flower. The following are a few that may be new to you: Greece, the violet; Germany, the cornflower; Spain, the pomegranate; Prussia, the linden; Egypt, the lotus; and Saxony, the mignonette. (2) No more stories of that sort, please.

R. W.—The room to which you refer is in the Imperial Palace at Petersburg. It is 100 feet long by 150 wide.

D. C. L. writes to ask me if I can tell him the reason bees prefer working in the dark.———This is due to the fact that sunlight causes the sugar to granulate out, and so to solidify the whole mass, when, of course, it is useless to them.

O. I. C.—A good method of restoring the perfume of flowers is to place them in a mixture of sugar and water. Home Notes Bouquet will do the same thing, too, and save the sugar.

The Laird wishes to know how the name of the Transvaal president is pronounced.———The correct pronunciation is "Krooyer." The "y" is pronounced as a letter which should be a cross between a "y," a "g," and a "j." If you want to make yourself understood though, you had better pronounce it "Krujer."

E. F.—The Viennese policemen are required to be able to swim, row a boat, and understand telegraphy.

Puzzled.—Certainly it is correct for a lady, after an introduction, to first acknowledge a gentleman in the street. Under no circumstances should he force his acquaintance upon her.

Guard.—If an express train moving at the rate of forty-five miles an hour were to stop suddenly it would give the passengers a shock equal to that of falling from a height of fifty-four feet.

D. D. B.—Surely there can be little doubt that bagatelle is a game of skill, although the element of chance in it is greater than that perhaps of billiards.

E. R.—I fully sympathise with you in your predicament. It is strange what a propensity Englishmen have for getting "hard-up," but the natives of India beat them in this respect. They put in pawn everything they can possibly lay their hands on, their lands, oxen, jewellery, their children, and even themselves.

G. P.—There are thirty thousand miles of telegraph in Great Britain.

Gentlemen,—I am now convinced that without exception "Koko" is the best preparation possible for restoring hair. You are at perfect liberty to make whatever use you think proper of this communication, and I am ready and willing to answer any question from anyone upon the subject.

Yours respectfully,
J. EDGHILL COLES.

P.S.—I enclose my photo, just taken, and I consider it a marvellous recovery of my hair, especially when you know that I am over sixty years of age.

No. 431.] For the week ending April 3rd, 1897. [One Penny.

GIVE ME WEALTH.

THERE was a strong personality about Eric Mansfield that raised him far above his fellow clerks at Bard's Bank. On the best of terms with one and all, yet none could say they knew him well. Some indefinable characteristic in his nature acted as a barrier to anything approaching friendship, and, apa t from the daily association his fellow clerks had with him in the routine of their avocations, Mansfield was a stranger to them.

Different from most young men, Mansfield seemed totally unaware of the existence of personal pronouns, and as reserved men always seem to be keeping something back, endless efforts were made off and on by the employés at Bard's to learn something of this enigma; but they were as ignorant at the end of twelve months as on the first day Mansfield joined the firm.

The various heads of the firm considered him a model clerk. He was as punctual as the sun, and accurate and precise in everything he did, and at the time of the opening of this story had just been appointed confidential clerk to the junior partner, Mr. Arthur Bard.

It was an old custom at Bard's that when one of the rank and file received sudden promotion to any important or confidential position, to celebrate it in the form of a supper, for which the recipient of the new post had the privilege of paying. On this occasion, however, and it was openly mooted as being the only one on record, there was no conviviality.

Mansfield explained that he knew what the custom was, and what he was expected to do, but pleaded indisposition—he called it liver. He hoped nevertheless that his enforced absence would not in any way interfere with the ancient precepts being upheld, and he would be more than pleased if they would allow him the privilege of suggesting that the Holborn——

All rights reserved.]

His little speech was not permitted to go beyond that point, for one of the features of the supper was the ceremonials attached to it, which naturally necessitated the presence of the principal. So the supper was indefinitely postponed.

The possession of an affected liver is an affliction that only those who have realised the ownership of that special piece of the internal anatomy can truly understand and sympathise with, yet Mansfield, despite his, managed to demolish a good many epicurean dishes at his club that same evening, and as we find him now—is calmly smoking a cigar with two aristocratic-looking young men, while taking sips of liqueur and coffee.

"What are you going to do with yourself to-night, Mansfield?" asks the elder of the two strangers.

"Oh, I think I shall turn in—I feel as if everything jars to-night."

"Come and have a turn in the card-room," suggests the other.

"I never play cards," Mansfield quietly replies.

"What's the difference between cards and backing a horse, old chap? Come, that's straining at the gnat a little, isn't it?"

"There's a vast difference. You back a horse by speaking three words, or by a mere nod—but cards, pshaw! breathing bad air, smoking, drinking, and losing a night's rest!"

"If Mansfield did that, what on earth would become of Bard's bank, I wonder?"

"Oh, I suppose I should be compelled to resign, and no doubt my successor would be chosen from that class who have no brains to fuddle."

"Thanks, Mansfield."

"Well, you asked for it, Philip."

"If Mansfield is really going, I'll give you one in five for fifty, Phil."

"Not good enough; I'll take two hundred."

"Split it?"

"Any way you like."

"I wonder," thought Mansfield, as he slowly strode along Pall Mall, "what those two men would do if they knew I was on the brink of—of what—say ruin. This is almost Thursday. By Monday I must raise two thousand seven hundred. If I owed it to a man I don't think I would have any compunction in being dubbed a defaulter, but I cannot, no I cannot let Alice in, she has sacrificed a lot for me, and I've been blackguard enough in that quarter. No, I see but one course open. It will provide the evening papers with a good bill: Absconding bank clerk—enormous defalcations—yes, and as soon as Alice saw it she would return the two-seven to Bard's. I'll go and see her now.

"Is Miss Cartwright in, and alone?" Mansfield asked the question from the boy in charge of the lift at Bedford Mansions.

"I think so, sir, but I've been away for my supper. Goin' up, sir?"

"Yes."

Arrived on the fourth floor, he quickly crossed the balcony, and touched the electric bell on the door whereon "Miss Cartwright" was printed.

"Is Miss Cartwright in?"

"Yes, sir."

"Alone?"

"She is, sir."

"That will do, I know the way."

In a room furnished with exquisite taste—if slightly foreign in appearance, sat Alice Cartwright, reading. When she heard the well-known footsteps of Mansfield she rose and ran to meet him.

"Oh, Eric, my love, this is kind of you. Have you come for supper? Are you in a hurry, because I will order it at once if you are?"

"No, dear, I'm neither in a hurry nor hungry. I've come just to have a talk—if you'll have me."

"Ah, but have you come to talk to me nicely, or to hedge that bet on Will-o'-the-Wisp?"

"Who told you I had a bet on Will-o'-the-Wisp?"

"Sir Philip Marshall himself. He came this morning and asked me what the price was. I told him ——"

"A hundred to six."

"Yes, and then he offered to buy part of the book."

"The fool."

"I don't think he is a fool at all. He certainly allows that man Edgcombe to sponge dreadfully, but apart from that I don't think Sir Philip is at all foolish. But we are talking shop. Come and sit here by me, and put your arms round me, and love me as you used to do."

"No, dear, I would bore you, I——"

"You bore me, Eric, you know you couldn't."

"It is sweet of you to say so, dear, but what I want is sleep. Let me lie down here for an hour, will you?"

"Will I? You stupid boy. Now wait a minute, don't be so impatient. Lift your head—no, this way. Isn't that better?"

"Yes, darling."

"Are you warm enough, or shall I put this rug round you?"

"Put it over my feet. Ah, that's splendid. Call me when it's time for me to go."

"Is that all?"

"All! What do you mean?"

"Don't you want a kiss?"

This was the lady bookmaker over whom all London was agog. No paper with a society column but had some personal item concerning Miss Alice Cartwright—the usual paragraphs: How she preferred her soup cold, and never was known to tie her boot-laces in a double knot. Rumour, and the ever-moving current report, gave the most brilliant details of her career, all of which were wonderful pieces of news to the lady herself.

One particular item of truth, however, if put up for auction in Fleet Street, would have obtained a fabulous price, but that was a secret between Alice and Mansfield.

And she sat in the subdued light watching the sleeping form of the man she loved, not a movement of his escaped her. If in restless turnings he moved the cushion from beneath his head, she would promptly and gently replace it. She was perfectly happy, and he?

The tender pressure of her lips—their very warmth, was still upon his when his brain became troubled with dreams. At first they were mere reflections of his active thoughts, the passing in a clouded phantasm of daily scenes and troubles. A period of deep sleep followed. Then he became conscious that he was dreaming again, but the dream took the form more of a vision. Someone was speaking to him, he knew not whom, nor could he tell what was said at first. Gradually, however, the buzzing in his ears took more definite sound, and he saw a figure kneeling beside him—and understood.

In his imagination he said to the figure at his side:

"Have you come to warn me?"

"No, to offer you your choice. Which will you have?—and your wish shall be granted. Honour, health, fame, happiness, or wealth?"

"Give me wealth—give me wealth."

"Eric, Eric, wake up."

"Give me, give me, oh——"

"What, dear, some water?"

"I was dreaming, Alice."

"You are ill, darling. Do let me get you something—a little brandy?"

"No, I will go home. I'm all right except a touch of liver; it will be well in the morning."

And he went.

Settling day arrived, and Mansfield had failed to raise the necessary money. On the way to the office he pondered deeply over his affairs. His objection to robbing Bard's bank was not from any sense of honour—for he was absolutely unscrupulous—but it would end all his scheming and ambition.

"I will see Alice and put her off for a week, and do a plunge. It is my only chance," he muttered as he entered the bank.

Fate, however, in the shape of a fortune, rescued him from himself. Some old idiot—his thankful way of putting it—had left him seven or eight thousand a year. The old idiot in question was his father, who had died without leaving a will—at least none was found, fortunately for Eric Mansfield, for he had long left the family circle with the proverbial shilling.

As soon as all the necessary legal arrangements were settled Mansfield went away; "to let the thing blow over a bit" was his motive.

Much talk ensued at the club over Mansfield's good luck, but the general surprise was nobody knew Mansfield possessed a father. Major Bousfield and Sir Philip Marshall were discussing Mansfield and his affairs one morning, and Sir Philip staggered the Major by remarking:

"I suppose he will marry Alice Cartwright, now?"

"By Heavens, I hope not!"

"Ah, Major, have you a tender spot for that quarter?"

"Not I, my boy. I was meaning that Alice Cartwright is far too good for him."

"You haven't a very exalted opinion of Mansfield, seemingly?"

"I should think not; he is a cold-blooded cur."

"I say, that's strong for you, Major."

"Yes, but I mean it."

"Well, I think Mansfield is strangely selfish, but I am certain Alice Cartwright loves him—dotes on him."

"Ay, and he?"

"Who could fathom that statue?"

For six months nothing was heard of Mansfield. He seemed to have dropped completely out of existence. Sir Philip Marshall was ruminating over the fact one Saturday morning. Sir Philip was an ardent footballer, and every Saturday during the winter assiduously scanned the lists of the teams in The Sportsman, and seeing the name of Mansfield, of course it recalled memories of Eric.

"Hullo, Phil!" the new-comer was Major Bousfield. "Have you seen this?" handing over a paper.

"The vile sneak!" remarked Sir Philip after reading. "It's odd, I was just thinking of him. But how on earth has this come about?"

"Simple as possible. The Earl of Blessington and family are at Cannes for the winter. Mansfield has evidently found the climate there equally charming."

"It will kill Alice Cartwright."

"Not it; she will be well out of it."

"I'll go and see her."

"Don't, Phil! She'll never like you again if you tell her. Your presence will always recall the misery—take my tip!"

"No; I'm off at once."

Ten minutes sufficed to reach Bedford Mansions.

"You are an early visitor, Sir Philip."

"Yes. I say, Miss Cartwright, I wish you would drop the handle, I hate it."

"But I cannot call you Mr. Marshall."

"Why not call me Phil, like the others? and you and and I are such old friends! I mean to call you Alice—Miss Cartwright is such a lot to get out, isn't it?"

"Yes—Phil."

"Now, Alice, I want you to think as well of me as you can, because I'm going to run the risk of—of making you hate and despise me."

"Whatever is coming? Are you broke, Phil?"

That was the maximum of calamities that Alice thought could be wrong with Sir Philip Marshall.

"No. I'm not going to speak about myself at all. And, first of all, I'm going to ask you a question, and don't think it is out of mere curiosity, or impertinent."

"You are beginning to frighten me, Sir Philip."

"Sir!"

"I mean Phil."

"Do you love Eric Mansfield? Oh, Alice, forgive me; I was brutal to ask so bluntly."

"Tell me all—quick, quick, is he dead?"

"No."

"He is ill, dying in some foreign land, and I here. Oh, tell me where he is?"

"He is neither ill nor dying, but, Alice, he is dead to you."

"To me?"

"Don't you understand, he is a cur, and has——"

"No, no, you don't know. What has he done? I forgive him, whatever it is—even if it is murder."

"He's married."

"Married!" with a gasp.

"Yes, he's married Lady Isobel, second daughter of the Earl of Blessington."

"Leave me, Phil."

"No, I won't yet."

"I want to be alone—to think."

"Let me manage a bit for you. How is your book?"

"Full. I shall never take another bet. This is the hand of Providence; I should never have taken up such an unwomanly occupation."

"Nonsense! I'll take your book over, if you'll let me."

"No, Phil; I mean what I said, so do go."

"And you won't hate me for bringing this bad news, but remember you have escaped marrying a blackguard."

"I shall never hate you, whatever you do; you have been very kind to me this morning. I would rather have heard it from you than anyone. Now go."

"Now, then, Phil, you fool, pull yourself together, else you'll be in fine trim this afternoon," and, with this admonition to himself, he walked off as straight as a British soldier—which he was.

* * * * *

"I am going with father and the girls to Daly's to-night. Will you drop in?"

"Let me see, what's on there?"

"The Geisha."

"I may if I get back in time, but in all probability I will have to run down to Newmarket."

"Whatever for, Eric?"

"Well, you see, Isobel, every man in my position is supposed to do something these days, so I mean to keep a few horses."

"But we have enough, surely?"

"I mean racehorses, my dear."

"Oh, Eric, cannot you find anything else than that?"

"I knew, of course, that you would object to any scheme I suggested, particularly if it would give me pleasure."

"I hate betting and horse-racing."

"Don't be foolish, Isobel. It is the duty of those who can afford it to try and improve the breed of racers in England and to purify the turf generally."

"I am sure your motives are purely philanthropical, dear, but I dislike the idea all the same."

"Of course you do! You dislike anything I do, and will soon dislike me also, I suppose."

"Is that kind, Eric?"

"Well, you goad me to saying nasty things. You seem perpetually trying to thwart me."

"Do I, Eric? Well, I won't even comment on your doings for the future, except that I do wish you would see someone about your cough."

"Oh, hang the cough! I beg your pardon, Isobel; come back—I am very sorry. Isobel!"

She had gone.

"I wonder what on earth is the matter with me. I used to have myself under better control. Isobel is very irritating sometimes; she either can't, or won't, see how her constant worrying annoys me, but I was a fool to swear. Yes, I'll go and see her."

Without speaking or knocking he made an attempt to open the door of his wife's boudoir, but found it locked.

"Let me in, Isobel," he asked pleadingly.

No answer.

"Isobel! do you hear?"

"Yes, I hear, but I am busy, and prefer my own company just at present."

Mansfield's lips twinged slightly; it was a unique experience for him to be baulked in anything.

"Open this door at once, or I will smash it in."

"Please yourself, of course."

For the moment his temper got the better of him, and he burst open the lock and entered the room.

"You had better continue the dictates of your breeding, and beat me now."

"Look here, madam"—grasping her by the wrist—"I want you to fully understand that I am master of this house, and will be obeyed. Don't think you've got one of your blue-blooded puppets to deal with now."

"At least, the blue-blooded puppets don't bully and swear at their wives. Eric, you are hurting my wrist. Eric, oh! you brute." With an effort she managed to escape from him.

"My Lady Isobel requires taming, and objects to the process."

"You will not have the opportunity of repeating your cruelty."

"Ah, you purpose showing only the velvet paw—a wise discretion on your part—very wise."

"Don't flatter yourself. I mean to leave you to-day."

"Oh, surely not. Will it be for good?"

"Do you think I am going to live with a man little better than a wife-beater?"

"I didn't know you had any private income."

"I shall go home again."

"I don't somehow think you will."

"Do you imagine that your threats will prevent me?"

"Well, my dear, your father is indebted to me for a few thousands, and has been for some considerable time. If he allows you to remain in his house against your husband's wishes I will—ah—request an immediate settlement—and I know he hasn't got it, and matters might become strained. Think the matter over, my lady, but don't do anything rash."

When Mansfield returned in the afternoon he was surprised to find that his wife had gone to Cadogan Place, and at once jumped to the conclusion that she had left him for good; whereas Lady Isobel had merely gone to see her father to verify Mansfield's statement regarding the loan, and to ask his advice.

All the pent-up venom and passion in Mansfield's nature appeared to suddenly spring into life, and instead of the calm, sneering, calculating man of the world, he was changed to a fiend incarnate. His features were distorted to ghastliness, and the violent fits of coughing that now and again attacked him with terrible violence only added to his devilish appearance. Martin, the butler, when summoned, stared horror-stricken at his master.

"Martin, have my things packed for a year's foreign tour, and send them to Charing Cross station."

"To-day, sir?"

"Yes, at once, and I want you to pay all the servants off and shut up the house as quickly as you can. If Lady Isobel returns she is not to enter this house on any pretext, do you understand?"

"Ye-es, sir."

"Have her clothes and things sent to Cadogan Place."

"I believe this is her ladyship coming in now, sir."

"Yes, go and obey the other orders."

"You have changed your mind too late, my lady, you can return to your father's house, no one wants you here."

"Eric! whatever do you mean?"

"Neither more nor less than what I said. In an hour's time this house will be shut up, so if you want any of your effects you had better see after them."

"Eric, dear, you are not well. Oh, surely you don't mean this just because of the few words we had this morning. Eric, speak to me!"

"It's too late, I tell you, my mind is made up."

"Oh, Eric, darling, forgive me, I didn't mean to vex you like this."

"Get out of my way. I am going."

"No, no. I cannot let you go like this. Eric, my love, my husband, forgive me."

She stood facing him with her arms pleadingly extended, and as he made a stride forward, she flung herself against him, crying and imploring him not to leave her. He tried to disengage himself from the nervous arms that were round him, but they held him with the strength of despair. Losing every atom of control of himself he threw her violently from him, and Lady Isobel fell with a crash against the marble fire-guard, her head striking the outer rail with a horrible thud—she was dead.

Mansfield left the house a different man—he hadn't the remotest idea that he had killed his wife. The evil passions deserted him as quickly as they had risen, and he felt almost inclined to go back and make it up with Isobel; and possibly might have returned on that errand, but for one reason. He didn't love her, and never had done since his marriage, which, in fact, was only a means to attain an end.

Earl Blessington had influence in political inner circles, and being pressed for money had consented to use his efforts on behalf of Mansfield for a consideration—the consideration being a loan and the marriage of one of his daughters. Unfortunately for all concerned, the unexpected resignation of Lord Rosebery had upset all calculations, and Mansfield's ambitions being shattered, his health failing, and being tied to a woman between whom and himself there wasn't a taste in common, his selfish nature became soured and bitter.

"It is always well," Mansfield mused as he walked towards Bedford Mansions, "to keep one good card in reserve, if only to gain the lead. Yes, I will play mine now, and when it scores, as it is sure to, I will return that doddering old imbecile his daughter and his I O U, having no further use for either, and Alice and I will leave this forsaken climate and go somewhere where there is warmth and sunshine."

"Miss Cartwright said she would be back by six, did she? Ah, then, I will wait, it is nearly that now."

A bright red fire gave not only actual heat to the room, but reflected a warm glow on the surroundings, and as Mansfield sat watching the ever-changing pictures in the grate, his thoughts, gradually released from their continued strain, ran riot for a while, but the warmth and soothing influences soon impelled reflections of that last visit, and everything that occurred, even to his dream, was vividly depicted in his mind. The reverie was interrupted by the sound of voices and footsteps approaching, and Mansfield turned to see who it was just as Alice and Sir Philip Marshall entered the room.

"How do you, Alice? How are you, Phil?"

"What's the matter? Can't you speak?" as Alice and Sir Philip drew back.

"Yes, Mansfield, kindly drop Christian names for the future. In fact, I think we had better drop acquaintanceship altogether. My wife and I don't——"

"Your what?" meaningly.

"My wife, sir," taking Alice's hand.

Mansfield sank into a chair; he tried to articulate something, but the red stream of life choked all utterance, save a sickening gurgle; he had burst an artery.

When Sir Philip returned to Bedford Mansions, after taking his wife to a neighbouring hotel, two men accosted him.

"Excuse me, Sir Philip," said one. "Is Mr. Eric Mansfield upstairs?"

"He was; why do you ask?"

"We're two police officers, and we have warrants for his arrest for forgery and murder. Do you know where he is, sir?"

"Heaven knows that; he is dead." C. E. Cowan.

A STORY OF NEW SPAIN

Padre Quintana drew a breath of relief as the red-tiled roof of the hacienda appeared in the hollow beneath him. He urged his small horse smartly down the gentle descent, for the midday August sun was all but intolerable, and thick clouds of fine, irritating dust rose about him from the road, on which no rain had fallen for three months. The rolling mesa extending on every side was burnt brown, the foot hills beyond a bright sere yellow. But the mountains bounding all showed a shadowy, cool, violet colour with a silvery powder of snow on their highest peaks, and the Californian sky was more purple than gentian.

The Padre, narrowing his eyes to escape this fierce glory of colour, and mopping his hot face with the sleeve of his gown, crossed the dry grass to the square of beaten ground in front of the hacienda, whose long, low, white-washed walls seem half submerged in the surrounding sea of golden wheat. A broad, covered gallery or verandah ran entirely round the house, which otherwise stood bare to the sun, without a tree or shrub to relieve its white glare. On this verandah lounged a couple of half-clad peons playing mora. They sprang up upon the Father's approach, and while one held his stirrup and led away the horse, the other ran to warn Donna Ysabel.

Pausing a moment to shake the grey dust from his robe, Padre Quintana followed him through the long sala and out again into cool, green fairyland. A second verandah surrounded the little patio or court, which was full of faintly rustling foliage, peppers and bananas and palms, and softly murmurous with the trickle of water in the stucco fountain. In the verandah, overlooking the patio, sat Donna Ysabel with her daughter Concepcion and three Indian maid-servants, sewing busily in the midst of piles of snowy linen and lace.

Mother and daughter, both dressed in sombre mourning garments, came forward to meet the Father. Donna Ysabel bent her proud, dark head for his blessing, but Concepcion fell softly on her knees, her brown braids trailing on the floor, and her round, childish face drooping. Padre Quintana laid his hand kindly on her head.

"Maria!" called Donna Ysabel to one of the maids. "Set a chair for the Father and fetch a fan and a fresh towel and a basin of water. And you, Josefa, bring instantly some azucarillos and water for his drink. Sit down, Father, you must be perishing with the heat."

"Truly, it is a little warm," said Padre Quintana, smiling.

"And no rain to come for a month at least—the dust will bury us!"

He sat down on a bench and leant his head against a pillar of the verandah. He was unusually tall for a Spaniard, and his slight tendency to corpulence carried no hint of grossness. His face was dark, and lined with care and fatigue rather than years, his eyes deep, grave yet fiery, his lips thin and beautifully cut. Donna Ysabel, small, straight, and milky white as became her pure Castilian blood, seated herself opposite him and took up again the piece of exquisite drawn-work on which she had been engaged. Concepcion perched on the verandah railing, giving a surreptitious kick to the heap of linen beside her.

"It was nearly dinner-time, Father," she said in the lingering, dragging Spanish accents. "I was afraid you would not get here in time."

"I shall be glad of it," said the Padre, "for I have not yet eaten to-day. And after dinner you shall confess all the mortal sins you have committed in my absence. See now if you have an appetite!"

But Concepcion did not return the Padre's smile. Her soft, long-lashed eyes met his forlornly, and he noted suddenly the stain of recent tears on her rounded cheeks.

"You are not well, my child," he said gently. "It seems to me you are paler than you should be. The heat, perhaps——"

"Concepcion is quite well," broke in the chill voice of Donna Ysabel. "Go, daughter, and tell Sandra to serve dinner out here, and at once."

The young girl rose and went away silently with downcast eyes.

"I have something to tell you which concerns her," said Donna Ysabel, "but it can wait till after dinner."

She folded her square of drawn-work, leant back in her low chair, and unfurling her black fan waved it to and fro in slow languorous spirals. No one looking at her would have supposed Donna Ysabel to be a grandmother. Her smooth, black hair, coiled high on the head, was without a thread of grey. Her large eyes were clear and brilliant as Concepcion's own, and somehow she had escaped the bane of Southern matronhood, that cruel redundance of outline which too often ends the brief reign of beauty! But a certain rigidity of hauteur about the Señora's thin lips and the coldness of her eyes robbed of charm this autumnal fairness.

"You had a good journey, Father?" she asked in her colourless tones.

"Good, my daughter—eight baptisms, two funerals, one marriage. Padre Josefo is to arrive at the Arroyo this week; so I shall be spared the long journey thither. In truth I find that my work hereabouts demands my whole time and strength."

"But you will rest a few days now?"

"I have to go on this afternoon to San Rafael to bless the new church there. I shall be gone four days. Father Vincent is lately dead, as you know, and there is no one yet to fill his place."

The Señora sighed. Then she stopped fanning herself for a moment, looking thoughtfully at the tip of her French shoe.

"I am sorry," she said slowly. "I had hoped we could persuade you to stay the night here. I have two things to ask at your hands. One concerns Concepcion; the other the young foreigner——"

"I have two things to ask at your hands."

"Ah, yes, the English engineer. He is still here, Mr. Fish? And his arm—he is mending?"

"He is quite well, I believe," said Donna Ysabel, still more slowly. "It is now three days that he has been out. Yet he makes no move to go. You understand that I cannot exactly ask him to go—but I will not have him here—at this time, I cannot."

"And you wish me to speak to him," said the Padre, looking out absently into the tangle of greenery. "Is he visible to-day?"

"That is the vexing part of it," said Donna Ysabel. "He has ridden to town this morning—on the horse that nearly killed him, and with his arm in a sling, imbecile!—and the groom says he will return at evening. He will return, you see! But now you will not be here to speak to him—fool of a foreigner!"

"Well, well—doubtless he will take his leave altogether now that he can get about. And the other thing—about Concepcion——"

"Ah, yes—Concepcion! Well, this—I have selected a husband for her."

"A husband—little Concepcion! Why, it was only yesterday——"

"She was sixteen, Father. At her age, I myself was already a wife. And you know that I have long desired the day when I could give her into another's keeping. I fear to leave her alone, and of late, Father—in short, I feel my life a matter of a few months, weeks perhaps, and therefore——"

Donna Ysabel indicated with a significant gesture the piles of wedding-linen which still strewed the floor of the verandah, then laid her finger to her lips. Concepcion came out, carrying a lace-edged cloth. Two of the maids set a small table close on the edge of the verandah, and Concepcion spread the cloth upon it while they went to fetch the dishes.

Padre Quintana submitted to be installed in a chair beside the table. His absent gaze rested on the light figure of Concepcion as she moved about and finally seated herself beside her mother. He halted and stammered twice during the lengthy grace, and when food was set before him he ate mechanically. Donna Ysabel's gesture of silence had not been necessary. Yet there was nothing apparently in her simple announcement to discompose him. He had heard similar statements many a time with no feeling save that of acquiescence.

Girls had to be married apparently—but little Concepcion! Only yesterday it seemed he had made the baptismal cross on her baby forehead, had taught her childish lips the first stammering prayer, had stretched his hands over her head shrouded in the veil of her first communion. And then so soon after her father's death—that strange death, of which he alone——

Here the Padre pulled himself together with an effort, answered a question of Donna Ysabel's, permitted a second serving of vermicelli soup and tortillas de maiz, accepted frijoles and declined the puchero, beef stewed with chillies. As he crumbled the home-made sweetmeats on his plate and drank his claret, his eyes and thoughts again strayed to Concepcion's pale face. She ate little and kept silence, leaving the conversation, as became a properly-reared young woman, to her elders. They talked desultorily of the prospects of the wheat harvest, the yield of the Tokay wines; and then of the Father's harvest of souls and of his labours in the spiritual vineyard, whose soil, like the golden land itself, needed only the unceasing bedewing of heavenly grace to prove matchlessly fertile.

At last to the relief of all the meal was ended. Immediately after service was held in the little chapel of the hacienda, all the servants being summoned to attend and afterwards given an opportunity to confess their sins. Then Donna Ysabel insisted that the Father should take his siesta. She conducted him to a hammock in a shaded and silent corner of the verandah, placed a fan and a glass of sugared water on a small table by his side, and was about to leave him when he laid a detaining hand on her arm.

"My daughter, I have some questions to ask you first. Concepcion is unhappy—has it to do with this marriage?"

"Father, all girls are so; I myself wept through the night before my marriage. But I married the man my mother brought me, as Concepcion will do, and she, too, will be reconciled."

"And this man—you have not told me his name?"

"Luis de Vargas."

Padre Quintana sprang out of the hammock, upsetting the little table; the glass splintered into fragments on the floor.

"Impossible! I have not understood you. Donna Ysabel—you do not mean——"

"I mean that my daughter will marry Luis de Vargas—my husband's old and trusted friend, a man against whom no one dares to breathe a word."

Donna Ysabel's voice was slow, and her eyes meeting the Padre's gaze expressed a cold surprise.

"My daughter——" he began; then paused, drew a long breath, and went on: "My daughter, you have made a mistake. That man is not the husband for your child."

"Father, you amaze me. Pray, why not?"

There was a pause. The imperious eyes of the woman met the kindling eyes of the priest.

"For one thing, he is more than twice her age. De Vargas is nearly as old as I. For another, he has been married. He has children older than Concepcion. For another—why do you stand here proposing to my face such a thing? It is impossible, I tell you. Dismiss him at once, do you hear?"

The Padre had lost control over himself. He shook with rage.

"Señor de Vargas is the accepted suitor of my daughter," said Donna Ysabel with a snake-like anger. "The betrothal has been announced, the wedding-day set——"

"In my absence!" interrupted the priest.

"In your absence, unavoidably and by no choice of mine. But I never dreamt you would object. Señor de Vargas is a gentleman of family, wealth, unblemished name. Moreover, this match was talked of two years ago, and my husband then gave his free consent to it, on the one condition that nothing should be said to Concepcion before the end of her sixteenth birthday. Señor de Vargas has behaved most honourably in observing this condition, and I have no hesitation now in giving Concepcion——"

"I command you to hesitate, to draw back, to break off this match while it is yet time. I forbid you to go on with it. Do you dare dispute my authority?"

Donna Ysabel's gaze fell before the concentrated fire of his eyes. She stood silent a moment.

"Your reasons?" finally she asked, scarcely opening her lips.

"You know that they are sufficient. It is not alone that the man is middle-aged and a widower, not alone that Concepcion's eyes are red with weeping because of him—no, I set against these things your anxiety, the approach of the time when you must leave your daughter. If that were all, I should sanction it, yes, though unwillingly. But not that man! Never! Donna Ysabel, believe without questioning me. If after my solemn warning, in spite of my commands, you bring about this marriage you will have committed a crime—a crime for which Heaven will as surely hold you to account as I stand here this moment!"

Padre Quintana turned away, wiping his forehead. Without looking at his hostess he went to the door and called one of the servants.

"Allon, my horse! Saddle at once—I must go on!"

He went on to the front verandah and there stood, his hands clenched in the folds of his black gown, looking sombrely out over the gold grain rippling in the breeze from the sea. Suddenly a small figure burst from one of the long windows and fell at his feet.

"Oh, Father, I heard you! You will save me? You won't let me be married? Oh, I think you must be an angel from Heaven!"

"Get up, Concepcion. Let go my hand."

Sobbing hysterically the girl seized his hand in both hers and kissed it.

"Get up, Concepcion! You are behaving like a baby. Let go my hand. Your mother will do what is best for you."

"She will make me marry him, and I can't bear it!"

"She will not make you marry Señor de Vargas. That I promise you. Do stop crying."

"But, Father, it is to be a week from to-day—and you are going away. And you do not know my mother——"

"I shall return in five days. Can you not trust me, silly child? Concepcion, tell me, why do you dislike this man?"

"I hate him! He is old, and fat—and—oh, oh, I can't bear him!"

"Reasons enough, surely! Yet"—the Padre looked piercingly at her—"tell me this—is there not someone else? If there were, I could almost—there is someone, eh?"

The girl's face grew rosy with surprise, and her long lashes swept her cheeks.

"And who is it? Why doesn't he run away with you?—no, Holy Saints, I don't mean that—but—come, his name?"

Concepcion murmured something into the bosom of her gown.

"Ah, the Englishman! I thought as much. You have known him—how many days is it? Seven—nine—as long as that? My poor Concepcion, you are very foolish. A stranger, a foreigner! Here is my horse. And now go, with my blessing—I must say farewell to your mother."

He walked slowly back through the hall. Donna Ysabel stood where he had left her. At his approach she turned her head and looked at him with unfathomable eyes.

"You are going, Father?"

"I am going. Assure me first that you will heed my words. They were not spoken idly."

"Father—on your return we will speak again of this."

Their eyes met, clashed, and parried like steel blades.

When he had left the hacienda behind him, when it had sunk again into the hollow, foaming over with musky grain, even when in the midst of the mesa he watched the setting sun flash its red light along the low hills, the look of those eyes haunted the Father, and an evil fear woke in his heart. Once out of the ruddy west, a horseman came towards him, swinging gaily along and whistling a careless tune. By the outline of his lithe figure with its helpless arm he recognised the English engineer. But pulling his broad hat lower over his eyes the Father passed without even a greeting. His was in no mood for speech.

On the third day after this visit to the hacienda Bandini, a man riding at full speed across the trackless plain hailed the first gleam of the white church walls of San Rafael with thankful relief. It was then near sunset, and the mountains before him were glorious with colour, but the rider, urging his panting horse up the hill towards the church, noted only that the day had almost gone. The little adobe houses among which his horses toiled heavily upward were apparently empty and the village entirely deserted. A few chickens and a brown baby or two digging in the road seemed the only inhabitants.

All at once came from the church the sound of a chant, abruptly bursting forth, ceasing as abruptly. Then an interval of silence, then the voices again. It was the vesper service—of course. Dropping from his horse at the door, the stranger railed impatiently at this combination of circumstances, which meant a further delay, and then turned his attention to his over-ridden beast, whose appearance did not improve his temper.

The mare stood with feet planted wide apart, quickly heaving flanks, drooping head and bloody nostrils, while the breath came with an ominous wheeze. Biting his lips in anger the man unbuckled the cinch, and with his one available hand lifted off the cumbrous Mexican saddle. Then he walked up and down before the church door until, after a final outburst of rude melody, a final brief murmur, the people came pouring out. When the last of them had passed, scanning curiously the figure of the stranger silhouetted in the dusk against the pale yellow western sky, the Padre appeared in the doorway. Henry Fish took off his hat and went forward.

"Padre Quintana, I must speak to you at once."

"Señor Fish—you! You have come——"

"From the hacienda—in two hours."

"There is trouble! Is anyone ill?"

Leaning against the door-casing, his hands deep in his pockets, his eyes on the dark face of the priest, Fish told his brief story, halting now and then for the Spanish phrase.

"Concepcion sent me, as you may guess. I left the hacienda yesterday at her suggestion—it was time, perhaps! This afternoon at four o'clock came a note from her. I went to the house, saw her for a moment. The affair is arranged for to-morrow morning."

The Padre uttered an inarticulate exclamation!

"Concepcion has some idea that you have influence over the Señora and so——"

"It seems not," said the Padre grimly. "And you, señor, how do you happen to be here? You wish to marry Señorita Bandini yourself?"

"Certainly. She will marry me if her mother consents, not otherwise, she says. I have no idea that the Señora would regard me favourably as a son-in-law. So, Father, unless you interfere, it is possible that Concepcion will be married to-morrow morning—and not to me."

The young man's grey eyes looked out moody and frowning from under his thick, light brows. Where he stood the pale light was reflected in them, and made visible his brown, resolute face. To the Padre's scrutiny he looked every inch a man.

"So you could not persuade Concepcion to run away with you?" said the latter suddenly.

"Well, in that case I should scarcely be here now—but how did you know I had tried?"

"I guessed it. You are not a man to be stopped by trifles."

There was a tone of sarcasm in the words. Henry Fish laughed and looked with interest at this country priest.

"You are right. Short of carrying her off by force I have done all I could. But she dare not disobey her mother. Probrecita! she is but a child after all. And now, Father, to come to the point. Will you go back with me to-night and do what you can to stop this marriage? From what Concepcion said I judge that you have some good reason and also the power to prevent it. Well?"

"I do not know. You bewilder me," murmured the Padre confusedly. "It is true, I would prevent it if I could—but—deceitful woman, she takes advantage of my absence, defies my authority! What am I to do? I cannot permit it—and yet——"

"You will go back with me, then? It is settled? My horse must have a rest—three hours at least. We can easily do the distance before dawn——"

"No!" cried the Padre suddenly. "I will not go back! If Señora Bandini chooses to disregard my commands, the sin will be upon her own head. I can do nothing. To prevent her from sinning, would you have me commit a sin ten times greater? No, I tell you—you are mistaken, I can do nothing."

Shaken completely out of his usual stately calm, Padre Quintana attempted to push by the Englishman, whose sinewy arm barred the doorway.

"Father, you must come back with me. Concepcion is there, waiting for you—you will not desert her? You can move the Señora, or perhaps this man—Vargas——"

"De Vargas!" exclaimed the Padre suddenly. "It is true I might—I will go with you then, señor. I will do all I can. But if I fail—I cannot reproach myself."

"That's all right—you won't fail," said Fish promptly. "You know something, I can see—Concepcion was right after all. And now I must look to my horse—poor beast. It is past seven now, we will start at ten, and arrive by six easily. Good!"

So it happened. When they reached the hacienda only the servants were astir. The Padre commanded the Indian girl, who led him into the house, not to announce his arrival to the Señora, and retired to the room he usually occupied on his pastoral visits. Fish, after seeing the horses turned loose in the corral, wandered away over the fields. Here he threw himself down among the wheat, wet as it was with dew, and presently overcome with fatigue, fell into an uneasy sleep.

But there was no sleep for Padre Quintana. He lay on his bed facing the ornate crucifix of ebony and silver which alone relieved the bareness of the walls, and listened to the servants moving stealthily on their bare feet about the galleries and guest-rooms on either side of him. His heart was full of perplexity and bitterness.

No doubt these rooms were being prepared for the bridegroom and the priest, hastily summoned from somewhere to perform the shameful ceremony. This was how they meant to trick him! This was his authority in the house where his word had been unquestioned for twenty years! So long as Don Felipe, his friend, had lived, not one of the household would have dared disobedience — but now — and above all others, his wife! The Padre groaned and hid his face in the pillow. He could not stand by and see this thing done.

Presently the Indian girl brought in a little tray of hot chocolate and bread, and, while he ate, the Padre constrained his pride to put a question or two. The marriage was to take place at eleven in the chapel. Señor de Vargas was not in the house yet. No guests, the family being in mourning, save certain relatives of the groom and the two married daughters of the house, who with their husbands had arrived the day before.

Padre Quintana watched the sunlight brighten through the closed curtains of his window, listened to the gradual awakening of the household, the clatter of dishes from the kitchen, the sound of a broom vigorously polishing the tiles of the verandah, then outside the Señora's window a slow voice issuing orders. Presently came the thud of horses' feet on the dust of the roadway, then their clatter on the hard ground before the house, the jingle of bridle-chains and housings. The Padre peered out between his curtains.

The prospective bridegroom, sitting to perfection his magnificent black horse, was attended by three gentlemen, his brother and his two sons. With the sun-glitter on the silver trappings of their horses and their own gay-coloured finery, the little cortège was sufficiently pleasing to the eye. De Vargas himself on horseback appeared stalwart and noble. But, dismounting, the stately man seemed metamorphosed. His legs were shrunken from lack of use—for a Californian rarely stirs except on horseback—and scarcely served to support his body, now taking on the stoutness of middle age. Still, in his rich apparel of crimson velvet, gold lace and embroidery, linen fine as cobwebs, and silver spurs to his high-heeled boots, he looked a cavalier by no means to be disdained.

The bustle of this arrival, the gaiety of the attendant squires, the welcome which Señora Bandini graciously extended to them, fell unheeded on the Padre's ears. His eyes were riveted to the swarthy face of De Vargas until he had passed across the gallery and entered the house. He turned away from the window, sat down until the sound of voices had died away, and then called softly to a servant, bidding her find out which room Señor de Vargas occupied and if he were now within.

"That's all right—you won't fail."

When she returned the Padre followed her to the door she indicated, opening like all the others on the verandah. With a firm hand he knocked on the door, and, without waiting for an answer, walked in. De Vargas was there, sitting on the edge of the bed and dusting his boots with a large handkerchief. He looked up, and as he met the priest's eyes, changed colour under his brown skin; the pupils of his eyes narrowed cat-like, and his jaws shut together with a click like a trap.

The two men remained staring at each other for a moment. Before either of them could speak there was a light tap at the door on the opposite side of the room; it opened, and the Señora appeared on the threshold. Above her dark-blue robe her face was pale enough, but at sight of the priest it turned grey, and her hand went to her heart. On the instant, however, her steely eyes flashed defiance into his.

"I did not know you had returned, Father," she said icily.

"Not too soon, it seems," was the stern response. "However, there is time enough for what I have to do. Senora Bandini, you have behaved most treacherously—you thought to carry out your mistaken plans in defiance of me. But it was not the will of God you should succeed. Before you leave the room, Señor de Vargas will have signified to you his intention of abandoning this marriage."

A scarcely suppressed sneer curled the Señora's pale lips! She turned to De Vargas, who still sat motionless.

"Luis, what have you to say to that?" she demanded ironically.

He rose, pushing his long hair back from his forehead with an angry gesture.

"It is quite false," he said loudly. "I have no intention of abandoning the marriage."

"Nevertheless, you will abandon it," said the Padre, advancing a step nearer and towering threateningly above him. "Do you understand, I will not permit it!"

Suddenly hatred blazed up in De Vargas' black eyes, and an ugly red flared in his sallow cheeks. He laughed.

"I will not allow this incredible insult to the memory of my dead friend. If you do not instantly withdraw your pretensions and leave this house I will expose you."

"Luis, what is all this, what is it he threatens——"

"Lies," muttered De Vargas hoarsely.

"Donna Ysabel, do you know what the man is, who enters your house as a son? Does not the spirit of your husband rise from his grave to warn you? Look at him! Look at the man who murdered your husband. Look at your own lover! Ask yourself what guilt——"

The Padre paused, his eyes fixed in terror on the Señora. With staring eyes and parted blue lips she leant against the wall, clutching at the bosom of her gown. Suddenly she staggered, and before he could reach her she fell heavily to the floor, striking her head against the iron foot of the bedstead.

There was no wedding that morning at the Casa Bandini, the bride in her white robes wept terrified tears; the bridegroom rode blackly away. The awe-stricken servants busied themselves in clearing away the untouched feast.

When Henry Fish approached the house he came upon Padre Quintana sitting in the verandah, silent and rigid, staring out into the hot sunshine. For some moments the Padre did not recognise him nor answer his anxious questions. At last he spoke drearily.

"It is all over—she is dead and will trouble you no more. Go and find Concepcion."

He started up, but, when the Englishman went on, stared vacantly after him and sat down again. They came out presently—Fish with a startled, grave face, and Concepcion clinging weeping to his arm. Then the Padre came back to himself. Ignoring the Englishman, he laid his hand gently on the girl's head.

"Farewell, my daughter—may you be happy. I am going away—a long journey of penance——"

"But you will return, Father!"

"I fear not, child."

He made the solemn sign of the cross above her, and went with slow, tremulous steps out of the house.

Miji-br-r-r-r-ick! Miji-br-r-r-ick! You fat rascal! What right have you to lie before the fire on that Persian rug, dozing and purring as happy and cosy as a cat can be while your master is out in the storm? Oh, you needn't come rubbing against my leg and singing any songs of peace to me! I'm tired of seeing such laziness and contentment. There you are, sleek, dignified, fat and lazy, while I am almost the exact opposite. Burr-r-r. what a cold night it is. There, now, wait until I take off my coat, and shake the snow off it. Then I will hang it up—so—take off my shoes, put on my slippers and jacket, draw my chair up to the fire, and light my pipe.

Now, now, I didn't say anything about petting you, did I? Well, if you must be petted I suppose I shall have to do it. There is no one else, is there? Miji-br-r-r-ick—old fellow—I am as happy as a lord to-night. You ought to have seen her to-night. But you don't know her, do you, old fellow? Never mind, you shall know her, for she is coming to-morrow to sit for me, and I will paint such a picture it will surely make my fortune. My fortune? Nay, our fortune—hers, yours and mine.

"Mmmmmmmm, mmmmmm, mmm."

Now, what are you saying? How did I meet her? Well, you see a poor artist like me doesn't often have such rare fortune, but it seemed as though an angel dropped from Heaven a moment to pluck from danger a wee doggie. There! there! don't arch your back and spit merely because I mentioned your bitterest foe. It was a wee doggie, and you abused it.

You haven't forgotten the other day when I let you out in the hall for a run about, hoping you might catch a fat mouse and save me the price of a piece of meat for you, and how you had a fight with a mite of a terrier, one-third your size?

It was through your fight with the little pup that I made an acquaintance with her. Who is she? Now you won't know until she comes here to live.

You remember how you proudly walked through the hall like a caged tiger that day, how you soon saw that your domain was invaded by the tiniest dog you ever saw. It was then that your sleek fur stood on end; that your gentle eyes shone fire, and you spat, as though you were trying to get the taste of a bad word out of your mouth. But the little rascal was not afraid of you. He came bravely to the attack, and you had to fight, and fight hard at that.

You made him run? Yes, and he ran right under the skirts of the prettiest lady you ever saw, just as she was coming by the door. I heard the row, and I looked to see what it was, when in you bounded. The little doggie, seeing your flight, took up the pursuit and darted between my legs. In an instant I saw that you had been in the wrong, and took off my cap to apologise for you.

What did this vision say, but that it was all the fault of Gyp. Gyp—indeed! As if I didn't know better. How could anything belonging to her, living about her, do anything wrong?

But, anyway, we made an acquaintance with each other, she with Gyp in her arms, and I with you safe behind me I learned that she sometimes came here to give music lessons to a friend of hers, an artist, on the floor above. I didn't know until then that there was any floor above.

I suppose her friend must be making great progress in music, for she gets a lesson every day. I have seen her every day. And some days I would walk a short distance with her. "Her father did not like the idea of her going to see her friend," said she, "so it was better that I did not call until I met her in some other way." But every time I walked with her, and every time I spoke to her, the blood surged madly through my veins until I could hardly keep from telling her how much I adored her.

* * * * *

Mrow-ow-ow. Mrr-r-ow. Mr-ow-ow-um-ummmmm. I wonder when that foolish fellow will come back? Here he has been out for an hour or two, when he should have been hard at work. And what a bustle he was in this morning. The place was all upside down. After the hint he gave me last night about the fat mouse, I think he might have let me have a little quiet here by myself this morning, so that I might have hunted up something good to eat.

Heigh-ho! Men never can understand cats. We are too sensitive for them. That is the reason we get along better with women. Their natures are so much like our own.

Well, he cleaned up all the place this morning. Everything was dusty and dirty before. Now it is clean and bright. There is not much of it, to be sure, but still it makes rather an attractive picture, even for a well-bred creature like myself. I do hope she is a thoroughbred. I hate those models with their loud talk and boisterous laugh.

Well, well, there is his step on the stair and his whistle. Here he is, with his arms full of bundles. Why, where did he get the money? I heard him complaining all day that he was broke, and muttering bad words under his breath.

Why, he has lost his ring, that beautiful ring that I admired so much. And I know he thought so much of it. I am sorry he lost it. Mmmmm. Meow! Meow! Mmmmm. He's looking out of the window. There he runs to the door. She is coming. Meow! She is here.

Oh, what a darling girl! Her fluffy brown hair falling over her rosy cheeks; her dimples and her long lashes. Her dark eyes and that beautiful blue suit which clings to her figure so closely.

My! My! Wow! What? Miji-br-r-r-ick! You're getting excited. What is that curious creature hanging about her neck, Miji-br-r-ick? It is detestable. Well, I shall soon see, for she is taking it off.

How he watches her every action. How caressingly he speaks to her. And she seems to avoid looking at him.

Will she have a cup of tea after her cold walk? Tea? Tea? Are my ears deceiving me? Why, I haven't smelt tea since I came to this place; that is, except some evil-smelling stuff the caretaker sent up one day when he was ill. He must have fallen heir to some grocer's shop.

And then they talk of many things—the weather, music, art, and all the rubbish that mortals in love usually talk about. Mortals in love did I say? Well, don't correct me. He confessed as much to me, and my eyes tell me the same about her. Of course he doesn't see that she loves him. Trust a man for that. Why, he wouldn't believe it if I told him myself.

It was getting late, and he could not paint her this afternoon, and he told her so. Would she come again? Yes. She would come again to-morrow afternoon, and every afternoon until the picture was finished.

Under such conditions the picture would never be finished. Now she is about to go. She picks up that creature she had about her neck when she came in. How its vicious little eyes glisten in the firelight. Why, the impudent thing! I believe it is defying me! You will, will you? Mrowoow! Mr-r-rw! Fizz! Br-r-r! Miji-br-r-r-ick!

It is all past now. I shall never do it again, but when I saw those little beady eyes blinking at me I sprang for it and tore the creature from her hand. I pawed and shook it. I slapped it, and was wrestling with it on the floor when she tried to take it away from me. What, take first my master, then my prey? The only thing I had seen all day that looked as though it might be eaten.

I carry in my paw four sharp claws, and she found it out, for with one movement I sent them down on her hand so hard they made great ugly scratches in her soft, white flesh. And the blood came. And there was a terrible clamour. For when she saw the blood she screamed gently and quietly sank downwards. If it hadn't been for him she would have struck the floor. But his arms were round her, and he was crying, "Oh, my darling girl! How did it happen? Sweetheart, it will soon be all right. My dearest!" and other idiotic expressions.

Pretty soon she opened her eyes. She may not have heard his last words, but I think she did. Any way she saw she was in his arms, and instead of struggling to get away she simply twisted herself round a little, threw up one hand over his shoulder, rested her head quietly on his breast, and fainted again. This spell was longer than the other. When she came to this time he was kissing her, and she was blushing, oh, so red.

Well, I haven't heard how it came out yet. You see, when he finished kissing her, she explained how it happened. Then I went out. I took a pane of glass with me, as I was in such a hurry to go. It was eight storeys down. But I knew the window opened on a verandah a little below, and alighted there.

He came down and picked me up about an hour later. He was trembling with joy, and said he would forgive me. That it was through me he was the happiest man on earth. That she loved him, and, oh, such nonsense.

But when it was all over, and I had eaten my supper, he sat in front of the fire and gazed into the dancing flames. Then he looked sad, then sadder, and finally two big tears rolled down his cheeks as he softly said "Miji-br-r-r-ick." I wonder why?

CHAPTER XVII.

The Search for West.

Jack Heathcote and Cécile took up their abode at Quiltering, the birth-town of Annie West's husband, about ten days after Edith's arrival in Paris. They immediately set about prosecuting their inquiries.

"It is a wonder the creature does not reply to our advertisement," said Jack sometimes.

"But you are queer," Cécile would answer; "carpenters' wives do not read often advertisements in newspapers, I think?"

"Most likely she's dead," suggested Jack.

"No—not most likely. Death is a big thing, of which people talk when it occurs. As we have heard nothing, it is a probability that she lives, and that her life is uneventful. You are not a great reasoner, sir."

"I never thought that I was," said Jack. "But you are, and I've got you—which comes to the same thing."

"You have not got me yet. Find for me Edith, and then—you shall."

He caught her roughly, rumpling her, kissing her, grown bold by assured possession.

"That is against rules," she said crossly. "We are not children. Do not let me think that you have more lips than brains."

Cécile broke into the sitting-room of their inn.

They ransacked Quiltering, speaking to nearly every one of its inhabitants, for nearly three weeks, and found nothing.

In the second week they received fifteen letters, forwarded by the London agency, from fifteen Annie Wests; but further correspondence elicited the fact that only two of them had lived in Dorsetshire, and only one was named "Hall" previous to her marriage; and Hall was not a first husband's but her maiden name. For some days Jack Heathcote was a busy scribe, writing letters of answer and inquiry all over the country.

At the end of the third week, Cécile broke into the sitting-room of their inn, with the glad tidings:

"I have found his mother! I have seen her!"

"Good news!" cried Jack, hoping for a kiss on the strength of this evangel; "has she told you about him, then?"

"No—she cannot speak—she cannot see—she cannot hear——"

"Oh, I say!"

"She is a hundred and fifteen years old. I found her in an almshouse at Tlahual, twelve miles from here. She has been buried away there for the last thirty years. That is why we did not hear of her till now."

"Then we are exactly where we were before," said Jack.

"No. You are a mere child. We have advanced—a step."

"I don't see it, then."

"That is because you go with your eyes half shut People live in a sort of mental moonlight. The sun does not shine for them, in general."

"I must try to improve," said Jack, making a mouth.

"No—I like you just as you are. Do not change a little bit. It is because you are just as you are that I—I love you so. But do you not see that we have advanced? West does not know that his mother is dead, for she is alive, though he may imagine that she is dead. We therefore now know something more about his life and its concerns than he knows himself. And we can use that knowledge at once."

"But how, darling?"

"We will put a story in all the papers; we will say that his mother is just dead, and left him a large legacy."

"But we don't know his Christian name."

"You are playing, I think? Did we not get his Christian name in the register of marriage?"

"Oh, aye, true enough. I admit, darling, that I am no good. But as he has not answered the advertisement for his wife, the chances are that he won't see this new one either."

"But this," said Cécile, "is the advertisement of a legacy. The working public take an enormous interest in legacies—in a definite piece of news, not a vague promise of something unknown. Besides, this new advertisement is directed to a man, not a woman. Men read these things in the papers more. If John West is not a reader his fellow workmen are. They will see his own name plain before them; they will speak of it. He will see it."

Her eyes wore their strange, far-away look.

"Suppose he has emigrated?" said Jack.

"No; he has not emigrated."

"How do you know that, Cécile?"

"If there were one reason against it that would make it improbable," she answered; "if there are two, they make it almost incredible; if there are three, the three together make it impossible."

"And are there three?"

"Yes. People in general do not emigrate, for one thing, though in general they migrate. Then again, carpenters emigrate least of all tradespeople, for the rough carpentering work of pioneering can be done by hands unskilled. It is the landsmen and the metal-workers who emigrate chiefly. But emigrants, seldom more than once or twice—but at least once or twice—write home from abroad. The shock of the great change of environment makes them think with fondness of home. It is only when they tarry in the same country with their left ones that they lack the impulse to write. John West, the carpenter, never wrote. He is in England—probably not far from here."

"Darling, how shrewd you are! What a cunning little——"

Jack was in prone career to break rules again, but Cécile fled.

Two days afterwards the advertisement of the legacy was published broadcast. Of fifty letters received from "John Wests" throughout the country, Cécile held up one, saying:

"This is the right!"

He lived in Manchester, and awaited instructions. They telegraphed that they would present themselves before him the next day.

And on the next day at noon Cécile stood alone at the door of a mean cottage, in a mean, grimy street made up of cottages all precisely like one another. At her knock a tall, raw-boned woman of fifty, with rolled-up sleeves, evidently straight from the wash-tub, opened the door.

CHAPTER XVIII.

A NAME.

"DID your husband tell you of a legacy advertised——" began Cécile.

"I should just think he did!" said a loud voice. "He can think of nothing else. He's been out on the booze ever since——"

"Well, can one speak to you about it?"

"Yes; you can come in."

She led the way into a parlour, neatly, but meanly and garishly furnished.

"You were married before, I think?" said Cécile.

"I was."

"And named 'Hall'?"

"Yes."

"'Annie'?"

"Yes; but I don't hardly like all this prying——"

"I mean no harm, you know. I have in my pocket £50 for you, and if you do not answer my questions I shall simply give the money to your husband, that is all."

"Who are you, miss?"

"My name is Cécile. I have the management of this money-matter. I wish you would be friendly with one. I want to ask you a few questions, merely."

"Well, ask away."

"You were once employed as servant near Crossley in the house of the Hon. Ernest Wentworth, I think?"

The woman threw her mind back down the years and nodded.

"You remember his wife?"

"What, the Frenchwoman?"

"Yes."

"I should just think I did. She was a pickle, I can tell you, in the house."

"Did your husband tell you of a legacy advertised?"

"Ah, yes—a 'pickle.' It is well. She was not a very good wife, I think?"

"No, the messer, that she wasn't. Wasn't there something about another man—— ?"

"But, yes! What was his name?"

"Oh, I don't think I can remember his name, after all these years. But I saw him several times. She used to meet him in the park, the horrid thing."

"Yes! Tell me! What was he like?"

"He was a tall man, with a pale face."

"That all?"

"That's all that I can remember. He was a foreigner, of course. He used to wear coloured waistcoats."

"Well, but that is something!" said Cécile, "a tall man, pale, with coloured waistcoats, and a foreigner. But his name! can't you remember?"

"Stop a bit—I'm thinking. No—I can't remember."

"Didn't it begin with an 'L'?"

"You are right! It did! 'Le' something. I knew it well once—but it's gone now."

"It was a French name, I think, beginning with 'Le'?"

"Yes, it was French right enough."

"You are sure it began with 'Le'?"

"Quite sure."

"'Lebon'?"

"No."

"'Lefrère'?"

"No."

"'Lemaitre'?"

"Right you are!" cried Annie West in a rapture of recollection, "that was it!"

"'Lemaitre,' then. Very well. I thank you much. What was he?"

"We servants knew him as 'the Doctor.' He was Dr. Lemaitre."

Cécile was ushered into the presence of a white-haired old lady.

"Excellent! You have told me much. I will add £10 more to the £50 on my own account."

"Oh, for that matter, you ought to be able to find out all about him from the Darrels. I don't know if they are still thereabouts; but they used to live about ten miles from our place, at—at Something House—I forget the name of it at this minute. It was the Darrels that Lemaitre was staying with at the time, you see."

"You are very good," said Cécile. "Here is the money. And tell your husband to go and see his old mother, who is still alive in the almshouse at Tlahual, and not be a brute. That of the legacy was a little trick to get at you, you see!"

She laughed, and Annie West, with the money in her hand, laughed, as they went together to the door.

"It's only a rough hand, miss, but you're welcome to it, I'm sure," she said, holding out her water-crinkled fingers.

Cécile walked back to the hotel where Jack waited her, and the same hour they set out by train to return to Crossley. Cécile wanted to pay a visit to the house of the Darrels.

They were a family of some importance in the county, but nearly extinct. On sending up her card, Cécile was ushered into the presence of a white-haired old lady in the drawing-room, who received her kindly. She told her errand. She wished to obtain some information of a Dr. Lemaitre who had been a guest of the house some twenty years before.

"Really," said Mrs. Darrell, "I am afraid I can tell you hardly anything. He was introduced into the house by a friend, and did not stay long. We have not been brought into rapport with him for many years. What is it you wish to know of him—his address?"

"That would help me a great deal," said Cécile.

"Well I think he wrote us a letter from Paris just before his visit, and in that case we are certain still to have it. Mr. Darrel, poor man, never destroyed a document."

"It would be difficult to find, would it not?" said Cécile.

"It would be difficult?—Yes. But if you will leave me your address, I will find it and send it you," Mrs. Darrel said, nodding and smiling.

"You are too good. I should like to know you better," murmured Cécile as she shook hands.

The next morning she had in her hand the twenty-year-old address of Dr. Lemaitre—17, Rue de Printemps, Paris. At ten the same night she and Jack were at the door of the Hilton's town house in Hyde Park.

"Good-night, darling," she said. "Go to bed, will you? You look so tired, poor boy. To-morrow, remember, we start for Paris. Be here by eleven. Good-night."

Almost immediately on entering she came upon Arthur, lounging at full length upon a couch.

"I am so glad to see you!" said Cécile. "I did not know you were in town. Is there any news?"

"Nothing to speak of," answered Arthur, recomposing himself among the cushions. "Lady Hilton is somewhat better, and I expect shortly to leave for Egypt."

"To Egypt? But no—you would not go, I think?"

"Yes, I should go. Can you suggest any reason why not?"

"Edith?" said Cécile.

Arthur winced.

"Edith," he said, "has chosen her own path, Miss Delisle. If she could desert me—her home—in the company of such vermin as Danton, you will admit that her affection for me, for any of us, could not have been very——"

"But hear me!"—Cécile in her eagerness stooped to her knees before him—"she is not with Dr. Danton! I know her—trust me to that extent! I admit that his being here on that day looks bad, but have faith in her—in me—her affection for you is very deep—don't you think I would know? If you went to Egypt now, that might spoil all——"

"It is quite likely, however, that I may have to go."

"When?"

"Within a few weeks."

"What, then, is the matter with Egypt?"

"You would hardly understand, I think. There is a vile man named Arabi Pasha who is giving some trouble there, and my regiment has received an intimation from the War Office to hold itself in readiness to proceed to the front. Ah, it is of no great importance, Miss Delisle. Nothing is of the slightest importance."

"That point of view you will change—only wait!" cried Cécile, and ran upstairs, where she was announced to Lady Hilton, who still lay on her back on a couch.

"Dear Cécile!" cried the old lady, "I am overjoyed. I was really anxious about you, you know. What have you been doing?"

"You are to go first," said Lemaitre.

"Poking about—making inquiries."

"About Edith?"

"Indirectly, yes."

"Have you discovered anything?"

"I may soon."

"What have you done to that poor Heathcote?"

"I have sent him to a hotel to bed."

"Has he looked after you well, dear?"

"Yes, he is good. I am taking him with me to Paris to-morrow."

"To-morrow, dear! Why, you live in a whirlwind, my child."

"Yes—to-morrow. Can you give me Dr. Danton's Paris address? He wrote you once, I think, from Paris?"

"Yes. I will put Mary on the hunt for it presently, dear. Have you had anything to eat? You must be so tired, dear Cécile."

Cécile was soon fast asleep beside Lady Hilton, who would not let her leave her.

In the morning she found that Dr. Danton's address, about the time of the end of the old year, was "17, Rue de Printemps, Paris."

Cécile started violently. It was the same address as the address of Dr. Lemaitre twenty years ago.

She had decided that the two were known to each other. Now she decided that they were intimately associated. The two doctors had lived, as doctors sometimes do, in the same house.

It did not dawn upon her, clever as she was, that Danton and Lemaitre were the same man. The probability of such a complexity of circumstances was too far away to occur to even her keen intellect.

She went groping on in the dark, coming ever nearer to light.

That day, before she and Heathcote had started for Paris, the advertising agency in London which had done all their work for them, telegraphed to its Paris branch this advertisement, for insertion in the French papers:

EDITH. Be good, and come back. But above all, avoid D. He is a man of dark antecedents, and will prove dangerous. You know I would not tell you false.—CÉCILE.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE BIRD AND THE SERPENT.

ON the night following their discovery of Edith, Hawke and Lemaitre stood before No. 13, Rue Morcelle.

"You are to go first," said Lemaitre. "You are to present yourself suddenly. And you are to claim her with paternal vigorousness. You are to be rough—be rough—but not too rough. It is not intended that you should strangle her, Mr. Hawke. You gently terrify her, that is all. Later on, say in a quarter of an hour, I shall appear as a delivering Perseus and slayer-of-monsters."

Mr. Hawke rolled up the five stairs, and tapped at No. 165, while Lemaitre went walking about the neighbouring streets. The door was locked, and no one opened to Hawke.

"She must be out," he said.

But, even while he stood in doubt, there was a quick woman's step behind him. He turned sharply round, and a shriek went ringing through the house.

Edith's two arms flung out; her deathly face worked horribly; but no sound came from her lips. She fell forward, and was caught by Hawke.

That face had been fearfully present with her from the day when she first saw it. If she opened her eyes in the darkness of night, before her, in a bluish, sepulchral halo, stood the face of Hawke; not the face of Arthur, or the face of Cécile, but the face of Hawke, whom she had seen but once! All she could dream of terror, all she could imagine of heinous loathsomeness, was embodied for her in that visage of horror. She dreaded it worse than the grave; she hated it worse than hell.

"Now, here's a darned to-do!" said Mr. Hawke, holding her up in the dim passage, lighted by only one lamp. "I never did like this job!"

He searched her pockets, in which he found her key, and, half lifting her, opened the door, and laid her in the dark on the bed.

In five minutes Edith opened her eyes. She felt rather than saw the presence of Hawke near her, and, in wild dismay, leapt up from the bed and rushed towards the door.

He caught her by the arm.

"Come, you're not a child!" he said, shaking her a little. "Who's going to hurt you, eh? Is that the way you treat your own father? Haven't you got no lamp?"

"Yes," she gasped; "I promise you—I will light it—only—don't touch me—I am very poor—I am so wretched—if you have any pity——"

"All right—pull yourself together.

A shriek went ringing through the house.

I want to take you away—quick. There's that man, Dr. Danton, he is on my track; he does not want me to have you—he wants to take you away from me. But he shan't! See, I have come all this way to claim you. Quick now!"

"Dr. Danton?" she panted. "Does he know?"

"Yes, I tell you. He's on my track. Quick now——"

At that moment there was a tap on the opening door, and Danton walked in.

Edith was holding a trembling match to her little lamp.

"Ah—I thought I heard you, sir!" he said sternly to Hawke. "How dare you?"

Hawke assumed an appearance of great terror.

"Well, well," he said, "so you've caught me again?"

"Leave this room!" Danton pointed majestically toward the door.

"That I shan't! She's my own daughter, I suppose?"

"Quick, sir!"

Hawke backed reluctantly toward the opening.

"But I'll be back again," he cried threateningly as Danton banged the door upon him.

"Miss Wentworth—Edith——" said Danton, bowing before the trembling girl, "I am so glad to be able to rid you of that presence. I have been tracking his movements for some weeks. I can almost promise that he shall never molest you again—if you will only put yourself into my hands."

She sank into a chair, staring before her, Danton sitting in front of her.

"You cannot, you know, for one thing, continue to live in a den of this kind. I wonder it has not killed you, my poor child."

His voice was full of genuine tenderness. Edith was speechless.

"You must let me obtain suitable lodgings for you this very night. Promise me that."

"No, no—I will stay here, please."

"Ah—you will be unkind to me? to me, Edith? No—I cannot believe that," said Danton, clapping his knee with a folded newspaper, which he held in his hand. "You cannot give yourself so much pain. If you pain me you pain yourself, and if you pain yourself you pain me. There is only one way to be free and happy—we must be married in a week or two."

"Oh, I cannot!" she cried, covering her face. "I cannot marry anyone! You should know it—you know what I am."

"Yes, I know what you are. You are me—you are mine. I am not an English aristocrat. I do not at all remember or care who your father, your mother was. I only know that you are flesh of my flesh, soul of my soul—Edith!"

The man once more was breathing his energy of passion into her, frowning upon her with his old mesmeric dominancy.

The bird, fascinated by the eye of the serpent, wishes to fly and is paralysed. Only the wings flutter—flutter, and with down-bent beak, with a strange trance in its little fixed and staring eyes, it gazes on into the glittering, saffron eyes of the snake, still fluttering—fluttering.

"Promise, Edith! Promise now!"

"What can I do?" she wailed, with writhing body. "What can I say? I am utterly helpless—utterly alone and helpless!"

Danton slapped down the newspaper on the table rather angrily.

"You shall not be cruel to us both. In two weeks? Say yes."

She heaved a sigh, which was consent.

"Very good," he said, relaxing his frown. "I sympathise with your reluctance, poor child! I am so much older than you, is it not so? But I will be kind to you, Edith. I will be a father as well as a husband. And now I shall go, and look you out a suitable lodging——"

"Wait!—one moment—stay here—I must go outside for a moment!" she cried with strange excitement, with panting bosom.

She went hurriedly to the door, snatching up her hat as she passed by the bed.

Her eye had caught these words on the newspaper beneath the lamp:

EDITH. Be good, and come back. But above all, avoid D. He is a man of dark antecedents, and will prove dangerous. You know I would not tell you false.—CÉCILE.

Danton, with impatience growing into frenzy, waited in the room an hour. Edith was flying away, away—in wildest panic—through the streets of Paris.

On the night of April 11th, 1809, Lord Cochrane steered his floating mine against the gigantic boom that covered the French fleet lying in Aix roads.

The story is one of the most picturesque and exciting in the naval annals of Great Britain. Marryat has embalmed the great adventure and its chief actor in the pages of Frank Mildmay, and Lord Cochrane himself—like the Earl of Peterborough in the seventeenth century, who captured Barcelona with a handful of men, and Gordon in the nineteenth century, who won great battles in China, walking-stick in hand—was a man who stamped himself, as with characters of fire, upon the popular imagination.

To the courage of a knight-errant Cochrane added the shrewd and humourous sagacity of a Scotsman. If he had commanded fleets he would have rivalled the victories of Nelson, and perhaps even have outshone the Nile and Trafalgar. And to warlike genius of the first order Cochrane added a certain weird and impish ingenuity which his enemies found simply resistless.

Was there ever a cruise in naval history like that of Cochrane in his brig, misnamed the Speedy, a mere coasting tub that would neither steer nor tack, and whose entire broadside Cochrane himself could carry in his pocket? But in this wretched little brig, with its four-pounders, Cochrane captured in one brief year more than fifty vessels, carrying an aggregate of 122 guns, took 500 prisoners, kept the whole Spanish coast, off which he cruised, in perpetual alarm, and finished by attacking and capturing a Spanish frigate, the Gamo, of thirty-two heavy guns and 319 men.

What we have called the impish daring and resource of Cochrane is shown in this strange fight.

He ran the little Speedy close under the guns of the huge Gamo, and the Spanish ship was actually unable to depress its guns sufficiently to harm its tiny antagonist. When the Spaniards tried to board, Cochrane simply shoved his pigmy craft a few yards away from the side of his foe, and this curious fight went on for an hour. Then, in his turn, Cochrane boarded, leaving nobody but the doctor on board the Speedy; but he played the Spaniards a characteristic trick.

One half his men boarded the Gamo by the head, with their faces elaborately blackened; and when, out of the white smoke forward, some forty demons with black faces broke upon the astonished Spaniards, they naturally regarded the whole business as partaking of the black art, and incontinently fled below. The number of Spaniards killed and wounded in this fight by the little Speedy exceeded the number of its own entire crew; and when the fight was over forty-five British sailors had to keep guard over 263 Spanish prisoners.

Afterwards, in command of the Impérieuse, a fine frigate, Cochrane played a still more dashing part on the Spanish coast, destroying batteries, cutting off supplies from the French ports, blowing up coast roads, and keeping perspiring battalions of the enemy marching to and fro to meet his descents.

On the French coast, again, Cochrane held large bodies of French troops paralysed by his single frigate. He proposed to the English Government to take possession of the French Islands in the Bay of Biscay, and to allow him, with a small squadron of frigates, to operate against the French seaboard. Had this request been granted, he says, "neither the Peninsular war nor its enormous cost to the nation, from 1809 onwards, would ever have been heard of!"

"It would have been easy," he adds, "as it always will be easy in case of future wars, so to harass the French coasts as to find full employment for their troops at home, and so to render operations in foreign countries impossible."

If England and France were once more engaged in war—absit omen!—the story of Cochrane's exploits on the Spanish and French coasts might prove a very valuable inspiration and object lesson.

Cochrane's professional reward for his great services in the Impérieuse was an official rebuke for expending more sails, stores, gunpowder and shot than any other captain afloat in the same time!

The fight in the Basque roads, however—or rather in the Aix roads—has great historical importance. It finally destroyed French power on the sea, and gave Britain an absolute supremacy. No fleet actions took place after its date between "the meteor flag" and the tricolour, for the simple reason that no French fleet remained in existence. Cochrane's fire-ships completed the work of the Nile and Trafalgar.

Early in 1809 the French fleet in Brest, long blockaded by Lord Gambier, caught the British napping, slipped out unobserved, raised the blockades at L'Orient and Rochefort, added the squadrons lying in these two places to its own strength, and, anchoring in the Aix roads, prepared for a dash on the West Indies.

The success with which the blockade at Brest had been evaded, and the menace offered to the West Indian trade, alarmed the British Admiralty. Lord Gambier, with a powerful fleet, kept guard outside the Aix roads, but if the blockade failed once it might fail again. Eager to destroy the fleet France possessed, the Admiralty strongly urged Lord Gambier to attack the enemy with fire-ships, but Gambier, grown old, had visibly lost nerve, and he pronounced the use of fire-ships a "horrible and un-Christian mode of warfare."

Lord Mulgrave, the First Lord of the Admiralty, knowing Cochrane's ingenuity and daring, sent for him, and proposed to send him to Basque roads to invent and execute some plan for destroying the French fleet. The Scotsman was uppermost in Cochrane in this interview, and he declined the adventure on the ground that to send a young post-captain to execute such an enterprise would be regarded as an insult by the whole fleet, and he would have every man's hand against him.

Lord Mulgrave, however, was peremptory, and Cochrane yielded, but on reaching the blockading fleet was met by a tempest of wrath from all his seniors.

"Why," they asked, "was Cochrane sent out? We could have done the business as well as he. Why did not Lord Gambier let us do it?"

Lord Gambier, who had fallen into a sort of gentle and pious melancholy, was really more occupied in distributing tracts among his crews than in trying to reach his enemies; and Harvey, his second in command, an old Trafalgar sea-dog, when Cochrane arrived with his commission, interviewed his Admiral, denounced him in a white heat on his own quarter-deck, and ended by telling him that "if Nelson had been there he would not have anchored in the Basque roads at all, but would have dashed at the enemy at once."

This outburst, no doubt, relieved Admiral Harvey's feelings, but it cost him his flag, and he was court-martialed and dismissed from the service for the performance.

Cochrane, however, set himself with characteristic daring and coolness to carry out his task. The French fleet consisted of one huge ship of 120 guns, two of 80 guns, eight seventy-fours, a 50-gun ship, and two 40-gun frigates—fourteen ships in all. It was drawn up in two lines under the shelter of powerful shore batteries, with the frigates as outguards.

As a protection against fire-ships, a gigantic boom had been constructed half a mile in length, forming two sides of a triangle, with the apex towards the British fleet.

Over this huge floating barrier powerful boat squadrons kept watch every night. Cochrane's plan of attack was marked by real genius. He constructed three explosion vessels—floating mines on the largest scale.

Each of these terrific vessels contained no less a quantity than fifteen hundred barrels of gunpowder, bound together with cables, with wedges and moistened sand rammed down betwixt them, forming, in brief, one gigantic bomb.

On the top of this huge powder magazine was piled, as a sort of agreeable condiment, hundreds of live shells and thousands of hand-grenades; the whole, by every form of marine ingenuity, compacted into a solid mass which, at the touch of a fuse, could be turned into a sort of floating Vesuvius. These were to be followed by a squadron of fire-ships.

Cochrane who, better perhaps than any other soldier or sailor that ever lived, knew how to strike at his foes through their own imagination, calculated that when these three huge explosion vessels, with twenty fire-ships behind them, went off in a sort of saltpetre earthquake, the astonished Frenchmen would imagine every fire-ship to be a floating mine, and, instead of trying to board them and divert them from their fleet, would be simply anxious to get out of their way with the utmost possible despatch.

The French, meanwhile, having watched their enemy lying inert for weeks, and confident in the gigantic boom which acted as their shield to the front, and the show of batteries which kept guard over them on either flank and to the rear, awaited the coming attack in a spirit of half-contemptuous gaiety. They had struck their topmasts and unbent their sails, and, by way of challenge, dressed their fleet with flags.

One ship, the Calcutta, had been captured from the British, and by way of special insult they hung out the British ensign under that ship's quarter gallery, an affront whose deadly quality only a sailor can understand.

The night of the 9th set in stormily. The tide ran fast, and the skies were black and the sea heavy—so heavy, indeed, that the boats of the English fleet, which were intended to follow and cover the fire-ships, never left the side of the flagship. Cochrane, however, had called the officers commanding the fire-ships on board his frigate, given them their last instructions, and at half-past eight p.m. he himself, accompanied only by a lieutenant and four sailors, cut the moorings of the chief explosion vessel and drifted off towards the French fleet.

Seated on top of 1,500 barrels of gunpowder and a sort of haystack of grenades, he calmly floated off, with a squadron of fire-ships behind him, towards the French fleet, backed by great shore batteries, with seventy-three armed boats as a line of skirmishers. "It seemed to me," says Marryat, who was an actor in the scene, "like entering the gates of hell!"

The great floating mine drifted on through blackness and storm till, just as it struck the boom, Cochrane, who previously made his five assistants get into the boat, with his own hand lit the fuse, and in turn jumped into the boat.

How frantically the little crew pulled together to get clear of the ignited mine may be imagined. But wind and sea were against them. The fuse, which was calculated to burn for twelve minutes, lasted for only five. Then the fifteen hundred barrels of gunpowder went off simultaneously, peopling the black sky with a flaming torrent of shells, grenades, and rockets, and raising a mountainous wave that nearly swamped the unfortunate boat and its crew.

The fault of the fuse, however, saved the lives of the daring six, as the missiles from the exploding vessel fell far outside them.

"The effect," says Cochrane, who, like Cæsar, could write history as well as make it, "constituted one of the grandest artificial spectacles imaginable. For a moment the sky was red with the lurid glare arising from the simultaneous ignition of 1,500 barrels of powder. On this gigantic flash subsiding the air seemed alive with shells, grenades, rockets, and masses of timber—the wreck of the shattered vessel." Then came blackness, punctuated in flame by the explosion of the next floating mine. Then, through sea-wreck and night, came the squadron of fire-ships, each one a pyramid of kindling flame! But the first explosion had achieved all that Cochrane expected. It dismissed the huge boom into chips, and the French fleet lay open to attack.

The captain of the second explosion vessel was so determined to do his work effectually, that the entire crew was actually blown out of the vessel and one member of the party killed, while the toil of the boats in which, after the fire-ships had been abandoned, they and their crews had to fight their way back in the teeth of the gale, was so severe that several men died of mere fatigue. The physical effects of the floating mines and the drifting fire-ships, as a matter of fact, were not very great. The boom, indeed, was destroyed, but out of twenty fire-ships only four actually reached the enemy's position, and not one did any damage.

Cochrane's explosion vessels, however, were addressed not so much to the French ships as to the alarmed imagination of French sailors, and the effect achieved was overwhelming. All the French ships save one cut or slipped their cables, and ran ashore in wild confusion.

The fifteen hundred barrels of gunpowder went off simultaneously.

Cochrane cut the moorings of his explosion vessel at half-past eight o'clock; by midnight—or in less than four hours—the boom had been destroyed, and thirteen French ships—the solitary fleet that remained to France—were lying helplessly ashore. Never, perhaps, was a result so great achieved in a time so brief, in a fashion so dramatic, or with a loss so trifling.

When the grey morning broke, with the exception of two vessels, the whole French fleet was found helplessly aground on the Palles shoal. Some were found on their bilge with the keel exposed, others were frantically casting their guns overboard and trying to get afloat again. Meanwhile Gambier and the British fleet were lying fourteen miles distant in the Basque roads, and Cochrane in the Impérieuse was watching, with powder-blackened face, the curious spectacle of the entire fleet he had driven ashore, and the yet more amazing spectacle of a British fleet declining to come in and finally destroy its enemy.

For here comes a chapter in the story on which Englishmen do not love to dwell. Cochrane tried to whip the muddy-spirited Gambier into enterprise by emphatic and quick-following signal. At six a.m. he signalled: "All the enemy's ships except two are on shore," but this extracted from drowsy Gambier no other response than the answering pennant. Cochrane repeated his impatient signals at half-hour intervals, and with emphasis ever more marked: "The enemy's ships can be destroyed," "Half the fleet can destroy the enemy," "The frigates alone can destroy the enemy," but still no response save the indifferent pennant.

As the tide flowed in the French ships showed signs of getting afloat, and Cochrane signalled: "The enemy is preparing to heave off." Even this brought no response from the pensive Gambier. At eleven o'clock the British fleet weighed and stood in, but then, to Cochrane's speechless wrath, re anchored at a distance of three and a half miles, and by this time two of the French three-deckers were afloat.

Gambier finally despatched a single mortar vessel to bombard the stranded ships, but by this time Cochrane had become desperate. He adopted a device which recalls Nelson's use of his blind eye at Copenhagen. At one o'clock he hove his anchor atrip and drifted, stern foremost, towards the enemy. He dare not make sail lest his trick should be detected, and a signal of recall hoisted on the flagship.

Cochrane coolly determined, in a word, to force the hand of his sluggish Admiral. He drifted with his solitary frigate down to the hostile fleet and batteries, which Gambier thought it scarcely safe to attack with eleven ships of the line. When near the enemy's position he suddenly made sail and ran up the signal: "In want of assistance;" next followed a yet more peremptory message: "In distress."

Even Gambier could not see an English frigate destroyed under the very guns of an English fleet without moving to its help, and he sent some of his ships in. But meanwhile, Cochrane, though technically "in distress," was enjoying what he must have felt to be a singularly good time. He calmly took up a position which enabled him to engage an eighty-gun ship, one of twenty-four guns, and in particular that French ship which, on the previous day, had hung the British flag under her quarter gallery.

For half-an-hour he fought these three ships single-handed, and the Calcutta actually struck to him, its captain afterwards being court-martialed and shot by the French themselves for surrendering to a frigate. Then the other British ships came up, and ship after ship of the French fleet struck or was destroyed. Night fell before the work was completed, and during the night Gambier, for some mysterious reason, recalled his ships; but Cochrane in the Impérieuse clung to his post.

He persuaded Captain Seymour in the Pallas to remain with him, with four brigs, and with this tiny force he proposed to attack L'Océan, the French flagship of 120 guns, which had just got afloat; but Gambier peremptorily recalled him at dawn, before the fight was renewed. Never before or since was a victory so complete and so nearly bloodless. Five seamen were killed in the fire-ships, and five in the attack on the French fleet, and about twenty wounded; and with this microscopic "butcher's bill," a great fleet, the last naval hope of France, was practically destroyed. For so much does the genius and daring of a single man count!

That the French fleet was not utterly destroyed was due solely to Gambier's want of resolution. And yet such is the irony of history, that of the two chief actors in this drama Gambier, who marred it, was rewarded with the thanks of Parliament; Cochrane, who gave to it all its unique splendour, had his professional career abruptly terminated!

That wild night in the Aix roads, and the solitary and daring attack on the French fleet which followed next day, were practically Cochrane's last acts as a British sailor. He achieved dazzling exploits under the flag of Chili and Brazil; but the most original warlike genius the English navy has ever known fought no more battles for England.

AN EPISODE OF LIFE

SUMMARY.

Roy Arbuthnot is in love with Nelly, a beautiful girl beneath him in the social scale. His father, Sir Richard Arbuthnot, an impecunious baronet, wishes him to marry his cousin, Mary Arbuthnot, an heiress, to retrieve the family fortune.

The story opens with the parting scene between Roy and Nelly, which affects him to such an extent that he resolves he will not give her up, whatever the consequences, but being urged to do so by his friend, Jack Sinclair, and again by his father, he finally yields.

CHAPTER III.

The Alternative.

A marriage has been arranged, and will shortly be solemnised, between Roy, son and heir of Sir Richard Arbuthnot, Baronet, of Hatfield, and Mary, only daughter of the late John Arbuthnot, Esquire.

The paper dropped from Nelly's grasp, her face had grown white and drawn. But a few minutes ago and she had listlessly turned the pages and skipped the paragraphs, dipping here and there where a headline caught her notice, waiting for Roy. Surely he would be with her soon, they had so many plans for the future to discuss, and he had not been near the house all yesterday. She had been surprised, pained even, after their tender parting, but she had made excuses, had told herself that he was worried, was making arrangements, still she had not doubted. Had he not sworn?

And now this cold, cruel, stereotyped notice stunned her. For a time her brain whirled in confusion, she could not realise what had happened, it was too sudden. Gradually the power to think returned; all too quickly the knowledge that she was abandoned rushed to her. Her senses reeled under the blow, but with intense pain came consciousness.

The numb sensation disappeared before the acute agony of lucid thought. The cruelty, the heartless manner of it, the giving this notice to the world whilst she had been left in ignorance; could Roy have been guilty of that?

She would not believe it. It was so mean, despicable, so unlike him, she told herself. White to the lips, trembling in every limb, she stooped to pick up the paper. Faint and dizzy, she nearly fell, but, steadying herself by the back of a great easy-chair, which had been Roy's favourite lounge, she tried once more to read the announcement.

The lines seemed blurred and misty, surely the type was faint. By an effort of concentration she conquered her weakness, the letters were clear cut, there could be no mistake. Sinking back into the depths of the chair, she broke into hysterical sobbing which caught in the throat, which had no relief in tears.

It was finished—her dream was ended. She might have forgiven, but the manner of the parting made her writhe with pain.

Steps crunched upon the gravel outside the window, quick, heavy steps, which she knew, almost without thought, were those of the postman. In moments of intense strain perceptions come quickly, and before he had reached the door and had rung his double knock, she knew somehow he brought news from Roy. With no surprise, then, she received from her maid a letter addressed in the well-known hand.

"You look ill, m'm; can I get you anything?"

"Nothing, Frances, I have a headache. Leave me, please," Nelly answered wearily.

And Frances confided to Thomas very shortly afterwards that, "If the goods in this 'ere shop wasn't to be sold at a sacrifice before long, she hadn't cut her eye teeth."

Which remark showed Miss Frances to be a young woman of some discernment.

Nelly opened the letter with feverish haste. As she expected, it was from Roy. He wrote how he dare not meet her to tell the news—sad, killing news to him—that they must part.

His father had put it so that he could not refuse. It was ruin with her. For his mother's sake—in extenuation he used his mother's name—they must not meet again. He dare not, he could not, face the pain of parting. He would do all he could for her. She was, and would be dear to him always. No woman could hold in his heart the place she held, and, in spite of all, would hold. It was, so far as a selfish man can write a manly letter, an honest admission of wrong-doing, and, strange as it may sound, it distinctly comforted her. The value lay in the last sentence:

"In a few days the world will learn that I am to marry my cousin. You know I have no choice, but you must hear before anyone else. Forget me, Nelly, and, if you can, forgive."

Roy, then, had not put this notice in the paper. Doubtless his father, fearful that Roy would change his mind at the eleventh hour, had fixed him so. Nelly, in all her grief, breathed a sigh of relief. He was not so callous, not so heartless as it had seemed. Again she read the letter, now more steadily, eagerly devouring the expressions of his love. Though she realised that he was lost to her, it was gratifying to know that he was unhappy. He suffered and she could not attempt to deny it gave her pleasure.

Her mortification was too acute to allow her to generalise. In calmer moments she would have moralised at the expense of others. She would have declared glibly enough that misfortune spread over numbers affects no one in particular, that the general burden so divided is easier to bear. She had not reached that stage, it would come later. Must she reply? Did his letter require answer? What could she say? She had implored him not to leave her, she had told him of her love, she had humbled herself, she had flung herself upon his mercy, she had pleaded, and this was the result.

A neatly-gloved hand stretched out.

Like a flash of light the question sprang unbidden to her lips. Was he worth it? Was he not utterly selfish? She had excused him but a few minutes ago, and pride which came to her aid told her plainly she had been foolish. She was not a slave, she had not sold herself body and soul to this man. The colour returned to her cheeks, her eyes flashed with anger. She passed from one extreme to the other. She would show him and his world she did not care. As the thought was framed she gasped with pain. She did care, but no one should know it. The past life was gone, ended; what of the future?

A summer storm beat upon the window and mimicked petulantly the tumult of her thoughts. Nelly, with face pressed against the glass, bitterly noted the similarity, the mockery. The elements were at war, she would war with the world. No pity had been her lot, no pity would she show. She would fight for her own hand, unaided, alone; she would fight and win. No more of love, no more tenderness. Never again should love warp her judgment. That hollow sham was gone, a pleasant dream whilst it had lasted, but with a rude awakening.

What was to be the next step? She would neither see nor write to Roy again. He should be blotted from her being. So far certain, but then?

As if in answer to the question, at that moment the garden gate was violently pushed open, and Charley Duff, under an umbrella which dripped rain from all its points, hastily approached the door.

"Kismet, it is Kismet," said Nelly bitterly. "I am answered."

CHAPTER IV.

After Many Days.

It was a dreary, sunless autumn day. A drizzling rain fell which soaked through wraps and cloaks and seemed in sheer malice to turn upwards under umbrellas to wet faces.

A day upon which pessimism was natural, and it was in no cheerful mood that Jack Sinclair made his way to the boat at Calais. He had been travelling aimlessly from place to place for months past. With no fixed purpose he had wandered on, now dawdling here, and then rushing with express speed to far distant towns. He would, as in other years, have been a welcome guest at many a country house, and indeed he had intended to return weeks sooner, but somehow a spirit of unrest had possessed him, and it was not until this miserable day in early November that he had turned his steps homeward.

He had paced the deck moodily for some short time after the boat had started, his chin buried in the upturned collar of an ulster, without taking note of other passengers, when as he passed a chair placed under the shelter of the paddle-box, a musical voice called to him: "Mr. Sinclair, Jack."

He turned hastily to see a figure huddled up in a large cloak and under a dripping umbrella. A neatly-gloved hand stretched out, and he was asked plaintively: "Don't you know me?"

"Nelly!" he exclaimed. "This is indeed a surprise. Are you alone? Are you not wet? Where are you going to?"

"What a string of questions! I am alone. I am not wet, and I am on my way to town. And you? But sit down, unless you are cold. Under the lee of this paddle-box you will get no more wet, anyway, than in walking the deck. I am sadly in need of a talk, Jack. You don't mind me calling you Jack, do you? You were always a friend to me. I know who looked after the sale of the house and things after Roy left me, and your letters, as Roy's friend, were so kind. I am delighted to have an opportunity of thanking you. But tell me, how is Roy? He is married, of course?"

"Yes; but I have not seen him since. I went abroad directly afterwards, and am only now returning."

"But you have heard from him?"

"Oh, yes; he and I are old chums, as you know. Still, men are bad correspondents, and his letters, and mine, have been few. I think I have had two from him."

"Tell me, is he well and—happy?"

Digitized by Google

"He was well enough when I heard last, and, I suppose, happy. He did not say; he would not be likely to. But, Nelly——"

"Yes, yes, I know," she interrupted quickly; "you mean that I had better not ask. He is married—has passed out of my life. I should forget. I cannot, Jack; it is no use. Do not tease me; the day is too unspeakably wretched—my nerves are all wrong. Tell me all you know about him, or I shall cry."

"Don't do that, for goodness' sake!"

"No, no; I won't, really. You need not fear a scene; but tell me."

So he told all he knew—which was not much.

How Roy, after the honeymoon, had gone to the country, had taken a house near to the family seat, and was determined to study economy, and to fulfil what he had in bitterness called his mission. How he progressed he could not say, for he had not heard from Roy for many weeks.

"It is not much, as you say," Nelly remarked as he ended. "I would like so to hear from him."

"No, Nelly, don't. Keep away. No good can come of that. In kindness forget."

"Manlike, you do not think of me."

"Yes, I do, but I see trouble ahead if you meet. For your sake as well as his, banish him from your thoughts."

"It is impossible!"

He did not answer. What could he say?

The rain beat down mercilessly. Big drops splashed without cessation upon the sodden deck. The speed at which the fast boat ploughed its way through the grey water slanted the rain upon them, and made an umbrella but a poor protection.

Nelly shivered and huddled closer within her wraps, but she would not go below. There was a sufficient roll to make her feel that the stuffy cabin with a varied assortment of suffering humanity would complete her misery. It was bad enough on deck, but below—she shuddered.

"No," she said, "I will remain here." And then hurriedly, as if this were on her mind, and she must unburden: "You know Charley Duff is dead? Somehow I thought you would know; he was never strong, poor boy, and in the Mediterranean contracted a wasting fever which seemed to beat his strength at every turn. One day he would rally, only to sink again the next. He fought hard for life, and sometimes I thought—but the end came.

"Three bad days of delirium and raging fever, and then collapse. He was quite sensible to the last, he simply sank from exhaustion. His mother arrived in time—just in time. He must have told her how I had nursed him, and I did do my best, Jack—for she was really kind to me. She said no nasty things, but rather thanked me for all I had done for Charley. I think if she had acted the part of the virtuous mother and flung scorn at my head, I should have drowned myself, but she did not. Of course I only saw her once or twice by his bedside, and he would have me there, but after the funeral she sent kindly messages and offered help. Fancy a mother who doted upon her son never once saying that I was the cause of his death. I shall never forget her consideration."

"Poor Charley. I am sorry to hear of this. He never was strong, though he had plenty of pluck."

"Pluck! To use his own phrase, he spurted too soon in the race and could not last the distance."

"And you, Nelly, now?"

"I do not know. I am a waif and stray. I did not know it until weeks afterwards, but he left me £300 a year for life. I tell you, Jack, when I think of that, I feel, oh! so cheap. I think sometimes I wish we had never met; he might be alive now. Then again, I know he could not have lived long. He had gone the pace, indeed, and his was not the constitution to bear the strain. And then I remember that I am at any rate removed from want, and hideously selfish thoughts come unbidden. Sometimes I think I am utterly callous, dead to all emotions, thinking solely of self."

"No, no, Nelly. Not so. I never did think so."

Which was not strictly true, as Sinclair knew, remembering his talk with Roy at White's. But he was learning to see this woman in another light. He was now inclined to separate her from the class of which he knew something. She was not the mercenary courtesan who would desert the rich for the richer; she had finer feelings, higher emotions, even aspirations. Seldom is a woman all bad, or, for the matter of that, all good. So he told himself, and recognised that here the good more than balanced the bad. Perhaps he was inclined to make allowance easily, as most men are when pretty women are in question. At any rate, he persuaded himself that to befriend her was now his part.

"I am glad, Nelly, that you are left with, at any rate, bread and-butter. The position is not so cruel."

"But I must do something. I want work. I must have an object in life. So far I have drifted with the stream, but I near the rapids, and to have a chance must grip the helm firmly. But what can I do? That usual refuge the stage? I can sing. I think I can act. Heavens! have I not acted lately a part I was not cast for? Feigning love until almost—but no, I could not forget Roy."

"Roy, always Roy. Put him away, Nelly. It would mean ruin to him, think——"

"Yes," she interrupted quickly, with a pathetic catch in her voice more eloquent than many words. "Yes, I fear, I know, you are right, but——"

"Promise me you will avoid him, for Mary's sake—his wife—a woman I respect highly and—pity—promise, and I will try to find you something to do. Something to distract your thoughts, to give you a life to live. Something, I don't now know what, but I will think it over. I have many friends in the artistic world, and probably it could be arranged."

"You ask me a hard thing, Jack."

"Promise," he said shortly.

And after a pause, whilst she looked frowningly at the dull waves which rolled by with unbroken crests, she said sadly: "Yes, I promise; you are right." Her face was drawn and haggard. He saw that to so decide was not what she had intended, she had had other views, had possibly thought out for herself another future, perhaps herself before the footlights, but Roy, always Roy, ready to take his cue. He clinched it at once.

"That's right. Now I help. But here we are nearing Dover. May I see after your luggage, get you a seat and so on? There won't be a crush, but, if you will let me, I will travel with you, and we can talk things over on the way up."

On arrival in town, Sinclair, having seen Nelly into a hansom, went to White's to dine.

As he entered, he met Roy Arbuthnot face to face; there was no chance of avoiding him, or at that moment he would gladly have done so. He was not good at lying, and he knew instinctively that he would be questioned about Nelly. Whether he had seen or heard of her, of her doings, and he knew he could not bluntly say he knew nothing. There he was, and he must face the music.

Roy's greeting was effusive. "Jack! old man, of all men the one I have longed to see. How are you? Come and dine with us. Mary and I are in town for a few days. She says she positively must have some new frocks. I don't understand, but suppose it is all right. We are staying at the Métrôpole. You will come, won't you? That's all right. You can get a room there. Now, do not disappoint me," as Sinclair hesitated.

"I am with you, Roy. I'll leave my traps here for the present. My rooms are ready, I wired my man that I was coming.'

He had known Roy's wife for years, and called her Mary with the familiarity of an old friend. She was glad to see him and chatted of old times and doings when they were all children together. She questioned him about his travels, his long absence from home, and heavily, yes, it must be confessed, heavily chaffed him about the grief his desertion of familiar haunts had caused to admirers.

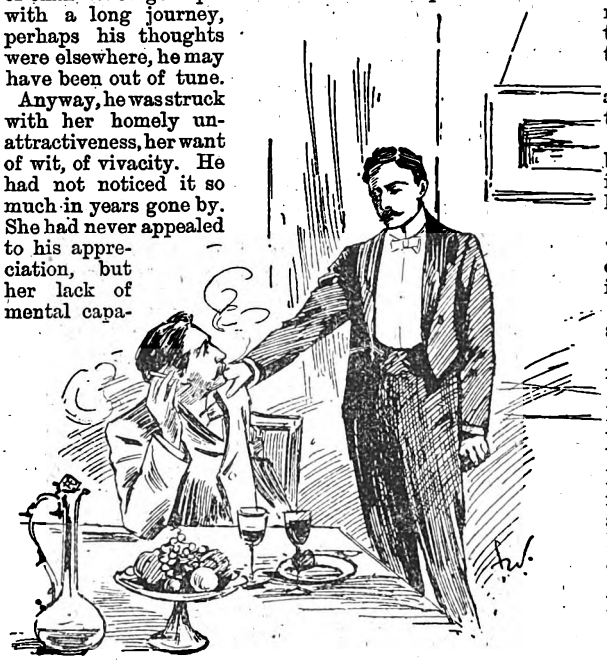
Indeed, Sinclair was distinctly bored. Hers was the sort of chaff which got upon his nerves. Perhaps he was tired with a long journey, perhaps his thoughts were elsewhere, he may have been out of tune.

Anyway, he was struck with her homely unattractiveness, her want of wit, of vivacity. He had not noticed it so much in years gone by. She had never appealed to his appreciation, but her lack of mental capacity to-night irritated. She chatted freely enough, but of the commonplace events of their life in the country which had no interest for him, and she seemed incapable of extended ideas.



Placed his hand on Sinclair's shoul:r.

He pictured the wife suitable to Roy, a man of sensitive, highly-strung temperament, and unwillingly he drew comparisons between what he had as a helpmeet and what he should have had. Here was Roy married to a woman, an estimable woman in many ways, but how unfitted to him! He noticed how now and again a tired look crept over his face, how it was only by an effort he joined in the conversation, and how from time to time he tried to lead her to general topics, with, however, indifferent success.

Mary was so evidently contented with her position as the newly-married woman, the future Lady Arbuthnot, taking her stand in the county amongst people she had not previously known, that their doings, their sayings, were an engrossing subject to her.

Sinclair did not like the outlook. She would not be able to keep Roy by her side. He felt that, and wished her mind's view could cover a wider field. He had time to reflect, as she wandered on, that women of her type develop in middle age into excellent, if somewhat over-anxious, mothers, into, perhaps, fussy patrons of local charities, village schools, and the junior clergy. He could see Mary inclosing her life with a fence, and living within it with no longing for the world beyond, and but little sympathy with its doings.

It would be a high fence, and the area surrounded would be small, so small that he feared Roy would wander afield. Already he thought he saw indifference, want of interest. He had an uncomfortable feeling that something was wrong, and he said to himself again he did not like the outlook.

Mary was a handsome woman, now at her best. She would probably, in still young life, grow stout and heavy, become the middle-aged, unattractive matron before her time.

Her deep, musical voice, clear as a bell, would, however, remain. It reminded him of Nelly continually, and several times he caught himself listening to its tones rather than to the words.

At length Mary left the room to prepare for the theatre, and the two friends, lighting cigarettes, pulled their chairs to the table again.

There was an awkward silence which Sinclair hesitated to break. He realised that one thought, one remembrance was in Roy's mind, and he knew also the question to expect, but he would give no lead.

Roy sat with bent brows, drumming upon the table with a knife balanced between his fingers, not heeding the cigarette which smoked in spiral rings from the plate where it lay.

Suddenly he looked up and asked quickly: "Have you seen Nelly?"

"My dear Roy, don't you begin about her. You are married, she is gone, that book should be closed."

"For Heaven's sake don't preach, Jack. I must know. Every time Mary speaks she reminds me of Nelly. Her voice tells me every minute of the day what a cad I have been. I left her to marry a woman I don't love, oh, yes! I know, common decency should stop me. I cannot hide it from you. I loved Nelly, I love her now. I can never love another woman. Mary's voice keeps her before me always. I shut my eyes and I hear Nelly, always Nelly. I open them and see—Mary."

"You are a fool, Roy. You are infatuated. You forget Duff."

"He is dead. I heard it yesterday, and you know it, I see you do. And you tried to deceive me. You know where Nelly is, you have seen her. Don't say you have not, I won't believe you." And in his excitement he sprang to his feet and shouted across the table to Sinclair, "tell me, I say."

"Arbuthnot, you are mad," answered Sinclair, controlling his temper by an effort.

"Tell me," again Arbuthnot said hotly. Then he rapidly crossed the room and placed his hand on Sinclair's shoulder as he said in lower tones: "Forgive me, Jack, I was mad, I am mad. I cannot bear this tension. I must see Nelly if only for a few minutes, just to explain, just to tell her I am not the heartless brute she must think me. Tell me her address, Jack," he almost pleaded.

"I will not," Sinclair answered shortly. "It would be suicidal for you to see her, ruin to both of you."

"Then she has asked of me. She does not forget. I knew she was true whilst I was false.

She had in surprise paused at the door.

When did you see her, Jack? Tell me that, anyway. I am in a fever. I am a brute, I know, but let it pass. Quick! Mary will be down directly. Is she well? How did she look? What is she going to do? Go on, man alive, go on."

"She is well—but, Roy, do drop this. Think, think what it means—ruin——"

"Ruin; what do I care about ruin? I have married to save the father, if I efface myself how does that concern anyone?"

It was with wondering thoughts that she took her seat.

"Mary?"

Roy laughed bitterly. "Oh, Mary, yes, of course I will—I must—remember her. There shall be no scandal. I only want to see Nelly to explain—to bid her good-bye. Tell me the address, Jack. Quick, man, she may be here any minute."

"I tell you again I will not. You are mad."

"You will not?" and Arbuthnot, with a face white with passion, confronted him.

"No."

The two men stood facing each other, drawn to full height, with flashing eyes and clenched fists as the door opened and Mary appeared enveloped in a cloak ready to start.

She stood there for a moment with startled eyes, with paled cheeks, looking from one to the other. Hearing voices raised in anger, she had in surprise paused at the door. She had heard the word "Nelly," and her husband had passionately asked for an address.

Who Nelly might be and what the reason for this heat she could not guess. She had no time to think, as the door swung open and they turned smilingly to her with commonplace remarks and passed down the stairs to the carriage. Perhaps they over-acted a little, and she noted the restraint.

It was with wondering thoughts that she took her seat, and through the play, Nelly, Nelly rang through her brain.

"I will find her without you," whispered Roy sharply, as they left Sinclair on the pavement.

The Air Squadron.

"Have another cigar, lieutenant," I said, pushing the box across the table towards him.

"No, thank you," he replied. "But, with your permission, I'll fill my pipe from your jar. Indeed, when I came up to your room, it was only for a little tobacco—ran out myself—cigars all gone. And here it is already twelve o'clock. My, my, how time flies when one gets reminiscencing! But, to continue."

Now, when my good friend Lieutenant Swash takes possession of me and my room at eleven p.m. I do not always consider it my duty to listen to him. He has been such a frequent visitor of mine since he has been staying at our boarding-house, and then he is one of those individuals who so lose themselves in their own narrations, that they even forget they have an audience. So, when the lieutenant said: "But, to continue," I sank deeper into my big chair and gazed absently into the fire.

He was talking warfare of the future. What cared I for that, who possessed neither stocks that would go down nor food products that would go up? My eyelids closed wearily. How I wished he would go! Then he made a statement so absurd that I laughed.

"It took place on July 16th, 1946," I heard him say.

"Eighteen forty-six," I corrected.

"Now, look here," said the naval man testily. "How old do you think I am—80? Pshaw! I was thirty then. It was 1946, and please don't contradict me. It was fifty years hence it all happened."

"If you will have it so, very well," I said.

"Now the date is settled, and you thoroughly understand the cause of the war. Great Britain claimed the atmospheric covering of the earth to a height of 10,000 feet, basing the claim on the fact that as far back as 1899 an English balloonist had disappeared from view at that height. He was never seen again. Such a claim as this, had it been recognised by other nations, would have given her too great a control over mankind's supply of breath. France claimed up to an altitude of 1,000 feet over their country, but Great Britain would not recognise this, and refused to arbitrate. The result was war—terrible war."

I took my pipe from between my teeth, and fixed a cold eye on the speaker, who went on calmly:

"You will remember that it was July 16th, 1946, that the fight occurred. There were three battleships in our fleet—Admiral Wad's flagship, the Swallow, carrying fifteen tons of dynamite and two machine-guns; the Lightning, Captain Blower, ten tons of dynamite, and two 6-inch rifles; the Hawk, Captain Wood, eleven tons of dynamite, and a pneumatic gun, used in throwing explosives at the enemy in case she got above us.

"We were accompanied by two small torpedo-boats and the swift unarmoured cruiser Kalamazoo, which we expected to be of little service, since a bullet could have punctured her and sent her to earth for ever.

"We lay in mid-channel for four days awaiting the approach of the enemy's flying squadron. It was ten o'clock on the morning of July 16th when we sighted them, about 200 miles away, running towards us at a rapid rate. They must have seen us at about the same time, for they sheered off a little towards the north and began to rise.

"Admiral Wad, at whose side I was standing on the quarter-deck of the Swallow, at once understood their manœuvre. In modern warfare it's the fellow who gets above the other and drops dynamite on him that wins.

"We were then at an altitude of about 8,000 feet, and did not lose any time getting higher. I can see the grand old admiral now as he stood at the switch-board, coolly puffing his cigar as if he were at his club in London. There was not a tremour observed on his long thin finger as he pushed the button marked 'Up.' Then we began to ascend.

"The other two battleships followed, and as we rose we cleared for action. The Kalamazoo and the torpedo-boats were left behind, as it was not deemed advisable to expose their frail structures to the enemy's fire.

"I confess, as I stood beside my brave leader and felt our ship mounting higher and higher and shooting on towards the enemy at a speed of ninety miles an hour, watched the crew of ten men coolly placing dynamite bombs in the most convenient places, saw the three great steel balloons of our enemy's squadron glistening in the sunlight as they shot towards us, I felt that strange inward sensation that heretofore I believed could only be caused by a Welsh rarebit at 2 a.m.

"I was in full possession of my mental faculties. Otherwise I should never have been able to have lived through those awful two hours. And the crew, too—I never saw a braver set of fellows in my life. Not a moist eye or a trembling lip amongst them.

"The enemy had two first-class battleships and two second-class. They advanced in a line parallel to ours.

Digitized by Google

Admiral Wad signalled Captain Blower to engage the two second-class ships on the left, the Hawk to take the right, leaving us the flagship in the centre.

"This vessel, I saw through my glasses, was a little larger than, but of almost the same construction as, the Swallow. There was a great cylindrical balloon of steel, fully 800 feet in length, with the car swung beneath it, an armed turret, fore and aft, protecting her guns, at her stern a great propeller fan and two huge rudders for steering. I saw her crew running two and fro, getting in readiness for the conflict; her commander, with a little knot of officers about him, standing forward, eagerly scanning our fleet.

"Higher and higher we rose, the air rapidly getting more and more rare, and our breathing becoming more and more rapid. I looked down at the sea, which was glimmering 15,000ft. below us in the sunlight. I turned my eyes at the great cylinder over head. Shot holes in two of its air-tight compartments, and what a fall! But there were other things to think of.

"'Admiral,' I gasped, 'if we go much higher, we shall die for want of air.'

"'Mr. Swash,' replied the grand old salt, 'duty before breath always—remember that, sir. I'm afraid the ship will not carry much higher. We'll get over them, don't you think, Captain Howitzer?'

"Howitzer gazed anxiously at the enemy, who were now within fifteen miles, and replied:

"'Close call, sir.'

"Then to the men:

"'Stand ready to drop a ton of dynamite on them if we get over them!'

"As he spoke there was a puff on the enemy's flagship, and a solid shot came singing half a mile below us. Old Wad laughed, and ordered the bow gun to return the fire when we were within five miles. Our shells passed over them. We had then reached as high an altitude as it was possible for the ships to float, and then we reduced speed. They approached to within two miles, and stopped and began to circle about us, evidently intending to subject our balloons to a cross fire. Higher than we they could not go, and the discovery of this fact brought jeers and cheers from our crew.

"For some fifteen minutes there was terrible suspense. Each vessel circled warily around its chosen opponent, banging away with its machine-guns in vain endeavour to puncture the enemy's balloon. But the distance was too great and the movements of the vessels too quick for any successful gun work. Suddenly Howitzer seized my arm and pointed towards the Lightning. Her crew had just thrown overboard her whole cabin, her two guns, and a great quantity of dynamite bombs.

"For a moment we were speechless with astonishment. Were they going to take to flight? Admiral Wad seized a flag and was about to signal, when he stopped. Slowly the great vessel was mounting in the air. A cry of dismay was heard from the hostile ship with which she was engaged. In five minutes she was 400 feet above them. The French crew madly threw overboard all the weight they carried—guns, bombs, and everything. But they were too late—the Lightning was above them. Then a black object dropped down upon them; a deafening roar followed, with a rush of wind that hurled the Swallow a mile out of her course. And when we looked towards the Lightning she was alone, but slowly sinking towards the sea, for the concussion had torn off the end of her balloon cylinder. We could see her crew at the rail cheering wildly.

"Admiral Wad at once ordered us to pursue the same tactics. Everything went by the board—guns and all ammunition but five bombs. We loosened some rivets in the floor and let the cabin fall; then we, too, began to rise. But the French Admiral was not to be outwitted, for he had been busy at exactly the same work, and when we found ourselves 1,000ft. higher, he lay a mile away at the same altitude.

"Admiral Wad swore. Our guns were gone and we could have lain there for eternity and not harm each other, unless we closed. For a long time he paced the deck in silence. At length he called the men together, and in a neat, touching speech asked for one volunteer for a forlorn hope.

"'All that can be done,' he said, 'is to ram the enemy. One man and myself can handle the ship, and it would be useless for you to stop on board simply to lose your lives.'

"Every man volunteered; every man offered to stay in their commander's place. He chose me for his companion, since I alone of all the crew was unmarried, and he positively refused to accept a substitute. He would go down with the old ship, he said.

"The scene that followed was most touching. The men wrung the brave old man's hand in a last parting. One by one they took their parachutes, swung over the side and went sailing away into the blue.

"The last man was gone, and old Wad turned towards me and embraced me. Between his emotion and the extreme rarification of the air he could not speak. This show of feeling lasted but a minute, for we were brought to our senses by a great cheer from the enemy's crew. They believed the ship deserted, and were bearing down towards us.

"Instantly the Admiral straightened up and firmly pushed the button, turning the full force of the electrical current into the propelling motors. The great ship swung round, and, with terrific speed, sailed at the enemy. The enemy tried to swing their ship out of the course, but in vain. In a minute we struck them. A crash like a thousand peals of thunder, a flash like the explosion of a dynamite factory, and all was still. And when I looked again there was nothing but blue, the endless blue of infinite space. The Hawk and her two opponents had been wrecked, I suppose, by the awful concussion."

Lieutenant Swash had finished his narration, and for a long time puffed silently at his pipe. I, for my part, was wrapped in silent wonder at the man. I knew Swash well, but such assurance as this I had not believed him capable of.

After all, he was one of those persons who lie so habitually that, coming from them, a story of their own death was not surprising.

A VERY UNEXPECTED DENOUEMENT.

Bill, by profession, was a burglar—hard-working, straightforward, skilful. With his partner it was different. Jim, by profession was a gentleman at large: "Jim-the-Gentleman." Frequently, however, he accompanied Bill on his excursions, while it was his brain that devised the plots and ruses by which he had become famous among his confederates.

Jim, in elegant attire, with a high, white collar, was reclining on a heap of straw in one corner of the room, puffing at a cigar. Bill was sitting huddled up on a three-legged stool, sucking a black clay pipe.

Suddenly he put his foot on the floor, and brought his hands down on his knees with a slap.

"Jim," he said, slowly and impressively. "Jim, funds is low."

"Funds are low," corrected Jim. "I do wish, my dear fellow, that you would learn to speak more grammatically."

"Funds are low," said Bill. "Hev you any idees for raising 'em?"

Jim leant back on the straw, half closed his eyes, and remained for a few minutes in deep thought.

"During the course of my afternoon stroll," he said at length, "I noticed a palatial residence in the vicinity of Clapham, set well back in fine-looking grounds. It occured to me that in this place we might find some funds."

"Who's the owner?" asked Bill.

"The owner is a retired merchant named Bankum."

"Any family?" enquired Bill.

"None. I also discovered that he dines at half-past six."

"Good," said Bill, rubbing his hands. "And goes to bed nice and early!"

"That I didn't trouble to enquire."

"Didn't you find out when he goes to bed? Oh, Jim, I'm ashamed of ye."

"If you will allow me to disclose my plan, perhaps you will be better able to criticise it," said Jim haughtily. "I propose that we visit this gentleman at about half-past seven."

"'Arf-past seven? Oh lor'!"

"We shall not, however, go in our present costume."

Jim pulled down his cuffs.

"I have in my bag the necessary paraphernalia."

Jim opened his bag, and drew out two new policeman's uniforms.

Bill stared at them in open-eyed amazement.

"This is for you," said Jim. "This, an inspector's, you will notice, for me. Now listen. At half-past seven we present ourselves at Mr. Bankum's residence. I find him sitting in his drawing-room. I tap him on the shoulder, and tell him that he must consider himself under arrest. He demands our warrant. I show it." Jim drew out a well-imitated warrant.

"He will storm and rave, of course, and fly into a temper. However, I will put you on guard, and tell you not to allow him to leave the room while I proceed to search the house. I will order all the servants into one room, and lock them in. Then I will take my sack, and proceed to examine the house, picking up anything that I may think useful. What do you say to that as a good idea? How will that raise the funds, eh, Bill, my boy?"

Bill was scratching his head. The idea had not yet quite sunk in.

"We start in an hour," said Jim. "In the meanwhile I have some letters to write, while you may be trying on your uniform." Saying which, he rose from his bed of straw, and, lighting a fresh cigar, strolled into the adjoining room.

Subdued roars of laughter came from Bill as he put himself into policeman's clothes.

An hour later the pair started off for the suburban residence of Mr. Bankum, at Clapham.

Precisely at half-past seven Jim rang the bell. The footman started back in amazement when he saw an inspector of police and a constable standing before him.

"I will inform Mr. Bankum of your presence," said the footman.

The drawing-room door was directly in front of the hall door. As the footman opened it, and delivered his message, the two visitors saw a curious sight. Mr. Bankum's face turned pale, fear shone from his eyes, a pen dropped from his hand to the floor. He half rose from his seat, and then sat down again, and mopped his brow..

"Show 'em in," he said. "Show 'em in. I'm—er—expecting them."

"What's up," whispered Bill.

"He's expecting us," said Jim. "Be prepared for a bolt," he whispered, as he was ushered into Mr. Bankum's presence.

"I am very sorry, sir," he said in his most polite manner, "to be under the painful necessity of putting you under arrest."

"Yes, yes," replied Mr. Bankum, "I quite understand. You come from Scotland Yard, eh?"

"Yes," said Jim.

A gasp came from Bill. His jaw dropped.

"What would happen, now," continued Mr. Bankum, trembling with nervousness, "if you were to go back to Scotland Yard, and say that I had gone? Left twenty-four hours before you came?"

Jim was silent for a moment. The question took him completely by surprise. Bill was gasping behind him.

"Nothing would happen," said Jim at length, "as far as we are concerned."

"Well, now, to come to the point," said Mr. Bankum, "what will you take to do it? A thousand for yourself, and five hundred for your man? How will that suit you, eh, Mr. Inspector?"

"Couldn't do it," said Jim promptly. "It's not worth the risk."

"Two for yourself, then—three—three thousand for yourself, and one for your man. On this condition," continued Mr. Bankum, when Jim nodded, and he counted out the notes, "you will inform Scotland Yard that I left twenty-four hours before you came?"

"Yes," said Jim.

"Good-night," said Mr. Bankum, and a moment later inspector and constable found themselves outside, gazing blankly into each other's eyes.

"Well," said Jim, completely taken off his guard, "I'm blowed."

"Whatever did he do it for?" whispered Bill.

They found out a few days later. Then all the world was startled by the news that Mr. Bankum, the well-known merchant, had absconded with an enormous amount of his firm's money.

"Now you understand," said Jim, as they discussed the affair over an oyster supper, "why Mr. Bankum was so generous."

But Bill was calling for champagne.

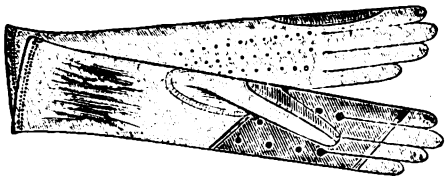
GLOVES.

MOST of our readers feel the essential need of being neatly gloved, and fortunately prices at the present day are now so moderate there are few of us who cannot afford this necessary finish to the toilet.

Quite recently I called at The London Glove Company's Warehouse, 45a, Cheapside, E.C., to inspect the novelties for the coming season, and I was really surprised at the remarkably low price for which an excellent and well-fitting pair of gloves may be here obtained. The variety at this well-known establishment is almost bewildering, and it would be impossible for me to describe the many styles of pointings and finish. For the benefit of our cycling friends, I must, however, draw attention to a smart Tan Doeskin glove, ventilated and tilburied, with leather palms, the price of which is only 2s. 4d. The illustration shows the style of glove I mean, and the same glove can be had in White Doeskin without the tilburied palms, at 1s. 11d. per pair.



A very complete and illustrated Price List has just been issued by The London Glove Company, and can now be forwarded post free to any address.

Those of our readers who conveniently can, should pay a visit either to the Warehouse, at 45a, Cheapside, E.C., or the branch establishment, 83, New Bond Street, W., where an infinite variety of novelties in Gloves, Hose, Handkerchiefs, and Fans are always displayed.

Answers to Correspondents.

The attention of readers this week is directed to the Puzzle Picture Competition, the first ten pictures of which appear on page 427. As everybody is familiar with the names of certain Members of Parliament, or has the means of discovering or obtaining a complete list, there is no reason why you should not have a try to obtain at least a portion of that £50. Bear in mind the fact that even if you are unable to solve every one of the first ten, there are thousands of others who are in the same position as yourself. Do as many as you can with the assistance of your friends. You cannot do more.

J. F. T.—No, you cannot compel any of the Post Office authorities to lick your stamps for you. All they do is to supply you with a little moistening wad.

E. R.—A "morning session" in the House of Commons begins at two o'clock in the afternoon, and lasts till seven in the evening.

Recruit.—The standard of height is greater in the British Army than in that of any other nation.

N. W.—I believe that the most valuable modern painting is Meissonier's "1814," which was bought by a Frenchman a few years ago for £56,000.

L. B.—Rosewood is so called because when first cut it gives out a perfume like that of the rose. You are wrong in supposing that roses grow upon the tree which supplies it.

Briton.—The Boers are descended from the Huguenots, who left France under the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and from Dutch emigrants in search of civil and religious liberty.

K. L.—Toothache can generally be cured immediately by putting a small piece of cotton, saturated with strong ammonia, into the hollow of the affected tooth.

Singer.—No, wine taken in moderation will not injure your voice; beer, however, will tend to thicken it and make it guttural.

C. D. writes to ask me if I consider early rising conducive to long life.——This has been the general opinion until recent years. An authority on the subject now says that a man has so many hours to be awake, and the fewer of these he uses up each day, the longer he will live. The proper way to economise life, therefore, is to sleep every moment that it is not necessary or desirable that you should be awake.

W. S.—Previous to the year 1748 there was no regular uniform for sailors. In this year, however, the "blue-jacket" was adopted.

H. C.—You are wrong. A ruby of the best quality, and of more than three carats, is worth more than a diamond of the same size and weight.

T. H.—No, silver is not legal tender in Great Britain for amounts over forty shillings.

P. C.—The use of amber for the mouth-pieces of pipes originated in a belief of the Turks that amber is an infallible preventative of the injurious effects of nicotine.

D. F. G.—The largest lighthouse in the world belongs to Havre, in France.

H. N. has been insulted by a man who is considerably bigger than himself, and wants to know the best way to repudiate.——There are two courses open; one is to bear it with Christian fortitude, the other is to hire a bigger man to show him the error of his ways.

W. A. J.—I am sorry that I cannot entertain the idea of publishing your Military Band March.

B. B.—The largest flower in the world grows in Sumatra. It is called the Rafflesia Arnoldi, and some of the specimens are thirty-nine inches in diameter. The central cup will hold six quarts of water. The other portion of your letter will have the best consideration.

B. D.—A few of the lower order of creatures live without sleep. Many short-lived insects do so, and some species of fish, such as the pike, salmon, and goldfish.

T. F. L. wants to know if when eggs are sent through the post, and chickens are hatched on the way, whether the creatures become the property of the Post Office authorities, the sender, or the receiver.——If the eggs were paid for, I should say the receiver; any way, certainly not the Post Office people.

A. B. D.—Perhaps, on the whole, the Chinese are the longest lived people in the world.

C. H.—There are a thousand parcels lost every day on the British railways.

Esther—Fulness of the temples above the eyes is supposed to denote musical ability.

H. D. C.—Frogs are not eaten all the year round in France. Like oysters, they are only in season during the months that contain the letter "r."

Athlete wishes to know what winter pastime is most popular in Russia.——Skating is, perhaps, the favourite, and in the parks the ice soon becomes roughened by the runners of the skates. A large roller is brought on to the ice, which is heated so as to melt the surface sufficiently to make it smooth. This roller is pushed or pulled over the ice by three men.

H. K.—Yes, ink-bottles should always be corked when sent through the post.

D. H.—You may be surprised to hear that the mosaic pavement you admire so much in the crypt of St. Paul's Cathedral was made by the female convicts at Woking.

G. H.—The crown of England is worth £120,000.

S. B.—The person who speaks the purest English is the man or woman with regard to whom it is impossible to say from what part of the country he or she comes.

Instead of waiting for a policeman to tell you that your bicycle lamp ought to be alight, you need only consult the "Dot" lighting-up calendar—a tiny frame that may be fixed to any part of the machine, containing a number of cards on which is printed the information you require. The price is sixpence, and the patentees live at 55, Fisherton Street, Salisbury, and are named Smith.

Mr. G. Nicholls, of Weybridge, is the inventor of a novel device for pumping a continuous current of air into the tyres of a bicycle while the machine is being ridden. Underneath the saddle is a small pump, and the energy exerted by the elasticity of the saddle-spring is utilised in passing the air along the framework of the bicycle, and through a false spoke in each wheel. By this means it is possible for one to continue riding even with the tyre severely punctured.

Messrs. Thorn and Hoddle of 164, Camberwell New Road, London, S.E., are the inventors of the patent "Incanto" Acetylene gas-generator. By means of this contrivance anyone can, without any previous knowledge, be his own gas-fitter, gas-supplier, and consumer. The generator is sold in three sizes, and is to be bought at a price ranging from £3 10s. to £21. For photographers and magic-lanterns the invention is of especial value.

CAN YOU EXPLAIN IT?

Here is a fact for the reader to think over and explain: Out of the thousands of letters written to us by people on the subject of their illness, the great majority assert that such illness began in the spring of the year—commonly in March or April. Of the remainder, the most cases are said to arise in the autumn; very few in midsummer or in midwinter.

Now, there is a reason for whatsoever happens. What is the reason for that? While you are cogitating on it, I will cite you an illustration or two.

"In the spring of 1892," says one of the many women who, in spite of what men say to the contrary, know how to tell a long story in few words, "I fell into a low, weak state of health. All the energy and ambition seemed to leave me as the snow melted off the ground. I was languid and tired, and felt heavy in body, as if I had somehow increased in weight—whereas the truth was the other way. My appetite was poor, and what little I ate hurt me at the chest, and lay dull and cold on my stomach.

"Presently a hacking cough set in, with night sweats, which made me extremely weak. I was often taken with a pain between the shoulders, and had a sense of sinking, as one has when wholly exhausted from some unusual labour or worry.

"As time went on I became still more feeble, and it was with great difficulty that I met the demands of my business. This will give you a general idea of my condition for nearly two years. None of the various medicines I resorted to gave me more than temporary relief.

"In February, 1894, a friend urged me to try Mother Seigel's Syrup. I got a bottle from Messrs. Robinson & Co., chemists, Hunslet Carr, and it helped me greatly. My appetite awoke, food agreed with me, and I felt better and stronger altogether. Holding on with the Syrup the cough abated, all pain left me, and I was once more in the happy possession of my former good health. This result I owe to Mother Seigel and her justly popular medicine; and if the publication of my experience of it will, in your opinion, be of use to others, you have my consent to use this letter in that way. (Signed) (Miss) Alice Green, 10, Moor Road, Hunslet Carr, Leeds, March 28th, 1895."

"One day in April, 1890," writes another, "I was suddenly seized with a strange feeling in my head, as though I was about to have a fit. My body writhed and my face grew dark and discoloured. The doctor said I was suffering from a form of nervous prostration which would probably produce spasms. He was right. I began to have three or four fits each day. I felt low and queer, and never knew what it was to be hungry. About my stomach and chest strange gnawing pains came and went. I had always a starved sensation all over me. I got no rest day or night, and thought I should never leave my bed alive. The doctor attended me constantly, but his treatment availed nothing. Month after month I remained in this condition.

"When I had given up all hope, I first read about Mother Seigel's Syrup in a small pamphlet which was left at our house. The book said my symptoms were due to inflammatory dyspepsia, which had filled my blood with poisons, and that my nerves were prostrated with lack of food—virtual starvation. Cure the diseased stomach, it said, and the fits, etc., would vanish of themselves. I sent to Messrs. Thompson & Son, Grocers and Tea Merchants, Ampleforth, for this medicine, and began taking it at once. Relief came in three or four days. After that, continuing with the Syrup, I improved every day. I now enjoy my food. After using two bottles the fits left me entirely, and I was strong and well as ever. Since that time (now four and a half years ago) I have had the best of health, and required no medicine whatever. (Signed) (Mrs.) Mary Annie Elsworth, Ampleforth, Oswaldkirk, York, April 10th, 1895."

The accuracy of the latter statement is vouched for by the Messrs. Thompson, who have known Mrs. Elsworth for many years. Although no witness is really needed, as every case of cure by Mother Seigel's Syrup is thoroughly investigated before publication, only unquestionable facts being allowed to appear.

As to why the majority of people are taken ill in the spring, we shall reserve that point for future discussion. Be the solution what it may, one thing is certain: wise folk will keep a bottle of Mother Seigel's Syrup by them every week in the string of fifty-two.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 432. FOR WEEK ENDING APRIL 10TH, 1897. [ONE PENNY.

What to Eat, Drink, and Avoid.

BY A MEDICAL MAN.

Diet.—Under this head we will consider what is the best. Every man or woman must be a law unto themselves as to what to eat, drink, and avoid. The saying, "One man's meat is another man's poison," is very true, and the time of year and the climatic surroundings have much to say in the matter. In the Arctic regions you can eat and relish fats or fat mixtures such as would be fatal to you in the tropics. Why do our countrymen suffer so much from liver complaint? It is because our insular training in the British Isles has induced a love for roast beef, spirits, and strong beers, and we indulge in these with one result: liver complaint. Were we only rational, and adapted our diet to our surroundings, we would lead healthier, happier lives. Were we to a great extent to shun animal food we would be healthier.

The foregoing observations lead us up to consider why Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa acts so beneficially on the liver. Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa has in it the four ingredients of a purely vegetable extraction, and while these in combination act most beneficially on the liver, they cannot in any sense of the words be either considered drugs or medicines. They are neither more nor less than strengthening, nourishing restoratives. They give tone and vigour to every organ of the body, while at the same time they build up the whole constitution in a way that has never been done before. This purely vegetable blend not only stimulates the liver to a proper discharge of its functions, but it builds up its various tissues to the highest pitch of efficiency.

Merit, and merit alone, is what we claim for Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, and we are prepared to send to any reader who names Short Stories a dainty sample tin of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, free and post paid. There is no magic in all this. It is a plain, honest, straightforward offer. It is done to introduce the merits of Vi-Cocoa into every home. Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa as a concentrated form of nourishment and vitality is invaluable; nay, more than this, for to all who wish to face the strife and battle of life with greater endurance and more sustained exertion, it is absolutely indispensable.

Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa is made up in 6d. packets, and 9d. and 1s. 6d. tins. It can be obtained from all chemists, grocers, and stores, or from Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa Limited, Suffolk House, Cannon Street, London, E.C.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 432.] For the Week ending April 10th, 1897. [ONE PENNY.

The Publisher, the Author, and the Duchess.

The Study of a Deep Plot.

ALTHOUGH I broke into my friend Hawtree's room in a manner that was not remarkable for its gentleness, it did not seem to disturb him in the least, for he continued calmly reading the book that he held in his hand, in which he appeared deeply engrossed.

This fact was suspicious in itself, for Hawtree is not a man to take up a novel in the small hours of the morning. It seemed evident to me that he had recognised my step on the stairs, and having a history prepared about the book, he had taken it up as an excuse for telling the tale.

I hesitated a moment whether to advance or retire. Then I thought that the day was yet young, and Hawtree's stories were worth the hearing, and his cigars were very good.

So I ventured on a cough. Hawtree continued reading. I tried again to attract his attention.

"Well, old man," I said heartily, "good-evening. I thought I would just look in as I was passing."

Still it pleased Hawtree's plans to ignore my presence, and it was not until I had crossed the room and stood directly between him and the light that he deigned to look up with a very well feigned start of surprise.

"Well," he said, springing to his feet, and shaking hands heartily, "I declare I never saw you come in. Why didn't you speak? Sit down, man, and make yourself at home."

He turned down the leaf he was reading of his precious book with much ostentation, and with a sigh laid it regretfully on the floor.

"Studying?" I suggested.

"No," he replied, "just peeping into a little book that has been unopened on my shelf for about five years. It was a most extraordinary thing altogether," he continued, gazing meditatively at the fire.

"What," I enquired, "was extraordinary?"

"Why," said Hawtree, "that I should meet the author of this book this evening as he was coming down the steps of the Empire. A man, mind you, that one has not heard of for five years, although at one time his reputation was world-wide. You know him by name, no doubt. James-James, the man who wrote 'Stones of Great Value.'"

"James-James? I don't know him," said I.

"You don't know James-James?" cried Hawtree. "You have never heard of 'Stones of Great Value'?" He sprang to his feet, and his voice fairly shrieked with excitement. He took up the book, and showed me the number of editions it had run into, then threw it on the floor, and would have raved about the ignorance of the modern man of letters for the rest of the night, had I not calmed him.

"You must remember," I said, "that we are not all so well up in men and things as you are, and that we journalists have to discuss so many subjects in the course of the year, that it is not surprising that we forget about them all. Now sit down and calm yourself, and tell me all about it from beginning to end."

"It's a long story,' said Hawtree, sinking back in his chair, "but when a journalist comes to me, and tells me he has never heard of James-James, I certainly think it is time that I should refresh his memory for his own good. Besides," he continued, gradually getting under weigh, "it's a story of your own trade; the story of a great 'boom'; the first boom in literature of modern days. For it is only quite recently, you understand, that men took to making little wars on their own accounts, and exploring out-of-the-way lands, and writing books on the subjects, and making their fortunes in this way.

"The beginning of James-James' literary career, then," went on Hawtree, while I was feeling for my notebook and pencil, "was the orthodox beginning of famous writers. He threw up a good trade, invested in a garret, a ream of foolscap, and a shilling's-worth of ink and pens, and proceeded to waste them as fast as human hands could work. His stories went the orthodox round of publishing houses, and returned to him in the orthodox way, having gained nothing but a vast accumulation of dirt. He came to the end of his resources, starved for a day, and was just giving up in despair when an idea suddenly took birth in his mind, which he immediately put on paper and sent out on its travels. It returned to him, of course, and after living for half a year on his landlady's money he took it to the last publisher he could think of, who gave more hope than the others—all in the orthodox way.

"This publisher, you must know, had just set up business when James-James called on him, and had plenty of time in which to read stories by unknown authors, and plenty of knowledge in his trade to recognise a good investment when it came in his way.

"He promised to read Hawtree's novel, and let him hear in a day or two what he thought of it. He read through the story, and having satisfied himself that it might make a book under certain conditions, and that those conditions would never be realised, he sent round for its author.

"'This book,' he said, smiling sweetly at James-James as he stood expectantly before him, thus raising his hopes to the utmost, 'is a very good book, but,' he continued, dashing all hopes to the ground, 'would probably, under the ordinary conditions, have no sale at all.'

"James-James' face turned pale.

"'What do you say,' he stammered, 'it is a good book, and yet it would have no sale? How can that be?'

"'It is a book, you see,' replied the Publisher, 'that people would take no notice of unless it were forced under their eyes. In fact, it is a book that must be "boomed" to go. It must be forced along, shoved, hurried into attention, have some scandal raised about it, so that it can't be disregarded. Unless we can do that, all that remains for your book is this——' and the publisher kicked a new waste-paper basket in which he had invested, and James-James groaned aloud.

"When he had gone the Publisher lit a cigarette, and fell to considering again the manuscript that lay before him. And the more he thought about it the more he was determined that there was merit in the book, and merit, properly applied, that would not only make its author's fortune, but make him, the Publisher, both rich and famous. Then he wavered again, and determined that it was too risky a venture for a new publisher to undertake, and he threw away his cigarette, put the book aside, and began reading the morning paper.

"As he glanced down the columns a certain little paragraph caught his eye. It ran as follows: 'The Duchess of Dawsborough's jewels are not only the most beautiful, but among the most valuable in London at the present time. They are valued at £50,000, although the Duchess would not part with them for more than twice that sum. They have been in the family for a long while, and she looks upon them almost as sacred heirlooms.'

"Now, James-James' novel, 'Stones of Great Value,' was entirely founded on the idea of a great jewel robbery, and it was for this reason that the paragraph I have quoted caught the Publisher's eye. And the stones of great value of James-James' estimation were set down as being worth about the same amount as the Duchess of Dawsborough's jewels—and the jewels of the story also belonged to a duchess. All that was required to complete the resemblance between fiction and reality was for the genuine duchess to be robbed of her stones.

"The thought that it would be rather curious if this should happen by any strange chance occurred to the Publisher. And as he was thinking an idea came to him.

"He leant back in his chair, and closed his eyes, and the possibilities of the idea passed before him. Never for an instant did it leave his mind for the remainder of the day. He took it away with him at night, and thought of it, and dreamt of it—this great idea.

"On the following day he went through all the daily and weekly papers on which he could lay his hands, and every now and again he came across a little paragraph about the Duchess of Dawsborough's jewels. It was evident that these paragraphs, praising the beauty of the stones, estimating their great value, and declaring them to be the sacred heirlooms of an old family, were, one and all, written by one hand, and that hand, a woman's; none other, in fact, than that of the Duchess of Dawsborough herself.

"Having satisfied himself that Her Grace was striving very hard to advertise her jewels, for what purpose she alone knew, and always with his great idea in his mind, the Publisher set about finding out all that he could concerning the stones in question.

"It was not long before he discovered that Her Grace had purchased them from a leading merchant only a few months previously. He also discovered that the Duchess herself was an American heiress, who had followed the fashion of marrying a Duke for his title, and that now that he was dead she was trying her utmost to make her way into English society.

"All this fitted in very well with the plans that the Publisher had devised.

"Having come to this conclusion, he sent again for his friend the Author—for in their mutual lack of money, and their mutual desire to gain it, a kind of friendship had sprung up between them.

"James-James came—in a cab.

"For three hours the two men remained closeted, with their heads together, talking. Then James-James went out and ordered an oyster supper, while the Publisher swung round on his pivot chair, and wrote the smartest business letter that he had ever penned—a letter so forcible, cunning, and clearly put, that it could not fail to carry effect. Having read this through, and satisfied himself that it lacked nothing, he put it in an envelope, and addressed it to 'Her Grace the Duchess of Dawsborough.'

"The reply came by return of post in a scented, heavily-crested letter.

"'Dear Mr. Publisher,' it ran, 'Your letter to hand. What a funny idea! You had better come and have tea, and tell me all about it.—Yours sincerely, Dolly Dawsborough.'

"Accordingly, the Publisher went to tea that afternoon.

"He found the Duchess in a room that seemed literally to teem with silver; every other object seemed plated with gold. He trod on a carpet that sank like a bed of feathers beneath his feet. A large, American-looking hand was held out to him, almost covered with rings. He took it mechanically, and found a pretty, merry face above—a very jolly face for a Duchess.

"The Publisher recovered himself quickly. He immediately let off the compliment with which he had prepared himself on the way.

"'I am delighted to note,' he muttered, bowing low, 'by your letter that I received to-day, that the business qualities of the Duchess of Dawsborough are not less deserving of praise than her beauty.'

"Her Grace laughed merrily, and clapped her hands.

"'Now, that's real nice of you,' she replied, 'for I have always reckoned that I am about as smart a business woman as they make. Didn't I hook the Duke and his title within a fortnight, in spite of all the bets that were made at the clubs? Now he poor fellow, has been carried off by his gout, I am thrown on my own resources to get along as best I may.'

"'I notice,' said the Publisher, 'that your jewels have already become famous.'

"'That's so. When the Duke died I bought all the jewels and trinkets that I could find. That's what you English seem to admire more than anything else. A woman with jewels is bound to succeed. Though somehow,' added her Grace with a sigh, 'your society ladies don't exactly seem to rush to me with open arms.'

"'You must remember,' said the Publisher, 'that, famous as they are, everyone has not yet heard of your jewels.'

"'That's quite true. Say, Mr. Publisher, how am I to get them known?'

"The Duchess sipped her tea from a priceless little blue china cup, and looked meditatively over the rim at the Publisher.

"'It was for the purpose of telling you how to do that,' replied he, 'that I called this afternoon. If you will leave everything to me I will guarantee that within three weeks the Duchess of Dawsborough's jewels will be more talked about than any other jewels in London.'

"'La,' cried the Duchess, executing a pas de seul, 'and how much do you want for doing that?'

"'Only two little things. First, that you will promise not to allow your jewels to be seen by anyone until I tell you you may; second, that you will procure a dummy set before to-morrow.'

"'Done,' cried the Duchess. 'Anything else?'

"'In the afternoon I shall ask you to go for a drive. Before you go I want you to tell your secretary, steward, butler, anyone you like, that you are going to take your jewels to the bankers. Circulate it among your household, so that everyone is talking about it. Do you think you are a good enough actress to do all that without arousing suspicion?'

"'Rather!' The Duchess elevated her toe, and contemplated it. 'First an actress, then a millionairess, then a widow, then a duchess——'

"'Then,' added the Publisher, 'the first lady in English society; second only to the Queen herself.'

"'When will the fun begin?' she asked eagerly.

"'To-morrow evening,' said the other. 'But you must be very careful. How do you think these headings will look in the papers?'

"The Publisher produced some carefully written manuscripts, and laid them before the Duchess. The headlines were startling enough: 'The Duchess of Dawsborough's Jewels—Stolen—Valued at £50,000—The Duchess Inconsolable—Clever Robbery—No Trace of the Thief—Scotland Yard Baffled.' Following these were several striking accounts of the robbery, of the jewels, and the Duchess, sufficiently exciting to produce a flutter among the evening papers, to which they would be dispatched.

"The Duchess was delighted.

"'But what am I to do with my diamonds?' she inquired.

"'Bury them,' said the Publisher, 'or hide them somewhere where no one will find them. If anyone suspects it is a trick we shall be ruined for ever. I implore your Grace to be careful.'

"'You may trust me. Now, is there anything else I can do for you? A thousand or two don't make much odds to me, you know.'

"'Thanks. I certainly have a little scheme on hand that requires financing. I am going to publish my first book very shortly. As I told you in my letter it's all part of my scheme. The book deals entirely with a jewel robbery, and the jewels are supposed to be yours. When all the excitement is over, the book will be published, and everyone will read it. The whole affair, your Grace, is a gigantic boom; first for a duchess, then for an author, and lastly for a publisher. And it all requires financing.'

"'Well, how much do you want?'

"The Publisher named a modest sum. The Duchess promised to forward it, on receiving security that the Publisher would carry out his part of the bargain. After going through the scheme carefully once more he took up his hat and said good-bye.

"On the day following the one on which the Publisher called on the Duchess of Dawsborough, her Grace procured a dummy set of diamonds from a small jeweller.

"Having given her order she returned home, and gradually made it generally known among her household that in the afternoon she would take her jewels to the bankers.

"About one o'clock the imitation stones arrived, and her Grace sat down to as hearty a luncheon as ever a Duchess consumed. She ordered her carriage for half-past two.

"'Tell them to drive to the bank,' she said, as she stood on the steps. 'I am going to leave my jewel-box there.'

"'To the bank,' whispered the butler to the footman.

"'To the bank,' said the footman to the coachman, 'Her Grace is going to lock up her jewels.'

"And the carriage drove away.

"Apparently, however, the Duchess changed her mind, for she gave orders to be driven first to an outlying district, where it was imperative that she should pay some early calls.

"'I will go to the bank on my way home,' said she.

"In the meanwhile an incident had occurred at the Duchess of Dawsborough's residence. It seemed that the carriage had barely turned the corner of the street, when Her Grace discovered that she had left her jewel-box behind. She had apparently sent her footman running back to bring her the precious box, for a man, who, it afterwards transpired, was disguised in every particular as her footman, requested the butler to give him Her Grace's case, which, as he declared, she had left on her dressing-table.

"The butler ran upstairs, and found the box, and hastened with it to the footman, who hurriedly carried it away down the street.

"That, however, was the last that was ever seen of the rascal.

"About four o'clock the Duchess had finished her calls, and ordered: 'Home.'

"She was reminded by her servant that she had wished to call at the bank.

"'Oh, yes, to the bank,' she replied, and then: 'Why, dear me, I must have left my jewel-box behind. How careless! Well, I will take it to-morrow.'

"The Duchess had come out a long way to pay her calls, and it was nearly six before the carriage neared home.

"It was then she heard the newsboys calling her name in the street. 'The Duchess of Dawsborough's jewels,' they cried, 'stolen—valued at £50,000—clever robbery—evening paper!'

"She procured a copy, and the coachman, with a white face, galloped the horses homewards.

"Holding the paper as best she could with the jolting of the carriage, her Grace read the account of the imaginary robbery of her jewels, which, in reality, as she well knew, were snugly stowed away in the family safe. She smiled as she thought how smartly the Publisher had done his work.

"Her secretary met her at the door of the house and hastily began explaining things. A man, disguised as her footman, had discovered—how Heaven alone knew, 'although,' said the secretary, 'suspicion pointed to the butler as having helped him'—that her Grace had left her jewel-box behind her. He had received the box from the butler and had gone off with the stones. Another mystery—an account of the whole affair had appeared in the evening newspapers.

"Never, even in her ballet-girl days, had the Duchess acted so brilliantly as when she ordered her whole household up before her and questioned them as to the robbery of her jewels. All, however, to no effect. The mystery was as unexplainable as ever, and the Duchess left it to the police and the press to discover what they could.

"The latter took up the matter eagerly. It had come at a time when news was scarce, and the public seemed deeply interested in the jewel robbery. On the next day the papers that claimed to have discovered a clue sold like wild-fire. Some accused the butler, some the footman, others Her Grace's secretary of having stolen the jewels. Their movements were carefully watched by the police, but all with no result. The whole affair was as pretty a mystery as had ever puzzled the public, and the press made the most of it. The Duchess's jewels were being 'boomed' as jewels were never 'boomed' before.

"Three days later public interest was beginning to flag, for nothing new turned up.

"On the evening of the third day the Publisher and the Author met together over a little dinner in the former's rooms.

"Over the wine the Publisher remarked: 'To-morrow, I think I shall arrest you.'

"For a man about to be arrested, however, James-James appeared to take the matter very coolly.

"'You think it is the best time?' he remarked flicking the ash from his cigarette.

"'I think so. Public interest is beginning to flag a little. I will come about twelve, if you will be up by then. I want you to be gazing meditatively down the muzzle of a revolver, and to babble like a baby about a jewel robbery and a confession and suicide. Think you can manage all that?'

"'Easily,' said James-James; 'every author is three-parts actor.'

"'Good. I shall judge whether your arrest causes a sensation or not. If so, I shall leave things for a day or two before I have you released. Or if the magistrates are too sharp for us, and begin to suspect that it is all a put up affair, I shall hurry things on to a crisis. Anyway, you may rest assured that they won't keep you more than a day or two, for it wouldn't be safe to let them. By the way, you might as well copy out this confession now.'

"The publisher took a new book, uncut, and looking as though it had come straight from the press, called 'Stones of Great Value,' by James-James, and, opening it at a certain page, handed it to the author.

"On this page the principal character in the story confessed to having stolen the stones of the fictitious Duchess. 'Dear friend,' ran the confession, 'I can no longer live while another man is suspected of having committed a crime of which I am guilty. I have decided to solve two mysteries by blowing out my brains. For it was I who stole the Duchess's jewels. When this reaches you I shall be dead.' There was much more of the same kind, and at the foot of the confession were the initials 'J. J.,' which, should the page be found lying about loose, might either be taken for the name of the hero of the story or for James-James, the name of the author of the book. It might, indeed, be rather awkward for James-James if the confession of the hero in 'Stones of Great Value,' written in the author's own handwriting, and signed with his initials, should fall into the hands of the police at a time when the genuine Duchess of Dawsborough had really lost her diamonds.

"He began to copy out the confession on a piece of foolscap, so that it began at the top of the page, and ended with his initials at the bottom. When he had finished it he handed it over to the Publisher, who put it safely away.

"'To-morrow,' he cried, 'our plans will be reaching their fulfilment. We have boomed the Duchess' diamonds, and to-morrow you will be boomed, and three days later your book. Let us drink to unqualified success.'

"On the following day a man, dishevelled, waving a paper, rushed wildly into the nearest police-station to James-James' lodgings.

"'See,' he cried, 'here is a confession of the man who stole the Duchess of Dawsborough's jewels. Come and take him, quick, before he blows out his brains. A friend of mine, James-James by name, a bit of an author,' and before the astonished constables had time to realise the state of affairs, they found themselves being hurried along in a cab to James-James' rooms.

"The door was locked. A policeman put his shoulder to it, and burst it open. At a table, muttering incoherently to himself, was the author of 'Stones of Great Value.' To knock away the pistol, and to handcuff him, was the work of a moment.

"That evening the whole report of the thief's arrest appeared in the papers. Public excitement was again roused to its utmost. When the James-James trial came on the court was crowded.

"Nothing could be gained from the prisoner, for he could only mutter senseless words about a book and a confession. This confession was the sole evidence that there was against him. As the magistrates remarked, it seemed much more likely that either the butler or the secretary had done the deed. The magistrates were about to remand the prisoner for a week, in order that the police might make enquiries about the confession, the people were rising from their seats to leave the court, when something happened that drew every eye from the prisoner to the figure of a man who now appeared in the court, and caused a sensation that has not yet been forgotten by the police.

"'Your worships,' said a police inspector, stepping forward, 'I wish to make an important statement. This gentleman, a book publisher, informs me that the confession, on the strength of which the prisoner was arrested, is merely the stray leaf out of a novel he was writing. The poor gentleman, thinking, no doubt, that the Publisher had refused his work, had temporarily lost his mind, and this accounts for the reason why he was not able to clear himself from the ridiculous charge of robbery. The book, your worships, deals entirely with a jewel robbery, and is called 'Stones of Great Value.'

"And that," said Hawtree, "is the end of my story. The plot has gradually unfolded itself. The Publisher's great idea has worked itself out to the end. He had boomed the Duchess of Dawsborough's jewels; the Author's name was in every mouth; thousands of copies of the book were sold; Author, Publisher, and Duchess were made famous.

"As I told you, I met James-James to-day on the steps of the Empire, fat and well-fed. And what seems the most remarkable part of the whole affair to me is that this book, 'Stones of Great Value,' was once world famous, and is now almost totally forgotten."

It occurred to me, as I crept out of Hawtree's rooms at the break of day, that even this fact was not so remarkable as Hawtree's imagination.

VI.—The Man Who Spoiled Napoleon's Destiny.

From March 18th to May 20th, 1799—for more than sixty days and nights, that is—a little, half-forgotten, and more than half-ruined Syrian town was the scene of one of the fiercest and most dramatic sieges recorded in military history.

And rarely has there been a struggle so apparently one-sided. A handful of British sailors and Turkish irregulars were holding Acre, a town without regular defences against Napoleon, the most brilliant military genius of his generation, with an army of 10,000 war-hardened veterans, the "Army of Italy"—soldiers who had dared the snows of the Alps and conquered Italy, and to whom victory was a familiar experience.

In their ranks military daring had reached, perhaps, its very highest point. And yet the sailors inside that ring of crumbling wall won! At the blood-stained trenches of Acre Napoleon experienced his first defeat; and, years after, at St. Helena, he said of Sir Sidney Smith, the gallant sailor who baffled him: "That man made me miss my destiny."

It is a curious fact that one Englishman thwarted Napoleon's career in the East, and another ended his career in the West, and it may be doubted which of the two Napoleon hated most—Wellington, who finally overthrew him at Waterloo, or Sidney Smith, who, to use Napoleon's own words, made him "miss his destiny," and exchange the empire of the East for a lonely pinnacle of rock in the Atlantic.

Sidney Smith was a sailor of the school of Nelson and of Dundonald—a man, that is, with a spark of that warlike genius which begins where mechanical rules end. He was a man of a singular physical beauty, with a certain magnetism and fire about him which made men willing to die for him, and women who had never spoken to him fall headlong in love with him.

His whole career is curiously picturesque. He became a middy at the tender age of eleven; went through fierce sea-fights, and was actually mate of the watch when fourteen years old. He was a fellow-middy with William IV. in the fight off Cape St. Vincent, became commander when he was eighteen years of age, and captain before he was quite nineteen.

But the British Marine, even in those tumultuous days, scarcely yielded enough of the rapture of fighting to this post-captain in his teens. He took service under the Swedish flag, saw hard fighting against the Russians, became the close personal friend of the King, and was knighted by him.

One of the feats at this period of his life with which tradition, with more or less of plausibility, credits Sidney Smith, is that of swimming by night through the Russian fleet, a distance of two miles, carrying a letter enclosed in a bladder to the Swedish Admiral.

Sidney Smith afterwards entered the Turkish service. When war broke out betwixt France and England in 1790 he purchased a tiny craft at Smyrna, picked up in that port a hybrid crew, and hurried to join Lord Hood, who was then holding Toulon. When the British abandoned the port—and it is curious to recollect that the duel between Sidney Smith and Napoleon, which reached its climax at Acre, began here—Sidney Smith volunteered to burn the French fleet, a task which he performed with an audacity and skill worthy of Dundonald or Nelson, and for which the French never forgave him.

Sidney Smith was given the command of an English frigate, and fought a dozen brilliant fights in the Channel. He carried with his boats a famous French privateer off Havre de Gracel, but during the fight on the deck of the captured ship it drifted into the mouth of the Seine above the forts. The wind dropped, the tide was too strong to be stemmed, and Sidney Smith himself was captured.

He had so harried the French coast that the French refused to treat him as an ordinary prisoner of war, and threw him into that ill-omened prison, the Temple, from whose iron-barred windows the unfortunate sailor watched for two years the horror of the Reign of Terror in its last stages, the tossing crowds, the tumbrils rolling past, crowded with victims for the guillotine.

Sidney Smith escaped at last by a singularly audacious trick. Two confederates, dressed in dashing uniform, one wearing the dress of an adjutant, and the other that of an officer of still higher rank, presented themselves at the Temple with forged orders for the transfer of Sidney Smith.

The governor surrendered his prisoner, but insisted on sending a guard of six men with him. The sham adjutant cheerfully acquiesced, but, after a moment's pause, turned to Sidney Smith, and said if he would give his parole as an officer not to attempt to escape they would dispense with the escort.

Sidney Smith, with due gravity, replied to his confederate:

"Sir, I swear on the faith of an officer to accompany you wherever you choose to conduct me."

The governor was satisfied, and the two sham officers proceeded to "conduct" their friend with the utmost despatch to the French coast.

Another English officer who had escaped—Captain Wright—joined Sidney Smith outside Rouen, and the problem was how to get through the barriers without a passport. Smith sent Wright on first, and he was duly challenged for his passport by the sentinel; whereupon Sidney Smith, with a majestic air of official authority, marched up and said in faultless Parisian French:

Digitized by Google

"I answer for this citizen; I know him."

Whereupon the deluded sentinel saluted and allowed them both to pass.

Sidney Smith's escape from the Temple made him a popular hero in England. He was known to have great influence with the Turkish authorities, and he was sent to the East in the double office of Envoy Extraordinary to the Porte and Commander of the Squadron at Alexandria. By one of the curious coincidences which marked Sidney Smith's career, he became acquainted while in the Temple with a French Royal officer named Philippeaux, an engineer of signal ability, and who had been a school-fellow and a close friend of Napoleon himself at Brienne.

Smith took his French chum with him to the East, and he played a great part in the defence of Acre—Napoleon had swept north through the desert to Syria, had captured Gaza and Jaffa, and was about to attack Acre, which lay between him and his ultimate goal, Constantinople. Here Sidney Smith resolved to bar his way, and in his flagship the Tigre, with the Theseus, under Captain Miller, and two gunboats, he sailed to Acre to assist in its defence.

Philippeaux took charge of the fortifications, and thus, in the breaches of a remote Syrian town, the quondam prisoner of the Temple and the ancient school-friend of Napoleon joined hands to wreck that dream of a great eastern empire which lurked in the cells of Napoleon's masterful intellect.

Acre represents a blunted arrow-head jutting out from a point in the Syrian coast. Napoleon could only attack, so to speak, the neck of the arrow, which was protected by a ditch and a weak wall, and flanked by towers; but Sidney Smith, having command of the sea, could sweep the four faces of the town with the fire of his guns, as well as command all the sea-roads in its vicinity.

He guessed, from the delay of the French in opening fire, that they were waiting for their siege-trains to arrive by sea. He kept vigilant watch, pounced on the French flotilla as it rounded the promontory of Mount Carmel, captured nine of the vessels, carried them with their guns and warlike material to Acre, and mounted his thirty-four captured pieces on the batteries of the town. Thus the disgusted French saw the very guns which were intended to batter down the defences of Acre—and which were glorious with the memories of a dozen victories in Italy—frowning at them, loaded with powder and shot, and manned by British sailors!

It is needless to say that a siege directed by Napoleon—the siege of what he looked upon as a contemptible and almost defenceless town, the single barrier betwixt his ambition and its goal—was urged with amazing fire and vehemence. The wall was battered day and night, a breach fifty feet wide made, and more than twelve assaults delivered with all the fire and daring of which French soldiers, gallantly led, are capable. So sustained was the fighting that on one occasion the combat raged in the ditch and on the breach for twenty-five successive hours. So close and fierce was it that one half-ruined tower was held by both besiegers and besieged for twelve hours in succession, and neither would yield.

At the breach, the two lines of desperately fighting men on repeated occasions clashed bayonets together, and wrestled and stabbed and died, till the survivors were parted by the barrier of the dead which grew beneath their feet.

Sidney Smith, however, fought like a sailor, and with all the cool ingenuity and resourcefulness of a sailor. His ships, drawn up on two faces of the town, smote the French stormers on either flank till they learned to build up a dreadful screen, made up partly of the dead bodies of their comrades.

Smith, too, perched guns in all sorts of unexpected positions—a 24-pounder in the lighthouse, under the command of an exultant middy; two 68-pounders under the charge of "Old Bray," the carpenter of the Tigre—and, as Sidney Smith himself reports, "one of the bravest and most intelligent men I ever served with"—and yet a third gun, a French brass 18-pounder, in one of the ravelins, under a master's mate.

Bray dropped his shells with the nicest accuracy in the centre of the French columns as they swept up the breach, and the middy, perched aloft, and the master's mate from the ravelin, smote them on either flank with case shot, while the Theseus and the Tigre added to the tumult the thunder of their broadsides, and the captured French gunboats contributed the yelp of their lighter pieces.

The great feature of the siege, however, was the fierceness and the number of the sorties. Sidney Smith's sorties actually exceeded in number and vehemence Napoleon's assaults. He broke the strength of Napoleon's attacks by anticipating them. A crowd of Turkish irregulars, with a few naval officers leading them, and a solid mass of Jack Tars in the centre, would break from a sally port, or rush vehemently down through the gap in the wall, and scour the French trenches, overturn the gabions, spike the guns, and slay the guards.

The French reserves hurried fiercely up, always scourged, however, by the flank fire of the ships, and drove back the sortie. But the process was renewed the same night, or the next day, with unlessened fire and daring.

The French engineers, despairing of success on the surface, betook themselves to mining; whereupon the besieged made a desperate sortie and reached the mouth of the mine. Lieutenant Wright, who led them, and who had already received two shots in his sword-arm, leaped down the mine, followed by his sailors, slew the miners, destroyed their work, and safely regained the town.

The British sustained one startling disaster. Captain Miller, of the Theseus, whose ammunitions ran short, carefully collected such French shells as fell into the town without exploding, and duly returned them alight and supplied with better fuses to their original senders.

He had collected some seventy shells on the Theseus, and was preparing them for use against the French. The carpenter of the ship was endeavouring to get the fuse out of a loaded shell with an augur, and a middy undertook to assist him, in characteristic middy fashion, with a mallet and a spike-nail. A huge shell under his treatment suddenly exploded on the quarter-deck of the Theseus, and the other sixty-nine followed suit.

The two ingenious men disappeared into space, forty seamen, with Captain Miller himself, were killed, and forty-seven, including the two lieutenants of the ship, the chaplain, and the surgeon, were seriously wounded.

The whole of the poop was blown to pieces, and the ship was left a wreck, with fire breaking out at half-a-dozen points. The fire was subdued, and the Theseus survived in a half-gutted condition, but the disaster was a severe blow to Sir Sidney's resources.

As evening fell on May 7th, the white sails of a fleet became visible over the sea-rim, and all firing ceased, while besiegers and beseiged watched the approaching ships. Was it a French fleet or a Turkish? Did it bring succour to the besieged or a triumph to the besiegers?

The approaching ships flew the crescent! It was the Turkish fleet from Rhodes bringing reinforcements! But the wind was sinking, and Napoleon, who had watched the approach of the hostile ships with feelings which may be guessed, calculated that there remained six hours before they could cast anchor in the bay. Eleven assaults had been already made, in which eight French generals and the best officers in every branch of the service had perished. There remained time for a twelfth assault. He might yet pluck victory from the very edge of the defeat.

Lannes' grenadiers were tumbled headlong from the tower.

At ten o clock that night the French artillery was brought up close to the counterscarp to batter down the curtain, and a new breach was made. Lannes led his division against the shot-wrecked tower, and General Rimbaud took his grenadiers with a resistless rush through the new breach.

All night the combat raged, the men fighting desperately hand to hand. When the rays of the level morning sun broke through the pall of smoke which hung sullenly over the combatants, the tricolour flew on the outer angle of the tower, and still the ships bringing reinforcements had not reached the harbour.

Sidney Smith, at this crisis, landed every man from the English ships, and led them, pike in hand, to the breach, and the shouting and madness of the conflict awoke once more. To use Sidney Smith's own words "the muzzles of the muskets touched each other—the spear-heads were locked together."

But Sidney Smith's sailors, with the brave Turks who rallied to their help, were not to be denied.

Lannes' grenadiers were tumbled headlong from the tower, Lannes himself being wounded, while Rimbaud's brave men, who were actually past the breach, were swept into ruin, their general killed, and the French soldiers within the breach all captured or slain.

One of the dramatic incidents of the siege was the assault made by Kleber's troops. They had not taken part in the siege hitherto, but had won a brilliant victory over the Arabs at Mount Tabor. On reaching the camp, flushed with their triumph, and seeing how slight were the apparent defences of the town, they demanded clamorously to be led to the assault. Napoleon consented. Kleber, who was of gigantic stature, with a head of hair worthy of a German music-master or of a Soudan dervish, led his grenadiers to the edge of the breach, and stood there, while with gesture and voice—a voice even above the fierce and sustained crackle of the musketry—he urged his men on. Napoleon, standing on a gun in the nearest French battery, watched the sight with eager eyes—the French grenadiers running furiously up the breach, the grim line of levelled muskets that barred it, the sudden roar of the English guns, as from every side they smote the staggering French column

Vainly single officers struggled out of the torn mass, ran gesticulating up the breach, and died at the muzzles of the British muskets. The men could not follow, or only died as they leaped forward. The French grenadiers, still fighting, swearing, and screaming, were swept back past the point where Kleber stood, hoarse with shouting, black with gunpowder, furious with rage.

The last assault on Acre had failed! The French infantry, field artillery, and baggage silently defiled that night to the rear. The heavy guns were buried in the sand, and after sixty days of open trenches Napoleon, for the first time in his life, though not for the last, ordered a retreat!

Napoleon buried in the breaches of Acre not merely 3,000 of his bravest troops, but the golden dream of his life. "In that miserable fort," as he said, "lay the fate of the East." Napoleon expected to find in it the Pacha's treasures and arms for 300,000 men!

"When I have captured it," he said to Bourienne, "I shall march upon Damascus and Aleppo. I shall arm the tribes; I shall reach Constantinople; I shall overturn the Turkish Empire; I shall found in the East a new and grand empire. Perhaps I shall return to Paris by Adrianople and Vienna!"

Napoleon was cheerfully willing to pay the price of what religion he had to accomplish this dream. He was willing, that is, to turn Turk. Henry IV. said "Paris was worth a mass," "and was not the East," said Napoleon, "worth a turban and a pair of trousers?"

In his conversations at St. Helena with Las Cases he seriously defended this policy. His army, he added, would have shared his "conversion," and have taken their new creed with a Parisian laugh. "Had I but captured Acre," Napoleon added, "I would have reached Constantinople and the Indies; I would have changed the face of the world. But that man made me miss my destiny."

Las Cases dwells upon the curious correspondence which existed between Philippeaux, who engineered the defence of Acre, and Napoleon, who attacked it. They were, he says, "of the same nation, of the same age, of the same rank, of the same corps, and of the same school."

But if Philippeaux was, in a sense, the brains of the defence, Sidney Smith was the sword. There was, perhaps, it may be regretfully confessed, a streak of the charlatan in him. He shocked the judgment of more sober men. Wellington's stern, sober sense was affronted by him, and he described him as "a mere vaporiser." "Of all the men who I ever knew who have any reputation," Wellington told Croker, "the man who least deserved it is Sir Sidney Smith."

Wellington's temperament made it possible for him to understand Sidney Smith's erratic and dazzling genius. Napoleon's phrase is the best epitaph of the men who defended Acre. It is true Napoleon himself described Sidney Smith afterwards as "a young fool," who was "capable of invading France with 800 men." But such "young fools" are often the makers of history!

An Episode of Life

By the Author of "Dunsford," etc.

CHAPTER V.

On the Brink.

The next morning, and a dull, dreary, wet morning it was, Jack Sinclair, in the smoking-room at White's, was making pretence of reading the news. He found the paper more than usually dull and uninteresting. The world was out of gear for him. He knew Roy's obstinacy of old. Easy going, not readily moved in general, willing to let others decide for him as Roy was, he recognised that this time he was in earnest. Roy's parting words on the pavement last night ran through his mind and blurred perception of the print before him.

It was with no surprise that he heard quick, impatient steps behind him, and felt a firm, familiar grip upon his arm.

"Jack, old friend, I was a cad last night! I've come to apologise to you. We have been chums too long to quarrel. Forgive me, Jack!"

He wrote rapidly.

And Jack noticed that Roy looked tired and worn. His face was drawn, and though he laughed as if he expected a ready response, he was not at ease.

"Of course, Roy, let us say no more about it."

"Thanks! Come and sit over here. Join me in a brandy and soda—my head aches. Look here, Jack, this cannot go on! I must find Nelly, if only to say good-bye. I tell you my blood tingles at the thought that she is so near and I cannot see her. It is useless to talk to me of prudence, of duty, and so on. You are right, in a way, to try to keep us apart. I am reckless. You said I was mad. I am. But if I can tell her face to face that I am not the brute she must have thought me, if I can make my peace, I will be prudent. I will remember my wife. Do not drive me to desperation. In trying to find her I shall do more harm, compromise myself more, than by an interview of which no one would know. Put an end to this, tell me her address. Hang it, man, cannot you see how I feel?"

"Yes, I can, and it is just because I fear the consequences that I will not. Think of Mary; you are married."

"No need to remind me of that," sneered Roy, "her voice reminds me of that fact every time she speaks, and that is not seldom. I will only see her once, Jack. If she says 'Go,' go I will. Only once, I promise you."

This was exactly what Sinclair feared she would not do. He remembered Nelly's interest in Roy on the boat, and was certain that she would not be able to say "Go."

"I am stronger than you think," Roy proceeded rapidly, "if I make you a promise I will keep it. I must see her, but only to explain. That curt announcement in the Morning Post was so infernally cruel. I explained, in a way, by letter, but I never could write letters, and she must think me a brute, and everything low. If I could see her and get forgiveness I should be content."

"Roy, I cannot. She is out of your life; she leaves town to-day and will travel abroad"—he invented the lie. "Much better so. Write to her, and I will forward the letter."

"No, no; you take me to her. Be present all the time if you like."

"Nonsense! Don't mix me up in this; I will have no part in the comedy—or tragedy, for tragedy it will be. For Mary's sake, Roy, think! It will not be one interview. If it would end there—— But do not be a child."

"It shall be one meeting only, I swear! If she says 'Go,' I have already said it is finished."

"But," Sinclair interrupted, "if she does not say 'Go'?"

A light flashed in Roy's eyes. It was an incautious question in that it showed what Jack feared her purpose.

Roy answered quickly: "There can be no doubt about that; her love for me must be dead. I only want to clear myself."

The tone of his voice belied the words, and Sinclair, who was near to surrender, hardened.

"No, it is impossible," he said.

Roy Arbuthnot rose from the chair. He frowned angrily as he said coldly: "We have been friends for many years; I thought you would have helped me now. I will find her without you, and when I do, blame yourself for what may happen. I meant what I said. I would have seen Nelly once only; now I will go my own way. I will not quarrel with you, nor repeat the folly of last night, but you will not understand. It is useless to say more."

He turned and left the room.

Sinclair uneasily watched him as he went. Had he in attempting to do good done harm? Could he prevent this meeting? He would try. He would write to Nelly to warn her, to ask her, for the sake of all, to leave town for the present, and as quickly as possible.

He wrote rapidly, describing Roy's excitement, his evident love for her, of late dormant, but now awakened into full flame, and conjured her to keep out of his way. He pointed out the trouble which must ensue if they should meet. Perhaps, not an altogether wise letter, but, at any rate, written with good motives. He rang the bell, and then, not waiting for an answer to his summons, impatiently strode into the hall and gave the letter to the porter, telling him to call a District Messenger, and instruct him to deliver the letter at once.

As Sinclair passed through the doors into the street, Arbuthnot crossed the hall in time to hear the last words of the message he had given the porter.

He guessed at once that it was a letter to Nelly, probably to warn her, and to ask her to go away.

He must see the address. He told the porter to call a cab and to put up the large umbrella which was kept by him for the purpose. The rain beat down in fierce gusts, the porter, to enable him better to manage the unwieldy umbrella, placed the letter upon a small table which stood within the portico. Arbuthnot read the address on the envelope and sprang into the hansom, ignoring in his haste the shelter of the umbrella, which the porter held with difficulty. Leaning back as the window was lowered, he gave the cabman the address. He had triumphed so far, and more easily than he had expected.

On the way he wondered whether she still was known as Mrs. Denison. He had paid more attention to the address than the name. The impression was there that he had seen on the envelope: "Mrs. Denison, Hotel Dieu Donnée." Yes, he felt sure of it.

"Is a Mrs. Denison staying here?" he asked the porter. "Send up to ask if she will see me—Mr. Sinclair."

"Yes, sir," as the man departed on his errand.

Presently he was requested to follow a waiter, and mounted to the first floor.

As the door opened she came forward with both hands extended. "Jack! This is—Roy!" then mastering her surprise as the waiter lingered, she said with heightened colour and acted ease: "How do you do?"

Roy turned to the man, saying shortly: "You may go."

The waiter chuckled as he closed the door: "It ain't Jack, anyway."

"Roy, what does this mean? I ought to call you Mr. Arbuthnot, but I can't. Roy, is it kind?"

"Nelly, my darling—nay, do not look like that. I love you—I am wretched! I come to beg your forgiveness. Sinclair told me last night he had seen you, but would not give me your address. However, I found it out, I wanted you to know that I was not responsible for the cruelty of the past. To tell you how I had been forced into this thing. I asked Jack to let you know that. I could not write, I hadn't the pluck. I felt such a fool."

"He told me."

"I was driven, Nelly. I had no option. I have tried to live it down, tried to be cynical, to think, to persuade myself you would not care."

"Roy!"

"Yes, I know. I wanted to be a brute, to stifle thought, remembrance. You were away, I hoped—no, I didn't. I thought—I don't mean that, I tried to forget you, anyway. But I could not. Your image was always before me, your voice always in my ears. When I heard you were in London, all other ideas, all prudence went like the wind. I must see you, and here I am, Nelly. Will you forgive? I cannot live without you."

He tried to take her in his arms, but she shrank from him, holding out her hands in protestation.

He covered them with kisses, called her his love, his darling, vowing the world held for him but one woman. He begged her pity, if not her love. She had loved him once, could she not forgive?

"Roy! how hard you make it for me. Do you imagine I have no heart? I loved you, I shall never love another. You broke my heart. I schooled myself to be callous, and when I thought the lesson was learned—you come."

"What can I say? I loved you—I love you! Oh, yes, I know what you would say. If you could understand how I am punished, you would pity. Nelly, I appeal to you, forgive me!"

She sank into a chair and covered her face with her hands. Short, dry sobs shook her. It was a great temptation. She had told Sinclair she would set aside all ideas of a reconciliation, and here was a trial forced upon her on the morrow of her promise—a trial for which she was not prepared. Roy, standing by her side, passed his arm round her shoulders and drew her to him. She could not resist, and he kissed her. She started guiltily.

"No, Roy, not that. Give me time; let me think. Go now, please."

"May I come again?"

"No; better not. Let this be good-bye. It is too trying; it hurts us both. For my sake, Roy, go!"

"If I may come again. Only once, Nelly; I cannot go like this."

"Better not, Roy; much better not. I am wretched, spiritless, and, oh! so lonely. I cannot think; my head whirls. Leave me, leave me!" she pleaded piteously.

"This afternoon?" he whispered, as again he drew her to him. "This afternoon?" he repeated, as she remained silent, breathing quickly, and looking straight before her, where the meaningless pattern on the wall bewildered her with its confusion.

She had no strength of will to longer refuse. It had come so suddenly. If there had been warning, time to reflect, to consider, she would have steeled her heart, controlled herself, but as it was, although she murmured "No, no," he turned to leave, well content.

The door opened in his face and, there stood Mary. As he stopped dismayed, she looked him up and down with anger and jealousy contending. Her eyes blazed as she turned sharply to where Nelly stood, surprised at the intrusion. The two women faced each other, ready for war. Instinctively Nelly knew who this was, knew she was face to face with Roy's wife. But she was with her back to the wall; hers was not the nature to cringe and give way. All her combative instinct was aroused. She looked straight into Mary's eyes unflinchingly as the latter sneeringly said:

"So this is Nelly! I overheard you last night and followed you here, Roy. I never thought I need spy upon you, but this must be settled here on the spot. Who is this woman? What is she to you? You must choose between her and me."

Roy, not without difficulty, rose to the occasion. "This lady was a—friend—of mine before our marriage, I came here merely to wish her good-bye, she is going abroad."

"Choose, choose between us," answered Mary bitterly, "now, before it is too late."

Of course he answered that he would go with her. He had, he repeated, only come to the hotel to say good-bye.

"Then come with me," Mary answered drily as she swept to the door. And he went. Nelly had said no word. But a few minutes had elapsed between Mary's entrance and exit, and there had been no need.

The door had but just closed behind them when the waiter entered bearing a letter. It was that which Sinclair had dispatched from the club. Nelly took it mechanically. Her thoughts were far away. Where could this lead to? She had been weak when firm resolve would have saved them. She blamed herself for yielding. His handsome presence, the well-loved voice, pathetic in remorse, had carried her away. And for what? Pain and regret, nothing more. She had excused his conduct months ago, she had forgiven, and now she loved again. And how he loved her. It was pleasing to know that. Every word, every gesture, had betrayed his love; it was not necessary, but he had avowed it; she knew it was true.

And all in vain. One more meeting and they must part for all time. Roy would come to her again, she felt that he would come at all hazard now Mary had asserted herself, but it must be for the last time. Fate dealt hardly with her. Could she bid him go? Yes, she had pr[illegible]sed. She would keep her word, but how hard it was. With a shrug of impatience she opened Sinclair's letter, turning first to the signature, then, seeing from whom it came, she rapidly read the hurried lines.

It angered her, she dared not ask herself why. His advice was so evidently good, his warnings so clearly necessary, and, since Roy's wife had been there, more so than before. She felt she ought to do as he suggested, he was absolutely right. But! Ah! that but! There was sense, and just then she hated sense.

Inclination, love, pointed one way, and he said take the other, and she saw he feared her resolve, her power of will, and that was vexing, because, again, he had reason for doubt. How tiresome that he should advise as she did not wish. She could not hide from herself that she did wish differently. It was useless to attempt that. Blind animal instinct drew her one way; reason, cultivated reason, to the exactly opposite direction.

As she still sat twisting Sinclair's note in nervous hands, mentally discussing the problem, the door again opened and Sinclair entered.

Nelly met him half way. "I wanted to see you," she said eagerly.

"Jack, this time," the waiter muttered as he closed the door.

"I sent you a few lines, have you got them Nelly? Yes! Then I thought it best to come in person. I met Roy this morning as I told you, he swears he will find you."

"He has just left."

"Here? How did he find you out?"

"He didn't. He found me in."

"Oh! don't be flippant. This is serious."

"Yes, I know it is. Forgive my feeble joke, I am nervous, hysterical, and don't know whether to laugh or cry. Roy came before your note, and his wife followed. Yes, you may well start. She overheard something last night, and suspected. He wants me to see him again, too, Jack! what am I to do? She and he have just left, but he will come again, I know. It would be foolish to try to deceive you. I love him, he loves me. You say we must not meet again. I feel, I know you are right, but, oh! it is maddening."

"You know what I would say, Nelly, be brave. Cold, cold, you may call it, but refuse. You ruin him if you yield. His wife is not the woman to submit to slight. It is worse now that she knows. It is ruin, Nelly, to her, as well as to him; you do not wish that, I am sure. You see, I put you aside."

"Quite," she interrupted bitterly.

"I only do so to appeal to your generosity. I know you like Roy."

"Like!" she again broke in. "It is torture to me to hear you speak so coldly. Of course, you are worldly wise in treating me as of no account. I suppose—yes, I know—to the world I am beneath consideration. But I have feelings, even I, and something of a heart. You ignore, that. I am to suffer. You accept that as a foregone conclusion. I was brushed aside before. Do you think it does not hurt?"

"The pain will be more intense when the crash comes in the end, as come it will. It must be, Nelly. Face it now—it is a wrench, but get it over. Pack up your luggage and go. I can say no more."

"You mean well, Jack," she said more gently. "I thank you for unpalatable, but good advice. I must think. Good-bye!"

He felt he had not succeeded, but could say no more.

When he had gone, Nelly sat down to think.

The position seemed hopeless. Memory rushed back to their separation. How then she had tried to detain him by her side and failed. The scene in the tiny dining-room at the villa was a picture vividly impressed upon her brain. How she had believed the victory won. His reckless action in throwing the roses into the grate. She could hear the crash of the breaking glass now. His loving words, his delight at the prospect of a flight to the other side of the world. The whole scene stood out in sharp contrast to what followed. That was the pleasant side of the picture, that was the dream. How painful the awakening! She tried to put it aside, to think. What was to be her decision? It must be made to-day.

Roy's future rested with her; she had only to say "Come," and he would be ruined. The word startled her—it came unbidden. Ruin! Ruin! It seemed to blaze in fire before her eyes. She had merely toyed with the question so far, had allowed full play to memory, that pleasant memory of the villa; but now reason, cold, hard, cruel reason, said but one word—ruin. If to stay with her before meant ruin to Roy, doubly so would it be now. She tried hard to escape that truth—to say to herself that no one would know.

What was to be her decision?

Impetuously she sprang to her feet, and, pressing her hands upon her aching brows, exclaimed: "It must not be! I love him so, I cannot! Oh, God, if God there be, give me strength! Let me stifle feelings, love, everything. In mercy make me hard, cold, calculating. Yes, that is it—I must be calculating," she laughed bitterly; "calculating, I!" and left the sentence unfinished.

"I will plead to him for my sake," she mused. "Yes, that must be my line. Tell him it can only end in unhappiness for me—appeal to his generosity. How foolish of me to talk so! He was forced into a parting before, and would be again. Oh, what am I to say? Jack is right, of course; but it is hard. Ah, well, it is finished, and I must remain a waif and stray. My head aches; I must lie down, or when Roy comes he will think I have grown old and ugly."

As the short November day drew to its close, Nelly dressed with more than usual care, and waited nervously Roy's return. She was to be cold, unbending, but could not resist the pleasure of being pleasing to his eyes. He should see her at her best. It was to be for the last time. Standing before the mirror with brilliant electric lights on either side and above, she surveyed herself critically, and, after a pause, complacently. She was beautiful, and knew it. They were never to meet again; for the last time let him see her to advantage.

And as Roy entered, he exclaimed involuntarily: "How lovely you look, Nelly. More beautiful than ever. I am not really to lose you, am I? Don't break my heart, Nelly."

"It must be, Roy. For your sake, for mine, we must not meet."

"Nelly, I implore you. In thought I am with you always. Cannot you have some pity?"

"Roy! how you tempt me! but you should not. Your duty to your wife, your family."

"Yes, yes, I know. I will consider all that, I will take every care. No one shall know that I see you. Nelly, if you send me away now I shall do something foolish. I am desperate, childish, anything you like to call me. My dear, I swear I love you, but you know that. You are the only woman the world holds; if I lose you again I care for nothing. Nelly, dearest, do not be cruel," and he took her in his arms, crushing her to him as he kissed her passionately.

Now she no longer resisted. Her resolve to be firm and cold was swept away by his impetuous pleading. It had been at best but a make-belief, and shivered into atoms before his passion.

She had said she would appeal for her sake to his manhood—his consideration. Now the thought never crossed her mind. Reason had decreed that this would ruin him, now reason was thrust into the background.

Happy in the moment, returning love for love, the future, like the past, forgotten, the die was cast, prudence was ignored.

(To be concluded.)

THE GREEN MOROCCO PURSE.

A DARK-HAIRED girl in a white jersey, with a red ribbon round her neck, sat at the window of a small cottage situated in the village of Twyford. The street on which the cottage faced was narrow and dark, and the room in which the girl sat was clean, but poorly furnished.

She was very sweet and pretty, and looked as much out of place in her dingy, mean surroundings as a moss rose in a London garden. Her brown eyes were clouded, and she spoke in a weary tone to a patient-looking old lady, who sat in an armchair by the fire—for there was a small fire, although it was a hot afternoon in September.

"It's no use, mother," said Nita with a sigh. "We have not got the money, and we are not likely to get it either."

"I wonder, my dear, if you were to go to Reading with a letter to old Mr. Davis, perhaps he would give me the money."

"I don't believe it, and I don't want to go to Reading, and I hate old Davis!" cried the girl petulantly. "I'll go on the river instead; Mr. Barnes will lend me a boat."

She rose and began looking behind the coal-scuttle for her hat. It was the place she usually threw it when she came in. Mrs. Hastings sighed heavily. The sum wanted was only £20, but to these two lone women it was as unobtainable as two millions.

It was owed for rent long overdue, and Nita had been to the landlord with tears in her pretty brown eyes, and begged for time, but now they were unavailing, and the money had to be found within fourteen days.

"Dear Mr. Barnes, let me go for a row," she said some few minutes later, sidling up to the boat owner.

He had a great weakness for pretty Miss Hastings, and his wife declared he would give her his pony and traps and all his business if she but asked for it.

"Let me have the Elfie—may I?" she continued, indicating a lovely little boat fresh from the painter's hands.

"Not that one, missy," replied Mr. Barnes. "She 'ave just come from Lonnon this day mornin', she 'ave—you take 'er, missy—she's good, she is," and he helped her into another boat of somewhat less charming exterior.

If she looked pretty on shore, the girl in the white jersey looked ten times more so on the water. But it was not of her appearance she was thinking. The fact of their wanting £20, and there being only 1s. 6d. for the next day's dinner, occupied her mind much more; and the sun was declining when she turned the boat homeward, still undecided as to whether it should be stewed steak or "a little fish to make up."

Suddenly coming towards her round the bend of the river, she saw another boat with a single occupant—and that occupant a man. As it came closer she recognised the boat as the Elfie, with her freshly-varnished sides bravely glittering in the sunlight.

"Pah!" said Nita in disgust. "Some horrid tourist down for a couple of hours, who can afford 9d. an hour." But when he came closer she altered her opinion. The man in the boat was Theodore Clements, whose father, the rich diamond merchant, had taken the Grange for the season.

As the boats passed, Mr. Clements bestowed a stare of hearty admiration on the girl in the white jersey, and she looked down and blushed, and hated herself for so doing.

Some hours later he passed her again. It was in the narrow village street, while she was out thoughtfully expending her 1s. 6d. She had dropped her handkerchief, and he ran after her and gave it back, and raised his hat and asked if he might help her carry her parcels home as they lived almost next door, but she curtly thanked him, and hurried home, uncertain as to whether he had not first taken her handkerchief from her pocket and then given it to her!

The next day Mrs. Hastings was firm. Nita must go to Reading with a letter to Mr. Davis. She put it off as late as she could, and finally departed, very much out of temper.

"It is a shame," she grumbled, "wasting a beautiful day like this hunting about for a horrid old man, and I know that I am no more likely to get the money from him than I am of seeing it opposite to me in this carriage."

Just at that moment she caught sight of a glitter between the opposite seat and the stuffed back of the carriage. She was alone in the compartment, so bending forward, she put out her hand to feel what it was.

The next moment she had drawn out a heavy green morocco purse!

For quite a minute she stared in stupefaction at the sight, and then with a beating heart she undid the clasp.

There lay before her £25 in gold and a lot of loose silver. If the skies had fallen, Nita would not have been more astonished. She rubbed her eyes and stared at the money, and then rubbed her eyes again. For fully three minutes she sat thus holding the money in her hands, and then came the queston: "What to do with it?"

Should she give it to the guard when the train stopped and have it taken to the lost property office, and perhaps never be claimed? or, perchance, had Heaven sent it to pay the rent; therefore, should she keep it? Nobody being present to answer her self-put questions, she arrived in Reading station, and straightway she put the money in her pocket and walked swiftly away, resolved at present to keep it and see what happened. Mr. Davis was out, and was not expected back; so, heavy hearted and with a guilty sensation of theft upon her, Nita journeyed home, expecting every moment someone to put his hand on her shoulder, and ask her where she got the money from. She knew she ought to give the purse up, but she was very poor, and she yielded to temptation, as so many have done. The next few days were those of the keenest agony to the poor girl. Every step that passed the house she expected to belong to the constable, and every knock at the door sounded like a summons from Reading Police Court.

She stayed indoors as much as she could, for she was afraid to meet the eyes of the townspeople, and was also afraid of hearing something about the purse, for common-sense told her nobody would be likely to lose a large sum like that and make no inquiries.

At last, a week later, came a curt and cold refusal from Mr. Davis, together with a peremptory notice from the landlord to pay the rent the next day. Mrs. Hastings alternately wept and prayed for the money, and at last Nita set her little teeth, and said to herself: "Very well, I will take the money; I am a thief, I suppose, but I shall not be alone in the world. I'll take him that money to-night, and then—and then! What?"

Her thoughts took her no further, how she was to account for the sudden accession to wealth she could not fathom, so, woman-like, she left it alone, hoping for Luck to help her out when the time should come.

Having decided upon her course of action, she felt easier, and sallied forth to buy some small household requisites, humming to herself.

Having made a tour of the village and made her purchases, she went home again.

The little house was silent. Poor Mrs. Hastings had gone out, to see if a friend would help her to find the money. Nita put away her parcels and sat down, and having nothing better to do, idly read the stale country news out of the paper that the candles had been wrapped in.

All at once a small paragraph caught her eyes, and the print danced madly before her! She held on to the table for support, and after a moment managed to read the following:

"Yesterday, Mrs. Maria Higgins charged a young man of gentlemanly appearance with the theft of her purse. Her case was, that she and the accused were the sole occupants of the carriage from H—— to Reading. The purse, which contained the sum of £25 in gold besides some silver, was in her hand as she entered the carriage, because she took her ticket from it.

"On the arrival of the train at Reading she found the door too stiff to open, and asked the accused if he would open it. This he did, and also helped her to alight, and it was then that she found her purse was gone. The accused is a gentleman of high social standing in the county, and the case is exciting a good deal of interest, as although he stoutly denies the theft it is understood he has been losing a good deal lately over horse racing. He stands remanded until next Tuesday."

Next Tuesday? Nita raised her eyes to the ceiling and counted the days over. Heavens, "next Tuesday" was to-day; and perhaps even then, while she sat there, some innocent man was being tried for the theft of the purse that she—Nita Hastings—had got in her possession!

Like one possessed she dashed upstairs, and, throwing on her hat and jacket, fled down the street to the railway station, the green morocco purse tight in her hand. The Reading train (there were but three a day) was just starting as she ran over the bridge and called loudly to the guard to wait for her.

He opened a smoking third, threw her in, and the train started. Nita sank exhausted upon a seat, and gazed helplessly at the purse. "Poor man! perhaps he has been convicted and sent to prison, and if he is married, the disgrace may kill his wife! Merciful Heaven! I shall then be a murderess as well as a thief!"

Poor Nita, this last thought nearly distracted her. The train had scarcely time to draw up ere she sprang from the carriage, and was away across the station and down the street towards the Court-house. A large number of idlers were outside.

Clasping the purse tightly against her beating heart, Nita wedged her small figure through the people into the crowded court room.

A loud humming sounded in her ears and she but indistinctly heard someone speak ng: "Now it only remains to decide if the prisoner is the thief——"

"He is not—he is not!" cried Nita, stepping forward and holding the purse high in the air, at sight of which an old woman in green glasses and a blue bonnet shrieked out: "My purse! My purse! Oh, the hussy!"

What a scene there was, and what a noise!

It was not until they threatened to clear the court that Nita's story could be heard.

The poor girl, so excited and so nervous, could hardly speak, and when the magistrate asked her why she had not given the purse up before, she could not answer at first, but on being pressed, she raised her pretty little head proudly, and said:

"Because I am poor, and my mother is poor, and we wanted the money. I did not steal it, I found it, and was tempted to keep it. I only knew an hour ago that an innocent man" (she waved her hand vaguely towards the dock where she saw a man standing) "was accused of taking the money, so—so I have brought it back, although to-morrow my mother and I will be turned into the street without a home, for want of it!" and she burst into tears.

Then someone took her out of the court and into the open air. She sat down on a seat to recover, and curious knots of people gathered round to look at her, especially two rough-looking men, who said they would like to see what a woman was like who would bring £25 back to oblige an unknown person! It was wasting the gifts of providence, according to them!

Then someone gave her his arm and assisted her into a beautiful carriage, wherein was an old gentleman. At sight of her he seized her hand and shook it fervently before everybody and said: "God bless you, my child, you have saved my life and the honour of my family, for had my son been convicted the disgrace would have killed me!"

Nita, still dazed, looked at the old gentleman, and wondered when she had seen him before?

A young man jumped into the carriage, and, raising his hat to the people who gave a cheer at sight of him, the carriage started.

Nita turned round. The young man was Theodore Clements!

"You here?" she said involuntarily.

"Rather!" he said with a laugh. "If it hadn't been for you, there's no knowing where I should have been."

"Why?" she said, looking mystified. "I don't understand; were you in there?" indicating the Court-house.

"Was I there? Don't you know it was I who was accused of stealing that purse?"

* * * * *

And the villagers even now say that the wedding between Mr. Clements' only son and Miss Nita Hastings was the prettiest that has ever been seen.

THE BLACK SHAITAN.

Calmly and swiftly the huge Empress of India clove her way through the glassy Red Sea. The sun beat down with a relentless intensity, defying every attempt to keep the decks cool, even by the aid of elaborate awnings.

The air literally quivered as though on the verge of combustion; the ship's sides were burning hot, for the fierce rays, pouring down from the pitilessly blue sky, were reflected back by the still surface of the salt sea. Passengers were prostrate in their cabins, seeking shelter, and longing for rain, wind, or sudden death.

Invalids from the scorched-up plains of India, young mothers with their little children, all homeward bound, lay smitten by the fiery darts, gasping for air, wondering whether it would not have been better to have succumbed to fever before they had embarked.

Only one individual seemed utterly indifferent to the heat, though perhaps Captain Jack Clanton, as he reclined in a hammock-chair on deck right through the frightful day, dreamily gazing ahead, was the most affected by it.

He sat thus for hours, until the sun had dipped low on the horizon, inducing some of the more energetic passengers to venture a move from their cabins. Clanton brightened when he heard a joyous childish voice in the saloon, and when he saw the slender, white-clad form of a small maiden emerge on deck, he clapped his hands and called out to her quite gaily.

She was a delicate little thing, with a pale face and rather sunken blue eyes, and a wealth of golden hair. She ran to her friend, and seating herself at his feet, began a merry conversation, plentifully dotted with exclamations and endless questions.

Presently, groups of men and ladies came and installed themselves in lounging chairs under the awning, awaiting their afternoon tea. Three ladies passed Captain Clanton.

The little girl rushed up to one of them, calling out "Mamma." The mother bent down to kiss the uplifted bright face, and then said a few kind words to the Captain, who, however, answered but gruffly.

"What a bear that man is, Mrs. Mordant," said one of the ladies, as they passed on. "You ought not to let little Muriel be so much with him; she is sure to pick up such dreadful manners."

"I think he must be a little mad," added the third lady. "My husband told me many funny stories of his eccentricities."

"Well, it is a very sad story. We have known Captain Clanton for years; in fact, my husband knew him as quite a lad."

"Wasn't there some romantic story about a flirtation, and a girl in the hills who jilted him?"

"No, no; you must not talk like that! It is quite true that he was engaged to his cousin; you know General Cavendish's charming daughter, whom all the men raved about. The girl was much younger than Captain Clanton, who had seen her grow up under his uncle's roof. But she died, and the poor fellow felt the shock terribly. He says Muriel is just as Mary Cavendish was. That is why the child can manage him so well, I suppose."

"Yes, dear; but surely there was some tale going about Miss Cavendish having treated him badly?"

"The poor girl died of cholera."

The answer was slightly inconsequential, but Mrs. Mordant looked as though she wished to change the conversation. Her friends equally plainly showed that they were very far from being satisfied, so presently she spoke again:

"You see, poor Jack was always terribly jealous, and he believes his jealousy killed the girl he loved. Mary was a very lovely girl, who attracted attention wherever she went; and though she was thoroughly loyal to Captain Clanton, yet she could not help showing how much she appreciated admiration. As a rule, Jack's fits of jealousy were soon over, for Mary was really indifferent to all her admirers save her cousin. But last year an Imperial Russian prince came touring through India, and spent some time with General Cavendish. Among the Prince's staff was a very handsome, dark-visaged Khan from Asia, who held a post in the Russian army, and was made much of by his master. The Khan was a young man, partly civilised, having acquired a little of the veneer of Petersburg society. He quickly evinced a deep infatuation for Mary, who, on her part, merely treated him as one of her father's special guests.

"The first real quarrel between the two lovers was about this Khan. Jack hated his handsome face, his graceful horsemanship, and his Russian veneer of sneering, insincere politeness. He resented his admiration for Mary, and let her see it. Mary was greatly offended. She looked upon the Khan as a mere 'black man'—a being inferior to herself and friends—and felt Jack's jealousy as an insult. That Jack should be jealous of his fellow-officers, or even a simple civilian, was pardonable, but to be jealous of a 'black man' was quite different. At the same time he was her father's guest, and so she owed him some attention. Perhaps Jack's behaviour made her unconsciously more gracious to the Khan, and an estrangement grew up between the young people.

"It had been arranged that the General should take the Prince and his retinue on a hunting expedition, and that Mary was to remain behind with the Colonel's wife. But the quarrel with Jack made her alter her mind. She determined that she would go with her father, inducing several of the officers' wives to join the expedition. This only enraged Jack, and the more he showed his anger, the more determinedly did she overcome her father's objections and insist on carrying out her new plans.

"The party started for the hills, and soon after news reached us that there was illness among the General's party. We next heard that it was cholera, that several people had died of it, and that the Prince had bolted with his staff. Jack at once obtained leave and rode off to the hills. But he arrived too late. Mary had been seized with the dreadful malady and been carried off in a few hours. When Jack arrived the funeral was over.

"Whether it was the terrible shock or the long ride under the burning sun, Jack fell down in a kind of fit, and for days he was raving in bed. He kept calling Mary, talking of her as though she were still a little child. Then he would heap curses on the head of the 'Black Shaitan,' as he called the Khan. When Jack got better he volunteered for active service in one of our little frontier campaigns.

"But Captain Clanton has never been the same man since his illness. At times he has acted very strangely. He used to be kind to the natives, but he suddenly grew quite cruel and vindictive. Then he drank heavily, and at last had to get invalided home. We all hope that the change will set him up again. Certainly Muriel seems to have a good influence over him."

"But, my dear Mrs. Mordant, he is mad! I certainly should be afraid to leave a child of mine with such a man. Why the doctor told me that the other day Captain Clanton knocked down the ship's barber, poor inoffensive fellow, who was doing nothing, and called him a black devil, and all kinds of dreadful names."

"Yes. I told you he has contracted an unreasoning hatred for the natives."

Then the three friends chatted eagerly about Anglo-Indian ways, and the odd notions of certain generals and commissioners and their wives, until it was time for dinner, when they trooped back into the saloon.

Meanwhile, Captain Jack and little Muriel remained on deck. The Captain did not care for dinner, so he called for brandy and soda. By the doctor's orders Captain Clanton was only served by the stewards with a very little whisky in a great deal of mineral water, but on this night one of the under stewards either forgot his instructions, or wishing to avoid dancing attendance on the Captain, brought him a decanter of strong brandy and placed it on a table by his side.

Jack tasted the fiery liquor, and his craving for alcohol came back to him. He poured out the brandy, diluted it but slightly, and drank it off in great glassfuls. His companion's artless prattle seemed to move him deeply.

Poor Captain Jack had all his wits about him then; the misery of his loss, the dread of the long, dreary future, appalled him. How hard fate had been! His was to have been a life of endless joy with the girl he loved so well, and then his own accursed temper had wrecked everything. The past was full of woe, the future full of terrors.

Men called him mad. Well, yes, undoubtedly he was mad; that dull pain in the head, his cruel hate of every being who seemed capable of joy, his long hours of darkness, when there was no thought left, only a swift-recurring change of blood red with pitch-black before his eyes—that was madness, or the beginning of it.

And Jack's trembling hand poured out yet another glass and he drained it. Poor little Muriel, he thought; was her end to be the same as Mary's? Was a cruel fate, a "Black Shaitan," to cross her path, too? Thoughts crowded on his brain which nerved him to fresh visits to the brandy bottle, and to forget the presence of Muriel. His sufferings were far too intense for outward incidents to arrest his attention.

Neglected Muriel stole quietly away from her moody friend, and presently she encountered one of the Indian servants, the ship's barber, who was arranging chairs and cushions close beside the companion ladder; the little lady began to chat with him. The gentle Hindoo was only too delighted to grin and talk with this beautiful daughter of a great Mem Sahib.

Captain Jack had finished his brandy, his misery had fled, but his brain was on fire. Muriel had vanished, and he went in search of her. Presently he saw her little white figure and walked unsteadily towards her.

As he did so, the barber, perhaps with sore recollections of former rencontres, got up from his haunches and moved stealthily away. With a yell of "Black Shaitan!" Captain Jack darted forward, caught Muriel in his left arm, and with his right, jerking out from the shoulder, caught the black barber under the jaw, sending him headlong down the companion ladder. There was a vast hubbub all at once.

The Captain was surrounded by his friends and forcibly taken below to his cabin. He was raving in the paroxysms of delirium tremens. The doctor came, shook his head, and declared that all would be over before morning—the Captain's hours were numbered. He could do nothing there, but his services were urgently needed elsewhere, and so he went.

As the night advanced, Jack became calmer, and some of his friends went off, leaving two of the youngest subs to watch him. Then Jack regained his senses a bit, and kept moaning for a drop of brandy. His comrades tried to soothe him, but the moan: "Brandy! brandy!" went on without remission.

"Fetch the doctor, do, old chap," said one of the watchers; "I know plenty of 'Pills' say that a fellow who is bad ought to have a drop to keep him up."

Jack kept up his moan: "Brandy! brandy!"

"Poor devil, he's only an hour or two to live; seems beastly hard to torture him like this."

One of the young fellows went out in search of the doctor, but that worthy could not come, and merely said that no alcohol was to be given.

"Brandy! brandy! brandy!" came from the parched lips of their fever-tossed comrade.

"Go to the steward."

But the steward had grown alarmed at his previous indiscretion, and he refused. The moaning was piteous, and at last one of the subs went out on a raiding expedition. Everyone refused him the spirits he asked for, and he could find none in the cabins. As he was passing by one of the state-rooms Mrs. Mordant came out, and she asked after her poor friend. While he was answering her the young fellow caught sight of a bottle of eau-de-Cologne. He begged her to let him have it.

"I've tried to get a drop of liquor for the poor chap everywhere, and can't. Let me have that. It'll be a mercy to the poor beggar, and can't do him any harm, for the doctor said he couldn't last till morning."

After much persuasion Mrs. Mordant gave the bottle, which was carried off triumphantly. They gave the patient a few drops in a glass of water. It seemed to refresh the dying man. He lay back with a gasp as though he were going to sleep. One of the watchers said he would take a turn on deck, seeing that all was quiet, and would come back and relieve his friend. But Jack did not go to sleep.

He watched his opportunity, and when he saw he could safely do so, he stretched out his arm, took hold of the bottle of eau-de-Cologne, and emptied it down his throat. Then he leaned back, exhausted. The stillness misled the inexperienced nurse, who, seating himself on a chair, dozed off.

By this time the spirituous essence was burning Jack up. He felt on fire, his brain was in a horrible whirl, ten million demons surrounded him, mocking and insulting, while they dug their burning claws into his living flesh, and tore him into ribbons. He could not do battle with them, for they were so much stronger, more cunning than he; but he would try to get away.

Slowly and painfully he rose, trying to brush aside the demons and their attendant imps with his feverish hands. Stealthily he crept to the cabin door, despairingly pressing forward to escape the infernal crew, and made his way on deck.

It was a moonless but starlit night, black masses of deck houses and rigging cast dense shadows on the snowy p anks. Suddenly the demons left him, all but one, who perched on his head, digging great claws into his temples, for there before him stood his guardian angel, his little white-clad Mary, with a glowing radiance about her tossing curls.

She seemed to beckon to him, and he went. Then he stood still and frantically tried to clutch the fiend on his head, for between him and his angel came the grinning Black Shaitan. As he hesitated, the legion of devils swarmed about him again, tearing him to pieces, while the chief, the Black Shaitan, advanced towards the angel Mary, gibbering and salaaming. With a yell that awakened every soul on board, Captain Jack dashed forward, upsetting the mild Hindoo barber, and seizing terrified little Muriel in his strong arms, plunged overboard.

Cries and hurried orders were heard on all sides. The engines were reversed and the ship stopped. Boats were lowered, and search-lights flashed over the phosphorescent waters, but poor demon-tormented Captain Jack, and his guardian angel, Muriel, were never seen again of man.

Amongst the Killed.

A man of method was old Mr. Staples. He always came down to breakfast at the same time, and always expected to find his daughter at the table before him, so that he could begin his meal without any preliminary skirmishing.

Breakfast over he would produce a battered old briar, and sit down for half-an-hour or so over the Standard.

He was a widower. His daughter Janet looked after him, though, truth to tell, he did not want much looking after, for a more independent old gentleman it would have been hard to find.

It was a fine spring morning. Mr. Staples finished his breakfast, produced his pipe, got out his paper—all according to rule.

"The situation in the East—murder in Yorkshire—speech by the Premier—ah-um, yes. Dear! dear! Janet my dear, there's some more fighting in South Africa; I wonder if Roger—Good Heavens!" The old gentleman suddenly dropped the paper as though it had been a living coal, and springing to his feet, gazed at his daughter with a face almost piteous in the intensity of its horror.

In an instant Janet had caught his alarm. Her face paled.

"Father, father!" she cried, "what is it?"

The old man pulled himself together. He put his arm round his daughter: "My dear, my dear," he said "the Lord giveth, the Lord taketh away, ble——" but he got no further, for in a moment Janet had broken loose from his grasp, and snatched up the fallen newspaper. "Roger!" she cried; "Roger, he is hurt! Oh, father, where is it?"

But as she spoke, her quick eyes caught the passage that had caused her father's cry of anguish, those few simple words that meant so much to her:

A Brush With The Matabele.

. . . . Amongst the killed are George Smith, Roger Furneaux—

The words danced before her eyes. Another moment she had fainted.

* * * * *

Roger Furneaux sat in his comfortable office in Johannesburg. He felt particularly happy that morning. Things were going exceptionally well with him, so well indeed, that at the present rate it would be a case of good-bye to the Cape in a few months or so, and then hurrah for home and Janet.

He leaned back in his seat and gazed out through the window at the steel-blue sky. He wondered what Janet was doing at that moment. An idea suddenly came to him. He would go home and surprise her as soon as ever he had finished his "money grubbing." He had as yet told her no word of his unexpected good fortune, how he had so miraculously "made his pile." He pictured her joy. At that moment came a knock at the door.

"Come in," he cried.

The door opened and a man entered, a big, brawny, bearded fellow, with a battered straw hat upon his head, clad for the rest in garments which a scarecrow would have felt ashamed to wear.

Furneaux regarded his strange visitor with evident surprise; the man hesitated a moment. A mirthless laugh escaped him.

"Furnie!" he said.

Roger sprang to his feet. "Furnie" had been his nickname at school: "who——"

Again the man uttered his mirthless laugh. "You don't know me?" he said bitterly. "I'm Jack Playfair!"

"Jack Playfair!" In an instant Furneaux had hold of the big man's hand. "Jack! Jack!" he cried, "what are you doing here?"

"What many another ne'er-do-weel is," answered the other recklessly, "nothing! I am off to the veld to-morrow, and I looked in to see you for auld lang syne's sake, and also——" he hesitated, "to beg an old suit of clothes, if you have such a thing."

"Why, of course, man," answered Furneaux, "but you must stay here a bit with me. Why must you go off into the wilds?"

But the other stopped him.

"No, no, Furneaux. I am a failure. I am beyond all that sort of thing. Let the past be the past. I shouldn't have looked in to worry you now, only"—his voice broke— "I wanted to see an old face. I've come a cropper. So say no more."

Neither could Furneaux shake him from his purpose. All Playfair would allow his old schoolfellow to do was to fit him out from his wardrobe. He would have no pecuniary help. The next day they parted for ever.

* * * *

Six months had gone by since that morning when Janet Staples learned that she had lost her lover, and in that short time the colour had died down from her cheeks, and dark shadows had formed round her sad blue eyes.

It had never occurred to her to doubt the truth of that meagre statement in The Standard. Why should it have? There could not be two Roger Furneauxes in South Africa. Besides, she had had no letter from him since that date. He would surely have written to her had he been alive. Poor child, how could she know of his plan to take her by surprise?

But one evening came a ring at the bell, a furious, impatient peal. Then a man's voice asking for her. The colour rushed to her cheeks.

Who could it be? She heard the front door open. That voice!

The door of the sitting-room was flung open. The next moment she was in Roger's arms, neither did she swoon away, as is fashionable in novels on such occasions, or shrink back in alarm for fear that it was a ghost. She said nothing. It was only after the joy of the first embrace that she ventured to speak.

"I thought you were dead, Roger," she said, and then her lover had to kiss the tears away—tears of utter joy.

The truth soon came out.

Poor Jack Playfair had gone out into the veld, there to fall a victim to a Matabele assegai. There had been nothing to identify him—nothing save the marking upon his clothes, so that in the hastily-dug grave, far away on the South African veld, the supposed remains of Roger Furneaux still lay in their last rest.

There was but one other explanation. Roger's silence. Why had he not written?

"I wanted to surprise you, darling," he said. "I knew you didn't expect me to make my fortune so soon. So I said nothing. I only worked on, and looked forward to the time when I should be able to come home and claim you. How I wish now that I had let you know my plans!"

The door of the sitting-room was flung open.

There was no need for them to wait longer. They were married. At the present they are living in London. And old Mr. Staples lives with them.

Over Roger's writing-table hangs a newspaper cutting, framed in black oak, the brief record of that Matabele skirmish. In full it runs as follows:

A Brush with the Matabele.

Danver's Horse were surprised this morning by a body of Matabele, who were repulsed after a severe engagement, with heavy loss, though, unfortunately, not before several of the whites were killed and wounded. Among the killed are Troopers Brown and Morrison; George Smith, Roger Furneaux . . . .

The Shadow-Hand

By Louis Tracy.

CHAPTER XX.

Wheeler v. Hawke.

Dr. Lemaitre stalked home from the Rue Morcelle in a thundering rage. He found Hawke at his mansion in the Rue de Rome in a somewhat maudlin state. A large sum of money was in Mr. Hawke's pocket. He had been drinking.

"What is it you want here?" asked Lemaitre furiously.

"Nothing, mate. A friend's a friend, I suppose?"

"Drunken ass! Make haste, before I kick you down the stairs!"

"Why, what's the matter? I am in luck's way; so are you. We're all in luck's way!"

"You are a vile idiot, Hawke! She is gone, I tell you—flown! We might just as well never have found her! The money I have crammed your pockets with, you dog, was for nothing. If you do not find her by this time to-morrow——"

"Gone?" said Hawke in tipsy surprise. "More fool you to let her go!"

"Very well, sir. Will you leave my house at once, and do not dare to show your face here until you come with news that you have found her again. You understand me?"

"All very fine, mate, but——" said Mr. Hawke, lifting himself heavily from his seat and backing away, observing danger in Lemaitre's eye and flushed face.

In a deep corner of his heart he had a secret dread of Lemaitre's rage. The next day he refrained from drink, and began his search for Edith.

Cécile had already been in Paris for about two weeks She had called at 17, Rue de Printemps, on Dr. Danton, and found the house locked up. A neighbour of No. 17 informed her that a Dr. Lemaitre had lived there for some years.

"And also a Dr. Danton?" she asked.

"No—at least I never saw him."

Cécile said to herself: "Did he live there secretly, then? Or were his letters only addressed from there?" She added aloud:

"Dr. Lemaitre was married, I think?"

"Oh, yes! His wife was supposed to be rather afraid of him, though violent-tempered herself. One could sometimes hear his powerful voice calling 'Julie!' half down the length of the street."

If Danton's letters were addressed to Lemaitre's house, Cécile decided that their intimacy must have been even greater than if they had lived together.

"I must find Lemaitre," she said; "he is the clue to Danton, as Danton is the clue to Edith."

One day she ran across Inspector Wheeler in the Rue du Faubourg St. Honoré.

"Well, now, miss, this is a meeting, now," said Mr. Wheeler, shaking her hand with beaming face; "I did not expect this pleasure——"

"Nor I," said Cécile. "What are you doing here?"

"Hawke, miss, Hawke; Hawke's in Paris as sure as you see that sun shining there, and before another two days are over, this hand's going to pat him on the shoulder."

"I hope so, Inspector, if it will give you pleasure. This is my address, and you may call upon me for a chat, if you have time. I may tell you meantime that I have discovered that the Thorgill Beck murder was most likely committed by a man—a doctor—called Lemaitre, a tall, pale man, who wears coloured waistcoats. Leave Hawke to go, Inspector, and find him. If you search his things, and find a travelling rug with blood-red hairs, you will guess that he is the right; if you find a mauve-coloured overcoat as well, you will be convinced that he is the right; but suppose you find two or three of the red hairs still sticking to the back of the mauve coat? Then, Inspector, you will be absolutely certain that he is the right."

She tripped away. The Inspector, with wide, wondering eyes, looked after her.

"Well, if she isn't the queerest fish—and she's plenty of brains, that's quite certain. But Hawke's the man to get hold of. Hawke first, the rest after. Hawke's at the bottom of a good deal of the mischief done in this world."

"The poor Inspector!" Cécile was saying to herself. "He is joined to his idols. He will never do or find anything or anybody until he gets Hawke off his mind."

Hawke, meanwhile, in mortal dread of the scourge of Lemaitre's anger, was putting all his wits and energy to work in order to find Edith.

He made a list of all the modistes of Paris. He reasoned shrewdly that Edith would not, in her inexperience, think of a new mode of making a living, but would seek it in the old way at a new point. In the purlieus of these shops he loitered whole days, eating out his stale heart with ennui, pining for the wine-bottle and gaming-table.

The two cabs dashed . . . through the streets.

One evening, as he was about to move away from one of these establishments, he lifted up his eyes and saw Wheeler quietly watching him.

Hawke's heart gave one bound, and his bronzed, hard-skinned face went a dirty yellow. But only for an instant. In the next he was himself again, coolly calculating his chances of escape.

Like lightning a series of thoughts passed through the rascal's world-wise brain.

"He sees that I am well-dressed" (Hawke had on a frock coat over his broad round bulk, and over the abyss of his paunch hung a watch-chain), "he knows that I am up to something, and whether he has proof or not, he feels justified in arresting me. He means to do it. But he mustn't. I've got too much money on me. Here's for it! There's ten yards between Wheeler and me. He don't know Paris, I shouldn't think. Only pity is, I am getting so jolly heavy."

But Mr. Wheeler still had some lightness in the legs which had already served him many a good turn. Hawke bolted. Wheeler, a much younger man, a much taller, but heavy too, was after him. In less than a minute Hawke had sprawled and dived into a passing fiacre, and bidden the driver fly his hardest. He knew the world too well to imagine that he could escape in that way; he knew that there were more fiacres than one in Paris, and that Wheeler would follow him in another. But he had his plan, his head was cool. "I always could outwit Wheeler," he said to himself, "except just that once when he nabbed me."

His aim in getting into the cab was to gain time. Wheeler was after him, and the two cabs dashed, rattling at a mad gallop through the streets, both occupants looking out and spurring their drivers to still wilder efforts.

Hawke had given as a direction to his Jehu the Rue de l'Enfer, in the Marais. It is a narrow, winding alley, without pavements, dark and filthy. One night, during his six weeks' spree in Paris, he had been taken to an old house in this Rue de l'Enfer by an English fellow-hater of the police, who had long lived in Paris, an old pal of Hawke's, a man of the same crimes and class, perhaps even more desperate than Mr. Hawke. The old house, totally unoccupied, was falling to pieces in a courtyard of broken slabs, and stood back a little way from the street. Its black and damp interior was bare of furniture; but in a small kitchen at the back stood a rotting table on three legs against the wall; and here Hawke and his companion had drunk in wicked friendship, and slept till morning. It was on waking on the floor late in the day that Mr. Hawke had discovered a secret of the room, of which he made a note for future use.

While the cab was still in motion he paid his man, and pelted from it into the doorless front of the old building.

Wheeler was close behind him.

"Stop, Hawke, or I fire!" rang the voice of the Inspector through the echoing desolation of the almost floorless house.

But on rushed Hawke, dodging, slamming the remains of doors in the Inspector's face, his short legs racing at their widest angle of urgency.

He had the almost complete darkness of the bat-haunted old building in his favour, but his dull, heavy tramp, sounding on the wet boards, guided his pursuer.

Every here and there, the flooring yawned black where a piece was missing, and they were both every moment in imminent danger of snapping their legs short off as they ran. At last, Hawke went crashing ponderously down. And the next moment Wheeler tumbled over him.

"Got you, Hawke!" panted Wheeler, instantly slipping on a pair of handcuffs.

"Well, Wheeler, you have," said Hawke, picking himself up. "Fair's fair—you have. I admit it, Wheeler."

Mr. Hawke's hands rested, riveted together, upon his frock-coated paunch. Wheeler had him by the sleeve, panting through his open mouth.

"Game's up, Hawke, my boy!"

"Not too soon, Wheeler!" shouted Hawke in a roaring voice, and at the same time, with a violent wrench, twisted his arm free.

The mad race recommenced through the ancient, black, and echoing halls. Hawke was handcuffed, but a man does not run with his hands. The old fellow, as he flew, felt once more the joy of his wild, bad youth, the old forgotten devilries caroling in his blood.

He disappeared —suddenly and utterly.

He reached the kitchen where he had had the carouse with his pal. It was at the end of the house, on the side farthest from the Rue de l'Enfer. A beam of moonlight shone in through the broken roof and the floorless rafters of the two upper floors.

Hawke ran, and laid his back against the wall at the farthest end, opposite the door by which he had entered. Immediately afterwards Wheeler rushed in, and drew up near the door, pointing his revolver.

"Hawke," he said, "if you move again, I shoot."

"Well, Wheeler, you see, I can't run any further," panted Hawke; "if you want me, come and take me."

The Inspector with rapid stalk moved towards him; but midway across the room he disappeared—suddenly and utterly. There was a cry of horror, and a loud splash of water from beneath.

He had walked over a doorless opening in the flooring, and fallen through the trap into a puddle below.

Here it was utterly dark. He found himself in a small, deep cellar with rough, damp walls, from which he could discover no egress.

As Hawke walked away, he said to himself, with a merry laugh:

"Well, poor old Wheeler! he ain't a bad sort, is Wheeler. But I always said I could out-wit him. I must send somebody in the morning to git him out of that there hole."

He himself waited in the ruins till the streets were perfectly empty; then he stole his way with many a pause and ...ar, towards Lemaitre's house in the Rue de Rome.

CHAPTER XXI.

Evil Devices.

...re, lost as Edith was to him, had an infallible ...unicating with her.

...lo was to insert whatever he wished to say in the paper in which her eyes had met the advertisement of Cécile. He, too, had seen the advertisement later on, and recognised it as the cause of her flight, and he knew that ever after she would be sure to search the columns of that particular paper for messages from Cécile to her.

He therefore used it as the medium of a series of avertissements directed to her, praying her to reveal her whereabouts, not to believe the evil spoken of him. All these he signed with his name, but received no token from her.

At last, when nearly mad with longing, he had a thought. He put into the paper this message:

To Edith.—Everything has been cleared up satisfactorily. Stay away no longer from us. Lady H—— is very ill. So am I. To-morrow, at three, shall be at No. 11, Rue Taitbout, waiting for you.—Arthur.

No. 11, Rue Taitbout, was a large, unoccupied, and empty house, purchased by Lemaitre a day or two previously.

To his joy, Edith replied to this message in the same newspaper. She said:

I mistrust. What is cleared up? Must see Arthur's signature and crest reproduced.—Edith.

In order to pay for the insertion of these words she had gone to bed supperless that night.

Lemaitre frowned. Arthur's signature and crest? She had, then, faith in the word of this brainless soldier and not in him? A dark flash of anger, of cruel jealousy, overspread his face.

The signature and crest were easily obtained. Arthur had written to him a letter mentioning the breach of his word after the duel. Lemaitre simply cut off the name and the crest at the top, and sent it to the paper to be reproduced with the following words:

Edith,—To-morrow at 11, Rue Taitbout. Do not fail. Your obstinacy is dreadful. Herewith crest and signature.—Arthur Musgrave.

On the morrow Edith did not come. All day Danton walked from end to end of a long corridor of the empty house in mad haste, like a man tormented with furies.

On the third day Edith answered, not having the necessary money before:

Still mistrust. What were the last words that passed between us in the lane? Answer at once.—Edith.

She was shrewd enough to know that the advertisements might not come from Arthur at all, but from Hawke, Lemaitre, anybody. But if the advertiser could give the last words spoken between Arthur and her in the lane on the night of Arthur's tipsy outbreak of passion, brought about by Cécile's cunning—words which none but they two had heard—that would be fully convincing, and in view of his assertion that something or other had been "cleared up satisfactorily," she would then consider the advisability of emerging again into the light of day.

It may be supposed that, at this message of Edith's, Dr. Lemaitre was utterly non-plussed. How could he possibly know what these "last words" were? But the man, now in a state bordering on frenzy, did not for a moment despair or doubt. Impossibilities seemed easy to him; a thousand difficulties, a thousand lives that came between him and her he would sweep away. He immediately set about the discovery of those last words.

He would see Captain Musgrave at once. He would tear the words from the officer's throat. He sent on his trunk to the Gare du Nord. That night he would start for Calais.

But fortune favoured him singularly. In the afternoon, as he drove in his stately equipage à quatre, leaning back wearily in the brougham, through the Bois de Boulogne, his keen eye caught sight of Arthur standing in the well-dressed crowd a little way from the carriage-path. Lemaitre at once pulled the check-rein and got out.

Arthur, within a few days, was to leave Europe for Egypt. The —th Hussars had been ordered to the front.

He had come to Paris, during a short leisure, to bid a sick-hearted farewell to civilisation, guessing that he would be in the same city as his love, and knowing that Cécile was here. Cécile's presence had somehow lately come to mean for Arthur a strange consolation and solace. It was only when near her that he now found the least assuagement from the despair which made all life bitter to him. If he had a hope left it was a hope in Egypt and the peace-giving bullets of the Mamalukes.

A little distance away, unknown to him, stood his servant and shadow, Tom Wilson.

"Captain Musgrave—I am delighted to see you," said Lemaitre, standing before him.

Arthur stared up into the pasty face, grown hideously sallow of late, with a stare which few men could have borne.

"Do not any longer play the child," said Lemaitre; "we are not children; we are men of the world. I have business of the utmost seriousness with you. You think, no doubt, that Miss Wentworth is with me—in my house——"

"Frightful ruffian," sighed Arthur faintly.

"Yes, I say, you are playing the child. Listen to me, sir, and be a man! How dare you act with this flippancy when matters of such moment are involved? It now depends entirely upon you whether Miss Wentworth be restored to her friends or not. At present I pledge you my honour that I do not know where she is."

"Danton, you have no honour. You are most certainly a great rascal. And as for Miss Wentworth, she is entirely at liberty to dispose of her actions. I do not care a straw where she is."

"You do! You do!" cried Danton. "Englishmen of your class despise a certain kind of lying—lying which is serviceable, and results in some practical advantage; but you will yourselves tell any number of foolish lies, like the one you have just told, for the sake of keeping up a shallow pretence of silly nonchalance. I am astonished that you should persist in such conduct!"

It was like a father rating his son.

"I shall certainly have you locked up in some sort of gaol, if you do not go away," drawled Arthur.

"You do persist in it, then?" cried Danton. "But you shall not. In kindness to yourself, I will not let you. See here—I will show you the means by which our friend may be recovered, if you are not too great a child to refuse to see it," he drew from a pocket some newspapers, and pointed one by one to his advertisements, and the answer from Edith.

Arthur had suddenly dropped from his high horse of disdain. His hands trembled a little. He read the passages.

"You cannot mean to confess that you have used my name in this way to Miss Wentworth?" he said.

Arthur stared up into the pasty face.

"Yes—I do mean to confess it! Do you not see that all this is not fun—not child's play—but dreadfully earnest? Miss Wentworth, I have reason to think, is suffering acute poverty and anguish in her hiding-place. Is it likely that I would hesitate to use whatever was the readiest means to hand to induce her to come back to happiness?"

"I see," said Arthur, "you do not stick at a sort of crime whenever it will assist your purposes?"

"No more of that, sir! The question is, are you prepared to insert in the paper the 'last words' spoken between you and Miss Wentworth in whatever 'lane' it is she refers to; and so induce her to meet us?"

"Yes," said Arthur; "I will do so; but she will not meet us, Danton; she will meet me."

"You speak just like a child," said Danton pityingly; "what do you mean?"

"I mean that I shall put another address in my advertisement, not the Rue Taitbout; an address at which you will not be—for you will not know it."

Danton smiled.

"But do you think," he said, "that I will not see your message to her in the paper, and the address you give? Do you suppose I shall not be there? I cannot think that you are serious. If you put your message in another paper, it is fifty to one that she will not see it. And if you alter the address of the Rue Taitbout, you probably rouse her suspicion, and cause her to keep away. She is at present shyer than a bird, you know. And it would serve no useful purpose. You will be at the Rue Taitbout with me when she arrives. Everything will be fair and open. Her subsequent conduct must be left to her own will. Do I not speak reasonably?"

Arthur did not answer.

"It only remains that you put your message in the paper to-morrow; or tell me the words, and I will insert them for both of us."

"Very well, Danton—since I am doomed, it seems, to be associated with a creature of your kind. The 'last words' in question were: 'Good-bye. I shall write later.' You may be sure, meanwhile, in case you be tempted to play any trick with the address in the way of alteration, that I shall keep my eye on every edition of the paper; and I shall be at the spot in good time."

Dr. Danton, with a slight glance of contempt, turned, mounted his brougham, which leaned and creaked to his weight, and drove away. The next evening there appeared in the Courier de Soir this advertisement:

Edith,—How mistrustful! The last words were: "Good-bye. I shall write later." The day after to-morrow (Friday) at three, No. 11, Rue Taitbout. Do not fail.—Arthur.

When Lemaitre read this notice he threw himself backward in his chair, looked upward, and said:

"Now, Captain Musgrave, I think I have you safe in my hands! and you, too, Edith—my love! my life! never more, for ever, to lose you!"

Musgrave, reading the same notice, said: "But why the day after to-morrow? Why not to-morrow? I have little time to lose on account of this Egyptian mess."

The day "after to-morrow" was chosen by Dr. Lemaitre because he needed time; he had certain preparations to make. He was a very learned man. His knowledge of subtle and obscure poisons was far more wide and profound than that of most medical men. He had made the subject of poisons his special study for years.

Arthur had promised to see Cécile on the next day. But having to visit the Embassy in the Rue du Faubourg St. Honoré, and to provide himself an outfit of tropical clothes, he found himself too busy.

"To-morrow," he said, late at night, "after I have seen Edith, will be the best time. I will take her with me to Miss Delisle's hotel."

To-morrow! What it will bring forth is wrapped in a darkness blacker than the blackest midnight.

LITTLE CORA.

I.

The little model looked charming in her Directoir hat, with her pretty, close-fitting dress of striped pink, and disordered frizzy black hair, while the painter gradually and tenderly developed on the canvas the outline of her supple little form—her youthful figure dimly showing beneath the gauze-like material of her old-fashioned costume.

"Ah! Monsieur Georges, this dress is pretty, very pretty, but it isn't what I should choose to be painted in!" She spoke with a soft Creole accent, very tenderly, with her face upturned—the copper-coloured pale face of an Arabian child—and opening wide her big, melancholy black eyes.

"And how would you like to be painted then, Mademoiselle Cora?"

The little model became enthusiastic all at once as a thought flashed through her mind, and she answered with trembling voice:

"What do I wish? As a Sister of Mercy I should like to see myself!"

"A Sister of Mercy?"

"Yes, with those great white wings which flap at each side of the face. They are beautiful, and it is so good to be a Sister of Mercy. I should like to be one. I a Sister of Mercy instead of——"

She stopped, and her black eyes filled with tears.

"If you cry, little Cora, your costume won't suit you."

It was in the studio of my young friend Georges, two doors from the church of St. Vincent de Paul, the towers of wh ch stood out against the sky, grey against the blue—the blue of a sky in May.

The little model was far away from the picture in which she figured. Her look, full of a melancholy despair, became fixed on the church towers.

"Sister of Mercy."

Her lips, of a deep vivid red, repeated under her breath the words that she had just spoken so regretfully, "Sister of Mercy."

"And how are you now?" asked the artist, still continuing his picture while Cora posed at a little distance from him in the light.

"How am I, M. Georges? Very well—I am quite well! I—I think I shall go out! The doctor has given me a draught with ether in it which has done me good. I sleep better——"

She coughed a little, adding quickly as if to excuse—or was it to deceive?—herself.

"I have still a cough, but such a little! Oh, it is going away, M. Georges. I am quite well. What does not go——"

She stopped and tried to smile, her childish face, the tiny nose, the delicate little ears, all expressing with terrible sadness her vain effort to appear cheerful.

"What does not go is the headache!"

"Or the heart-ache. You still think of him always?"

"Always, yes, always! And I always will think of him," repeated the poor Creole.

Ah! The romance of little Cora! In the heart of this woman-child there was a vision of suffering. Life had dealt hardly with her, and had brought this melancholy look to her face. The breath of love had whispered amongst her curly locks, and had saddened her full lips, which were only made for kisses and smiles.

Yes, there was in the whole world a someone who for her was the someone to whom her thoughts would always turn; someone who had forgotten her, doubtless, who thought no more of her; someone of whom she only knew the first name, "Pierre," a name repeated thousands of times, as sweet to her as a caress. She loved this name. It was all that remained of her past, not very far back either, for how old was little Cora? Eighteen years!

"But," said she sadly, "one is old at eighteen in my country, especially"— and she tried to drown with her laugh the sorrow her words expressed—"when one hasn't had good luck."

II.

"Who was M. Pierre?" She still called him that just as when she had first addressed him, down there in Réunion.

"Who was he? Lieutenant in the Marine Infantry, and so noble, so good! Little, like me, very fair, with a small moustache turned up at the ends, which I loved to curl with my finger tips, when he would let me."

"We loved each other at once, as the way is. Why not when one is free, and knows that one can please oneself? My parents were dead. I lived there with an old aunt, who wished to make me a milliner. It was a good idea. The hats that were made in the island, they were pretty! And Pierre, he was so good. I used to say to myself: 'Seeing that he loves me, he will make me his wife. I love him only. I will always love him only. I am an honest girl, as he is an honest man, and I love him, with all my power, with all my heart.' When he held me in his arms and I leaned against the officer's stripes on his uniform, I felt prouder than if they had made President of the Republic!

"There are Marine Infantry barracks in the suburb of Poissonière. When I pass them, on my way to the Rue Lafayette, I stop, M. Georges, and gaze at the men, their uniforms, their yellow epaulettes, and I say to myself, 'Perhaps I will see him!' He may not be in Paris, but I hope always, and when I have looked for a moment at them, my eyes fill with tears—all the past is before me.

"I see the island, the sea, the ship 'down there,' our sky, our trees. All these pass before me like a dream. They haven't the white uniform of the tropics here, but there they are nevertheless, the same as at my home. Then I remember and say to myself: 'You are stupid, my poor Cora; all that is done with; you are no longer in Réunion—you are in Paris'—Paris is melancholy, and hard to live in!

"I think longingly of the time when I acted as interpreter for him. I have been on a campaign, you know! I went with the Marine Infantry to Madagascar. I liked it—the swamp, the fatigue. He had under his command the volunteers of Réunion. I marched with them, yes, I. I was not afraid, I assure you. I was amused by the cannonading at Majunja, and also when we were attacked on board the Bonnemary. We heard the whistling of the balls—pss! pss!—but what did that matter to me? I was with him!

"His men adored him as I did. The lieutenant! When they said 'The Lieutenant' you would think they were speaking of a god. And when he said to them 'Go,' they went. When we made a dash through the jungle he went first. He took great strides, and I with my small steps walked beside him. We nearly disappeared in the grass. Sometimes we hid there, and I kissed him while the shots were flying all around. I had a charm given me by a native sorcerer that preserved us.

"The captain, who had authorised me to go as interpreter with the column, died of lock-jaw one night. He had received a wound which he neglected and continued the march. Pierre nursed him better than any doctor, but he died saying: 'This is terrible! I wished to die facing the Germans. Ah! This dog of a country! Lieutenant, I give over my men to you. Take back as many as you can to France, the brave boys!' I still hear his voice. His cry 'Die here! Die here!'

"I think of it all, and say to myself: 'In spite of the fatigue, the firing, the scarcity of water, the swamp where death lurked, the nights when the enemy was ready to take us by surprise, it was a good time. I would live through every hour again!' But it is all over now, alas, and one beautiful day the column returned to Tamatave.

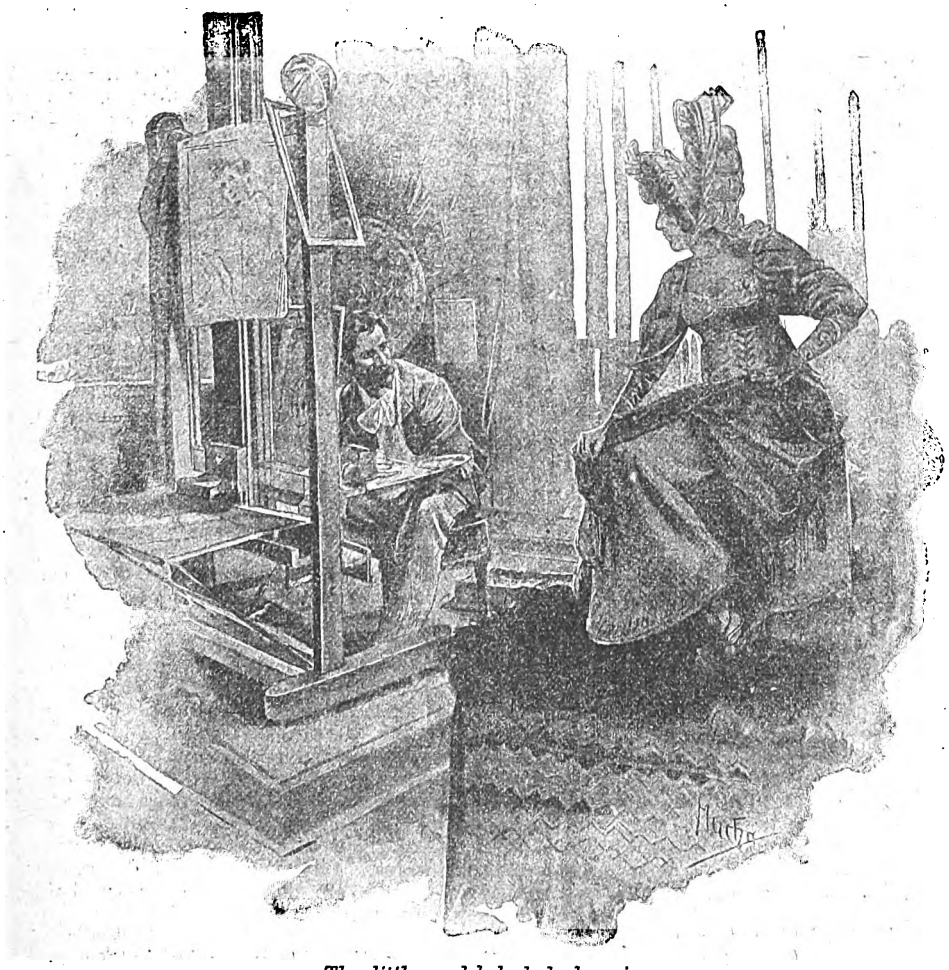
"We had buried the captain in a hole with many others far away. Pierre was in command, and returned in triumph, burnt by the sun as black as I. The governor complimented him. Ah! those compliments! I was wild with joy at his success. I said to him, 'They will make you a Colonel, at least!' 'A Captain, you are quite silly, my little Cora.' He was right, I was very foolish, but if they had made him a General right away I would have thought it only just.

"If I had only guessed that that campaign was going to separate us—that he would be recalled to France, to Paris, because of his advancement! Nevertheless, that was what happened. He told it me joyously one morning, not noticing that it made me sad. He was leaving for France, and he seemed astonished to see tears in my eyes.

"'Probably,' he said, 'he would find on arrival his nomination for promotion.' I was content because he was, but I was also grieved, yes, grieved, because he did not understand the pain I felt in spite of his joy—or because of his joy—who knows?

"He couldn't take me with him, it seemed. It was impossible. A government vessel wasn't like the swamp; one couldn't hide in it. But, at least, if he couldn't take me with him he could write to me. Oh, yes, he promised me that. Has he forgotten Cora, his little Cora?

"Then he said. 'You would make a pretty picture.' I was fated to be a model, M. Georges, you see. That gave him heart to leave me, I knew. It was in vain I pleaded, 'Hide me somewhere, take me away. You take your treasure, why not me? I will make myself so small, no one will see me!' No. Always the same answer. 'You are silly,' or 'You are foolish.' Yes, one is often so when one loves much.



The little model looked charming.

"And then the day came when the ship was to sail. The farewell was said, the last kiss given, and the last prayer whispered in his ear. 'You will write to me, you will write to me?'

"The last caress of his fair moustache was on my lips. 'Yes, little Cora, I will write.'

"Then the boat took him away. He waved his hand, went on board the ship, and disappeared, as if a great shark had swallowed him. The ship sailed further and further away and became so small that the smoke was all one could see. Then that became a mere speck, which grew smaller and smaller until—there was nothing. Nothing! No more Pierre, no more love! Little Cora alone in the world, with no one to care for.

"At first I said: 'He will come back,' or again, 'I'll forget, one always forgets in time,' but the days passed, I didn't forget, and he didn't come. You can understand how sad I was, I cared for nothing — a great weariness and longing to die came over me.

"To die, yes! I thought of that more than once! because life wasn't worth living without him. Then an idea came to me, foolish but settled, if he wouldn't come to me I would go to him. I would find him. I must go to France—to Paris—as he was there. Then sou by sou, working as hard as I could at the hats, I saved the passage in the mail boat to Marseilles, third class. You will laugh when I tell you that I used to say to myself, 'I will easily find him there.' And do you know where I expected to find him? In the Great Square. I pictured Paris as a big village, as at my home, with a great square, where there was music and where the market was held, and which was a general rendezvous for everybody.

"I can still hear all M. Castelbiel said."

"When I told the people on the boat, 'I'm going to look for someone in the Great Square in Paris,' they laughed at me, thinking I was joking. But I let them laugh. I had an idea that I would see Pierre there, walking along with his broad sword by his side, and with his pretty helmet of white cloth.

"With that idea I came to Paris. I did not even stay a day at Marseilles, but came straight on and asked at the little hotel where I stopped, 'The Great Square; please where is the Great Square?' You can imagine how the landlady and the boys opened their eyes. 'The Great Square,' they said, 'there were many great squares, la Place de la Concorde, la Place Royal, la Place de la Madeleine, la Place de la Republique, and others. Many houses, and many squares.' And all these streets and boulevards, they frighten me even now. I felt bewildered. Where had I come to? How could I find Pierre in this village, which was a world? I went here and there, I looked, I asked, I saw that people thought me mad.

"At the Government Office they asked me, 'Have you the name, the Christian name, and the rank of this Pierre?' No, I had nothing. I called him Pierre and I loved him, that was all I knew. I went to the office at the barracks but they were so rude to me there and treated me like a tramp, so that I dared not go again. The wearers of the yellow epaulettes, when I asked them in the street, laughed at me, or tried to laugh with me, which was worse. Then I said to myself, 'Wait; trust to chance, little Cora!' That was silly and foolish, wasn't it?

"I came to Paris knowing nothing, and with only sixty-five francs in my pocket, which soon melted away. When I returned at night to my bare little room in the Rue de Lyon, I often longed for Réunion and Tamatave. I cried then, drying my eyes, I said to myself: 'No matter, little Cora, you were quite right to come. You will find him. Among all these men who pass you will see him one day or other. Courage, my child!' I was brave. Among all these people I knew no one. I felt like a pebble in the sea. Then, how would I live when I had spent my last sou? Hats? I didn't know how to make any like those I saw in the shop windows. I was afraid when I thought of it.

"Without having found him, either in the 'Great Square,' you understand, or anywhere else, I came to such a pass that I hadn't money to pay for my room, and had to ask myself what I was going to eat the next day and whether I would drown myself that evening! It is true, M. Georges, I had come to that! And I said so to the landlady. I went to all the milliners, I was so anxious to get work. After all, I was clever with my fingers. She was a good woman, the landlady. She said she would get me a situation. It was she who saved me from dying from starvation.

"Among her lodgers was a former manager of a theatre in Algiers. He had come to Paris with a whole cargo of Arabian costumes, dresses of gauze, silk handkerchiefs, sequins, a quantity of Turkish slippers, and two big Algerian Jewesses, sisters, I believe, whom he had induced to come to Paris telling them that he was going to get up an Algerian entertainment like the one at the music-hall of Tunis in the Rue du Cairo. M. Castelbiel was looking for premises and a company. The former he found in Saint Martin. They put on the door a board with a gold crescent and Arabian characters announcing 'Algerian Theatre of Varieties. Drinks and dances of the choicest.' And the two Jewesses, in native costume, sang Algerian songs. But they couldn't dance, these big massive people, or they danced very badly. 'Too clumsy,' said M. Castelbiel himself, 'much too clumsy!'

"Then the manager thought of me and spoke to Madame Souveraine, the landlady, who took me to him. Would

I not join him? A hundred sous a day, choice costumes, and for that I had only to dance. 'You don't know how to dance? Quite a mistake. All women can dance, as all ducks can swim. Dancing is part of a woman's charm. You have never done this dance? Ah, well, you look like a dancer. There are many less pretty to look at in the performance at the music hall in the Rue de Cairo, and you will have such a lovely costume of gauze, with a sash of gold, and pink slippers. You want to find someone whom you love in Paris? This is the way to find him, the best way. He is certain to love art, your unknown. When he sees the advertisement of the Algerian Music Hall he will be sure to come to Saint Martin's.'

"I can still hear all M. Castelbiel said. Honeyed words. The idea that I could by having my name on a poster, find Pierre, attract his attention, and see him again, carried the point.

"I put sequins in my hat, and showed my arms through my gauze sleeves, and I danced. M. Castelbiel evidently was right, all women dance well, and at least I didn't dance badly. That dance in the clouds of smoke, with the applause accompanied by the clinking of spoons against the glasses, I shall never forget. Every evening, in the hot air full of tobacco smoke, which got into my throat and made me cough—every evening I anxiously scanned the crowd from the stage, through the mist, to see if he were there attracted by the huge bill where my name appeared in large type, and if in that sea of unknown faces I could not discover Pierre's.

"I searched one face after another, but never saw him. If he had been there I wouldn't have needed the evidence of my eyes to know it. My heart, my eyes, all of me was his. The dance, the tambourines struck by Fatma and Midja, the Algerian songs, accompanying my movements, that was all, but no Pierre. I returned each night to the little room I had taken in Saint Martin, sadder than I used to be in the hotel in the Rue de Lyon.

"I wasn't happy; it bored me, this profession of a mountebank. But what could one do? It was necessary to live.

"Days passed, then months, like a dream. It was so long, and yet it passed so quickly. The Algerian Music Hall wasn't a success. It was closed. M. Castelbiel went away, no one knew where, leaving the two Jewesses to shift for themselves. And then we were asked, Midja, Fatma, and myself, to dance at the Red Mill, the same dance in the interior of a gigantic elephant bought at an establishment which hadn't succeeded during the Exhibition. It was there that you saw me, M. Georges, always dancing, in the body of an elephant this time, and always looking to see if 'he' were there. I was in despair when I met you, besides being ill with a cough which I caught at the Algerian Hall. There I was worn out with continual dancing to the sound of the tambourine played by those stupid Jewesses.

"When you asked me to sit for you, you saw what pleasure it gave me. It changed me. I breathed another atmosphere. I felt stifled there, and I had a pain in my chest which seemed to burn me. I don't like winter, nor these Paris fogs; I need the sun, you know. The heat from your stove is lovely. I wish the winter were over."

Then a childish smile suddenly came to the pale, fragile face of the little Creole.

"Oh! what I should love above everything else is to have a picture of myself as a Sister of Mercy. I should love to be one."

"You shall have your picture, little Cora, with the white flaps."

"Really?"

She clapped her hands joyously, like a child to whom one had promised a toy.

"Yes, you'll have it."

"All the same it is funny," she said, suddenly becoming sad. "I will never see Pierre again. I will never find him, that is certain! Ah, well, the idea of seeing myself as a Sister of Mercy consoles me. There were Sisters of Mercy 'down there' who nursed the wounded soldiers."

III.

I had carried away a touching remembrance of the little Creole, of her slender and exquisite figure, her deep, melancholy eyes, her sweet voice, her tender ways, the resignation in the pretty child, who, to find her lost love had left her native country full of trust, and now was thrown in the hurly-burly, the bustle of this great Paris, saying:

"Do you know a fair, brave officer called Pierre? and where is the Great Square of the village that I may find him there?"

Poor child! a Sister of Mercy!

Then I lost sight of her, though I sometimes thought with a smile of the childlike trust which had possessed her to cross the sea to follow her lover.

gold ornaments on her brow, her wrists, and in her hair.

Cora, little Cora, the little model whose great desire was to be painted as a Sister of Mercy! She seemed to me transformed, her dark complexion lighted up by the pale glimmer of the footlights, and the contortions of the lithe body of the Creole really gave an idea of Egypt to

A Sister of Mercy.

One evening at the Porte Saint Martin in "Cleopatra," among the slaves grouped round the Queen on her throne, stretched out like a serpent in the sunshine, I thought I recognised the little model of my friend's studio, and, looking through my opera glasses, I found Cora, no longer in the striped silk costume of the affected lady, but clothed as an Egyptian dancer, with the public assembled, who little knew the romance which saddened the pretty girl with her childlike heart under the gauze draperies. And I said to myself:

"Bah! lost in the turmoil of the gay life in Paris, a favourite on the boards of the theatre, she will forget the past, and adieu to her friend Pierre!"

She was no longer the little ignorant girl arriving in the big village to find her lover; she was the much applauded dancer in "Cleopatra," with her photographs for sale in the shop windows. Some months passed, and I had forgotten the little dancer, when a letter recalled her to me—a touching letter, written by her in a piteous and pleading tone. She asked me to back a petition she was sending to the Minister of Marine.

Ill, consumptive, she said, she was afraid to die in Paris. She wanted to return to Réunion, to see the country, the sky, and the sun of former times. She had had enough of this Paris; it was killing her. She longed more to get away even than she had to come to look for Pierre. But to do so it was needful to have money. She trembled lest she should find herself on the ship with this hacking cough and this "ill all over" feeling, of being stifled between decks, and she was begging the Consul to be good enough not to send her steerage, but to let her breathe freely the sea air, and to look at the stars at night.

The mail-boat would leave Marseilles on the third of April, and Cora made her request in January—doubtless she knew that the official reply would be long in coming.

The request of the poor girl was never looked at by the Minister of Marine; but so the formal official reply ran: "She was entered for this matter, in the department of M. the Under-secretary of State of the Colonies, who in turn, had transmitted her, etc., etc."

And coughing in that dreary room, little Cora waited, living as she best could on her savings from the Porte Saint Martin. Her strength, poor child, was fast waning when April came, and the beginning of the spring. She no longer desired to sit for her picture in the white head-dress, as a Sister of Mercy!

"So tired and so thin, I would be so plain. No, no," she said, "I will leave you my photograph taken when I could believe I was pretty. You will paint me from memory with the white head-dress of the Sisters of Mercy. You will see me 'down there.'"

She had gone away by the end of April, the little Cora, gone to the country where her dream was born. The phantom of love which she cherished so long she will find "down there." She will find it more surely than in the crowded streets of the "big village." I often think of her—the beautiful head of the child, her dreaming eyes, the soft, caressing Creole voice, the entreaty of the little model, "Oh, M. Georges, I should like to be painted as a Sister of Mercy; it is so pretty!"

And I say to myself that perhaps over the white pillow where the little Creole had let her brown head fall, some Sister of Mercy's head-dress is already bending "down there," the head-dress which she thought so pretty, like the wings of a white butterfly—and that a woman's voice as sweet as hers, a voice murmuring between the white wings, will have said softly to the little model, the little Cora, so tired, and shutting her eyes for ever:

"Sleep, little Cora, sleep well," and she will be lulled to sleep, under the white wings of a Sister of Mercy's head-dress, to dream of her good friend Pierre, for whom she will look again in the "Great Square" of a bigger village of that other world, vaster and more incomprehensible than ours—the Infinite!

Dream always, little Cora.

* * * * *

Just one week after her departure the news reached Paris of the stranding of a mail steamer running from Réunion to Marseilles. In the list of passengers whose lives were lost was the name of Colonel Pierre de Rivass, who, it appeared, was returning from a flying visit to Réunion after a long absence from Paris on foreign service!

JULES CLARETTE.

The Old Woman's Money.

We sat in the verandah of a hotel at Seaborough one warm July night. There were half-a-dozen of us, mostly travelled men, and we had met by chance during the holiday season.

One of our number was an old man who, in his earlier days, had acted as scout in the Western States of America. He had joined our circle while Dickson was thrilling us with some train outrage, and when this was finished we taxed him for a story. It was some time before he would speak, at length he began:

"As far as I know, the smoothest trick, prompted by a desire to save money, ever played upon stage robbers occurred near Miles City, U.S.A., in '79. A load of passengers were almost within sight of the town. They had been travelling all day, and were worn out, for the roads were awfully bad in those days, and all coaches bounced and swayed very much. Having come near their journey's end, they were congratulating themselves. Hold-ups had been frequent. Two heavily-armed messengers accompanied each coach, with orders to fire on any person acting suspiciously.

"'Dear me,' said an elderly man near the door, 'I'm glad we are safe. I have all my money with me, and if I lost it, I don't know where I could get more.'

"Two miners and a prospector, each with large rolls, expressed their satisfaction at passing dangerous points safely. The next speaker was a little woman, kind and motherly in her ways.

"'My boy has started a restaurant in town, and is doing well. He wanted me to come and help, so here I am, goodness knows how far away from dear old Ohio. I thought he would need his mother, for these mining towns are wild, I hear, and full of temptations. I have got all the cash I have in the world with me. Fearing robbers, I have put it in a place where no one would think of looking. You cannot guess where.'

"Of course the guesses were all wrong.

"'Well, I have four notes against the sole of my foot inside my left shoe.'

"'Capital!' said the elderly gentleman. 'No one would ever think of looking for money in your shoes.'

"In the far corner at the front sat a small slender, black-haired man. He kept between his feet a little black valise. No one spoke to him during the journey, and he made no sound save occasionally to cough in a peculiar manner. Some of the passengers thought him to be a consumptive. Even when general good fellowship prevailed he took no part in the conversation.

"'And you; what would you do if we were held up?'

"A hollow cough and a shrug of his shoulders was all his reply.

"'What a mean fellow!' thought the old gentleman.

"At this instant the coach lurched violently to one side, and bang, bang, bang, came the sudden reports of guns. One messenger was shot, the other compelled to throw up his hands before time for resistance, and consternation and terror prevailed within the coach.

"'Lord, Lord!' prayed the elderly man.

"'Oh dear, oh dear!' cried the woman.

"'Hustle up here, git out,' and one of the robbers held the door open with his left hand; while he covered the passengers with the revolver in his right.

"Of course, they all filed out, and were stood up in a row. There was much trembling on the part of the men, and the poor old woman wept audibly. It only took a few moments to go through the pockets of the line, and to investigate the messenger's small safe. Probably the road-agents would have taken to the hills at this moment had not one of them beheld the frail figure within the coach.

"'Hold on, boys; here's one we forgot?' and he started in with an oath to drag forth the consumptive. As he entered, a most plaintive, cough-interrupted voice greeted him, and, tough as he was, he paused.

"'Please don't make me get out. I am very ill. I will die, I know. If you will only let me be, I will tell you where you can get a lot of cash which you have overlooked. I have no money myself.'

"The robbers outside, having heard the shrill, penetrating voice, glanced at each other. The leader called out to his fellow within the coach:

"'All right, Bill; find out where that money is, and let the pore devil alone. We got to be skipping out.'

"The piping voice took courage. 'Gentlemen, if you will ask that old lady to remove her left shoe, you will find the money.'

"The men began to mutter and scowl. The commercial traveller even found courage enough to say it was a shame to rob a poor old woman, and no one but the most depraved sort of a road-agent would be guilty of such an act. The leader walked up to the speaker, slapped his face, and tickled the end of his nose with the muzzle of his six-shooter. The grumbler discreetly held his tongue until the thieves were gone.

"It was with sighs and sobs that the old lady seated herself on the ground, took the shoe from that fat foot, and handed over her hard-earned savings. In a twinkling it was pocketed, and the outlaws jumped for their horses and were gone.

"What a hubbub broke out when the people found themselves alone once more! With one accord they assailed the man within the coach.

"'Oh, you villain, you wretch, to tell them of my money!' cried the woman as she shook him by the shoulders.

"The commercial entered at this moment. He had been talking to the other men of the party in low tones.

"'Just step out, madam; we want to talk with him,' he said.

"She obeyed, and several entered. It was noticed that the driver had his reins in his hands, and one end of them looked suspiciously like a noose.

"'You rascal,' said the driver, 'to have deliberately given this woman's money over to those outlaws. We'll make short shift of you;' and he threw the noose over the man's head.

"There was a desperate struggle for a moment, and then the noose fell down clean cut through. It was seen that the little man had a knife in his hand. He spoke in a different voice this time.

"'For Heaven's sake, don't bother me here. You can hang me at Miles City as well as here. It's only a little way; I shall not escape. When we get there, I will have something to tell you, which will explain my action. A man always has a right to have a fair hearing before he is hanged, and I claim that privilege.'

"Someone helped the driver with the body of the messenger, and the coach started for town. The others watched the little man intently, but he made no movement, nor did he speak until the coach lumbered up in front of the post-office and hotel; then he said, in a quiet voice:

"'I have £8,000 in this bag. The only way to save it was by telling the robbers of the old woman's money. I am glad to return it to her, and a bit extra for the worry I caused her. As for the rest of you, I have nothing to do with your losses. We all ran the same risk. I wish you good-evening;' and he stepped quickly from his seat to the door, and into the street, dropping a bundle of notes into the lady's lap as he passed."

The old gentleman rose and sauntered down to the pier, and as we looked at one another we realised that he was the hero of the story he had told.

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS IN THE TREATMENT OF OBESITY.

Our corpulent readers will be glad to learn how to positively lose two stone in about a month with the greatest possible benefit in health, strength and muscle, by a comparatively new system. It is a singular paradox that the patient, returning quickly to a healthy state, with increased activity of brain, digestive and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto, yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight 1lb. to 2lb. daily, as the weighing-machine will prove. Thus there is no suggestion of starvation. It is an undoubted success, and the author, who has devoted years of study to the subject, guarantees a noticeable reduction within twenty-four hours of commencing the treatment. This is different with other diseases, for the patient in some cases may go for weeks without being able to test whether the physician has rightly treated him, and may have derived no real or apparent improvement in health. Here, we repeat, the author guarantees it in twenty-four hours, the scale to be the unerring recorder. The treatment aims at the actual root of obesity, so that the superfluous fat does not return when discontinuing the treatment. It is perfectly harmless. We advise our readers to call the attention of stout friends to this, because, sincerely, we think they ought to know. For their information we may say that on sending two penny stamps, a book entitled "Corpulency, and the Cure" (256 pages), containing a reprint of press notices from some hundreds of medical and other journals (British and Foreign) and other interesting particulars, including the "recipe," can be had, post free, from a Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.—Belfast News Letter.

CYCLING FOR CORPULENT LADIES.

Cyclists of the fair sex have become so numerous lately, that a special journal to represent and advocate their interests has recently made its appearance. One of the stock subjects discussed by the expert lady contributors is the question of cycle costume for corpulent ladies. This and kindred questions are, however, disposed of by the practical consideration that any lady whose weight is more than proportionate to her height becomes an object of ridicule on a cycle. There are many ladies who have yet scarcely passed their first youth, and who are, nevertheless, so stout that they find themselves debarred from joining in an amusement which has much to recommend it beyond the fact that it is certainly the fashion of the hour. There is, however, no reason for their suffering this deprivation, as any overstout lady may learn by glancing through the pages of Mr. F. Cecil Russell's "Corpulency and the Cure," a copy of the just issued 18th edition of which we have received. This little book of 256 pages is sent post free to any address on receipt of two penny stamps, forwarded to the author's offices, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. From the evidence of the innumerable letters which Mr. Russell has received, it is certain that many ladies belonging to the highest social circles, who are now cycling daily, owe their ability to do so to the success which has attended their submission to Mr. Russell's course of treatment. His method recommends itself in a special manner to those who are anxious to take a sufficiency of physical exercise. With the rapid reduction of the weight effected by Mr. Russell's preparation, and the consequent rejuvenation and ability to cycle or otherwise utilise the limbs, naturally comes an increase of appetite. "Do not give way to it," the old-fashioned obesity authorities would say, "or else you will get fat again." "Nonsense!" the author of "Corpulency," etc., says in effect: "I have removed the cause of obesity by enabling the proper organs to perform their natural function of getting rid of unnecessary fat. You can eat and drink anything in reason;" and the evidence which Mr. Russell adduces shows that he is justified in making this bold statement. He is, unquestionably, a successful revolutionist in the cure of Corpulency.—Leeds Saturday Journal.

CORPULENCY: INCREASING POPULARITY OF AN EFFECTUAL CURE.

Many persons are doubtless familiar with the nature of the extraordinary revolution in the cure of obesity which, within recent years, has been wrought by the original researches of that now eminent expert, Mr. F. Cecil Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. It is evident that the certainty, the rapidity, and the agreeable surroundings of his curative process have been recognised in a very large degree among ladies and gentlemen belonging to the highest social circles. Keen observers who have an opportunity of judging affirm, in the pages of Society papers and otherwise, that owing to the general employment of Mr. Russell's treatment, extreme obesity is becoming as much a thing of the past at fashionable gatherings as intoxication; and, no doubt, it will soon be regarded as nearly as disgraceful. The issue of an 18th edition of the author's singularly convincing little text-book, "Corpulency and the Cure," however, serves to indicate that the popularity of the system has now reached spheres far remote from those of West-end fashion. The book of 256 pages may be had, post free, by sending two penny stamps to Mr. Russell's offices as above; and it is worth the careful attention of those who wish to free themselves of a burden of fat, because extreme obesity terribly interferes with the energy necessary, in these days of competition, to make one's way in the world, or even to earn a very modest competency. A large proportion of the letters of Mr. Russell's grateful correspondents refer to their delight at being enabled—within a very brief period and without any irksome conditions implying semi-starvation—to attack their accustomed tasks with pleasure instead of wearied disgust, through being reduced to their normal weight. The popularity of the system is also largely due, doubtless, to the English hatred of mystery, which is utterly swept aside by Mr. Russell. He fully explains his modus operandi, and supplies the recipe for his preparation.—Bicester Herald.

Answers to Correspondents.

In our issue of March 13th there appeared a story, "A Little Fisher Maiden." This we find is the copyright of the proprietors of Household Words. The Editor begs to express his regret that it should have appeared without permission.

H. T.—Columbus, I should say. More than seven hundred of his biographies have been written in various languages.

John.—No, Captain Webb was not the only person who attempted to swim Niagara Falls. There are over thirty men now living who have tried it.

Rainy Day puts the following question to me: "If you see an unknown lady unprotected in a heavy shower, ought you to offer her the loan of your umbrella?"———— It would be rather dangerous, wouldn't it? People are so very unscrupulous about umbrellas. Besides which, it would be (I am assuming that the little scene takes place in a big town) rather indiscreet. No lady would accept the offer, and consequently to make it would hardly be in the best of form. But who is to lay down the law? What could only be regarded as an act of courtly generosity coming from, we will say, an elderly clergyman would be regarded in a very different light if a young man were forcing the attention upon a girl.

Charlie.—British young gentlemen refer to their fathers as "dad," "the boss," or "the old man." In heathen countries they say "father," but then, of course, they are a long way behind the times.

Miss D. B.—"Chicken gloves" are gloves made in Limerick from the skins of very young calves. Each pair are packed inside a walnut shell, and fastened with a little silk riband.

D. D.—I am glad to hear you appreciate Short Stories so highly. Yes, the Picture Puzzle Competitions will be continued for some time yet.

Amateur Gardener.—The simplest way to make a hot-house is to leave a box of matches where the baby can get at them.

H. J. wants to know how far the average eye travels in a year's reading? ————It has been calculated, I believe, that in reading a million letters of the ordinary newspaper type the human eye travels a mile, and that the average man in an average lifetime goes through 2,300 miles of reading matter.

W. P.—The clouds are full of meaning as to the kind of weather we may expect. If their forms are soft, undefined, and feathery, it will be fine. If their edges are hard, and sharply defined, rain may be expected.

D. G.—Yes. The Mint is only able to coin one kind of metal at a time. If, for instance, there is a great demand for bronze coin, all coining of gold and silver must be suspended for the time being. Your story will receive the best consideration.

D. C.—Modern English dictionaries contain, I should think, between one and two hundred thousand words, but nine-tenths of these are seldom used.

B. B.—The elephant "Jumbo," of world-wide renown, was between three and four years of age when he was brought from the Jardin des Plantes, Paris, and installed in the Zoological Gardens at Regent's Park. He originally came from Africa.

I. M. T.—The deaf and dumb branch of the Salvation Army of which you speak is in Sweden.

R. T.—A great deal of the flowers we see offered for sale in the London streets during the winter come from the Scilly Islands, as well as from the South of France. Large farms are to be found in the Isles entirely devoted to the cultivation of flowers for export.

H. H.—Your case is not an exception. Some people have double rows of natural teeth.

I hope that you have not entirely ignored the article on the Fresh Air Fund which appeared in a recent issue of S.S. Remember that if you cannot afford a shilling or more send ninepence, which will cover the expenses of a day's outing for a child. The towns which will benefit by the scheme for this year are Aberdeen, Belfast, Birmingham, Blackburn, Bolton, Bradford, Bristol, Cardiff, Dublin, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Hull, Leeds, Leicester, Liverpool, London, Manchester, Newcastle, Nottingham, Oldham, Portsmouth, Sheffield, Sunderland. I hope that every reader living in any one of these big centres will do his or her level best to get together sufficient money to help at least half-a-dozen little ones, for it is within their reach to become personally acquainted with the sordid misery which they are asked to alleviate. Subscription forms may be obtained from these offices by anybody who is sufficiently kindly disposed to render assistance, and I would ask ladies who care to help in the Fresh Air Fund street collection on May 22nd by taking a table to communicate with the secretary of the F.A.F., Pearson's, Henrietta Street, Strand, W.C.

F. S.—A wet silk handkerchief tied without folding over the face is a very good preventative of suffocation from the effects of smoke. It permits free breathing, and, at the same time, excludes the smoke from the lungs. Thanks for your kind wishes.

B.—China, I should say. There are more ducks there than in all the world outside of it. They are kept by the Celestials on every farm, on the public roads, on streets of cities, and on all lakes, ponds, rivers, streams, and brooks in the country.

T. P.—Your poetry is not of such a high order of excellence as you seem to imagine. I do not wish to offend you, but you ask for my candid opinion—and there it is.

G. F.—There are, broadly speaking, about 13,000 different kinds of postage stamps in the world. I am afraid you would find it rather difficult to get a specimen of each kind. But you may be a millionaire, for all I know.

E. B.—The custom of writing letters on black-edged paper during the period of mourning is about 130 years old, and originally came from Italy. No; it is certainly not used to the extent it was a few years ago, and probably this may be owing to the prevailing opinion nowadays as to the uselessness of large expenditure in mourning requisites.

C. C.—Water does not contract when freezing, but expands.

A good many ideas in boot protectors have been produced from time to time. One of the best of these is a new rubber flange grip stud, easily affixed to the soles and heels of all kinds of foot-gear. The studs are made up of a piece of rubber, over which is a layer of leather, on top of which a round-shaped rubber stud is fixed. Messrs. Joseph Dawson & Sons, of London Wall, E.C., and Northampton, are the manufacturers.

For the Week ending April 17th, 1897.

A LEGEND OF KNOTT MILL FAIR.

EVERYBODY has heard of Knot Mill Fair, once on a time the saturnalia of the northern counties; and every lover of quaint streets knows that Deansgate, Manchester, was in the same days one of the most irresponsible thoroughfares in England. The Fair has gone, and the street has been groomed, educated, and civilised out of recognition long since. Ergo, as my story opens at that time when the showmen were in full possession of the open space around St. John's Church, just off the dirty old street still in all its ragamuffin glories, with its half-gross of low public-houses, doing even a brisker trade than usual, it is evident that it is a tale of half a century or so ago.

At that time, not far from the fair ground, and in the direction of the Liverpool Road, there existed a short blind alley well-named Welter Lane, which was stopped up at the dark end with a public-house known to all and sundry as the "'Op Pole." It is true that the sign depicted a gentleman in the attire of Hans Breitmann's mermaid, striking (in addition to an attitude) an instrument with five strings, each the thickness of a kitchen poker, whence antiquaries have concluded that the real intentions of the tavern's sponsors was to name it "The Apollo."

A rickety old piano in the principal room and a long established reputation for its Saturday free-an-easy bore out in this opinion, but, nevertheless, we bow to the voice of the multitude, and speak of the tavern as the "'Op Pole."

John Scroggs, the owner thereof, had not a musical name, and he hardly looked a musical man. The alley was so blind and the "'Op Pole" so secluded (not to say shady) that his customers were "a rum lot," as the police put it, and Scroggs might have had some trouble to keep his license had he not been on remarkably good terms with the force. Many a little secret divulged in the expansiveness of beer in his frowsy bar-parlour had been edited and revised at the police station and presented to the courts as "information received." Some of the fame of more than one of the Manchester detectives might very fairly have been claimed by the innkeeper. John was a modest man, however, and pocketed the shekels of the police without bragging about it.

It happened one day, when the great fair was in full blast, that Mr. Scroggs had a visitor in his bar-parlour whom he regarded with much curiosity and some suspicion. Not that this visitor was a suspicious-looking character in the ordinary sense of the phrase; he was a good-looking young fellow, and well-dressed enough. But he had made his appearance with the early rum and hot coffee customers, and with the morning wearing away he was still in the gloomiest corner mooning over a beer-stained sporting paper, with a bottle of the landlord's best tincture of logwood almost untouched before him. He was palpably perturbed in spirit, moreover, and threw a startled glance towards the door each time a newcomer entered.

"Swells don't dodge in here to swipe port at five in the morning," muttered John to himself, "and if that young chap ain't got something on his mind, I'm a cherrabim!"

As the landlord sat quietly behind the screen of his bar windows watching his customer and thinking the problem over, a fat little man in the loudest possible check suit bustled noisily into the room. There was nothing suspicious about him at any rate. From his smooth chubby face, viâ the ponderous gold chain and massive bunch of seals reclining on his greasy waistcoat, to his wonderfully square-toed boots, every inch of the little man shouted "showman."

"Tom Maber!" exclaimed the young fellow in the corner dropping the paper from before his face.

"Why, Mr. Frank Burton!" said the little man, crossing the room towards him. "What on earth——"

"Hush, no names!" said the other. "What's your drink?"

"Rum 'ot," said the little man promptly, dropping into the chair opposite Frank. "I've got the bloomin' 'ump. And there's nothing like rum 'ot for that as I ever heard tell of."

"I thought you were in the States," said Frank, as the landlord retired to his coign of vantage after filling the order.

"So I have been," acknowledged the showman; "picking up ideas and freaks. Only you don't catch me missing Knot Mill. Tell you what, Master Frank, they do know something about the business over there, and no mistake! I've got my show fixed right up in Yankee style you'd better believe. No keeping the public a-waiting half an hour to see one ugly fat woman or a sickly human skellington. You pays your dime—leastways it's threepence—and there they are all on gorgis thrones ready for you. A baker's dozen of extra quality freaks; all warranted genuine, and shown by the littlest dwarf with the biggest gift of the gab in creation—dash his eyes for a spiteful little toad! 'Maber's Meteoric Marvels' is knocking them this time, I can tell you."

"Then wherefore the hump?"

"It's the dwarf," explained Maber. "He's set the whole lot snarling at each other. There's the Tattooed Prince in the Iron Mask so rampageously jea ous of the gentleman wot prefers broken glass to pickled onions, that he won't show, and it's all along of that dwarf! And there was four-and-threepence that wanted its money back this very morning!"

"And got it?"

"Not likely," said Maber simply. "But it's saying it's been swindled all round the fair."

"That's bad," acknowledged Frank, sighing. "But, by George, it's not a circumstance to the mess I'm in."

"I knowed it!" exclaimed the showman almost triumphantly. "I said to myself as soon as I'd seen you: 'Here's the young medical what's the pride of your own village in a pickle, and you've got to get him out of it, Tom Maber.' Now, what's the trouble, Master Frank?"

"Haven't you seen the morning papers?"

"Don't read 'em in show time," said Maber shortly.

"You could have seen it on the contents bills," said Frank bitterly. "It's big enough: 'Medical Students Again.' 'Riot at a Theatre.' 'Attendant Injured.' 'Disappearance of the Ringleader.' I'm the ringleader, if you please."

The little showman whistled.

"That's a bit thicker than I should have thought," said he. "What the dickens does old Dr. Burton's son want with rioting at theatres?"

"Oh, I'm a complete ass," acknowledged Frank impatiently. "But I don't see how they make me out the ringleader, and I certainly didn't drop the stool on the fellow's head. It's this way. You know they played George Barnwell at the Queen's last night?"

"A rattling good drammer," said the showman approvingly. "I only know one better, and that's Jack Long of Texas."

"Fustian!" continued the medical student. "Filthy fustian! Anyway the Manchester medicals always have protested and always will protest against George Barnwell."*

"Think their morals don't want any improving?"

"Possibly," went on the other. "Myself, I object to it because it's such stilted rubbish. However, as usual we marched down to the theatre in military order, and, I suppose because we're the dashest fools, I and long Jack Stevenson marched in front. He took one half into the pit and the rest followed me up into the gallery. Then we started guying—legitimately, I give you my word. Nothing worse than an occasional orange passed between us and the stage. Then they put the big lights out and somebody dropped a stool into the pit. I wasn't near it that I know of."

"Then how can they make out it was you?"

"I'd been chaffing a bobby who was supposed to be keeping order," explained Frank, "and the second the man in the pit got the stool on his head the bobby went for me. Knew my name, too and yelled to all creation to stop me. I got out of the theatre with a rush of the other fellows, and scudded over the Old Bailey Bridge into the wilds of Salford. All of a sudden I remembered that the show folks would be busy fixing up things for the fair, and I dodged round there, and spent the night in an empty waggon."

"Lor' bless you," said the showman, "why didn't you think of me? I could have put you up beautiful. You could have dossed comfortable with the Cannibal King from Woora-Woora. But why on earth are you running away? Why don't you go and face the music, if it wasn't you?"

"That bobby will swear he saw me do it," said Frank gloomily. "But I'd give myself up at once but for one thing. I want to see my old dad. He's getting very weak, and I've got a presentiment that if they send me to quod, it will just bowl him over."

"That," remarked the little showman gravely, "is a good sort of thing to think of beforehand."

* A historic fact. It was at one time invariably played at the Queen's Theatre, Manchester, on Shrove Tuesday, and the medical students invariably turned the playhouse into a bear garden.

"I know, I know," agreed the student, "I've been the very largest size of idiot, I allow. But, anyway, I want to see the old boy, and tell him that nine-tenths of it is a lie."

"Well," said Maber soothingly, "if that bloke didn't get the stool too hard it'll only be a fine. Still, if you must go home I'll help you if I can. What's your plan?"

"I daren't go near the railway station. I was thinking of tramping it after nightfall."

"Just the way to be pulled up certain, let alone that it's a tidy step to Budworth. I tell you what, Mr. Frank. You come and lie purdoo in Maber's Meteoric—that's the ticket! There's a little fair at Knutsford on Saturday, and I can easy send a van down without anybody twigging nothing. From there it's my lady's ta-ta to Budworth, and there you are!"

"You're a good little chap," said the medical student, grasping the other's hand. "But what about your people? Won't they talk?"

"They don't get much chance," said the showman coolly. "Freaks is very like nuns in their off-time. Why, it would burst up the business if the public could see 'em for nix! All except the Tattooed Prince, and he goes about like a blooming lord when he's got his coat on. Which shows the ingratitood of the chap. But, my stars, I've an idea! I'll sack him, and you shall have his shop until Saturday!"

"What do you mean?"

"Why, we'll make you up into a lovely tattooed nobleman! It is done at times in the profession. Just your back and arms nicely painted and a beautiful velvet half mask with 'oles for your eyes all complete and lovely. And I'm blessed if you shall show except when the public 'owls. What do you say?"

Frank laughed.

"That's 'arty," continued the showman. "Now, what do you say?"

"Oh, I'm on," said Frank, still laughing; "lead ahead. Let's go out of this hole at once."

"We'll jump into a cab and drive to the back of the show," said Maber, rising. "They'll think it's a freak arriving. Come along."

As the two left the tavern the landlord of the "'Op Pole" watched them to the end of the lane, whistling softly to himself. "And now," said he, rubbing his nose meditatively, "I'll just step down to the Albert Street Police Station and see if Detective Tampling is to be found. It ought to be a fiver at any rate."

Detective Tampling was in a complacent mood and in no particular hurry when he entered the fair ground that afternoon. He revolved in his mind a brilliant capture with the slight touch of the dramatic art in it that his soul rejoiced in. There was another plain-clothes man with him, but he was of the lower order of creation, merely a representative of the brute force of the law. Detective Tampling personified the intelligence thereof.

As he strolled leisurely through the mob he gazed with an indulgent eye on the humours of the fair. And certainly to the student of human nature the showman busily engaged in his eternal operation of quickly securing an audience and getting rid of it quicker still is a man to linger with. Foghorns, watchman's rattles, and cymbals; big drums and pistols, the most German of German bands, and the wheeziest of steam organs were all going together, and the gentlemen of the profession, every man jack of them with voices as hoarse and as foggy as the fifth of November, were all competing with the rest of the row at the top of their stentorian lungs.

Maber's Meteoric Marvels were planted well in the centre of this pandemonium, and the large and handsome stand which held them was adorned with numerous highly-coloured pictures, principally of a gory nature, which could not well have had any connection with anything inside the show. Maber himself was on "the parade" of his establishment, busily working a foghorn with one hand and a rattle with the other. Anon he would seize a drum-stick and bang vigorously into a huge gong hung conveniently behind him, and anon he would pause in the assault to shriek: "Hi! Hi! Hi! We ain't just a-going to begin, becos we allays have begun. On'y show in the fair allays ready and piping hot! Ree-member there—is—NO waiting. All THE marvels of the universe, as shown before the crowned heads of Europe, Asia, Africa and Wigan! Walk up! walk up! walk up!" and the little man had dodged down the steps, captured a hesitating couple, and was back again banging the big gong before you could have said "Jack Robinson."

Detective Tampling and his companion edged through the crowd to the front, and as two or three country folks were ascending the steps they quietly followed them, depositing their coppers in the pigeon-hole of the pay office like ordinary mortals. As the little group entered, a tiny dwarf with a weirdly malicious face beckoned them to come forward.

"Step right here ladies and gentlemen," he said, his words pouring out in a constant flow, without change of intonation, and with the smallest possible amount of punctuation. "You takes us where we've got to and has the privilege of stopping till we've got all round the blooming thirteen marvels every one of them unique without counting me which is the smallest and best-looking dwarf wot ever wos;" and he rambled on till he arrived at the tattooed man. "Now we come to the unfortunate young Prince from Cream Tartary wot wos wrecked on a raft in the Andaman Islands and was tortured by the Kalmuck Tartars till he confessed that he was born at 4 p.m. on a Sunday morning when he was at once too-tood with all the regular astronomical signs of his constellations on his back all quite correck according to the Herald's College as you may see for yourselves and the hireogriffiths signerfying his melancholy fate all down his arms which everything has come entirely true so far ladies and gentlemen as argues that Old Moore and Mother Shipton ain't in it with some of those furriners and all done with the tooth of a cuttle-fish and the juice of a deadly poisonous tree indignant to the island."

As the dwarf paused for breath the detectives pushed their way to the front.

"I arrest this man," said Tampling, putting his hand on the shoulder of the Prince. "Warrant in my pocket, if you want to see it."

"What for?" shrieked the little dwarf. "Here, boss! boss!"

Maber came quickly into the interior of his show, and took in the situation at once.

"Well, I'm jiggered!" he remarked. "Wot's up, sergeant?"

"This chap knows well enough," said the detective, and indeed his prisoner was making no show of resistance and offering no remonstrances. "Now the only thing you can do is to get us out as quietly as possible for your own sake."

Digitized by Google

"Certainly," said the little showman, bustling to the back door of the tent, "right you are, inspector. We'll have a cab at the back here in no time, and I do hope these ladies and gentlemen won't go and talk and ruin my show."

The small crowd, congratulating itself upon having its money's worth for once in a way, gathered excitedly round the door, and the energetic little showman, calling repeatedly on his audience to witness that he was giving the police every assistance, got a cab and bundled the three in at once. As it drove off the people rushed out, each to give his own version of the affair, and as in their imaginations the prisoner ranged from a bank forger to an early edition of Jack the Ripper, Maber's Meteoric Marvels did more business in the next hour than they had done in any previous day of their existence.

Meanwhile the cab had pulled up at the Albert Street Police Station, and Detective Tampling presented his prisoner to the inspector sitting in solitary state at the desk.

"This is our chap, Mr. Inspector," said he, dexterously removing the half mask, and disclosing the features of a fair-haired young fellow with a cowed look in his eyes.

"That's him, is it?" said the inspector gravely, opening his charge book.

"And if you believe me," went on the detective grinning, "he's painted like a Trojan."

"Pynted!" cried the prisoner, speaking for the first time. "Here, guv'nor, wot are you giving us?"

"Come, none of your gammon," insisted Tampling. "You're painted all over like a Mede and Parthian, Mr. Frank Burton."

"'Arry Jackson's my nyme," answered the Prince, beginning to get virtuously indignant. "And if you've run me in for being a pynted fraud you're blooming well mistook. Blimy, guv'nor, have a go at this!" and he bared his capacious breast with such energy that a couple of buttons flew off his waistcoat.

"Are you sure you've made no mistake, Tampling?" asked the inspector uneasily.

The detective smiled sarcastically, and, dipping his handkerchief into the office water-bottle, began to dab viciously at the head of Orion the Hunter, the feather in whose cap was tickling the toes of the Twins high up on the right shoulder blade of the Prince. Nothing stained the immaculate white of the handkerchief, nothing whatever, for absolute cleanliness is an irksome and melancholy necessity in the profession which the Prince adorned. As the detective paused, with a bewildered look on his face, a policeman entered the office, and the inspector appealed to him at once.

"Bates," said he, pointing to the prisoner, "who is this man?"

"Don't know him from Adam," answered X 54, "except by the tattooing."

"Then he isn't the medical student, Burton?"

"Not a bit like," said the policeman derisively.

"Then what I want to know," put in Detective Tampling desperately, turning to the Prince: "Why didn't you open your blessed mouth? You've got a tongue, haven't you?"

"'Ow did I know what yer were lagging me for?" asked the Prince indignantly.

"Oh, I see," put in the inspector, "you've done a step or two in your time, eh, my man?"

"Onect or twict, guv'nor," acknowledged the Prince, "but I ain't done nothink in this blooming tawn that I knows on."

"Well, we don't want you," said the inspector genially. "You can sling your hook when you've told us a bit. Our information was that Maber had given you the push this morning, and that a man we do want had got your job. Now give us the rights of it."

"Ho, I see!" exclaimed the Prince. "Myber did come in with a toff abate noon, but I wus O.K. in my plyce, and he giv me some lip, that wus all. I cawn't tell for dead sure, but I think the toff was shoved into the money-box. Noice arryngement, too, 'cos ony 'is 'ands 'ud show."

"I can get him still," said Tampling, starting for the door.

"You needn't trouble," began the last comer. "That's just what I've come about. It was a gallery boy that caught Phillips on the head with the stool, Phillips saw him do it. And he's as right as a trivet already, moreover. Burton is to be summoned with half-a-dozen other names we've got, and it'll be forty shillings and costs for him, as near as I can fix it."

"Ain't I to 'ave somethink for this 'ere wrongful copping?" whined the injured Prince.

"Be off," said the inspector sharply. "Stay, here's a couple of bob for your cab fare. Tell Mr. Burton, if he's there still, not to make a fool of himself, but to go back to Owen's right away. Now mizzle!"

The Prince took the coin thrown him, spat on it, and dropped it into his pocket, winked at the abashed detective, and departed. When he reached Maber's, the student was certainly not there, but Tom nevertheless relieved his mind within the next ten minutes, and the Prince added a golden coin to the florin which he had not frivelled away in cab-fare.

When the story spread round the fair-ground, with such slight exaggerations as that the Prince had been held down in a bath and scrubbed by four of the strongest members of the force, the money poured so fast into the Meteoric pay-office that the price went up to sixpence, "to pervent the loss of life consekwent on crushing, as by lor commanded," as the dwarf put it.

Within half-an-hour Maber had an enormous new placard out, stating that by order of Her Majesty, the Prince had been duly authenticated by the High Court of Justice and that all others therefore were impostors! At the end of the week the little man could have forsworn freaks for the rest of his life if he had been so minded, and he insisted on paying Frank's fine which, be it stated to the credit of the perspicacity of the force, was exactly forty shillings and costs.

Even if Philip had not taken the trouble to point him out to me beforehand, I should have noticed the new trooper at dress parade.

He sat his steed like a born horseman, his figure erect, his clear blue eyes lacking the squint peculiar to the new-comer under the glaring vault of the brassy Mexican sky, his comely lips closed into a precise line that bespoke a character in which self-control was the chief factor, his entire person breathing a suggestion of foreignness to time, place and people.

As still as a statue he sat amid the commonplace hordes, his red-brown hair giving forth from every wave a glint as purely golden as those thrown by the beams of the fiery southern sun itself, and forming a sort of aureole of light about the handsome face backgrounded against the intense blue of the arching heavens.

It was years ago, when Baby and I were, literally as well as figuratively, following Captain Philip about from pillar to post, and had, several weeks before, joined him at this post on the Rio Grande. I was as glad as Baby (our son of four years) to settle down under the grateful shadow of the old Mission of Santa Madonna del Norte, and revel in the warmth and sunshine that prevailed when the place was not visited by that dreadful "Northers" that swept from the upper localities I had left, as if to warn a deserter of the continued existence of a home she might otherwise have too easily forgotten.

The garden of the convent belonging to the Mission was a thing of such beauty that I immediately cultivated the acquaintance of the Sisters, who seemed glad to have me and Baby spend some of our leisure time with them.

Among the nuns was one who especially charmed me, so lovely was she, so gentle and sad. I grew to singling out the beautiful Sister Dolorosa from among the others, and talked to her about the fine needlework she did so well. I engaged her services for a set of d'oylies, to be given to a pet cousin as a wedding gift, and cajoled myself into believing that I, thereafter, had an excuse to call often at the convent, and see how the work was progressing.

Sister Ursula, who was Sister Superior of the Convent, smiled indulgently upon us as we sat upon a bench together in the shadowy mimosa-hedged garden, her pious austerity melted by Baby's smiles, which were, each and all, magnets strong enough to attract the women down the sandy paths between the rows of tall Ascension lilies.

How my heart ached for those defrauded Sisters—how I squeezed Baby and hugged Phil after every visit to those saintly souls robbed of the heaven of home, and how Baby always grunted and Phil laughed, saying Barracks was a home, wasn't it, and how much, compared to the dwellers in tents and shanties, those poor dears had missed!

When Baby fell ill of a fever, both Sister Ursula and Sister Dolorosa came and nursed him until he was strong and well again; it was then that I enshrined them in my heart of hearts for ever. He was just over that fearful attack when Phil was called away with his command to chase some smugglers who had crossed with dutiable merchandise to the Texas side of the "Rio Bravo."

Until he came back I was in a tremor of anxiety, for the desperadoes held life cheaply, and when cornered and fighting for booty had killed many a brave man.

He came with clanging sword, keeping time to the cheery whistle he sent on before him, just as the moon began to peer into the shallow, restless arroyo near our quarters, and after my cry of welcome, said:

"Well, little woman, he's a dandy!"

"Who is, Phil?"

"The trooper I pointed out to you."

"What is he, Phil?"

"Taffy was a Welshman," began my husband, unbuckling his sword-belt; "but the other lines won't apply. I never saw such daring, such bravery, such nerve! Candidly, little woman, if Taffy hadn't been the man he was, I'd have fared ill—there, don't cry—I'm all right! I'd call you a goose if I didn't consider you a—duck! There, that's better!"

"Oh, Phil!"

"No, dear, you don't 'owe Phil'—it's the Welshman, if anybody, to whom you are indebted. I mean to send that evil-visaged Jorge out of my service, and take Taffy——"

"What's his name, Phil?"

"Comyn Gower."

"I'm so glad."

"That his name's Gower? Why?"

"No—that you are at last going to give that ugly Jorge Mejos his walking papers. I always feared him!"

"Oh, intuition of woman! I've mistrusted him ever since I saw him confabbing with old Pedro Querido—he's a sleek scoundrel is Pedro!—and have positive proof that his own brother, Miguel, is a regular smuggler. He was one of the gang we captured to-day."

"Oh, I wish you were anything but a soldier, Phil, just anything!" I said.

"Come, now—ah, there's Taffy—excuse me just a moment, dear."

The next morning saw Comyn Gower installed at our quarters. I confessed that it hurt me to see him polishing up his—Phil's—boots, and putting his military accoutrements in trim. My husband laughed, and called me a "Mystery-maker," accusing me of weaving romances about even old McCulhane in the kitchen. I pleaded guilty to the charge, and joined in the laugh that never hurt anyone and did the laugher a world of good.

Baby took to Trooper Gower from the first, climbing to his broad shoulders, and being carried about in royal state. One day the little fellow hurt his finger, cutting it with the blade of papa's unsheathed sword, and when I ran out at his cry, I found Gower tearing his own kerchief into ribbons, and binding the slight wound.

"There, Baby, now it's all right," I cried, kneeling to comfort my unheroic son. In doing so I came quite near to where the Welshman sat, and as I reached out to pat Baby reassuringly, one great, hot tear splashed upon my wrist. With a start I looked up at the man. The sun-bronzed face bent over the dimpled hand was wet with tears, and I had much ado to restrain the impulsive hand that started up to lay a comforting touch upon his shoulder.

"Te little moster haf hurt his hond. I wass in fault—I should haf watched te poy petter, mattam."

I heartily excused him, and took Baby myself until the shining harness was duly cleansed and ready for use.

After that I managed, without apparent effort, to draw Comyn Gower to talk of himself. One day, when military duties were over for a time, and Phil lay stretched in the hammock in the shade, Baby crept into Gower's arms and fell asleep. I sat in a rocker near by, listening to the low, rich voice of the Welshman singing a lullaby so sweet and soft and crooning that Phil soon gave audible evidence of its efficacy, and followed Baby to dreamland.

"You sing well, Gower," I said, as he paused to shift Baby to an easier position.

"In Wales, mattam, all sing," said the man softly. "T'at wass te national air of my country, ant it wass callt 'Poor Mary Anne.' At home, mattam, I wass a harper."

"Did you earn your living so?"

"Oh, no. Many play harps in Wales. I wass carrier of te mail, mattam, petween Gower and Swansea."

That explained the reason of his excellent horsemanship, I mused, as I threaded my needle against the sunlighted glare of a waxen cactus bloom.

"Is Wales a beautiful country, Gower?"

"Oh—ay; most peautiful, wit lofty hills ant lufly falleys."

"And yet you left it willingly?" Giving another little dexterous tap to the wedge of curiosity.

"Neffer willingly, mattam. One toes not go from Paradise willingly. But if Efe leafs Atam tere iss no longer a place of pliss."

Baby stirred, and the gentle voice sang again Silence reigned once more, and I ventured a remark that set him to talking to me of himself. He was so frank, lacking in all self-consciousness as he spoke, seeming so much more a disinterested historian of some third person's fortunes, that I listened, inspired with an almost personal concern and sympathy, to the story of his lonely life.

After going back to the hard, unlovely childhood he had known, he hurried on to the time when he, a youth, left the valley farm, and accepted the proffered position of mail-carrier.

"Te riffer sometimes flooded te whole falley—little Tawy Riffer, it is callt, ant it wass tangerous to cross it at te forts. Put I have neffer hat accitent of any kint, mattam, ant wass so happy to always see in te great shatow of Craig-y-nos—just where a hut mate a white spot on te hill—te figure of my peautiful Nesta Glenellen stanting in te toorway wafing to me.

"To hear Nesta sing—tat wass to hear peforehand te angels of Heafen singing praises to te Creator. It wass set when we sang together, Nesta ant myself, tat te music of te spheres fount echo in our harmony. I know not of tat; put I know I wass always in Heafen when her voice soart wit my own to te chorts of my harp. Yet it was her voice, mattam, tat afterwarts mate for me tiss purgatory in which I now lif."

I looked at the face of the soldier, who, with gently swaying body, kept my little one hushed in slumber, and read therein signs of a patience bereft of all bitterness.

I was about to break the silence, when the sound of music was borne to us upon the waves of the warm, sunny air. It was the voice of the nuns singing in the little oratory, whose windows opened towards our quarters. The sounds that reached us first were subdued and indistinct; then grew in volume, until one at last could distinguish above all others a powerful, insistant soprano, clear as the note of a lark, sweet as the chiming of a silver bell, tender as the cadence of love itself, yet, for all that tenderness, as cold as crystal waters falling from a mountain's height.

With a bound, Comyn Gower started to his feet; but at Baby's startled cry he sank back again upon the box that was doing duty for a chair, soothing the child with endearments in unpronounceable Welsh.

"Nesta sang like te foice you now hear, mattam—tat foice above te otters. Te same timper, full, lout, sweet—put tiss lacks in glatness. It iss a fine foice, foteffer, ant iss mucht te same as Nesta's."

A long silence followed, during which we both listened to the Sisters' singing. At its end, I said:

"What is it all about, Gower?"

"It is tat of which I neffer speak; put I should like to tell you, mattam, if you pe pleast to hear."

"Thank you, Gower; my sympathy is yours, believe me."

"It is goot of you, mattam. I shall feel petter when you know. Nesta liffet quite near Craig-y-nos castle, where dwelt Mattam Nicolini, te great singer——"

"Do you mean Patti, Gower—our Adelina Patti?" I interrupted eagerly.

"I to, mattam. She came to Wales, pecause she knew te air of my natif country wass pest for toes tat sing, as iss provet py the singers we poast in our own homes. She spent much money to improfe te castle, and liffet in splendour."

This I had every reason to believe was true.

"When Nesta came home as my pride, yes, mattam, we were marriet—I tought te gates of Heafen itself were opening pefore me. I still rote wit te mails, put came home for ofer Suntay, upon which happy tay we sang togetter in te little chapel in te falley.

"Once one of Mattam Nicolini's house party—a man—came to te chapel, ant, hearing Nesta, sought her out, ant wass fery praiseful ant friendly. I tit not tisagree when she talt me, a week after, tat he swore to her tat her foice wass superior to te 'teeva's,' as he callt his hostess; put when she sat he offert a pig sum of money to go wit him ant sing in great cities, I set, 'No; Nesta tat will not to.' Te light went out of her prown eyes, ant she set no more.

"Put te serpent had enteret my Eten. One tay I rote home to fint my house—wass empty." The head of the speaker fell upon his breast, and the voice grew still. Baby stirred, reaching up a little fat hand until it touched the quivering lips of the man who held him in tender embrace.

"I was more guilty tan she," he added hoarsely, "for I tit not seek to safe her."

That was all Comyn Gower told me of his past, but it sufficed.

Every day Philip had some new praise to sing of him, and every day Baby lorded it over what he soon came to look upon as his own personal property.

Why do all days of the year's calender seem, as we glance them over, so all alike, their black figures bespeaking no hint of the joy, the terror, the delight, or the despair they are to bring to us?

Slowly the time drew on, a fatal number of a day burdened with woe for me creeping nearer and nearer, until the symbol that should have been printed in blood-red characters—fit presage of a direful doing—stood dumbly and dully to represent the resplendent breaking of a glorious April day.

Phil had gone about his duties as officer of the day, and Gower was in attendance upon him. I gave Baby his breakfast, then bade him wait for mamma outside, and we would go "bye-bye" to see Sister Dolorosa. He vouchsafed me his usual grunt of acquiescence, and went out into the open air. I wished to carry with me a certain length of linen I had gone purposely to purchase at Laredo the day before, but having mislaid the little flat bundle, was forced to make a lengthy search for it. When, at last, I found it, I called to Baby as I emerged into the hot, sunny air, glad to be off and away to the cool cloisters of the convent.

But no Baby answered.

In vain I searched for him, expecting to come upon him at every turn. Growing alarmed, I sought Philip, who, I was informed, was not then to be interrupted.

In his stead Gower came to me, and when I told him of my terrible anxiety, dashed past me with a face as white as death, and disappeared in the direction of the stables.

Very soon—ages it seemed to me—Philip came, and, in a twinkling "Boots and Saddles" was signalled, and half the command, following Philip, left the post.

Time goes by heart-throbs. I lived several long lives before that afternoon, when the men came galloping in, cheering like mad. I knew, then, that Baby was safe, and ran to clasp him in my arms before the awful mist I felt closing round me should swallow my failing senses.

Comyn Gower had tracked Jorge Mejos to a mezquite grove some miles away, and, after a savage struggle, had rescued Baby from his abductor. But the gentle saviour of my son was mortally wounded, and lay across his horse an inert mass of senseless flesh.

I moaned in anguish as, by Philip's orders, they brought the dying man into our quarters, and cried aloud that he should not die—alas! alas!

All night he lay as one asleep; but at dawn the fierce fever the surgeon dreaded set in, and I, overwrought by the long and terrible strain to which Fate added this cruel sorrow, gave up the consciousness I was battling hard to keep, and swooned away.

When again I opened my eyes, Phil was standing beside me, bathing my forehead.

"Now, little woman, go to sleep and rest you. Gower is much easier, and you are about used up. I have sent for Sister Ursula and Sister Dolorosa to watch beside the—dear—soul,"—the tears in Philip's voice shook me to the foundation of my being—"and if he grows worse, I'll wake you. Come, close your eyes—that's right—that's right!"

I did sleep and the slumber was a heavy, dreamless lethargy that rested and soothed me. Many hours passed, and at their end I started to my feet.

It was dark. In the next apartment I could hear a soft voice saying:

"Yes, Nesta, it is Easter day, and you must sing te song of te Ressurection. Ant te mattam, whose foice iss like your own, will gif you lilies for te chapel. She has many in te glass house py te castle, and she iss generous. Put you must not talk to him—you hear me, Nesta?"

I softly approached the door. Sister Dolorosa knelt, saying prayers for the dying man, whose eyes roved ever to the light of the taper on the further side of the bed. Sister Ursula had disappeared. Before I could move nearer, the voice began again, but oh, so faintly—so faintly!

"Yes, Nesta, te Easter lilies are like yourself—so pure! Tat is a pig armful you carry, ant I like to see tem apout you. Sing wit me, put first kiss me, my wife—my pride!"

With sudden start, Sister Dolorosa sprang to her feet, and, leaning above the whitening face, laid her beautiful lips upon his own. I looked on as one looks at the performance of some divine miracle. I could not move as again and again she kissed the brow, the eyes, the mouth of the dying man. No sound escaped her, and when the noise of an approach assailed her ears, she fell again upon her knees and murmured Latin prayers.

Comyn Gower died at dawn. In the afternoon of the same day two shadows darkened the door of the room where the wan house of a freed soul lay untenanted, and Sister Ursula, followed by Sister Dolorosa, entered the presence of death.

The elder woman soon passed out again, but the younger, approaching the bier, let fall upon the still, cold form the great bouquet of Easter lilies she had brought, and wrung her hands above them.

It was more than I could bear. My heart, filled with its own personal sorrow, overflowed at the profound pitifulness of this futile meeting of the two erring, hungry souls, and reaching out my arms to the woman, I wept aloud.

At my cry she turned to me, and, throwing her slender arms round my neck, held me close while her whole being shook convulsively.

Then, without one look at the still face whiter than the lilies lying about us, the black-robed nun loosed her close hold upon me, and as she went out into the hot glare of the April sunshine, I called softly after her:

"God's peace go with you, Nesta Gower!"

British naval history is rich in the records of what may be called great sea-duels—combats of single ship against single ship, waged often with extraordinary fierceness and daring. They resemble the combat of knight against knight, with flash of cannon instead of thrust of lance, and the floor of the lonely sea for the trampled lists.

He must have a very slow-beating imagination who cannot realise the picturesqueness of these ancient sea-duels. Two frigates, cruising for prey, catch the far-off gleam of each other's topsails over the rim of the horizon. They approach each other warily—two high-sniffing sea-mastiffs. A glimpse of fluttering colour—the red flag and the drapeau blanc, or the Union Jack and the tricolour—reveals to each ship its foe. The men stand grimly at quarters, the captain, with perhaps a solitary lieutenant, and a middy as aide-de-camp, is on his quarter-deck.

There is the manœuvring for the weather gauge, the thunder of the sudden broadside, the hurtle and crash of the shot, the stern, quick word of command, as the clumsy guns are run in to be reloaded and fired again and again with furious haste. The ships drift into closer wrestle. Masts and yards come tumbling on to the blood-splashed decks.

There is the grinding shocks of the great wooden hulls as they meet, the wild leap of the boarders, the clash of cutlass on cutlass, the shout of victory, the sight of the fluttering flag as it sinks reluctantly from the mizzen of the beaten ship. Then the smoke drifts away, and, on the tossing sea-floor, lie, little better than dismantled wrecks, victor and vanquished.

No great issue perhaps ever hung upon these lonely sea combats, but as object-lessons in the qualities by which the Empire has been won, and by which it must be maintained, these ancient sea-fights have real and permanent value. What better examples of cool hardihood, of chivalrous loyalty to the flag, of self-reliant energy, need be imagined or desired? The generation that carries the heavy burden of the Empire to-day cannot afford to forget the tale of such exploits.

One of the most famous frigate fights in British history is that between the Arethusa and La Belle Poule, fought off Brest on June 17th, 1778. Who is not familiar with the name and fame of "the saucy Arethusa"? Yet there is a curious absence of detail as to the fight. The combat, indeed, owes its enduring fame to two somewhat irrelevant circumstances—first, that it was fought when France and England were not actually at war, but were trembling on the verge of it. The sound of the Arethusa's guns, indeed, was the signal of war between the two nations.

The other fact is that an ingenious rhymster—scarcely a poet—crystallised the fight into a set of verses in which there is something of the true smack of the sea, and an echo, if not of the cannon's roar, yet of the rough-voiced mirth of the fo'castle; and the sea-fight lies embalmed, so to speak, and made immortal in the sea-song.

The Arethusa was a stumpy little frigate, scanty in crew, light in guns, attached to the fleet of Admiral Keppel, then cruising off Brest. Keppel had as perplexed and delicate a charge as was ever intrusted to a British Admiral. Great Britain was at war with her American colonies, and there was every sign that France intended to add herself to the fight. No fewer than thirty-two sails of the line and twelve frigates were gathered in Brest roads, and another fleet of almost equal strength in Toulon.

Spain, too, was slowly collecting a mighty armament. What would happen to England if the Toulon and Brest fleets united, were joined by a third fleet from Spain, and the mighty array of ships thus collected swept up the British Channel? On June 13th, 1778, Keppel, with twenty-one ships of the line and three frigates, was dispatched to keep watch over the Brest fleet. War had not been proclaimed, but Keppel was to prevent a junction of the Brest and Toulon fleets, by persuasion if he could, but by gunpowder in the last resort!

Keppel's force was much inferior to that of the Brest fleet, and as soon as the topsails of the British ships were visible from the French Coast two French frigates—the Licorne, and La Belle Poule—with two lighter craft bore down upon them to reconnoitre. But Keppel could not afford to let the French Admiral know his exact force, and signalled to his own outlying ships to bring the French frigates under his lee.

At nine o'clock at night the Licorne was overtaken by the Milford, and with some rough sailorly persuasion, and a hint of broadsides, her head was turned towards the British fleet. The next morning, in the grey dawn, the Frenchman, having meditated on affairs during the night, made a wild dash for freedom. The America, an English 64-double—that is, the Licorne's size—overtook her and fired a shot across her bow to bring her to.

Longford, the captain of the America, stood on the gunwale of his own ship politely urging the captain of the Licorne to return with him. With a burst of Celtic passion the French captain fired his whole broadside into the big Englishman and then—instantly hauled down his flag so as to escape any answering broadside.

Meanwhile the Arethusa was in eager pursuit of the Belle Poule—a fox-terrier chasing a mastiff! The Belle Poule was a splendid ship, with heavy metal, and a crew more than twice as numerous as that of the tiny Arethusa. But Marshall, its captain, was a singularly good sailor, and not the man to count odds. The song tells the story of the fight in an amusing fashion:

Come all ye jolly sailors bold,
Whose hearts are cast in honour's mould,
While England's glory I unfold.
Huzza to the Arethusa.
She is a frigate tight and brave,
As ever stemmed the dashing wave;
Her men are staunch
To their fav'rite launch,
And when the foe shall meet our fire,
Sooner than strike we'll all expire
On board the Arethusa.
On deck five hundred men did dance,
The stoutest they could find in France.
We, with two hundred, did advance
On board the Arethusa.
Our captain hailed the Frenchman, "Ho!"
The Frenchman he cry'd out, "Hallo!"
"Bear down, d'ye see
To our Admiral's lee."
"No, no," says the Frenchman, "that can't be."
"Then I must lug you along with me,"
Says the saucy Arethusa!

As a matter of fact Marshall hung doggedly on the Frenchman's quarter for two long hours, fighting a ship twice as big as his own. The Belle Poule was eager to escape; Marshall was resolute that it should not escape; and, try as he might, the Frenchman, during that fierce two hours' wrestle, failed to shake off his tiny but dogged antagonist.

The Arethusa's masts were shot away, its jib-boom hung a tangled wreck over its bows, its bulwarks were shattered, its decks were splashed red with blood, half its guns were dismounted, and nearly every third man in its crew struck down. But still it hung, with quenchless and obstinate courage, on the Belle Poule's quarter, and, by its perfect seamanship, and the quickness and the deadly precision with which its lighter guns worked, reduced its towering foe to a condition of wreck almost as complete as its own. The terrier, in fact, was proving too much for the mastiff.

Suddenly the wind fell. With topmasts hanging over the side, and canvas torn to ribbons, the Arethusa lay shattered and motionless on the sea. The shot-torn but loftier sails of the Belle Poule, however, yet held wind enough to drift her out of the reach of the Arethusa's fire. Both ships were close under the French cliffs, but the Belle Poule, like a broken-winged bird, struggled into a tiny cove in the rocks, and nothing remained for the Arethusa but to cut away her wreckage, hoist what sail she could, and drag herself sullenly back under jury masts to the British fleet.

But the story of the two hours' heroic fight, maintained against such odds, sent a thrill of grim exultation through Great Britain. Menaced by the combination of so many mighty states, while her sea-dogs were of this fighting temper, what had great Britain to fear? In the streets of many a British seaport, and in many a British fo'castle, the story of how the Arethusa fought was sung in deep-throated chorus:

The fight was off the Frenchman's land;
We forced them back upon their strand;
For we fought till not a stick would stand
Of the gallant Arethusa!

A fight even more dramatic in its character is that fought on August 10th, 1805, between the Phœnix and the Didon. The Didon was one of the finest and fastest French frigates afloat, armed with guns of special calibre, and manned by a crew which formed perhaps the very élite of the French Navy. The men had been especially picked to form the crew of the only French ship which was commanded by a Bonaparte, the Pomone, selected for the command of Captain Jerome Bonaparte.

Captain Jerome Bonaparte, however, was not just now afloat, and the Didon had been selected, on account of its great speed and heavy armament, for a service of great importance. She was manned by the crew chosen for the Pomone, placed under an officer of special skill and daring—Captain Milias—and dispatched with orders for carrying out one or more of those naval "combinations" which Napoleon often attempted, but never quite accomplished.

The Didon, in a word, was to bring up the Rochefort squadron to join the Franco-Spanish fleet under Villeneuve.

On that fatal August 10th, however, it seemed to Captain Milias that fortune had thrust into his hands a golden opportunity of snapping up a British sloop of war, and carrying her as a trophy into Rochefort. An American merchantman fell in with him, and its master reported that he had been brought to on the previous day by a British man-of-war, and compelled to produce his papers.

The American told the French captain that he had been allowed to go round the Englishman's decks and count his guns, omitting, no doubt, to add that he was half-drunk while doing it. Contemplated through an American's prejudices, inflamed with grog, the British ship seemed a very poor thing indeed. She carried, the American told the captain of the Didon, only twenty guns of light calibre, and her captain and officers were "so cocky" that, if they had a chance they would probably lay themselves alongside even the Didon, and become an easy prey.

The American pointed out to the eagerly-listening Frenchman the top-gallant sails of the ship he was describing showing above the sky-line to windward. Captain Milias thought he saw glory and cheap victory beckoning him, and he put his helm down, and stood under easy sail towards the fast-rising top-sails of the Englishman.

Now, the Phœnix was, perhaps, the smallest frigate in the British navy; a stocky little craft, scarcely above the rating of a sloop; and its captain, Baker, a man with something of Dundonald's gift for ruse, had disguised his ship so as to look as much as possible like a sloop. Baker, too, who believed that light guns quickly handled were capable of more effective mischief than the slow fire of heavier guns, had changed his heavier metal for 18-pounders.

The two ships, therefore, were very unequal in fighting force. The broadside of the Didon was nearly 50 per cent. heavier than that of the Phœnix; her crew was nearly 50 per cent. more numerous, and she was splendidly equipped at every point.

The yellow sides and royal yards rigged aloft told the "cocky" Phœnix that the big ship to leeward was a Frenchman, and, with all sails spread, she bore down in the chase. Baker was eager to engage his enemy to leeward, that she might not escape, and he held his fire till he could reach the desired position.

The Didon, however, a quick and weatherly ship, was able to keep ahead of the Phœnix, and thrice poured in a heavy broadside upon the grimly silent British ship without receiving a shot in reply. Baker's men were falling fast at their quarters, and, impatient at being both foiled and raked, he at last ran fiercely at his enemy to windward. The heads of both ships swung parallel, and at pistol-distance broadside furiously answered broadside. In order to come up with her opponent, however, the Phœnix had all sail spread, and she gradually forged ahead. As soon as the two ships were clear, the Didon, by a fine stroke of seamanship, hauled up, crossed the stern of the Phœnix and raked her, and then repeated the pleasant operation.

The rigging of the Phœnix was so shattered that for a few minutes she was out of hand. Baker, however, was a fine seaman, and his crew were in a high state of discipline; and when carronade; this commanded the whole of the British ship, and with it the French opened a most destructive fire. The British ship, as it happened, could not bring a single gun to bear in return.

Baker, however, had fitted the cabin window on either quarter of his ship to serve as a port, in preparation for exactly such a contingency as this; and the after-most main deck was dragged into the cabin, the improvised port thrown open, and Baker himself, with a cluster of officers and men, was eagerly employed in fitting tackles to enable the gun to be worked. As the sides of the two ships were actually grinding together the Frenchmen the Didon once more bore up to rake her antagonist, the British ship, with her sails thrown back, evaded the Frenchman's fire. But the stem of the Didon smote with a crash on the starboard quarter of the Phœnix; the ships were lying parallel; the broadside of neither could be brought to bear. The Frenchmen, immensely superior in numbers, made an impetuous rush across their forecastle, and leapt on the quarter-deck of the Phœnix.

The marines of that ship, however, drawn up in a steady line across the deck, resisted the whole rush of the French boarders; and the British sailors, tumbling up from their guns, cutlass and boarding-pike in hand, and wroth with the audacity of the "French lubbers" daring to board "the cocky little Phœnix," with one rush pushed fiercely home, swept the Frenchmen back on to their own vessel.

On the French forecastle stood a brass 36-pounder saw the preparation being made; a double squad of marines was brought up at a run to the larboard gangway, and opened a swift and deadly fire into the cabin, crowded with English sailors busy rigging their guns.

The men dropped in clusters, the floor of the cabin was covered with the slain, its walls were splashed with blood; but Baker and the few men not yet struck down kept coolly to their task.

The gun was loaded under the actual flash of the French muskets, its muzzle was thrust through the port, and it was fired. Its charge of langridge swept the French ship from her larboard quarter, and struck down in an instant twenty-four men!

The deadly fire was renewed again and again, the British marines on the quarter-deck meanwhile keeping down with their musketry the fire of the great French carronade.

The fierce and bloody wrestle lasted for nearly thirty minutes, then the Didon began to fore-reach. Her great bowsprit ground slowly along the side of the Phœnix. It crossed the line of the second aftermost gun on the British deck. Its flames on the instant smote the Frenchman's head-rails to splinters, and destroyed the gammoning of her bowsprit.

Gun after gun of the two ships was brought in succession to bear; but in this close and deadly contest the Phœnix had the advantage. Her guns were lighter, her men better drilled, and their fierce energy overbore the Frenchmen. Presently the Didon, with her foremast tottering, her mainmast gone, her decks a blood-stained wreck, passed out of gunshot ahead.

In the tangle between the two ships the fly of the British white ensign at the gaff end dropped on the Didon's forecastle. The Frenchmen tore it off, and, as the ships moved apart, they waved it triumphantly from the Didon's stern. All the colours of the Phœnix, indeed, in one way or another had vanished, and the only response the exasperated British tars could make to the insult of the Didon was to immediately lash a boat's ensign to the larboard, and the Union Jack to the starboard end of their cross-jack yard-arm.

The wind had dropped; both ships were now lying in a semi-wrecked condition out of gunshot of each other, and it became a question of which could soonest repair damages and get into fighting condition again. Both ships, as it happened, had begun the fight with nearly all canvas spread, and from their splintered masts the sails now hung one wild net-work of rags. In each ship a desperate race to effect repairs begun.

On the Frenchman's decks arose a babel of sounds, the shouts of officers, the tumult of the men's voices. The British, on the other hand, worked in grim and orderly silence, with no sound but the cool stern orders of the officers. In such a race the British were sure to win, and fortune aided them. The two ships were rolling heavily in the windless swell, and a little before noon the British saw the wounded foremast of their enemy suddenly snap and tumble, with all its canvas, upon the unfortunate Didon's decks.

This gave new and exultant vigour to the British.

Shot holes were plugged, dismounted guns refitted, fresh braces rove, the torn rigging spliced, new canvas spread. The wind blew softly again, and a little after noon the Phœnix, sorely battered indeed, but in fighting trim, with guns loaded, and the survivors of her crew at quarters, bore down on the Didon, and took her position on that ship's weather bow. Just when the word "fire!" was about to be given, the Didon's flag fluttered reluctantly down; she had struck!

The toils of the Phœnix, however, were not even yet ended. The ship she had captured was practically a wreck, its mainmast tottering to its fall, while the prisoners greatly exceeded in numbers their captors. The little Phœnix courageously took her big prize in tow, and laid her course for Plymouth.

Once the pair of crippled frigates were chased by the whole of Villeneuve's fleet; once by a few chance words overheard, a plot amongst the French prisoners for seizing the Phœnix and then re-taking the Didon was detected—almost too late—and thwarted! The Phœnix and her prize reached Gibraltar when a thick fog lay on the Straits, a fog which, as the sorely-damaged ships crept through it, was full of the sound of signal guns and the ringing of bells. The Franco-Spanish fleet, in a word, a procession of giants, went slowly past the crippled ships in the fog, and never saw them!

Fell with a splash.

On September 3rd, however, the Phœnix safely brought her hard-won and stubbornly-guarded prize safely into Plymouth Sound.

The fight between the two ships was marked by many heroic incidents. During the action the very invalids in the sick-bay of the Phœnix crept from their cots and tried to take some feeble part in the fight. The purser is not actually part of the fighting staff of a ship, but the acting purser of the Phœnix, while her captain was in the smoke-filled cabin below, trying to rig up a gun to bear on the Didon, took charge of the quarter-deck, kept his post opposite the brazen mouth of the great carronade we have described, and, with a few marines, kept down the fire.

A little middy had the distinction of saving his captain's life. The Didon's bowsprit was thrust, like the shaft of a gigantic lance, over the quarter of the Phœnix, and a Frenchman, lying along it, levelled his musket at Captain Baker, not six paces distant, and took deliberate aim. A middy named Phillips, armed with a musket as big as himself, saw the levelled piece of the Frenchman; he gave his captain an unceremonious jostle aside, just as the Frenchman's musket flashed, and with almost the same movement, discharged his own piece at the enemy.

The French bullet tore off the brim of Captain Baker's hat, but the body of the man who fired it fell with a splash betwixt the two ships into the water. Here was a story indeed for a middy to tell, to the admiration of all the gun-rooms in the fleet.

The middy of the period, however, was half imp, half hero. Another youthful Nelson aged sixteen, at the hottest stage of the fight—probably at the moment the acting purser was in command on the quarter-deck—found an opportunity of getting at the purser's stores. With jaws widely distended, he was in the act of sucking—in the fashion so delightful to boys—a huge orange, when a musket ball, after passing through the head of a seaman, went clean through both the youth's distended cheeks—and this without touching a single tooth!

CHAPTER XXII.

The Coffin.

There are poisons so subtle that the least conceivable portion entering the blood on a pin's point will produce the convulsions of death. The blood will congeal to a putrid cream. The limbs will curl and shoot for agony.

Lucretia Borgia had a ring furnished with a tiny poisoned prick, with which she shook hands with such of her guests as she wished to die.

"What is it?" said Arthur.

Nature has secrets and resources which can only be described as ghastly. You meet with them on the road to the Abyss.

On contact with this dark chemistry many human brains reel with frenzy.

In this scientific witchcraft Dr. Danton was an adept. In the middle ages there were drugs known to the learned of such marvellous operation that it is no wonder if they were regarded as diabolical agencies. Men hardly dared speak of them in the open day to each other; if anyone dared to write of them, he did it timorously, in cryptograms and symbols. A great part of his life Danton had spent in trying to decipher such hidden lore.

The condition known as the Somnus Angelorum—the Sleep of the Angels—is produced by a drug which probably few living men of science could prepare. The body stiffens into the rigour of death; all the bodily functions cease totally. Only the brain remains clear; the mind is active; the senses are acute. But the victim can no more lift an eyelash than he could blow away the moon with a breath.

When Arthur on the appointed Friday at a quarter to three arrived at No. 11, Rue Taitbout, he was suprised to see that the house was apparently untenanted. Why had Danton appointed such a place for the meeting? A faint suspicion, a vague uneasiness, passed like a mist through his mind. But he was not a man given to fears. He stood with one foot on the front steps, waiting. His face showed no agitation—but his heart was thumping in his bosom. He was about to see—her.

The front door opened above him, and there stood Danton's great body, calling to him to enter.

"What is it?" said Arthur. "I prefer, thank you, to remain here till the lady arrives."

"Pray—enter," said Danton.

"I will stay here."

"If it pleases you, certainly. But the lady is already within."

"I do not believe one word of it."

Danton bowed.

"It is true, nevertheless."

Arthur's heart was fluttering. She was here, already! He could divine no motive for the lie.

"You say she is here?"

"I have said it."

"That, on your honour?"

"By all means."

"You have no honour, Danton. But I suppose a human creature can't lie in that way."

He mounted the stone steps. He entered. The door banged ominously behind him, moaning through the hollow house.

"This way, please," said Danton.

He led the way through three large apartments, then up a flight of uncarpeted wooden stairs, towards the back of the mansion.

They stood at length in a bare room. In it was nothing but a low kind of platform at one end. On this platform stood a small vial containing a greenish liquid, a wine-glass, and a long black coffin, the lid of which leant up against the wall.

Danton, as they walked in, shut the door behind him; then, with a hideous laugh, holding out his arm, he said:

"Shake hands!"

"You frightful ruffian! what is the meaning of this insolence?" cried Arthur.

Danton had a huge ring on his middle finger. He did not reply, but with his palm he struck Arthur on the back of his hand.

In less than a minute Arthur had turned pale, and tottered faint towards the wall.

Danton emitted a whistle, and Hawke entered the room.

"Hold him, Hawke, while I give him these few drops." Danton walked towards the platform, very carefully measured out ten drops from the vial into the glass, and poured them down Arthur's throat, while Hawke supported him.

Arthur suddenly felt his consciousness revive. His brain cleared; he knew that there was Danton watching him. He knew that he was leaning on another man. He tried to stand upright, but his weight seemed to have grown too heavy for him. He waited a moment, and said to himself: "Now I will stand up!" But he could no more move a muscle, or the atom of a muscle, than he could fly. His body was fixed and stiff in death. He tried to look round. His eyes would not move. He had a will, an intelligence, but his frame no longer owned them. He was living in the tomb of himself, in a prison of flesh that had turned to granite.

Danton touched with his forefinger the ball of Arthur's glazed and lifeless eyes.

"That is all right," he murmured.

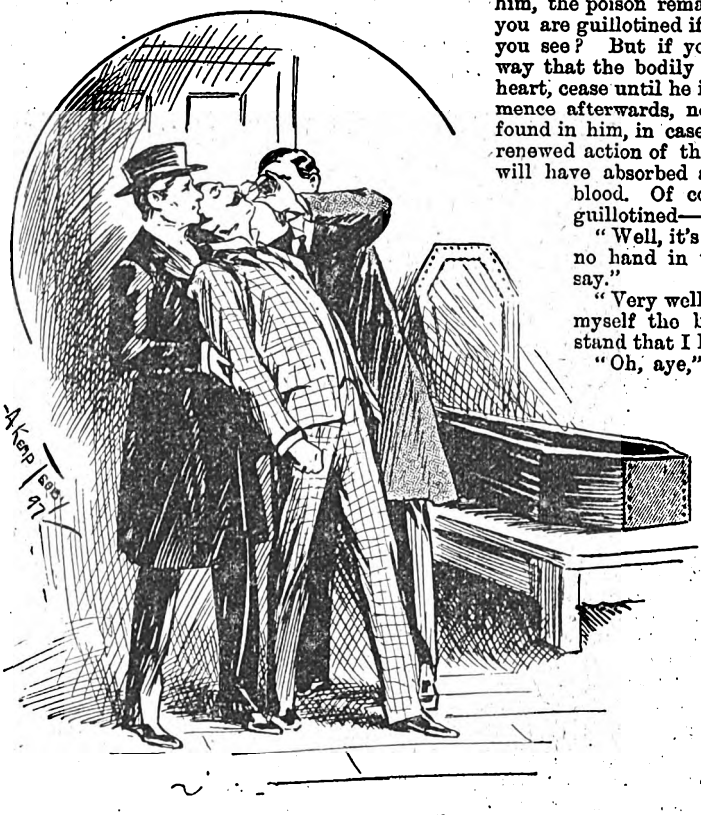
Arthur heard him speak, knew that he had touched his eyes, but the eyes did not flinch to the millionth part of an inch.

Danton put his ear to his heart—to his chest.



Poured them down Arthur's throat.

"Those are all right," he murmured. "They have quite ceased to act. Hold his shoulders, Hawke."

Hawke took his shoulders, Danton his feet. They bore and laid him in the coffin, and over the coffin they settled the lid. Arthur tried to shriek; he could as soon have lifted the earth.

"Is he dead, mate?" asked Hawke, as he and Danton walked away.

"Dead, no! He will shake himself out of that in thirty-six hours' time, and be as hearty as you or I."

"But he will be under the ground by that time, won't he?"

"Certainly."

"Why not kill the poor lad outright, and spare him all that misery? Look here, I tell you plain, mate, I don't like this job."

"You are a fool, Hawke. If you poison a man and kill him, the poison remains in his stomach; and you are guillotined if his stomach is searched, you see? But if you poison him in such a way that the bodily functions, the lungs, the heart, cease until he is buried, and then recommence afterwards, no trace of poison will be found in him, in case of exhumation; for the renewed action of the functions in the grave will have absorbed all the poison into the blood. Of course, if you wish to be guillotined——"

"Well, it's nothing to me. I've got no hand in the matter, that's all I say."

"Very well, Mr. Hawke, I take upon myself the burden. But you understand that I leave you to-night?"

"Oh, aye," said Hawke; "it's all very fine for you to be going down to your grand château in the country with this girl, and leave me to do all the dirty burial work."

"By no means," said Lemaitre. "I have done all the work that is necessary. The books at Père Lachaise were signed two days ago; a friend upon whose discretion you may rely looked to that for me. He believed, in fact, that he was signing for a grave for a pauper lunatic whom I formerly attended. Nothing remains to be done except to accompany the hearse to the cemetery."

"That would be a fine job for Wheeler to nab me on, wouldn't it?"

"Wheeler must not 'nab' you. You have gone out before, since your trick upon him, in a close carriage—why can you not go to-morrow?"

"Oh, very well, I'll risk it. But suppose, after all, the girl won't go with you to the country?"

"She will, Mr. Hawke."

"I doubt it myself."

"She will come. My care for her will make her love me. I shall make her rich promises, Mr. Hawke, a stately country house after her poverty, perfect solitude——"

"That promise, anyway, will be made like pie-crusts, to be broken."

"What, sir! Did you ever know me to break a promise, and to the lady of my heart, you villain? No! she shall, I say, have perfect solitude—for some weeks, at any rate, until she learns to look for me, to long for me. I shall go away, I shall travel. When I return to her she will have learnt to trust me utterly, to love me madly, Mr. Hawke."

"I like your big talk, I do!" said Hawke. "Suppose she runs away from the château?"

"I have made full provision for that, Hawke. I can trust my servants, sir. She will be watched and guarded."

"Do you know," said Hawke meditatively, "I've once or twice thought that this here girl is really the daughter of your wife by her first husband?"

"You idiot! What wife?"

"Why, Julie."

"Hold your tongue, you beast, or I shall knock every tooth down your vile throat!"

"All right, mate. Strikes me you don't much like hearing that word 'Julie' mentioned, do you? But this here girl, Edith, greatly favours you in the face, you know; no one can say she don't."

"Do you mean to say she is like me?"

"I do."

"It is the affinity between us, you idiot. We are made out of the same piece—our two souls—our two bodies."

"Oh, that's all very fine! But when I showed her that photo of your—your—Julie, do you know she said 'yes—that is my mother?' Now, that wur very strange, you know."

"She did not see the picture well, I suppose," said Lemaitre musingly; "and there may, in truth, have been some resemblance between her mother—and—and—the other woman. You are talking nonsense, sir!"

No suspicion had ever yet crossed Lemaitre's mind that Edith was the daughter of Julie; for Julie had carefully concealed from him the fact that she had ever had a daughter.

At this point there was a knock at the front door. It was Edith.

Expecting to meet Arthur, she fainted into Lemaitre's arms on seeing him come to the door.

He bore her to the only furnished room in the house, and laid her on a couch. It was a room next to that in which Arthur lay.

For a long time Arthur, stretched in his coffin, heard the occasional tones of her voice, though he could not catch the words. Toward evening, two hours afterwards, she drove away in a carriage with Lemaitre, bound for his newly-purchased château in far Provence. In her eyes was the wild and weak look of mesmeric ecstasy.

CHAPTER XXIII.

The Search.

All that afternoon, Cécile, at the Hôtel Anglais, was waiting for Arthur; he had made a new appointment with her, but he did not come.

About nine Tom Wilson was ushered into her presence in her suite of apartments on the first floor.

Cécile was cross. Jack Heathcote was sitting woebegone at the other end of the room, banished from her.

"Well, Tom, what have you?"

"A'm no that easy in my moind about Captain Musgrave," said Tom. "He went oot and said he'd be back long since."

"He promised to be here, Tom. One can do nothing. Why do you come to me in your trouble?"

"A always do, 'ee knoa. Didst thoo no tell me to look well after t' Captain?"

"And you do, I think, Tom? Because you are good, eh? as one said you were?"

"That's neither here nor there, Cécile Delisle. Wot A've got to say is, thot o' Tuesday evening, A went oot after him, having naught to do, keeping an eye, 'ee knoa, in this ootlandish pleace; and A see that lump of a man, Dr. Danton, they call him—get from his carriage, and have speech with t' Captain. A doan't loike thot Danton at all."

"No, Tom? Is it so, yes? Then you are my very boy! I don't like him, too!"

"A thought not. Danton showed him some newspapers. A heerd them say as they shoold meet again. Thot's aboot all A've to tell."

Some newspapers! Cécile spent a sleepless night in her chair. For his first breach of his appointment with her, Arthur had been profuse in apologies. If he broke a second appointment, what could she think? She must think that he broke it because he could not, by any possibility, keep it.

But she could dream of nothing that could prevent him, except physical inability; and she went over in her mind all the various forms of such physical inability, rejecting the far-fetched. He was not dangerously ill, except through some accident, which was unlikely; he was not detained in prison. He was bound by some artificial force, by private hands—or he was dead. If he were dead, he was murdered.

She did not need the information of Tom Wilson to make her think of Danton as the source of the mischief. Yet she knew nothing against Danton. Was the man capable of committing a crime, as his close comrade, Lemaitre, had been?

In the morning, early, she rose, washed, and hurried in a cab to Arthur's hotel. He had not come home. She took Tom Wilson, who was walking to and fro in front of the hotel façade, into the cab with her, and made straight for Père Lachaise cemetery.

She left Tom in the cab at the gates, and walked rapidly towards the bureau of the Archiviste des Sépulcres. An old woman who was sweeping near the entrance told her that she was too early by an hour.

For an hour, in an agony of impatience, she walked about among the avenues of stately monuments and streets of tombs. When at last she entered the bureau and asked for the archiviste, one of the clerks sitting at a table led her along a passage, up some stairs, and ushered her into a room of many shelves, stocked with dusty documents. An old man in a scull-cap sat reading at a table.

"I wish to know if you have appointed any grave within the last day or two on a death certificate delivered by a Dr. Danton," said Cécile.

The old man searched a pile of papers. Then he opened a pig-skin volume, and ran his finger down a column of "D's" on a page.

"Not only is the answer to your question no," he said; "but there is no such doctor as Dr. Danton in Paris at all."

"Then I give notice," answered Cécile, "that in case of such a death-certificate being handed in, there will be a necessity for investigation——"

"But your notice is useless. There being no such doctor here, the Registrar of Deaths would refuse to pass the certificate on to me, mademoiselle."

"But what am I to do, then, m'sieur? I have a fear that an Englishman, by name Arthur Musgrave, may have met foul play in Paris——"

"That is a matter for the police, mademoiselle. It is entirely beyond my province."

Cécile turned and walked sharply away. "It is not a matter for the police," she said inwardly. "It is a matter for instant action—for desperate effort, by me. So 'Danton' is not his real name, then?"

She hurried back to Tom Wilson, and scribbled in pencil on the unused half of a note, which she took from her pocket, the words:

"Get quickly all the Paris papers since Monday last, and search in the advertisements for the name of Edith. Will see you at one."

She handed it to Tom, and told him to take it at once to Jack Heathcote at the Hôtel Anglais. The newspapers which Tom Wilson had seen Danton showing to Arthur!

Her quick instinct told her that there, if anywhere, would light be found.

As Tom rolled away in his cab, she hailed another, and set off in a different direction. Her first point of aim was the Tribunal de Police in the Rue de St. Sepulcre, where she merely stated her case, briefly mentioning the disappearance of Arthur, with a description of the man calling himself "Danton." Then she procured a list of the cemeteries in Paris and its environs, and began a wild career from district to district, collecting items of information about all the burials to take place within the next few days, with the address of the bodies, and the causes of death.

"What am I to do, then, m'sieur?"

Sharp at one she was back to the Hôtel Anglais. Jack was waiting for her in her rooms; he pointed to the Courier de Soir, and the advertisements appointing a meeting at the Rue Taitbout.

Cécile threw herself on a couch, face downwards, her hands covering her face; and for half-an-hour lay so thinking.

"Stupid!" she cried at last, springing up. "I have wasted a whole morning: what I undertook was just endless. Arthur is at the Rue Taitbout, of course—alive or dead. Come."

She, with Heathcote, rode in a front cab; behind, Tom Wilson and three agents de police, whom Cécile picked up on her way; two of them were already in search for Arthur; and all of them drove at high speed toward the Rue Taitbout.

At No. 11 Cecile stopped, flew up the steps, and knocked. The other five followed her, and waited round the door. There was no answer. The truncheons of the police began pounding clamorously at the door, the whole street echoing with the alarm. But there was no answer. . . . The shoulders of the five men went urging at the door; it was heavy, but old; with many a jerky swing their invading shoulders gained slowly upon its tense resistance; there was a creaking—a sudden ripping of wood—and they tumbled in through the splintered door, victorious.

They rushed different ways through the house, searching every cranny of it; but they found it empty.

An hour before, Arthur, lying in the stiffness and pallor of death in his coffin, had heard the screws turn and groan in the lid which shut the light from him. The thunders of the Day of Doom itself could not have affected him with half the horror inspired by this simple sound.

Ten minutes later, if anyone had peeped within that coffin, the hair of the coffined man would have been seen to have turned to the whiteness of untrodden snow.

At the moment when the door of No. 11, Rue Taitbout, was being ripped to shivers, Arthur was hearing the heavy, wet clods of the grave falling in dull thuds upon his coffin-lid. His imprisoned spirit went mad, and swooned.

Hawke had seen to it that the funeral took place at an early hour. Old gaol-bird as he was, his tough conscience was ill at ease at his deed. He had made up his mind to have an afternoon of hopeless drunkenness—a grand time; and as soon as he saw the coffin lifted from the hearse at the grave-side, he called to the driver of his close carriage, and drove away to Lemaitre's mansion in the Rue de Rome. Here he had the choice of many forms of delight, and before long was lying on a couch, singing, laughing, and drunk

As Cécile walked hurriedly about the rooms of No. 11, Rue Taitbout, her wits, which had hardly been as clear that day as usual owing to the confusion of her terror and dismay, sprang up into vividest life. She felt that it was a case of now or never. "Oh, I must not be a blind fool this day—this day of all days!" she said to herself. She called one of the gendarmes, and, pointing to the ground, said: "Look there!"

"What, mademoiselle?"

What she showed him was so faint that he had to stoop quite low down to see it. It was the damp mark of a footstep nearly dry on the uncarpeted floor. It had been raining a little that morning.

Yet, small and indistinct as the marks of the footsteps were, she astounded the officer by saying five minutes later:

"There have been no fewer than three men here within the last hour. And they were bearing a heavy burden."

"Is that so, mad'moiselle?" said the man.

"Yes. If you look closely, you will see that the marks on the floor are characterised in three distinct ways by the three pairs of feet; and the random direction of the footfalls lead one to guess that they were struggling under a burden."

In another minute she raised an outcry which brought them all round her. She had entered the room from which the coffin had been removed.

"See there!" she cried, pointing to the low, dust-covered platform, "that is where the coffin stood. It has left its distinct shape marked out in the dust!"

"To the cemetery—quick!" cried one of the men.

"But which cemetery?" asked Cécile.

"Père Lachaise. That is where a person from this district would most likely be interred."

In a quarter of an hour they had dashed through the streets and stood before the archiviste.

"What you ask is impossible," he said to their representation; "twenty-five persons have been buried here this morning. To exhume the whole of them would be nothing short of an outrage upon the twenty-four."

Before this dilemma the search-party stood dumb. But Cécile had a sudden thought.

"You say that 'Danton' is not among the certified doctors of Paris. Will you see, then, if 'Lemaitre' is?"

"Yes," said the archiviste, "I know the name. One of to-day's certificates is actually signed by him."

"Then the body for which he signed is the body we want!" cried Cecile.

In five minutes an order for exhumation was in her hand; in thirty the white, dead face of Arthur appeared before her. The girl was leaning pallid and faint on Jack Heathcote.

"Is that the Englishman, mademoiselle?"

"Yes—no, no, that is not he! His hair is white—is white as snow." Then with a sudden shriek: "Yes, see his eyelid! He lives! he lives! It is Arthur! Oh, God!"

Her eyes closed, she sighed, and fainted.

CHAPTER XXIV.

The Schooner.

Four days later, towards evening, she stood with him at the railway station, the Gare du Nord. Arthur was sitting inside the train, and Cécile stood talking at the window.

"Well," she said, "if you will be cruel and obstinate I cannot prevent you; but you have not, I think, the right to go fighting in Egypt just now."

"Dear Miss Delisle," he said, "how good you are, and wise, and strong! But I feel as well as ever I did; my hand, I admit, shakes a little."

He held it out and it trembled. He was a changed Arthur Musgrave—that was clear. If Dr. Lemaitre had seen him now with his white hair he would no longer have said that he was "playing the child"; the grave had made of him a full man—a developed man. The over-fine well-bred languor of manner was gone, and as he held out his shaking hand with a smile, his eyes were lifted to Heaven in gratitude, and a tear dropped from them.

"Well, if you will go, you will go," said Cécile, "but is it kind to Edith?"

"One must do one's duty," he said. "Edith is with Dr. Danton. It his her own will, I assure you. I told you I heard the tones of her voice speaking to him, from the coffin. They were sad and subdued tones, I admit, but I am sure that they were not angry tones. She has chosen her own way."

"But you do not doubt that she loves you?"

"I must doubt it—I cannot but doubt it. Yes, decidedly, I doubt it."

Cécile sighed.

"It is no good speaking of it," she said; "some day you may know better. God keep you—good-bye."

He wrung her hand. The train was whistling to start.

But before she turned away, she called Tom Wilson out of the carriage, and led him a little way from it.

"Tom," she said, "I want you to promise me something. You will look well after the Captain, I think?"

Tom nodded.

"You won't let him be killed, will you?"

Tom nodded.

"Promise me."

"Aye—A promise."

"It is Arthur! Oh, God!"

She kissed him on the forehead—on both cheeks—on the mouth.

The train whistled and moved. Tom rushed back to his place beside Arthur, crying. Cécile waved her hand—and sighed.

* * * * *

France was growing hot for Dr. Danton. The news of the body buried alive had gone through the country. The name of Danton, who had arranged to meet the buried man at No. 11, Rue Taitbout, and the name Lemaitre, who had signed the death certificate, was in everybody's mouth. Probably the only person who saw nothing of it was Edith, living alone in the grand château in the solitudes of Provence.

What was the connection between Danton and Lemaitre? everyone was asking, but no one knew. Meanwhile, it could not be difficult for the authorities to find Danton, though of Lemaitre they could obtain no trace. Danton's properties—his house in the Rue de Rome, and his château in Provence—had recently been purchased. Within two days after the exhumation of Arthur, the police had gathered this information from the estate agents of Paris.

But long before two days Lemaitre had decided upon his course. As soon as he read of the salvation of Arthur he determined upon a swift and bold plan. He must destroy his identity as though he had never existed; then he would settle down in some secure nook of the world, and spend the rest of his existence in peace with Edith, his soul, his life. He at once telegraphed a warning to Hawke at the Rue de Rome; and before the police had had time to visit the house Hawke was well out of it, by no means very anxious about the matter. His pockets were kept well lined by Lemaitre, and in a state of maudlin content, just taking a few necessary precautions to keep himself unsuspected, he entered upon a career replete with his favourite enjoyments of gambling and drinking.

With masterly activity, Lemaitre, having dispatched the telegram to Hawke, hurried back to his château, for immediately on reaching it with Edith, he had kept his promise to her, and gone away. By his mysterious power over her will, he was enabled to persuade her that there were reasons why the château would not, after all, be a fit residence for her. Edith heard him with surprise, mistrust, and scorn, but with gradually lessening resistance.

After each of her encounters with him, when he had left her, she was filled with marvel at herself for yielding to his will; but the mysterious laws of Nature are stronger than we. Always at the next contest with Lemaitre, the result was the same as at the last: she yielded.

That morning he had seen the offer of a lonely furnished house near the Lake of Como advertised for sale in an Avignon paper, and he had promptly purchased it under an assumed name. In the end, he induced Edith to travel thither alone that very day, and take up her abode in this Italian casa, with the promise that she would remain there in perfect seclusion till she heard from him. He sent with her three of the château servants, whom he trusted. He provided one of them with a roll of notes, and saw the party off by train. The same night, having elaborately disguised himself, he boldly started for Paris.

By the next evening, he had gathered into his pockets all the money he was worth from the Paris banks, in which it had been deposited in the assumed name of Corot.

At seven o'clock he was walking rapidly through the streets towards the Gare du Nord, a travelling-bag in his hand, when Cécile Delisle, who was walking in the same direction, but more slowly, saw him from behind beneath a lamp.

"My God! there is Lemaitre!" she muttered under her breath. "Why, he has the very back of Dr. Danton!"

Lemaitre had on a long mauve-coloured overcoat, which reached to his feet. It was furred at the neck, and wrapped him high up round the head. The weather was quite mild, but he had chosen it for the double purpose of concealment and warmth in his long journey. He had not once worn it since an eventful day, months ago, and he had not brushed it on taking it from his trunk on the previous day.

"My God! there is Lemaitre——"

She had seen, beneath the lamp, three blood-red hairs—like the hairs of a rug—still adhering to the back of the light-coloured coat.

She ran to the other side, and on in front, to a point from which she could look back at his face, and at once, with sinking disappointment, cried:

"But that is not Lemaitre! That is not a pale man!"

Lemaitre had at present a high, florid complexion, red hair, and a long, pointed, red beard; he looked very like a Yankee traveller. A peaked cap of check cloth was drawn low down over his eyes.

"Was it Lemaitre?" Her mind swung backward in favour of the negative. Might not two men, by some possibility, have red hairs on a mauve coat? And this man had the wrong face. She was distracted with doubt. And she felt that, if she were so, an officer of the police would be certain to smile at her simplicity if she attempted to give the man in charge.

But she would not lose sight of him. Just then she had been going to the Gare de Lyons, intending to travel south, with the object of spying out Danton's château near Avignon. She had an instinct that Edith might be found there. But now she changed her mind, and walking abreast of Lemaitre on the opposite side of the street, she kept up with him till he reached the other station. She heard him take his ticket. When he stepped into the Calais train, she, too, got into it, immediately behind him.

She slept towards morning in the Hotel Continental at Calais, where Lemaitre, too, had put up.

She awoke frightened, about eleven a.m. She had overslept herself. What if he had gone? She made inquiries in the hotel, and heard that the gentleman with the red beard had gone out, but would return. She looked through the recent arrivals in the visitors' book, but saw no name that she knew. If this were, indeed, Lemaitre, he was in disguise, and had used a false name. She hurriedly ate something, and went out into the streets.

Moored to the end of the pier was a Marseilles schooner with her mainsail up and flapping in the breeze. There was quite a swarm of men about and on her, busily loading her with firkins of paraffin-oil in cubic tin boxes. She was to leave that evening, and had already taken out a clearance for Toulon.

In the cabin, at the time when Cécile came out to spy after him, Lemaitre was closeted with the skipper of the schooner, a thick-set tar, with short beard, and broad face Their conference lasted two hours.

The schooner was heavily insured for the voyage; and it was arranged between them, that on Lemaitre handing the captain 15,000 francs for his own personal benefit, the captain and mate should land him in a boat in the middle of the second night out, on a lonely spot of the western coast of France. The schooner should then proceed some distance on her way, and be hurriedly scuttled towards morning. When the crew were already in the boats, and the schooner was on the very point of sinking, the captain and mate, who alone were to be in the secret, should raise the alarm that the passenger had been forgotten in his berth; and they should pretend to make some effort to save him just as the schooner disappeared from sight. The other sailors would thus be made certain that the passenger had perished.

to feel or know of, that he was utterly unaware of the drops which had been afterwards administered to him; so that he could not at all account, when questioned, for the strange state of death-in-life into which he had fallen. When asked if any drug had been given him, he had, in fact, said no.

It was Lemaitre who had signed the death certificate; it was Lemaitre who had murdered Julie; it was Lemaitre whose existence and identity must be wiped clean out of the book of life; but Danton was safe.

But when Lemaitre was stepping from the schooner back to the pier, all being arranged between him and the skipper, Cécile saw him from a distance. And half-an-hour later she was beseeching the captain to grant her a passage to Toulon in his ship.

He told her that it was impossible. His craft was not a passenger-boat; and he had already departed from his custom by taking one passenger.

"A gentleman?"

"Yes."

"I wish I could see him—he might yield his place to me. What name?"

"Dr. Lemaitre."

Cécile tingled.

"So you cannot let me go with you?"

She looked through the hole.

"Well, haven't I told you at least twenty times, mademoiselle, it is quite out of the question?"

"I will go with you all the same," said Cécile to herself.

For two hours longer she watched Lemaitre about Calais, keeping her face well out of view. He had no idea that she was near him. And in her effort to escape his notice, it happened, too, that she never really saw his features well. About three p.m. she observed him write something in the visitors' book, and soon afterwards, looking, saw the words: "Armand Lemaitre."

She no longer doubted that he was the Lemaitre she sought, and decided that his florid colour was a disguise. She could then and there have given him into custody with tolerable certainty; but the mystery of this bold announcement of his name was too much for her egotism, her scent for the hidden; this man was hers; for many months all her thoughts had been centred around him; she herself must probe him to the bottom, and shew herself his master.

"And now," she said, "for the schooner!"

She mounted watch from the quay, near the bustling and swarming craft, and watched till she saw the captain step ashore and walk away landward. She had in her hand a small bag, crammed with sandwiches and a bottle of water.

About seven, the schooner dropped from her moorings and sailed leisurely out, deep-laden. Lemaitre occupied a stuffy little cabin on the starboard side. Immediately for'ard of it was the pantry; and immediately connected with this, separated from it by a sliding board, a tiny compartment, totally dark, from the ceiling of which hung three hams. On the floor of this cell, her back propped against the partition, sat Cécile, chewing sandwiches.

In two hours, the schooner was plunging and swaggering about among the waters. The night came on bleak and squally, and up rose the north wind stormily, rolling large billows before it.

At about eleven Cécile staggered from her hiding-place, drew the panel, entered the pantry, and came out into the passage of the cabin. All was still, save the piping winds, the slow dirge of the creaking ropes, and the click of a lantern wildly swinging from the roof. On first coming down into the cabin, she had looked into all the berths, and decided which was the best; that one, she knew, would be allotted to Lemaitre.

There was no key in the door, and steadying herself with both hands, she looked through the hole. A lantern nailed to a beam gave light within. Lemaitre was sitting on the edge of his bed, fully dressed, with something held up in his hand, at which he steadily gazed. Was he sea-sick? she wondered. He hardly seemed the same man whose face she had seen that day. Beneath the red with which his face was painted, the greenish hue of horror was now suggested. The hand which held the something before his eyes trembled like a reed in the wind.

She stood clinging desperately to the posts, looking at him for about half-an-hour, and keeping at the same time a sharp ear for any approaching step. Lemaitre, but for his trembling hand, seemed turned to stone. Suddenly he dashed the thing he held on to a chair, with a jerk of terror and abhorrence. It was then that Cécile saw that it was a photograph of Julie. She had seen the likeness which Edith had had of her mother, and recognised it under the lantern-light. Lemaitre suddenly picked it up again and put it hurriedly into an inner pocket of his overcoat, which he still wore. Cécile crept back to her retreat, frightened by the look she had seen in those haunted eyes.

When the day broke a definite storm was blowing from the north-west, and the schooner, labouring heavily, was drenching the man at the wheel with seas shipped over her bows. Through the day the wind continued to roar, loading the reefed sails with tempest. At five o'clock it was as dark as midnight, and the schooner was butting blindly and sullenly along in a cloud of spray, under half her jib and mainsail. Her foresail, an hour before, had been battered into shreds by the cuffs of the blast.

At seven the captain was down below in Lemaitre's berth having a long conference with him. Cécile, ever on the watch from the dark door of the pantry, saw him enter, and crept near. She heard from their talk, the whole scheme, by which Lemaitre was to be landed and the ship scuttled. The captain had come to tell him that on such a night as this the thing was out of the question. A boat put out in such a sea would almost certainly founder.

Lemaitre walked up and down the little berth, mad at the delay.

Cécile's quick wit took in the entire plan. Lemaitre intended to wipe out his whole former existence from the world of men. This, then, was the secret of the signature of his true name in the hotel book. When the captain rose to leave him, Cécile plunged back to her pantry.

It could hardly have been ten minutes later when the cry of "Fire! Fire!" was raised far for'ard.

"Fire! Fire!"

The ship was loaded with oil, and the winds were howling like ten thousand bulls in pain.

Easter Eggs.

I was twenty years old and inspector of the study-hall at the College of Chautevigne, a little old town whose lime-whitened houses were basking in the sun on the banks of the Rhone.

Above the houses, and surmounted by a weather-cock or a cross, pointed the steeples of its innumerable churches, while the whole was inclosed with sham fortifications, cut out as if from pieces of lace, and gilded like the crust of a pâté.

By what train of circumstances I had come to occupy this not very lucrative and little-to-be-envied situation, permit me to say nothing. The story, besides, would not be new. There comes a time to many of us when, if the heart is rich and the brain full, the pocket is light and the purse empty.

The College was, as are almost all these little colleges of the South, an old religious building, more or less appropriate for its novel use. The passages were dark and winding; the class-rooms had still the air of the cell; in the refectory was still the chair where formerly each of the white fathers came in his turn to read some pious work, while the others, in silence, ate their stew of potatoes or their bowl of rice and milk. Even now the table fare was but little changed. In the court, surrounded by its circular yard, surmounted by high-standing walls covered with moss, the sun seemed never willing to enter.

Ah, well! You may believe me or not, as you wish, but this college without sunshine, with its old walls and its gloomy passages, had ended by pleasing me, and I lived there contentedly; I ceased to remember the principal, a very slim man with a spare beard, whose blue glasses and enormous bunch of keys seemed at every instant to spring up behind you; I even forgot my scholars, a lot of gamins badly combed, mischievous, and wicked—and all this because, one morning, from the window of my room, I made a discovery.

It was Thursday. I was awaiting the hour to descend to the study-hall, and was leaning on my elbow at the window, gazing at the roofs and chimneys. I saw in the distance the fields already green, and on my right the Rhone, on the blue waves of which, hoisting their white sails, the little barques were passing. Below, in the street, a scissor-grinder sang as he made the wheel of his grindstone whizz; and in the material silence of being and things, his song came up to me, mixed with the rumbling of the stone under the iron.

Suddenly a window was opened almost opposite me, a hand pushed back the narrow shutter, which creaked on its hinges; then a head appeared, a pretty blonde head, with large blue eyes and hair disordered in a most amusing fashion. She had not seen me. Gently she hung a little mirror on the side of the window; then, taking her long golden hair in her hands, she set about completing her toilet. I stood there open-mouthed, my heart beating loudly. But at the same time I listened to the neighbouring clock. If I could, I would have stopped the hands. Alas! It rang the hour! Below the drummer beat his drum, and its roll mounting, spread the length of the long corridors of the old college. It was the porter, whose business it was to beat the morning call, and he acquitted himself very conscientiously, I assure you.

At the noise my neighbour lifted her head. She saw me. I began to redden, for her look, at first angry, softened, and while I withdrew with regret from the window, it seemed to me that a peal of mocking laughter accompanied my departure.

I arrived at the study-hall late. The principal said nothing, but the bunch of keys shook in the most significant manner.

At noon I knew who my charming unknown was! Ah! the lady was neither a duchess nor a marchioness, but love never has had its titles of nobility. She was called Mariette, and she simply was the niece of the pastry-cook established almost in front of our college, and who recruited his best clients among all our young students.

I never, until that day, had paid any attention to his marble shelves, whereon gridirons placed on painted plates, spread in a most appetising way, were golden nugatines, buns loaded with raisins, and cream puffs on which the sugar glistened.

I had never entered his shop, but now I desired two things—to cross the threshold and to win, at any price, the friendship of the uncle. It seemed to me that that was the chief point, and I commenced the attack that same day.

At two o'clock, when I went out with my pupils, I made them pass very near the shop. I ought to say that in this I had not much trouble, as they went very willingly indeed. The uncle was there, large and fat, in his white vest with its double row of buttons. Timidly, I saluted him. Surprised, he glanced at me; then mechanically bowed. Good man! how gladly I would have hugged him!

That same evening, towards six o'clock, I entered his house. The shop of the pastry-cook was open to everyone. In a trembling voice I asked, from the threshold of the door, for four sous' worth of gum drops! And I coughed to give a most serious aspect to my demand.

It was she who came to serve me; ravishingly pretty, blonder even than I had thought, and very sweet with her white apron so tidy, and giving out a warm perfume of fresh cakes. She smiled sweetly, handing me the little paper bag, and I gave her my four sous.

"Thank you, monsieur," said she, bowing slightly.

"Thank you, mademoiselle," said I, my voice trembling.

And I went out, not without once more saluting the uncle, who was reading his paper at the end of the shop.

I have filled myself with gum drops all this month, and I have accomplished nothing. To write I have not dared; nor have I ventured to speak.

The uncle, it is true, bids me good-day now—Mariette salutes me also. But I am afraid of everyone, of myself, of the porter, of the neighbours, of the principal, of my two colleagues especially, two old mocking bachelors who, at times, look at me with a provoking air. And it was thus I found myself at Easter Sunday. I had before me five long days of vacation, five days of liberty.

"Are you a man?" I asked myself.

"Yes."

"Well, then, go ahead."

* * * * *

I awoke in the morning very full of life, songs on my lips and my heart full of laughter. I opened wide my window. Ah! but it is good to live! This was a great feast everywhere. The birds were warbling above my head, under the eaves. On all sides the bells were ringing, and their joyous chime seemed to answer one another. Then they began to chant all together, the big ones, with deep, loud basses, accompanying the clear voices of the smallest. And these sounds all seemed to ascend and then disperse high up in the rosy sky, and already all is bathed in sunshine.

A sharp knock at my door made me turn quickly. I opened it, and saw standing there the porter, a small, round, fat, old man, who smilingly handed me a package folded in white paper. "For you, Monsieur Jacques," said he. And he was gone.

Astonished, trembling, without knowing why, I untied the pink ribbon which fastened the parcel; I unfolded the paper and a little box appeared. I opened the box at once, and on a bed of cotton, white as snow, I saw—what? An Easter egg. A little Easter egg of sugar, on which, in red letters, was traced this magic word, "Hope!"

I remained a moment confused, gazing down by turns at the ribbon shining on the floor, the box, and the egg. Nothing indicated, nothing could indicate to me from whence came this gracious gift. I knew no one at Chautevigne. All at once I uttered a cry. I had divined the mystery. "It is from her," I said, and taking the egg in both my hands, I covered it with kisses, kisses which left on my lips a delicious perfume of violets. For I had now recognised the egg. All the week I had seen it in the shop window of the little shop.

It was she. She had guessed my secret. She had divined my timidity and my silence, and she had sent me this little Easter present that it might speak to me of her. Hope and confidence. My imagination travelled so much and so far that only an hour after I went down dressed in my best clothes. What I would do I had not decided, but I would do something.

It must be said my coat shone a little in the sun, the nap of my hat was a little thin in places, but I did not give much thought to these details. It was Easter. It made the sun clear. The bells were ringing like the joyous chimes of betrothal. And in the pocket of my coat, delicately resting in its bed of cotton, I could feel the egg of sugar, which I had been too willing to carry with me.

In passing before the porter's lodge I saw my two colleagues. I waved my hand to them; they bowed and smiled, and I went on. I was on the point of telling everyone of my good luck, even to the principal, if I had met him.

The pastry-cook, the uncle, was at his door. He saw me and signed me to approach. I pretended not to have seen, but he called me. I saw I commenced to be nervous. I was too lucky, and my happiness frightened me. I had always had a timid nature. I went towards him.

"And where were you going so fast?" said the large man, extending his hand, "and so fine!" added he, beginning to laugh.

I reddened, and did not know what to reply, but with a look I searched the interior of the shop. "If I could only let Mariette know that I am here!" thought I.

All at once an idea came to me. My old trick! I coughed.

"Still that villainous cold there?" asked the uncle.

"Yes," replied I. "By-the-way," I added, "since I am here I may as well take some gum drops."

"Very good," said he; "come in."

And I entered. Mariette was not there!

The uncle took down the jar, and one by one rolled the gum drops in the scales, separating any that were fastened together. I looked about me, my eyes everywhere, hoping that the curtain at the end would be lifted, and in her pretty white apron, Mariette would appear, smiling, a finger on her lips; and I quietly prepared to take the egg from my pocket, that she might see that I had received it and that I understood.

"A propos of this," said the pastry-cook, rolling the paper bag between his fat fingers, "has the farce succeeded?"

I looked at him in astonishment, not understanding.

"Ah, but you are not, perhaps, in the game," said he. "Your colleagues told us the story last evening. They came to buy an Easter egg, which they wished to send to a silly friend of theirs, to make him think that the present came from a beautiful unknown, for whom he had been sighing for two months."

It seemed that everything was turning round me.

"They wanted one," he continued, "with a suitable motto. Mariette found an old one of last year for them However, they will tell you the story better than I, but this much I can say: they laughed very heartily as they tied their little package with a beautiful pink ribbon. A propos, I had forgotten to tell you the principal thing, and, to a customer like you, that would be impolite! My niece will no longer serve you with gum drops. She is to be married in eight days. Her future family has come to visit her this morning, and this evening a grand betrothal dinner will be given. Ah, it will be a great affair!"

And, bursting with laughter and pleasure, he slapped me on the shoulder. The shock was too rude—I fell back limply on a chair, unable to say a word. Under me I heard a crash. It was the egg which broke. I had sat upon it. Fortunately, a customer entered, and I went out immediately.

"You have forgotten your gum drops," called the pastrycook.

"Thank you," said I, and taking the little bag I rushed away. I wished to be at home—alone with myself.

In passing the porter's lodge I saw my colleagues still there. I passed bravely by them, and went up the stairs singing. But once in my room, I sadly removed my coat, and plunged my hand in my pocket to see what remained of my poor Easter egg. It was in crumbs.

Easter fell this year on the first of April—I had forgotten. It was in looking at the calendar that there came back to me the remembrance of this little story.

CHAPTER VI.

Diplomacy at Fault.

Sir Richard Arbuthnot stepped briskly along the front at Brighton towards Hove. The wind coming from the sea dashed the waves with sounding force against the wall, and flung the spray high overhead. Here and there frothy patches blew across the asphalt, and stones and weed lay scattered by the railings. The tide was high, and as the white-crested waves rolled to the beach and broke in tumult, small groups of sightseers, daring a cold douche, ran briskly forward to the railings and back, followed by the flying scud. Not always with impunity, for now and again the ringing laughter of children would tell that one of their number had been caught, and he, a hero for the moment amongst his playfellows, ran back to safety, wet but happy.

The sun shone brightly, and tempted many to brave the biting wind, so that Sir Richard found his way barred many a time by groups of people retreating from some heavy rush of bubbling water. But he did not linger; he was there on an errand not to his liking. His thoughts were elsewhere.

But for an exclamation of impatience as some hurrying child cannoned against his legs, he paid no attention to the scene around.

At length he turned to the King's Road, and drawing an envelope from his pocket read an address. "Alpha Villas," he muttered; "an ominous name. The beginning of the alphabet; I wish we could skip all the other letters and reach the end. There will be a row, I know. What could possess that silly boy to run his head into the noose a second time passes my comprehension. I freed him from the entanglement once—got no thanks by-the-way—and now—— Why will men make such fools of themselves about women? Ah! well, Dick, my boy, strictly between ourselves, you need not say too much. But this must be the house. No. 17, yes, I know the type, tawdry, dingy neighbours either side, a bright clean villa, with an air, in between. I wonder if the lady will see me?"

Of the maid who answered the bell, he asked if Mrs. Dennison were at home, handed her a card and waited in the porch.

Presently the maid returned with a message that her mistress was indisposed and could not see the gentleman.

"Now, look here," said Sir Richard to the girl, "I must see your mistress. You tell her I have come from London on purpose, and I am not going back again until I have seen her. I will send out for sandwiches and some beer and sit on the doorstep until she is ready. Now, tell her that."

After a few minutes Sir Richard was requested to enter, and turning into a tiny drawing-room, which opened into a smaller conservatory, found himself face to face with Nelly.

Standing in the centre of the room, drawn to her full height, with flashing eyes and head thrown back, she angrily demanded, as soon as he entered:

"How dare you come into my house in this way, Sir Richard Arbuthnot?"

"Mrs. Dennison?" he queried with a smile and bow.

"You know I am Mrs. Dennison," she answered with heightened colour, "but my question?"

"Not so fast, my dear young lady. I want to have some conversation with you. But with your permission I will take a chair."

"You will evidently do as you please."

"That I confess has been my aim in life. But will you not be seated also? I may keep you some little time."

"You assume that I will allow you to remain?"

"I think you will not turn me out to eat sandwiches on your doorstep. Now, please sit down. That is better; now we may talk more at ease."

"I have no wish to talk at all. I am waiting to hear why you have intruded here. You must know I hate you, and with good reason."

"Hate, eh," said Sir Richard with affected surprise, "why, what have I done?"

"Did you not take Roy away from me months ago? Do you not come here to do so again?"

"Now, my dear lady——"

"Do not speak to me like that. It is an impertinence," she broke in hotly.

"I beg your pardon, but you are very charming, and the phrase came naturally. Now, don't interrupt again. We shall never get on at this rate. It is about Roy I have come to speak. I need not go into the past, I am a man of the world, and was young once, and now that I have the pleasure of seeing Mrs. Dennison I can appreciate his temptation, I can——"

She sprang to her feet in anger.

"You madden me, you insult me with a compliment. For Heaven's sake say what you have to say and go. Am I to ring the bell and have you shown to the door?"

But he only smiled amusedly, as he resumed.

"Pray sit down again. You excite yourself into quite unnecessary anger. I meant no insult, I meant what I said, and had no second thought. You are a handsome woman in anger; you can, I am sure, be charming in every mood. Now, my de——, there, I forgot for the moment I must not say that. I am not here to make you angry, I am here as Roy's father. What was is past, the present is my concern. Of course, he does not know I have called upon you. Roy is married, as you know. His wife would not stand this—affair, shall I call it? Few wives would; I appeal to you to put a stop to it. It can only end in disaster for him and her. I know, of course, that my daughter came to your rooms when Roy was there. He has made his peace. She believes this ended. Misery, ruin, regret, stare him in the face if she discover that he has lied. It is not too late, but it will be so soon."

"And I? You do not consider me."

"We do not expect you to starve. We will be most happy to make arrangements."

"Stop, stop, Sir Richard; you speak of we for the first time. Are you here with Roy's sanction? Mind, I ask the truth, and will verify your reply, for frankly I do not trust you."

"Now that is not fair," he said, but not in an offended tone. In truth, he admired what he mistook for a business-like grasp of the situation. But he was not prepared to lie. "No," he proceeded, "I have already said Roy does not know I am here."

"Thank Heaven!" she exclaimed.

Then he saw his mistake. Still, he could not believe that money would not smooth away difficulties. He must be circumspect, but anticipated success.

"Of course," he proceeded, "I do not intend that you should suffer pecuniarily. That I trust you will permit me to make my business. I will instruct my lawyers to——"

She buried her face in her hands and moaned:

"Lawyers! How cold, how pitiless you are! I love him, I tell you—love him with a love of which you know nothing, and you talk of lawyers! Oh, I shall go mad! In pity go. If you wanted revenge, if you wanted to wound me, be content; you have crushed me. Oh, go, go!"

"Revenge — wound! Not I. No such thought entered my head. I hoped we were upon a business footing. I offer you a bargain. No, do not wince; you do not like the word. It is an ugly one, perhaps, but sentiment has long been dead with me. As men grow older, sentiment, gush, love—er—of this sort, lose their grip before the real force of common-sense. The intangible gives place to the tangible. Roy cannot, would not, put it so. He is infatuated, reckless. Yes, I feared that would please you; but I, his father, see but ruin ahead, absolute social ruin and misery for him and her. Again I appeal to you. My daughter-in-law is a good, pure woman. Think of her. It is not too late; she knows nothing of this. She believes Roy to be true; now she has forgiven, she loves him."

She sprang to her feet and faced him with flashing eyes. That last phrase had undone the effect of his appeal.

"She has no right to love him—he is mine, mine, I say. She bought him. He married her to save you. Oh, I know! You were on the verge of bankruptcy. He had no choice. You forced on the marriage. He loves me—I hate her!"

She paced up and down the small room with brows knitted and hands clenched. She had no thought for the man who sat before her, silenced by her passionate outburst. She saw but Roy as she had seen him last, confident, happy, the old smile upon his face, the smile she knew so well and which, as a fact, had long been absent.

They had cast in their lot together; come what might, they had sworn eternal love. She paused before the window, and unconsciously followed the whirling movements of a few crisp, dry leaves which, torn by the gale from a stunted oak, rustled across the pavement.

The lines across her face smoothed out, a smile puckered the corners of her eyes, she no longer stooped as but a few moments ago. She looked into a dingy street, true, but the mental vision soared far and away above the driving clouds into bright sunshine.

Sir Richard's clear, cold voice startled her as he said: "Well, Mrs. Dennison, what is your answer? You do not refuse my offer, I hope. Now, do not be hasty," as he noted her quick turn and the light in her eyes, "I will come later, if you wish. Take time to think it over. Yes, that will be best, think it over. Upon your decision the happiness of many depends."

Never before had Dick Arbuthnot felt so uncomfortable, never had he felt so small. Many a time in the past had his good offices been in request on behalf of friends who wished to make other arrangements; then he had carried matters with a high hand, had offered terms and seen them accepted, but now before she spoke he knew he had failed.

For once his confidence failed him, and though he attempted an easy mien it was but a sorry effort.

"No need to wait, to think it over. You have my answer now. Until Roy asks me to free him I will not. You are utterly selfish; your pleading, up to a point, moved me. Then you offered gold, gold which must come from her; you have none, you have been a beggar for years past. It is your turn to wince now. Hear me out; this is my scene." And as anger mastered her control, she stood before him with hand outstretched pointed to him. "She whom I hate and detest may never know, but the money you offer would come from her purse. You—yes, you, immaculate you—would manage that. You would buy me with her money, and Roy does not know. You think yourself a good diplomatist; I tell you, you are puny, despicable! Go your way; I refuse to listen to you. Go!" and she rang the bell violently. "The door, Frances," as the maid appeared hurriedly.

"One minute, please." Then, turning to the maid, he said, in tones she obeyed mechanically: "Step outside that door and close it." Then he proceeded. "Now, Mrs. Dennison, you have refused my offer, to my great regret. I will not reopen that subject for the present, but I appeal to you to be discreet. You know Roy is at the Métropôle; perhaps you do not know his wife is there also. I beg of you, let there be no scandal. You said in anger just now you hated her. In calmer moments you would not, I am sure, say that; you would not wish to. But there, you understand me. May I hope you will do me this favour?"

As Sir Richard, crestfallen, returned to the Métropôle, battling with the wind, which was rising to the force of a gale, he irritably reviled this woman who had defied him, and all concerned, except himself. His well-meant effort had been a failure; but as his natural buoyancy returned, he did not dream of attributing want of success to his inability.

CHAPTER VII.

Saved in Error.

Roy Arbuthnot, in the meantime, had gone for a ride, and alone. From the front he had turned to the north, past the gas works at Hove, and then some distance on.

leaving the road, he had followed the path across the fields to a solitary farmhouse, which nestled amongst trees at the foot of a steep hill, upon the summit of which a tiny church reared its square tower, sombre and grey. A solitary building, mean and unpretentious in design, where, at most, some twenty or thirty worshippers regularly assembled each week, as their forefathers had done, and were content with the simple ritual, untroubled with doubts and modern innovations, under the guidance of the Vicar, who had led their devotions for a generation.

Here the wind moaned high overhead, bending the topmost boughs of the taller trees, whistling round the old grey tower, but leaving in peace the quiet valley where he paused.

Over the farm buildings the few remaining leaves of a luxuriantly-climbing creeper glowed a deep russet red, some grand old oaks, which had not yet shed their leaves, rustled and quivered in querulous age. The hedgerows still were green, and here and there a bright mass of red berries stood out in bold relief before a background of deep green holly. The ducks and geese in the pond by the gates made much of the warm sunshine, pluming themselves with noisy splashing of wings in the dark water, and chattering incessantly in language they doubtless understood.

On another occasion, in a different mood, he would have appreciated the quiet beauty of the scene, the restfulness of the surroundings, but to-day he longed for action. Impatiently he pressed his horse against the hill opposite, and galloped along the ride which crosses the golf-links at a speed which the animal he rode did not appreciate.

On the high land the wind spent its full force, screaming through the gorse, and bending before it the yielding bracken-like waves of an oily sea. He drew bridle only at the Dyke, to admire, perhaps, the finest view of Southern England. On this sharp wintry day no tourists were about to offend ears and eyes by inane shoutings and boisterous horse-play.

At his feet, deep in the valley, lay a peaceful hamlet, dreaming its life, a life of dull routine, to which excitement and bustle were but names, but which had compensations in absence of these very points. And beyond, far as the eyes could reach, like a well-drawn map, stretched field upon field, homestead after homestead, the hedges standing out darkly across the green, which alternately paled and deepened as scudding clouds crossed the sun—a network framed by man on Nature's foundation, the parts of a puzzle fitting closely with no patch left blank; and in the blue distance range upon range of hills, until an indistinct blur marked the limit of human vision.

But he could not enjoy the panorama of beauty spread before him. He was troubled with the spirit of unrest. The wind howled around the desolate inn, and flapped the cords against the flagstaff with short, sharp cracks which irritated. The surroundings were in contrast. Here, on the summit of the hill, were rush and roar; below, in the valley, peace and quietude. He would face the gale, and turning, again cantered over the springy turf of the downs right in its teeth.

And now the blood tingled in his veins, his spirits rose as the fierce gusts beat upon him, and he pressed his knees against the willing sides of the game chestnut which caught something of his master's mood, and with distended nostril, forced his way onward at reckless speed.

At length, soothed, perhaps tired with battle, he slackened speed, and turning homewards, jogged quietly to the hotel. There he learned that Mary and his father had gone upon the pier to watch the breakers roll to the shore.

Nelly, when Sir Richard had left, had indulged in a fit of crying. She had flung herself upon a couch and sobbed hysterically. It was all too cruel. No one had any thought for her. Sinclair, his father, each thought only of Roy and his wife. She was not even considered. She was a pawn in this game of chess, of little or no account. She was utterly, unspeakably miserable.

Why follow her mood through? There is no need. The inevitable reaction followed. The reaction which prevents more suicides than does qualm of conscience or scruple. Gradually she braced herself to fight, to see it through. Roy's wife was at Brighton—she would see her again and judge of the chances of the coming struggle.

She washed away the traces of tears, and dressing with perhaps more than usual care, set out for a walk. Battling with the boisterous wind, which whirled her skirts closely round, fighting for foothold as each strong gust threatened to carry her off her feet, she pressed on. Her combative instincts had been braced this morning, and now she relished this struggle with the elements which at any rate fought fair. She laughed joyously at each fresh challenge of strength, and at repeated victories.

After all, this noisy but humourous antagonist could do no more than reveal a shapely ankle for a few seconds, and a dexterous twirl of drapery robbed him and others of that pleasure. The colour mounted to her cheeks, she was, and she knew it, as dainty a specimen of English womanhood as Brighton contained. Hers was not the mind to brood long over worries; hers was an elastic temperament which rebounded easily. The interview with Sir Richard had crushed her for the time being, but knowing herself, she had prescribed this cure, and found it efficacious. She had even for the moment forgotten the object of this hard tussle; she was a beautiful animal warring amiably against a rough yet chivalrous enemy, and she enjoyed it.

Before she realised where she had got to, she was opposite the Métropôle. With a start, she stopped, for on the steps she saw Sir Richard Arbuthnot, holding his hat on with one hand, whilst with the other, he pointed to the pier, and apparently was asking a lady by his side to go there.

This must be Roy's wife. Yes, she saw it was, and Nelly turned, and followed them at a distance. She noted that Mary, for her style, was a handsome woman. She reluctantly admitted that. She was a formidable rival, she had allowed that already.

Digitized by Google

Anger, jealousy, returned. With frowning brows and pale cheeks, she followed them along the pier. If only this woman were out of the way, if only she were dead, Roy would, she knew, marry her, despite all. The thought was maddening. She was a murderess in thought, utterly reckless. Mary dead! Impossible. There, in front, she stepped with the free, easy swing of perfect health. The sea beneath rolled with majestic sweep in white-crested billows to the shore, to burst in roar and tumult upon the shingle.

She felt she could laugh to see Mary caught on the crest of a huge wave, and dashed lifeless on the stones, with froth and weed for a shroud. She shuddered; it was too horrible, but it was real. She was not herself yet as she followed them along the pier; the hideous thought would come: if only it could be! If only some accident would clear her path.

And Roy was but a few yards away, though he did not see her.

In front of her Sir Richard and Mary, bending low to meet the wind, were passing to the head of the pier, where a small knot of people stood watching the waves hiss and foam through the iron grating of the lower landing steps. The rail on the leeward side had been removed for the purpose of carrying out some repairs then in progress.

As Mary fearlessly stood by the edge of the pier, Nelly reached her side. Without warning a heavy squall struck the pier.

Through the air there flew a human form to fall upon the crest of a broken wave, whilst above the roar, a voice shrieked: "Roy, Roy!"

"Heavens, Nelly!" shouted Roy to the gale, and throwing off coat and vest, plunged into the sea. His was a hard fight. Time and again he almost gave up the struggle. His strength failed, the blinding spray filled his eyes. His breath came in short, painful gasps. Rolled over in the surf, buffeted by the pitiless waves, he, yet with his burden, was driven shorewards. Once he thought he heard encouraging shouts, directions it might be. Then came—a blank.

A glimmer of reason returned as he lay upon the beach beyond the reach of the waves, with strong arms holding him. By his side lay motionless, a woman, and as he turned he saw Mary.

"Good heavens, my wife!"

Hours later as the tide receded, loungers by the beach saw another form twisting in the surging water, now close in, now drawn back with the suck of a retreating wave. And when at length it was recovered, there lay a beautiful woman with long, auburn hair, which clung around her face and in part concealed an ugly gash across a fair brow.

* * * * *

Again May had arrived, and Sir Richard Arbuthnot was in town for the season. He had met Sinclair in Bond Street, and he was now answering a string of questions.

"Roy? Yes, he's in the country and likely to remain there for the present. He was much cut up about that Brighton business. Sad, you say? Well, in a way, yes, but most opportune. She could not have chosen a more fitting time, nor, as it turned out, a more telling manner of quitting life. She pushed Mary into the sea. Nonsense? I tell you I saw her do it. You can't believe it? Ah, my boy, you, perhaps, have not seen her in a rage. I have.

"She once assumed, for my benefit, the tragedy queen business, and did it well, too. I have no doubt she overbalanced and the sudden squall helped. She must have struck a girder as she fell, and sank like a stone. I was on the beach and helped to pull Roy in. Of course, Mary thinks he went over to save her, and she worships Roy. She will never learn the truth. By-the-way, do you know there is a son and heir? All goes well, in fact. Roy's health? Well, might be better, perhaps. He broods a good deal, and worries; but he always was too sensitive. Give him time. You are in a hurry, I see. Well, good-bye! See you to-night, I suppose."

THE VOW of KING VENDIS.

An Atlantis Story.

IN the palmy days of old Atlantis, when her armies were invincible and her fleets swept the sea with uniform victory, and her colonies were prosperous and loyal, Prince Vendis came to the Golden Throne of his father Dulo, in the six-and-fortieth year of his age.

King Dulo the Seventh had been a ruler of kind heart and slow wit, too simple and trusting for a monarch of a restless people, and his reign had been a record of misfortunes and losses of legal privilege and dignity, second only to the record of Unlucky Atripan. But it has passed into a by-word that delicate children make old folks and fragile buildings are the last to be destroyed, and so it happened, that for all his lucklessness, King Dulo reigned long and undisputedly, leaving the throne to his only son when Vendis was a man past the prime of life, and over-worn with dissipation and Court living.

Many were the forebodings of the priests as to the future of Atlantis when the Prince put on the crown after his father was buried in the pyramid of Kronos; yet their fears proved baseless in the end. Power and responsibility brought sobriety and wisdom to Vendis, and he set himself to regain what his father had lost, to curb the usurpations of the nobles, to check the avarice of the priests, to make himself a king in deed as well as in name.

He succeeded well, and under his sway the people settled down, glad to feel a master-hand at the helm of the ship of state, and for ten years there was peace in Atlantis, and all her Court intrigues were set at rest.

But happiness is never the lot of mortals for long together, and trouble came to King Vendis towards the last.

Like his father, he had one child only—a son—and, like himself, Prince Sanim was grown past his youth before he saw the end of his father's reign. Now Sanim was a goodly-looking man, with brown curly locks and ruddy face, and a stalwart figure that women loved to see, and it was openly bruited about at the palace that the hands of the most high-born and beauteous maidens in the land were his for the asking. Bright eyes, and honeyed words, and tender glances, were ever ready for him at the banquets and state ceremonials, and they were many who envied his lot.

But though his father besought him often to make his choice from amongst these, particularly wishing him to marry the daughter of one Dernon, a rich noble governor of the Province of Aidè, Prince Sanim would have none of them, seeking instead amongst the women of the poorer classes for a wife.

So a coolness grew between the King and his son, and their lives drifted apart, Sanim dwelling chiefly in the old Palace of Miropis, the ancient capital, doing as his desires listed; and one day a messenger came to Vendis whilst he was seated in the Hall of Audience, and spoke secretly in his ear. A blackness as of the Shadows grew upon the King's face as he listened to the news, and the messenger trembled as he saw the Royal hand fly to the sword hilt.

"Art sure that this is a true tale, slave?" cried Vendis, with menace in his tone. "Wilt swear it by the Spirit of Truth; by the Eternal Three?"

"I swear it, King," said the terrified bearer of ill tidings, "by all and every spirit known to men! It is a true tale I have brought thee."

"Then tell it to my counsellors and people, slave," said Vendis, seizing his crown and dashing it to the carpet in front of the throne. "Tell it to them, so that all men may know how my son hath brought disgrace upon me and upon my father's house and upon the banner of Atlantis. Tell it them, I command thee."

The Nubian slave, knowing full well the stern nature of the King, stood forth and told his tale. And these were his words:

"I am sent here from Miropis, by the Priests of Truth that guard the Sacred Grotto, to tell unto the King the sad news that his only son, Prince Sanim, hath taken unto himself a wife without his knowledge, and, moreover, a woman who is of no good repute, the daughter of a pirate captain, whose ship has sorely ravaged our coast.

"And even this is not the worst. In the blood of this woman runs the blood of the foreigners of the eastern isles, and their marriage having been consummated in secret for more than a year, the two have already a child—a son—whom the Prince has named Dulo, after thy father, King. And the wife of the Prince is beautiful, and he loves her greatly, and hath sworn to make their child our future king, and the priests predict that his wish shall be fulfilled. And more than this I know not."

A murmur of consternation, of surprise, of perplexity, went round the vaulted chamber, and in the midst of it the slave stood trembling, fearful lest the weight of the Royal anger should fall upon him, the bringer of the evil news. As the murmur died away, Acron, the Secretary, picked up the crown and placed it once more on the King's head, and, with the gleam of a set resolve flushing his features, Vendis rose.

"'Tis well thou knowest no more, slave," he said, his voice ringing hard and stern, "for what thou dost know is enough to turn my greying hairs to white and plunge a nation into sorrow. But stand thou there, at my side, and fear not; I may want thee again.

"And to you, my people and ministers, what can I say? How can I look up again to the Spirits who have guarded Atlantis from her birth when I know that my son hath desecrated our line by wedlock with a woman of foreign blood, and would place her child upon the sacred throne? To you, my people, I can say little, save that my heart is grieved beyond the power of words to tell, and that rather than this, I would know that my son—who shall no longer be a son of mine—was lying dead, a hundred fathoms deep below the waves of the sea.

"But this I can say to the Eternal Spirits, this I can vow to them, by all that a man and a king may hold most dear; that neither Sanim, who was my son, nor his wife, nor their son, nor any children they may have, shall ever sit upon the Golden Throne of Atlantis. By the Three Spirits I make this vow. By all that is on earth, and in the sea, and in the Land of Shadows beyond the grave, I make it. By all I love and cherish, by my title and my dignity, and in the name of our loved Atlantis, I swear it. By Amarunth, the God of Death, I swear this vow: Sanim, who was my son, shall never come to the Golden Throne on which Queen Unnalala sat, nor shall his wife nor any of his children. I have spoken words beyond recall."

And raising his sword high above his head, King Vendis once more repeated the awful vow to the Eternal Three; the vow that might never be broken. And the people answered with a murmur of approval, though some, friends of the Prince, were silent, and turned sorrowfully away. Then Vendis spoke to the slave again:

"Go straightway to Miropis," said he, "and give Sanim word of what I have sworn this day, and add, that even though he come to me, and weep tears of blood at my knees, that which is done cannot be undone. And tell him, moreover, that it were better he never saw my face again; that it were better he shook the dust of his native land from off his feet, and sought a home amongst the people of the eastern isles whom he has run after to make his kith and kin. And say also, to those meddling priests of the Sanctuary of the Sleeper, that I hold their prophecies of small account, and that it is in my mind to raise one of our brave generals to the throne when the mists of death begin to dim my eyes. Tell them this, and may all the land know it also .... And you, my ministers, leave me, for the blow is a sore one, and I would fain be alone awhile.'

The slave, swift of foot, departed on his errand, the Royal Guard cleared the Audience Chamber of the crowd, and King Vendis passed beneath the purple curtain to his own room. And for forty days, as at the death of his wife, Viola, the Royal household went into mourning.

Bactri the slave was a trusty messenger, and in due time came to the palace at Miropis and told the Prince what the King had said.

Sanim heard him to the end with unmoved face, though there was a terrible fire in his eyes, and when he had heard all, he bent his head, as though in submission. Then he dismissed the Nubian with a handsome present, and went into the inner hall and told Isida, his wife. It was then the morning, and before noon the whole city was agog with the news, and many of the more reckless spirits of the place were for acclaiming Sanim as their King and setting up in open revolt.

But Sanim would have none of it, and bade them get ready his favourite pleasure barque, and just as the even shades began to fall, went down to the harbour with his wife and child and got aboard. A mournful crowd of the people went to the water's edge to bid him good speed in parting token of their esteem, and as the graceful vessel gathered way under the impulse of her hundred oars and swept swiftly down the narrow channel to the bosom of the sea, Prince Sanim felt a choking in his throat and a strange dimness before his eyes.

The ship held on, the cheering of the people grew fainter and more faint until it ceased, the lights came together in a cluster of brilliant points that faded to a haze on the horizon, and the outcast turned his gaze away, and seized Isida in his arms and kissed her fiercely and then the babe that nestled at her breast, and then strode to the bow, muttering angrily to himself. And how the gay ship fared thereafter was never known, for no native of Atlantis ever saw its lines of symmetry again.

Now King Vendis grew old and weary of his life, and repented him of the rashness of the vow he had made but could not undo. The fawning flatteries of the Court grew less pleasant to his ears, the pomp and panoply of martial ceremonial less pleasing to his eyes, the droning of the priestly services distasteful to his soul, and more and more he passed his time upon the sea, aboard his favourite warship, chasing the pirates, and learning, in his latter years, the arts of naval war.

Four years after the banishment of Sanim, being then in his sixty-first year, King Vendis put off in the bright glow of a summer noon from the harbour of Kronos, with a squadron of ships, headed by his vessel, the Monarch of Storms. The captains put their prows to the east, for the ships were well filled with men, and they had certain news of the whereabouts of a pirate flotilla that had long been a terror to the coast. And chief of that pirate fleet—seen now and then, and never at one place twice or for long—was a rakish, low-built craft, with queer rigging, and monstrous lion-head upon her upcurved prow. This ship was a scourge to the merchant vessels that poured the luxuries of the far-off East into the ports of Atlantis, and it was whispered by some who had seen it that it was commanded by a reckless Atlantian and his lovely wife, and that he was none other than Sanim the Prince. But there were others who denied this.

So King Vendis paced the deck of his great ship in sullen mood as the leagues of glittering amethyst were overpassed on the way to the isles set in the sunny eastern sea, and not until the squadron came in sight of a dozen pirate vessels making northward, did his interest awaken. Then he ordered all speed to be put on, and after the now flying vessels the seven royal ships foamed on through the tumbling waves, in the teeth of a rising gale.

The chase was a long and stern one, but the warships slowly gained, and by nightfall of that day the Monarch of Storms was within a cable's length of the rearmost foe, and her six consorts were far behind, visible only as black specks in the wild waste of waters. The pirate strove to tack and so escape, but the great ship was too near, and drove on resistless through the seething spray, and her sharp-cutting prow, catching the doomed craft on the port-bow, shore her in twain and passed on. The severed fragments of the wreck, with the shrieking robbers aboard, floated a moment on the angry sea, then were swallowed up in the fury of the storm and the blackness of the night. The Monarch of Storms held on with scarcely a shiver of her staunch timbers, and the face of the King wore a grim smile of joy.

But the gale was now a tempest. The wind howled wildly through the rigging, and tore the lashing waves in giant furrows; the rain came down in a deluge that drenched the crew to the very skin. Out of the thick darkness of the cloud-banked sky came the flashes of the lightning and the rolling roar of the thunder-wheels of the gods, and when Vendis and his sailors looked around they saw only through the driving murk the fleet of pirate vessels speeding on in front. Behind was now no speck to break the wild greyness of the billowy expanse.

Through the stormy night the stern pursuit went on, and when the sun arose upon the waters, Vendis saw that nine ships only of the foe remained. But these now lay to and waited his coming, and as the Monarch of Storms forged up to them, closed round, and beset her on all sides. In his old age the King had grown reckless, and so refused to escape, bidding his men, with set, flushed face, be ready for the fray. One more ship they rammed ere they were boarded on bow and stern and quarters, and one they disabled beyond repair, but the other seven hung round the great ship as dogs round the hart driven to bay at last, and those tough pirates fought desperately when roused.

Yet the crew of the Monarch of Storms was an old and well tried one, and equal in number to three of the others, and they fought hard, and died well, standing there amidships round their King, and the robbers began to fear lest the combat should be prolonged till some of the other royal craft came on the scene.

Now Vendis had noted with wonder that the famous ship with the lion-headed prow was not amongst the hostile fleet, and was in secret glad, because of the rumour, but in the midst of the struggle, just as his keen blade struck one of the robber captains to the wet and slippery deck, he beheld the very vessel of his thought approaching on the leeward bow, riding the calming sea as lightly as a bird. And two figures there were upon her deck that made Vendis sick at heart—for one was Sanim his son, and the other a woman of surpassing loveliness. The King dashed the salt glaze from his face and plunged into the fight anew at that sight, and of the fifty sailors who now remained, none fought so desperately as he.

Now the lion-headed ship joined the rest, and her crew mingled with the others, and one by one the sailors were cut down, till presently Vendis alone was left, facing a ring of pitiless foes—wounded, weary, and forlorn. His grey and white hair and his evil plight might have moved some men to mercy, but the pirates were made of stern stuff, and closed round him with cries of revenge; and one giant of a fellow, Lycian by name, a grim and grizzled veteran of the deep, smote the King's sword out of the weakening fingers, and upraised his own broad gleaming blade to strike the fatal blow. A strange numbness seized King Vendis, a singing came in his ears, and he put his hand to his eyes as he leant against the mast, waiting for the moment of death.

But it came not. A man broke through the jeering ring with a woman at his side, and whilst his sword flew up and dashed away the falling blade, the woman threw herself between the victors and the vanquished, shielding the old man with her graceful form, as he sank to the deck in weakness. Sanim's act came just in time, yet so strong and forceful was big Lycian's stroke that his sword point swept down within an inch of Isida's heaving breast, even cutting a little gash in the linen of her tunic.

"Back, you! Murderers all!" cried the Prince. "Have I not cautioned you against this deed? Would you have me the slayer of my father, or the captain of his slayers? Back, all of you, and leave us!"

The men, obedient, and amazed at Isida's daring for the sake of her husband's father, shrank back to the decks of the nearer ships, leaving the three alone. Then Sanim raised the King, his father, from the deck, and Isida staunched his wounds and cleansed his face and spoke to him words of loving care. For awhile Vendis answered not, though tears stood in his eyes and his hands trembled in her grasp. Then he said, slowly:

"The Spirits be thanked for this day! Now I know that my son is no rebel but a son indeed, and fit to be a King, and that his wife is lovely indeed, and worthy to be his Queen. The gods be praised for this day of ill-fortune!"

"But the vow—the vow that cannot be recalled?" said Sanim. "What of that? Thou canst not make me King now, howsoever thou mayst wish. Thou canst not undo the evil that thou didst in thy passion, and which has embittered me against thee ever since until this day."

"Be not too sure, my son," said Vendis, recovering a little, a queer smile growing on his face. "I may yet set thee upon the throne of Atlantis, though I may not break my word. Wilt thou be my son again, and forget and forgive; and wilt thou, lovely one, be as a daughter to me, and pardon the past, if I can do this?"

"Right wil ingly!" they cried together, and while the puckers of perplexity gathered deeper on the brow of the Prince, Isida bent down and kissed the old man on the lips.

"It is well," he said, with a sigh of satisfaction. "Now do as I command, Sanim, remembering that I am King Vendis and thou art the Prince, my son. First call me thy most trusted men hither, so that I may speak with them, and then—if things fall out as I expect—thou wilt come back to Kronos with me and live in my palace till that end comes, which I feel is not far off."

Sanim summoned the men as he was bid, and the scarred and sour-faced pirates stood round, a strangely silent line. The King was now so far recovered that he was able to support himself against the mast.

"My stalwart men," he said, and there was a royal ring in his tone, "I have but little to say to you, in whose power I am, but that little will be no supplication for mercy. "I am still your King, and I ask you to leave your reckless and uncertain life and take service with me. If you will bring your arms and your ships, your tough sinews and stern wills, into my fleet, you shall have riches and honours galore and no past faults shall be remembered against you. It is your King who asks and offers this."

A moment there was silence and suspense among those rough-and-ready robbers of the sea, then Lycian threw down his sword at the King's feet and knelt upon it, and swore by Amarunth that henceforward the King would have no trustier servant than he. And with that the others joined him in a shout of boisterous acclamation that startled the flying gulls, and raised their weapons to the sky in token of the self-same will. The last shadow of sorrow left the King's face.

"Well said, my worthy sailors," he answered. "I have fought many fights upon the sea, and won many victories, but to-day's defeat hath pleased more than any of them. I am but an old man on the shore of the Shadows, and I feel that Atlantis will not know me long, so now I would return and see my son enthroned before fate intervenes. You will man this noble ship at once, and set your prows for Atlantis and for home."

The sailors, with veterans' eyes, conned the powerful build and matchless lines of the great battleship with exultant joy, and as the seven pirate ships turned their bows to the westward, the Monarch of Storms swept grandly to the front and led the way to the harbour of Kronos, her new crew chanting the rollicking refrain of the "Ina-Ana," the war-song of the seas.

A fleet came out to meet them as they neared the bar on which the white surf rose, a fleet of many ships, for the people thought it was a pirate raid, but King Vendis stood high on the deck of his ship, with Sanim and Isida at his side, and when the captains saw that they turned about with joy, and a swift barque bore the news to the city, and all became excitement and pleasure and boundless amaze.

That very day the King gave secret orders to sundry of his artificers, and sent out word by his heralds that rejoicing must be made at the coming home of his son the Prince, and Isida the future Queen, and their little one, Dulo, for he was reconciled to them again and before many days Sanim would be made King.

On the eve of the eventful day the Stately City held high carnival, and in the bright, propitious morning, as the hour drew near, a crowd congregated in the pillared palace courts, and the grey-clad soldiers had much ado to keep the thronging thousands within the limits set for them. But their task was not a hard one, for the eager citizens were full of good nature and high spirits, and passed the time of waiting with jest and song.

A great roar of acclaim went up as the prancing steeds and the golden-filigreed car drew up at the marble steps, and Vendis and his grandson stepped out and bowed together to the people, and Sanim and Isida followed, and all went into the palace and stood in the open place before the throne. The priests and nobles went in after them, and then all the populace who could find standing room, and as every man went in a look of surprise grew on his face, and over the whole assembly a spell of silence fell.

For at the foot of the throne steps, where the royal party stood, lay a massive ingot of solid gold, gleaming dully yellow in the softened light, and over the throne itself was thrown a covering of purple cloth. And behind the seat stood Bactri the slave—high now in the King's favour—and behind him the repentant pirates, a grim-visaged group.

"What meaneth this?" cried a voice from the crowd.

In answer, Acron the secretary stood forth, and bowing low to Prince Sanim, said:

"King, I salute thee! This day, as he hath declared in the temple, Vendis, our former King, giveth his crown and his sword, and his dignity, and the throne of Atlantis, into thy keeping whilst thou livest."

"But the vow!" cried Namen, the priest of Truth. "The vow! By all the laws and customs of Atlantis, the King cannot do this thing. He hath given his word, sworn to the gods an oath that may never be broken."

A murmur of disappointment, mingled with anger, rose from the mighty throng, but Vendis smiled quietly as he said:

"Nor shall I break my vow. What said I, Bactri, when I swore it?"

"These were thy words, King," said the Nubian slave with a glitter of mirth in his coal-black eyes. "That by the Eternal Spirits and all that a man and a king may hold dear, neither Sanim, who was thy son, nor his wife, nor their son, nor any children of theirs, should ever sit upon the Golden Throne of Atlantis. By all the gods, by all things, thou madest this vow: That Sanim, who was thy son, should never come to the Golden Throne, nor should his wife, nor any of his children. That was thy vow, King."

The face of Sanim darkened as he heard the words, and Isida's clouded with sorrow, and perplexity came to many, but Vendis remained calm.

"And that vow I shall preserve," he said. "Sanim, my son shall never sit upon the Golden Throne, nor shall any King of Atlantis ever sit upon it again. But upon the throne of Atlantis shall Sanim, my son, be crowned this day. It is time, slave!"

All eyes were strained upon Bactri as he gathered a corner of the cloth that covered the throne, in his hand, and a cry of astonishment went up as he drew it aside with a sudden movement, revealing a regal chair of pure and polished silver, inlaid with rose-coloured granite and ivory stars.

"Go forward, Sanim," cried his father, in the silence, "and Namen shall place the crown upon thy head; and thou, Isida, shall sit beside him and be his Queen. As for little Dulo, he shall stay here with me."

Acting as one in a dream, Sanim obeyed, and was made King; the first King of Atlantis who was crowned on the Silver Throne. And upon that self-same silver seat was Arnon, its last King, crowned, in the days of the end.

"And where is the Golden Throne that has so long been used?" asked one.

"It is here," said Vendis, placing his foot on the ingot of gold. "And half of it shall be given in equal parts to the stalwart pirates who rallied to my flag in the hour of their success, and the other half shall be given amongst all those in Kronos who are poor and in need. And now come with me, little Dulo, for I am weary already and would fain rest."

A thunderous roar of appraise rose from a thousand throats as the ex-King and his little grandson the Prince went out and stepped into their car to be whirled off to the palace in the suburbs. And as the rattle of the chariot wheels died away and King Sanim turned to Queen Isida his wife with words of love upon his lips, the trained priests led the people in the joyful chorus of a festive song.

Answers to Correspondents.

Half-a-Dozen volumes of Mr. Louis Tracy's book, "The Final War," will be given to the first six readers who correctly place the sketches on pages 502-5 in their proper order with the corresponding reading matter underneath. Simply write on a sheet of paper the numbers of the sketches in the order you believe correct, and alongside each figure place the text. Envelopes to be marked "Reading," and to reach this office by Tuesday, April 20th.

T. H. asks: "What is the cause of cold perspiration?" ——— There are several ways of finding out this by personal experience. Try stepping upon a dog in the dark.

J. F. B. wants to know if there is such a thing as a women's boating club. Yes, at a women's college at Boston, in America, there is a boating "eight" composed entirely of girl students.

D. H. — Alas, there are too many methods of torture employed in Siberia to mention in these columns. One of the most fearful ways in which information is extracted from prisoners is by means of thirst. The victim is fed entirely upon salt herrings, and allowed nothing whatever to drink. This treatment promotes such inconceivable agony that, after a time, he is almost invariably willing to impart whatever is required of him.

G. D.—Do not be disheartened because the parents of the girl you love do not look upon your suit with favour. If she is anything like the rest of her sex, it will only make her all the more determined to marry you.

J. J.—We are very much obliged to you for the trouble you have taken to make Short Stories known amongst your friends. It is indeed the most practical way in which you can show your appreciation of the paper.

The result of the first series of Pearson's Picture Puzzles appears in P. W. dated April 17th.

R. B.—Geraniums are considered an excellent balm for cuts and wounds where the skin is rubbed off. Bruise a few leaves and apply them to the part, and you will find the wound will be cicatrised in a very short time.

R. D. writes to ask me if I can tell him who was the inventor of the "penny-in-the-slot" machines. ——— An American named Everitt was the inventor of the present-day machines. The same principle, however, was used by the Egyptians two hundred years before the Christian era.

Particulars will be found on page 506 regarding Pearson's Athletic Record, one of the new papers issued from this office. Its chief object will be to give full and graphic details of all Saturday's sports, and to publish reports on the subject of cricket, cycling, and swimming, as well as golf, hockey, and lacrosse; and votaries of any one of these sports will find all they wish to know in the Athletic Record. The paper is published every Monday morning, and may be obtained from newsagents and booksellers for a penny.

P. K.—The habit of opium eating kills about 160,000 people in China every year.

D. B. wishes to know if it is possible to obtain a blue rose. ——— No. The law which governs the colouring of flowers makes a blue rose an impossibility.

W. H.—The works of Charles Dickens are more widely read on the Continent than those of any other English novelist. Thackeray and George Eliot are also great favourites abroad.

J. W. A.—Many thanks for the suggestion, but it is impracticable. A single odd sheet cannot be inserted in either Pearson's Weekly or Short Stories unless it is pasted, and the cost of doing this would be prohibitive.

A. Beginner.—If you find that you lose your breath as a result of continuous running, the best thing you can do is to stop it altogether—the running.

A. B.—No; the Arabs eat very little animal food. They live almost entirely on dates and a coarse kind of bread, and seldom drink anything but water.

Engrosser.—If you are troubled with cramp do not write too long at a time, and use a thick-handled pen.

J. Y.—Certainly you can sign your insurance coupon with a copying pencil, provided it is treated in the way you mention.

H. J. Chapman.—Hyde Park would hold 8,712,960 people. This is assuming that all the timber was removed and that the people were allowed to stand on the flower-beds.

H. H. has very sensitive nerves, and is very much annoyed when at a theatre or opera for an evening's enjoyment by the amount of time devoted by the orchestra to the tuning of their instruments. "Why in the world don't they tune up before coming into the orchestra?" he growls. ——— So they do, my dear H. H., but if you knew anything about stringed instruments, you would understand the reason. The slightest change of temperature influences the catgut of the strings—even the performer's own breath affects it. The loosening of a peg or the slightest alteration in the tension of the strings all tend to necessitate a second tuning.

J. M. F.—Subject to certain exemptions, it is still lawful in case of emergency to impress men for service in Her Majesty's service.

E. C. B. is insured with an American life assurance society, and wishes to know if in the event of war occurring between this country and the United States, the company would cease paying the annuity. ——— I should think that the payment would be stopped unless the company had in this country sufficient funds to meet all demands.

A. G. wishes to know if any members of our Royal Family have ever been tattooed. ——— Yes. Both the sons of the Prince of Wales, the late Duke of Clarence and the present Duke of York, were tattooed on the arms while on a visit in Japan. The Duke of Edinburgh was also tattooed by the Japanese.

B. B.—Ships can travel at a greater speed in deep than in shallow water.

L. C. M. (Glasgow).—No glasses are made which fit under the eyelids, unless they have been constructed by a private person for his own use. Even then, I don't see the use of them.

J. H. H.—Such a series of articles as you suggest appeared in Pearson's Weekly some time ago. It was entitled: "How to Succeed," and dealt with all the chief trades.

J. B. C. and Allison.—I dare say you would be able to obtain a bottle of the water from the priest in charge of the Shrine at Lourdes.

In a Fix.—If there is any substance lighter than cork that can be cut into perfectly round balls about the size of a pea with a very smooth surface, I have never heard of it.

May.—No, there is no such thing as a sea serpent. The belief in these creatures dates from very early times. Some wonderful stories have been told of these so-called sea serpents, but nothing authentic has ever been proved. A large mass of seaweed has on more than one occasion been cautiously approached, and even harpooned, under the impression that it was one of these monsters of the deep.

SHORT STORIES

TOLD BY THE DOCTOR.

No. I.—THE MYSTERY OF A COUNTRY HOUSE.

CHAPTER I.

Major Dessalene's Illness.

In looking back over my experiences, I am driven to the conclusion that no single medical man can have had so many romances, crimes, and mysteries brought under his notice in connection with his profession as I have been called upon in my time to help investigate. My friend, Tom Arlack, Q.C., says that if he is called a criminal lawyer, I ought to be dubbed a criminal doctor, and the term is not inapplicable to me.

Soon after I passed my examination, and became qualified to practise, the death of a rich relative removed the necessity for my doing so, and I became known among my large circle of medical friends as a man who could be relied on to take up at a moment's notice any case which called for more time or careful investigation than they, with their practices to attend to, could personally afford.

It became known, too, that I had given a great deal of study to that mysterious influence of mind over mind, which men call, indifferently, hypnotism, mesmerism, or animal magnetism, a branch of study which medical men too often sedulously neglect; and this fact brought some very interesting cases which my friends preferred not to touch. Then again, after the notorious Dessalene case, it became a generally-received impression that "mysteries" were my speciality; and people with "mysteries" to unravel sought me out accordingly to assist in investigating them.

It was certainly the Dessalene case which gave me my reputation in this direction, although I really did nothing towards throwing light on what was in the beginning a really puzzling affair. My friend, Dr. Diplock, was the Dessalenes' family doctor—he had a pretty big practice round Almond Ferry, where the Dessalenes had their country house—and he asked me to come over and see the Major, simply because he could not make out what on earth was the matter with him.

"Why, it is a case of opium poisoning," I said to Diplock, after I had seen his patient, and he had taken me downstairs to ask my opinion. He shook his head.

"That is what I thought, but he has been like this for nearly a fortnight. If he had taken a dose of opium then, he would be better, or dead, now; but he remains just the same—unconscious most of the time, with a little wakening up now and then."

"Oh, yes!" I said, "if it is opium the dose must be regularly repeated—each time too little to cause death outright."

"And each time too much for any opium-taker to give himself," added my friend.

"I do not know—an habitual opium-drinker. But one can see at a glance that Major Dessalene is not that," I said. "It seems as though somebody must be poisoning him slowly."

"Yes," said Diplock, "I have thought of that."

"Then why not have the police in to see into the case before the murderer succeeds in his purpose?"

"Because I do not want to make a fool of myself," said my companion. "The Major tells me, when he has a lucid moment, that he has been like this before, that his illness is considered an affection of the brain. If it is, and I bring a lot of police ferreting about, why, I shall lose my practice to begin with. Now you are just the man. You take up the case as a medical man, and if there is foul play going on, I think I can trust you better than the average detective to find it out."

I thanked him for the compliment. Looking back now, I am afraid that I did not justify his opinion of me, although I had the best of opportunities. Diplock, I found, had arranged that I should live at the house, where there was certainly plenty of room for me, although the place was full of guests. The Major and his young wife had just filled the house for the shooting when the former's illness began, and Dessalene, in his intervals of consciousness, was very earnest in insisting that everything should go on as if he were well.

According to Diplock, the Major was not of much account in the house. Mrs. Dessalene was the ruling spirit. So things really did go on exactly as they had been doing before the Major's illness. The men went out on the moors every day, and most of them forgot even to inquire how their host was getting on when they returned.

As Mr. Diplock was leaving me entirely in charge of the case, and as there seemed some suspicion of foul play, I made him tell me all he could about the people in the house. As he did so, my interest became centred on three people: the hostess, Mrs. Dessalene, her cousin, Captain Allis, and Sir Reginald Dyne, who had come up the day before Dessalene's seizure.

Mrs. Dessalene was not yet twenty-four. My informant knew the date, because he had helped her into the world. She was the daughter of a clergyman, with a living not ten miles away, and had only been married a little over a year. A beautiful woman she was, as I saw for myself later in the day, with big blue eyes in a clear, straight-featured face, framed in the most gossamer fluff of golden hair. I could see that old Diplock had a warm place in his heart for her. All the men were head-over ears in love with her, he said.

"What! is she a flirt?" I asked, and her champion shook his head.

"No, not a flirt. But I am sorry to say she acts like so many heart-broken women do, making a kind of sport of love since her own love story has ended unhappily."

I was rather mystified.

"It was not a love match, then—this marriage to Major Dessalene?" I asked.

"No, poor girl! She was driven into it by her parents, I am afraid."

"Then it is possible that she may be trying to poison the old gentleman. As you know so much about her, Diplock, can you tell me whether she was really in love with anybody at the time she married?"

"I am afraid so. Everybody thought she would marry Sir Reginald Dyne, to whom her father was tutor. But he was poor, worse luck, and her father raised obstacles. You see I am pretty well acquainted with her history, as I have attended the family all her lifetime.

"The Canon, her father, was in Major Dessalene's debt rather deeply. All of a sudden it was announced that Miss Clytie was to marry the Major, and Sir Reginald went abroad—or rather he was abroad till the day of the wedding, and came back as soon as he heard the news. The saddest thing about it was that Dyne had just come into a fortune unexpectedly, and was coming home to ask Clytie to marry him. I happened to be the one to tell him the news, poor fellow, that Clytie had that day become Mrs. Dessalene. This visit is the first occasion on which they have met since, I believe."

"It is rather queer, his coming," I said, "under the circumstances, isn't it?"

Dr. Diplock stammered:

"Yes—I took it upon myself to suggest as much to Mrs. Dessalene. But I was given to understand that the invitation came from the Major."

"Who is ignorant, of course, of the little history you have told me?"

"Oh, no. Dessalene was quite aware how the land lay before he married his wife. So it seems strange. But he is a man full of queer whims."

"It seems like it." I said drily. "And does this old suitor make love to his pretty hostess?"

"No; he is the only man who doesn't."

"Who does not openly, you mean. The love-making may be all the more serious on that account. Do any of the other men seem in earnest?"

Good old Dr. Diplock lowered his voice to a whisper.

"Well, if you ask me, Favel, I think her cousin, the Captain, is in deadly earnest. I want you to see Captain Allis. He is what I call a thoroughly wicked-looking man, although his breeding is perfect."

"A melodramatic villain," I said; "and he is in love with the pretty heroine. Then we must naturally suspect him of trying to murder the heedless husband. Why, it makes quite a pretty little story. Madam is in love with the handsome Baronet, but married to the ancient Major. The wicked Captain is in love with Madam, but the passion is not reciprocated. The wicked Captain removes the ancient Major, and hangman removes the wicked Captain, and the hero and heroine, Mrs. Dessalene and the young Baronet, are left free to marry. A very pretty little story. It seems quite a pity for us to interfere, doesn't it?"

Dr. Diplock was hurt. "If you are going to treat this case as a jest," he said severely, "I am sorry I asked you to assist me in it."

I was serious at once. "I was not altogether jesting," I explained. "Do you not yourself expect that Captain Allis may be slowly poisoning our patient in order to marry his widow?"

"If so," said Diplock, "I am quite sure Mrs. Dessalene knows nothing at all about it."

"Of course not. Allis would find his labour lost as far as he is concerned. Now tell me—who is looking after our patient? Does his wife stay with him much?"

"Yes; she is a good wife. I had trouble in persuading her to go out this afternoon for her health's sake. She is always at her husband's bedside."

"A suspicious circumstance."

My old friend was certainly getting very short-tempered in his old age. My interruption put him into a passion, and I had quite a task to pacify him. I explained that I must come to the investigation with a perfectly impartial mind.

My old friend retorted that I came with the fixed idea that Mrs. Dessalene—one of the best women who ever lived—was poisoning her husband.

I never argue with people who feel deeply; so I went on making inquiries about my new patient's nursing.

"Who was the woman I saw in the room? A professional nurse?"

"Yes. I have just engaged her. Mrs. Dessalene has just given me a free hand in the matter—not a very likely thing for a woman to do if she were poisoning the man, as you think—and whatever the Major says in his lucid intervals, we take no notice of."

Digitized by Google

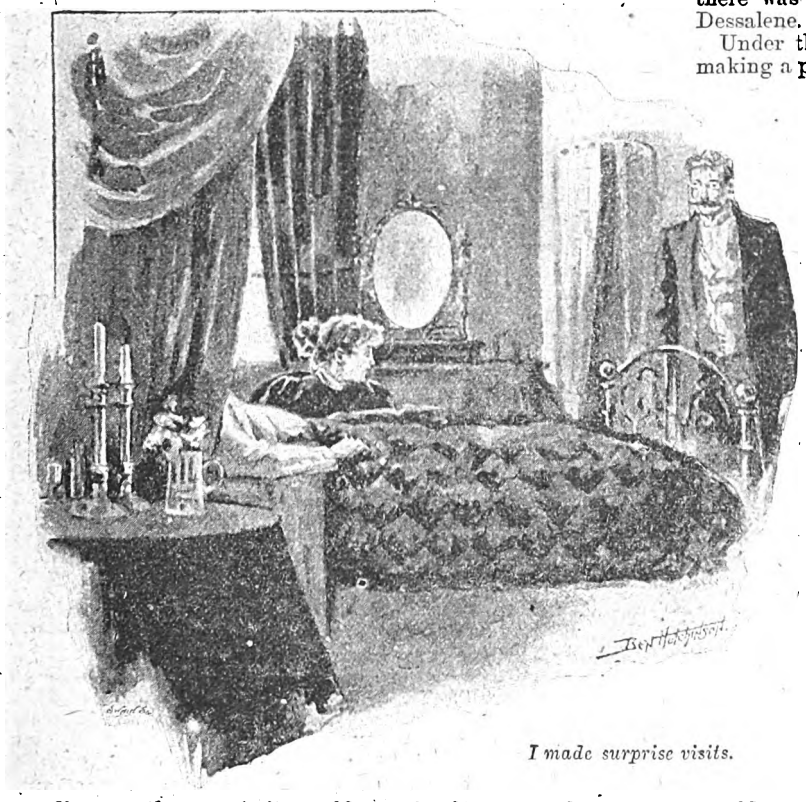
"The Major objected to the nurse coming?" I asked.

"Yes—and to your coming as well. He says we are making a great deal of fuss about a very insignificant illness. I often wonder if he is right. But I feel easier now I've done my best, and if there is anything wrong, you will be sure to find it out, thank goodness!"

CHAPTER II.

The First Murder.

I did not feel quite so sure as my old medical friend that I should discover the secret of Major Dessalene's illness. But I thought, at the same time, that if I did not discover the secret, it would not be for want of opportunity. I was given a couple of nicely-furnished rooms, exactly opposite that of my patient, with the understanding that I was to do exactly as I liked in the house—consider myself a guest, and join the shooting-parties, or keep to myself in my own rooms, as the whim took me. I was to direct the Major's treatment, of course, and rule in the sick-room; and I devoted myself during the first day or two in keeping a strict watch on all the food and medicine which my patient had prepared for him.



I made surprise visits.

I made surprise visits, too, when he was alone with his wife or any other member of the establishment. The nurse, whom Diplock had himself obtained from a nursing sisterhood in London, after the commencement of the illness, I could not, of course, include in my mental list of suspects. With that one exception everybody in the house was down on it, since there was no knowing at first what the relations of any person in the place to the Major actually were, or what motives the least likely might have in poisoning him.

As the days passed and I discovered more about the various people among whom I found myself the list naturally thinned down, and by the third or fourth day of my stay I began to believe that Captain Allis was the man on whom I must most particularly keep watch.

No wonder that old Diplock suspected him. He was often in the sick-room, being the only one of Major Dessalene's guests who made a point of exhibiting a distinct interest in his host's indisposition, and he called every morning to make inquiries or spend a few minutes by the sick man's bedside, an attention which, I am sorry to say, I did not ascribe to his good nature. Then there was no mistaking his passion for Mrs. Dessalene.

Under the circumstances I felt justified in making a private survey of the Captain's bedroom while he was out on the moors, in the hope of discovering some traces of the poison to which I ascribed my patient's indisposition, but I was no more successful there in finding opium than I had been in discovering it in the Major's food and medicine, or in any part of the sick-room.

That was on a Saturday, the fifth day after my arrival. In the evening my patient had one of his temporary improvements, and seemed much better than I had seen him yet.

He talked to me quite lucidly, asking my opinion of his illness, and seemed to take an interest in the little I told him about it. I did not mention my idea that he was being poisoned, and was rather surprised, therefore, to hear the suggestion from his own lips.

"I thought it was my brain again," he said, speaking dreamily, "but I do not know."

"Indeed," I said, as cheerfully as possible, "and what do you think now, Major Dessalene?"

"I think I am being poisoned!"

I concealed my interest, and answered lightly:

"Who would want to poison you, Major?"

"Every man in the house would. They are all after my wife. Clytie is too beautiful for a dull old fellow like me. Don't you think so, Dr. Favel?"

He had my name before my arrival. I answered that Mrs. Dessalene was undoubtedly beautiful; but that it was not customary for the husbands of beautiful women to be poisoned.

The sick man took no encouragement from my words or manner. He went on mumbling with a drowsy mournfulness:

"Every man here would be glad for me to die, so that he might have a chance of marrying Clytie, I know. I have watched them before I was ill."

"My dear sir," I said, "if you think that, why on earth don't you have the house cleared? I understood that it was only by your express desire that the party did not break up."

My patient opened his eyes in faint surprise.

"No, no; it is Clytie," he said sadly. "I beg her every time—I know what I am doing—to send them away, and she will not. She says she won't be in an empty house with this mystery hanging over the place."

I had been inclined to like and admire Mrs. Dessalene, but when I heard this, she went down some pegs in my estimation, and up a little in my list of suspects, with Captain Allis at the top.

I asked the Major which of the men he suspected; but he seemed relapsing into his usual state of unconsciousness, and did not seem to hear my question. However, he must have done so, for suddenly he started, and, staring at me, whispered hoarsely: "Captain Allis." Then he fell back on the bed, breathing heavily. I poured out a dose of the counter-poison, with which I was trying to fight the opium, and held it to his lips; but it was too late for him to drink the potion. I had to force it between his teeth.

After glancing into the inner room, where the nurse, Sister Agnes, slept, to make sure that it was empty, I walked away to my own room across the passage, determined to keep watch on the sick room until Sister Agnes, who was enjoying a constitutional, returned; for it was always after these intervals of awakening that my patient's illness developed its worst form, and I was determined that he should not receive another murderous dose without my knowing it.

However, as it happened I was called away by a servant, who came up excitedly to tell me that Mrs. Dessalene was fainting in the drawing-room, having cut her finger badly. It was a very trifling matter I found when I went down, but it kept me occupied for some little time. When I returned to the sick-room I found that Sister Agnes and Captain Allis were both in the room, and that the Major, as usual after his improvements, had become perfectly unconscious.

"It is Captain Allis," I said to myself, and I felt that I should be almost justified in denouncing him publicly as poisoner; but al hough I was fully persuaded myself that he was the criminal, still I had not sufficient evidence, I knew, to convict him of the crime. So I resolved to watch and wait, only hoping that I should succeed in revealing his villainy in time to save the poor Major's life.

I was very pleased, then, when I was knocked up in the middle of Sunday night by a half-dressed servant, too excited to say anything but reiterate: "Captain Allis! Captain Allis! Will you please come to Captain Allis?"

By the time that I had unlocked the door the man was gone.

"The game is up. He is caught in the act!" I said to myself as I threw on my dressing-gown and prepared to cross the passage into the sick man's room.

I was suprised to find the door closed, and when I entered, it was only to find the sick-room undisturbed, and the patient lying in the most profound of his trances, while a monotonous snoring in the inner room told me that Sister Agnes had not been aroused.

My call had evidently nothing to do with my patient, and I left the room, somewhat disappointed, to seek out Captain Allis's chamber on the floor above. I had no difficulty in doing so, for the room was quite filled with a crowd of frightened and half-dressed servants and guests, all whispering together. The man who had roused me was just coming through the doorway, on his way to hurry me, and he beckoned me in excitedly.

"Please be quick, sir; he seems to be bleeding to death," he said, as I entered.

But the man was wrong. Captain Allis had bled to death fully half-an-hour before I bent over his body, as it lay cold and motionless in the bed. A great gash in the throat must have killed him almost instantaneously.

The butler pointed to a blood-stained razor lying on the dressing-table.

"It is suicide, I suppose, sir?" he said in a whisper; and I turned away from the bed to follow the direction of his finger.

"Has the razor been moved?" I asked.

"No, sir; I was the one to find him, smelling something burning—where you see the bed has been set on fire and smouldered a little"—he pointed at the tindered quilt as he spoke—"and the razor was there just as it is now."

"Then there is no question of suicide," I answered decisively. "No man could get from the dressing-table to the bed with that gash in his throat, much less stop to fire the bed. Cover up the body, and send for the police."

CHAPTER III.

Silax is Killed.

The murder of Captain Allis left me without a single theory to account for the illness of Major Dessalene. If the Captain had not been dosing him with opium, who could have done it? The wild thought occurred to me, of course, that Allis had been killed by some friend of the Major's, in order to prevent his poisoning the latter, but the idea was too extravagant, and there seemed to me nobody in the house sufficiently fond of Dessalene to defend him.

His wife was attentive, and spent most of her time at her husband's bedside; but she certainly had not the strength to kill the Captain as he had been killed.

It was probable that both crimes were the work of the same man, but why the criminal should choose slow poisoning in one case, and a speedy throat-cutting in the other, was a perfect puzzle to me. The whole case was so perplexing, that I was quite rejoiced when a detective from Scotland Yard came over to take the case in hand. The guests all cleared out rapidly. Even their enthusiasm for shooting, and Mrs. Dessalene's society, could not keep them in the face of this terrible tragedy to one of their number.

One guest alone remained at the earnest request, I understood, of Mrs. Dessalene, who was prostrated by this second mystery in the house, and nervously terrified at the thought of being left in it with none but strangers.

Sir Reginald Dyne, who seemed a manly, outspoken young fellow, gave me another reason for remaining at the house when the other guests had gone.

"I am told that some people suspect me of poisoning old Dessalene," he said frankly. "Everybody knows that there was no love lost between Allis and me, so I expect his murder will be put down to my charge also. Under the circumstances, I do not think it right to leave the house until I have done my level best to find out who really killed Captain Allis."

"Yes," I said doubtfully, thinking that two amateur detectives in additional to a professional one might cause complications; and my companion misinterpreted my hesitation.

"Perhaps you are one of those that suspect me?" he asked sharply.

I shook my head and laughed.

"No, I do not think you are the man to commit a murder," I answered quite truthfully. For the Baronet's manner had won my confidence entirely.

My trust in his innocence was not shared by Mr.

Robin Silax, the gentleman from Scotland Yard, who had been provided with a room in the ever-hospitable house, to enable him more effectively to carry out his investigations. He informed me in a burst of sympathy that Sir Reginald and Mrs. Dessalene were managing the murdering business between them.

Mr. Robin Silax seemed to me very well fitted for a novelist; for he had worked out of the materials in his hands the plot for an interesting story. "Mrs. D—— is poisoning her husband," he said, "in order to marry her old love"—he had wormed the love-story out of old Diplock—"Captain Allis found out what she was doing and kept 'mum' in the hope of frightening madam into his hands. So the young Baronet had to 'pop off' the Captain to keep him quieter still and less embarrassing. I shall have them both in gaol in a week," he finished complacently.

"Of course, you have evidence to prove your case?" I said stiffly; because I liked both the persons he was accusing, and I did not like Mr. Robin Silax.

The detective took a pinch of snuff.

"I am collecting evidence," he said cheerfully, and pulling out a dingy letter-case handed me a letter to read.

"Tell me what you think of this," he said with another pinch of his abominable snuff, and I got halfway through the epistle before I realised that it must have been purloined from Mrs. Dessalene's possession. Then I handed it back, indignant with myself and him. I glanced at the date, however.

"That was written two years ago, before Mrs. Dessalene's marriage," I said.

"Possibly," returned Silax, his eyes twinkling wickedly, "but marriage does not put out red-hot love like that—marriage, that is, to another man. And it proves something; that the lady has kept the letter till now hidden away in the desk, which I took the liberty of investigating."

The man irritated me, and I turned away abruptly, sad at heart every time that I thought of the outpouring of love I had read, terrible in its earnestness; desperately pathetic, when I thought how that love had been blighted.

"Poor Dyne!" I kept saying to myself, and "Poor girl! poor girl!" when I thought of the woman who had treasured up that old letter, when to do so was a sin against the man she had married.

My idea of a detective, gathered, I will admit, entirely from books, is a man of perfect reticence, who in silence and secrecy builds up a chain of evidence from the merest trifles, until the chain is complete, then startles everybody by a result which appears nothing less than miraculous until the workings are shown.

Mr. Silax was as different as possible from this ideal sleuth-hound of the law. No sooner had he come across any small discovery, than he hurried to me with an account of it and a new and wonderful theory based upon it. He suspected in turn, as circumstances occurred to alter his opinion, every member of the household, and explained to me in detail what their object was in killing Captain Allis and poisoning Major Dessalene; and when he surprised me one night in the sick man's room, where I had gone in the course of my own researches, I could tell from his ominous silence and the manner in which he looked at me, that I in turn was enjoying the favour of his suspicions. I ought not to try and belittle the poor man, however, now that he is dead.

He came to me one night looking every inch the astute and unreadable detective of the story-books. His manner was altogether different from usual, and he even waited for me to ask how he was getting on. His answer, for once, almost impressed me.

"I am collecting evidence."

"I have got to the bottom of the case," he said quietly, "or rather, I have got the key. I will admit that it was more or less of an accident my finding it, but there is no doubting it this time. I have seen the person who doses Major Dessalene in the act."

"And who was it, man?" I said, almost excited.

"I cannot tell you just at present," he said, "but I think I shall be able to show you before to-morrow. I may wake you at any time in the night, I suppose?"

"Certainly."

His unusual reticence really impressed me, especially when I found that it was quite impossible to get any further information out of him about his discovery.

That night I lay awake quite a long while, wondering whether Silax would give me a call, and whether he had really obtained at last the key to the mystery which I was unable to solve. I did not fall asleep till after two, and then only slept for a couple of hours. As the clock in the turret was chiming the hour before striking four, I sat up suddenly wide-awake, with the certain conviction that something had happened, or was just about to happen.

My thoughts went, of course, to my patient, and I jumped out of bed at once, resolved to give him a call. A light burnt all night in the sick-room, so I did not trouble to strike a light, but felt my way into my slippers and dressing-gown.

The passage outside my room was pitch dark, the Major's door being closed, and I made my way very gingerly across, afraid of making a noise and thus disturbing the criminal, whom I imagined for some reason to be at that very moment in the sick man's room.

Just outside the door, however, I stumbled over something, and, bending down to discover what it was, drew back suddenly, my hands warm and wet with a moisture that, in spite of my professional experience, made me turn sick and faint.

I rushed back to my room for matches, and returned, spilling them all over the place in my haste. When I managed to strike one I believe I looked at my hands first, and that prepared me for what I saw when I looked down. It was poor Silax, with a knife in his heart, and a little bottle of liquid opium in his clasped hand.

CHAPTER IV.

The Mystery is Cleared.

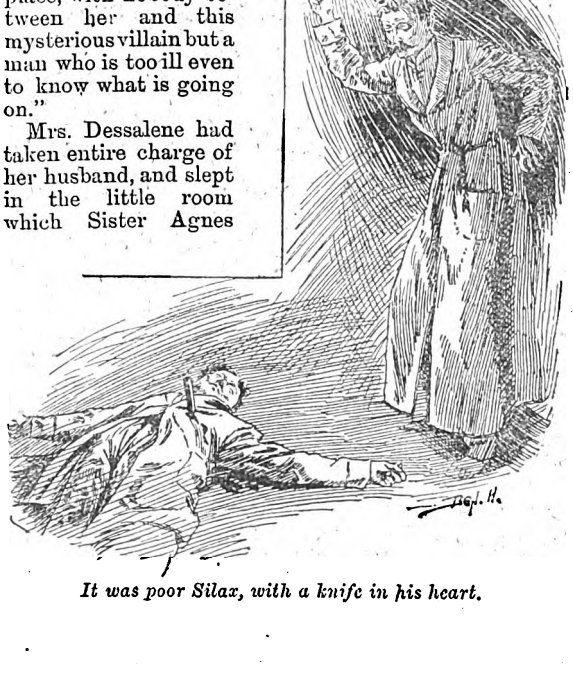
In the morning, when it became known that another murder had been committed in the house, the servants all left in a body. The nurse whom Dr. Diplock had engaged to attend on Major Dessalene went with them, although she would be expelled from her sisterhood for doing so. They said that an evil spirit was abroad in the house, and that no one could tell who would be its next victim. I did not share their superstitious belief, of course, but I felt that every person who remained in the house was menaced by a very great danger, and I determined to sleep with my door locked in future, and keep sharp look-out in walking about the house, especially after dark.

Sir Reginald Dyne still stayed on, although I felt bound to suggest to him that he would most likely be the next victim.

The Baronet smiled; we had ceased to laugh in that fateful house.

"I don't think I'll run away," he said. "I could not bear to think of that poor girl alone in the place, with nobody between her and this mysterious villain but a man who is too ill even to know what is going on."

Mrs. Dessalene had taken entire charge of her husband, and slept in the little room which Sister Agnes had occupied. I cannot speak too highly of her devotion and ability.



It was poor Silax, with a knife in his heart.

Mrs. Jagger, a very estimable old servant, who had nursed Mrs. Dessalene as a baby, and had accompanied her on her marriage to her new abode, proved the only noble exception in the general exodus of servants. If it had not been for her devoted courage, I suppose the Baronet and I would have had to take turns in cooking our meals, and fulfilling other necessary domestic duties in the house. With Mrs. Jagger's services, we managed very comfortably, and sat down solemnly to dinner together at our usual time, as if nothing extraordinary had occurred. Our hostess had begun to take all her meals in her husband's room.

Now that the circle had narrowed, the problem I had come to solve became more mysterious and exciting. If any other outrage occurred in the house, or if the Major's illness continued, either the miscreant must be some terrible being from outside, or dexterously hiding in the large rambling house, or it must be one of four persons. Of these four I knew that I myself was innocent, although I began to wonder what I might be capable of doing in my sleep. Then it seemed extremely hard to think that either Dyne or Clytie Dessalene, or her old servant, could possibly be guilty of such wholesale murder.

I am afraid we all considered the others with a little suspicion. I had my eyes on Sir Reginald every moment he was in my company, looking in vain for some slight indication of hidden madness or brutality under his pleasing exterior character. I made a point of inquiring specially into the history and character of Mrs. Jagger, and stayed awake a whole night considering the possibility of her committing a crime to aid a beloved mistress. In turn, I doubt not they were considering whether I had not used my presence in the house to satisfy some homicidal mania to which I might be subject, for all they knew.

So impossible was it, however, for us to seriously suspect each other, that the two women had taken to speaking in whispers of the "influence," while Sir Reginald Dyne and I made a complete search throughout the old house, and a careful examination of doors and shutters before retiring to rest.

We were left entirely to ourselves in the matter, for some hitch had arisen at Scotland Yard about sending down another man, and the local policeman who came making arrangements for the inquest, was visibly shivering all the time he was in the house.

The inquest on poor Silax was held at the Dessalene Arms, in the village where Dyne had had the body removed, in deference to Mrs. Dessalene's nervous horror of it. When I saw the Major, just before we started for the inn, he seemed much better than usual, and I began to hope that if he were really being poisoned the prisoner had departed with the servants. Perhaps, after all, it was one of them who had a grudge against his master, and had been obliged to kill both Captain Allis and the detective to avoid detection. I breathed more freely at the thought.

But a rough shock came next day at dinner, to which, as I said, Dyne and I sat down together. Usually we help ourselves to a glass apiece of the Major's '74 port after the meal, but on this occasion the Baronet declined this. He poured me out my glass, however, from the decanter, and handed it across to me, asking me some ordinary question or other as he did so. Luckily, I stopped to answer him before drinking the wine, and in doing so something in the scent of it made me suspicious. In an ordinary way I should not have taken any notice of the slight difference of perfume, but to-day all my senses were on the alert to discover danger; and so, instead of drinking my port, I took it upstairs with me to my room, decanter and all, leaving Sir Reginald staring at me in apparent astonishment. He came and tapped at my door ten minutes afterwards.

"What on earth is the matter, Doctor?" he asked, when I let him in. "Something the matter with the port?"

"Yes," I answered grimly. "Poison."

Sir Reginald started.

"You are quite sure of it?"

"Quite; the decanter has opium in it enough to kill six people."

He sat down on a chair and looked gloomily straight before him. Neither of us spoke for fully five minutes, while I went on with my rough analysis of the decanter's contents. Then my companion said gravely:

"This is a bad look-out for us. We shall not dare to eat or drink anything in the house."

"I was hoping 'he' had gone with the servants," I said. We always spoke of the mysterious murderer as "he."

Dyne cheered up a little.

"Perhaps 'he' put that poison in the decanter before he went," he said, as the bright idea struck him.

But I could not let him retain even that small consolation.

"I saw Mrs. Jagger filling the decanter yesterday morning," I said. "It is lucky we did not dine at home after the inquest."

"Then he is in the house still?" said Dyne in a whisper.

"Apparently."

There was another silence. Then the Baronet said meditatively:

"I never used to think myself a coward; but this mysterious business is taking the heart out of me. I don't like to be a moment alone in this house. I hate the idea of sleeping alone in it."

I had it on the tip of my tongue to invite him to share my bed, which was roomy enough. But up came the everlasting suspicion in time to stop me. No, I said to myself, one must lock one's door at night against everybody, if one wants to be safe; and when Sir Reginald Dyne went on to put the request straightforwardly into words, I made some excuse for refusing it. I advised him to lock both window and door when he went to bed, and luckily as it happened, he took my advice.

Mrs. Dessalene also promised to lock the door of her husband's room to secure them both from any midnight assailant. Mrs. Jagger needed no advice on the subject, so that half-past ten o'clock found the household ensconced in four separate strongholds, protected as well as possible from intrusion, both from outside and inside the house.

I felt so secure in my own defences that I slept soundly, for the first time since poor Allis's death.

In the dead of the night I was awakened by a quick tapping on my bedroom door. Jumping out of bed, I took the precaution of asking who was there before turning the key. It was Mrs. Dessalene's voice which replied, and when I had hastily made myself presentable and thrown open the door, in the light which I had kept burning all night in my room I found her standing, with bare feet and only a shawl thrown over her night-dress, appealing to me with a white, terrified face. Her yellow hair streamed down over her shoulders like a golden aureola, and even at that moment I thought what a lovely woman she was.

"Oh, please come," she was saying excitedly, "they have carried my poor husband away," and she led the way across the passage into the sick-room, where I had always seen Major Dessalene lying. Now his bed was empty.

Sir Reginald staring at me in apparent astonishment.

"I just woke," said Mrs. Dessalene, "and peeped out of my little room to see if all was right. And the door was open, although I locked and bolted it before I returned. Oh, tell me, what have they done to him? Where have they taken him?"

She seemed under the impression that the Major had been removed by some evil spirit, and terror was written on her face.

But to me the Major's disappearance came as a sudden revelation, and when poor Mrs. Dessalene cried again, wringing her hands: "Oh! where is he?" I answered excitedly, as I seized one of the big brass candlesticks, the nearest substitute for a weapon, and hurried from the room:

"Quick; he is upstairs—murdering Reginald Dyne!"

I got up the first flight of stairs as quickly as most men could do it, but Mrs. Dessalene was at the top first, and I had to seize her arm and pull her back.

"We must go carefully," I hissed into her ear, "or we shall both be killed as well;" and still I had to hold her with all my force to prevent her flying to her fate.

The Baronet's room was two flights above ours, and up the second flight we crept stealthily. Then we crouched, watching; for a man was at Dyne's door, trying a bunch of keys one by one, carefully, noiselessly in the closed lock.

"Quick! For Heaven's sake do not let him get in," whispered the woman at my side. "Let me go and stop him if you are afraid."

I waited, in spite of this taunt even, until the right key was found and the door swung back. Then like a shot I was up the stairs and into the room behind the we struggled together like wild beasts on the bed, till poor Dyne, who was underneath us, awoke to see the strange scene, and collected himself sufficiently to take my part. After that the battle was soon decided, and Dyne, who was something of a sailor, managed to tie the Major up pretty effectively with the cording of his boxes.

It was only then that I had a chance of thinking of Mrs. Dessalene, whom I found in a swoon at the top of intruder. And still I was only just in time; for the Major was bending over the sleeping Baronet with a great knife—like the one which ended Silax's life—in his hand. He turned as I entered the room, and faced me, glaring at me malignantly. I ought to have struck him down instantly with the heavy brass candlestick in my hand, but I was too excited to do anything but fling myself upon him, dropping my weapon, and grappling for the knife in his hand. He fell back as I did so, and the stairs. Dyne carried her to the room of the fair Jagger, while I kept watch, with Dyne's revolver in my hand, on the imprisoned murderer, who lay foaming and chafing like some wild animal on the bed. When Dyne returned, we took him down to his own room, which had iron-bound windows (being easy of access for burglars from the conservatory), and locked him in there while Dyne dressed and went for further assistance.

For some reasons it was a pity we did so, since the poor wretch managed, in spite of his bonds, to get at his opium supply, and was dead by the time that the Baronet returned with some men from the nearest farm.

The opium supply was left uncovered—ten three-ounce bottles in a specially prepared recess in the woodwork of the bed. As the Major was dead this discovery was all that we had to help us in clearing up the mystery. With its assistance Diplock and I managed to put together a fairly probable explanation of the whole series of occurrences, which we had to be content with, since the chief actor was dead.

We put down the Major as the victim of a mad jealousy. The preparation of the recess and the storing of the opium showed that he must have made careful arrangements beforehand for his deception. So we thought that he had planned to collect at the house all the men who paid any attention to his wife at all, with the intention of killing them one by one. His own illness was arranged, of course, to remove him out of the range of suspicion, and he evidently knew how much opium he could give himself without endangering his life.

Poor Robin Silax, I suppose, must have really discovered the secret of the mystery. He had seen the Major dosing himself, and was coming to me with one of the bottles of opium, probably thinking the murderer asleep, when Dessalene jumped up, followed him, and killed him outside his door to preserve the secret, the preservation of which by that time was worth the effort. The knives must have been obtained especially, too, and hidden, since nobody had seen them in the house before. Their hiding-place, however, was never found. The poison had been placed in the decanter of port, of course, while we were away at the inquest, for Dyne's benefit.

Dropping my weapon, and grappling for the knife in his hand.

Such is the best solution which Diplock, Dyne, and I can give of the case, after considering all the details together. Possibly some of my readers may think of a better.

The whole case, of course, caused a great stir in the papers at the time, which some of you may remember, and the name of Dessalene became so notorious that within six months Mrs. Dessalene changed hers for that of Lady Reginald Dyne.

Made to Order.

Mr. Augustus Stead was an original genius from the land of the Elephant and Castle, and it is seldom that the Elephant produces so great a son.

He had been the idol of his fond mother, the pet of his respectable father, a small master printer, and the plaything of compositors: and at last, he was the dux of a small commercial academy, thanks to the large bones he had inherited from his father, the beef with which he had been early nourished, and the solid, plodding, phlegmatic habit of mind which made him certain to climb and to succeed.

Nature had endowed him with an admired type of face, a little after the high art of tailors' advertisements perhaps, and his moustache was obviously a triumph of cosmetics, but one must not be censorious.

Mr. Augustus Stead was also a literary genius, for contact with authors is very stimulating for young printers. He knew several reporters, and a leader writer for the Elephant's Trumpeter, the organ of progressive local thought.

Augustus was not only a remarkably steady young man, he was the superintendent of a Sunday-school, where he reigned in glory over a mixed assembly.

There was a mobile crowd of children beneath five or six fair and smiling lady teachers, with a crippled youth and a bald mechanic, and Augustus was king among them all.

He handled the large register with the air of some Norman William fingering Doomsday Book. When he rang a little muffin bell (consecrated by such uses and the touch of his royal hand), his grave severity would have quelled the ribald mirth even of Pantaloon's own children, had they been present; but he would relax a little and unbend at the teachers' meeting, where he coached his team, if one may dare to say so, against next week's effort.

He would also hold long and intimate conversation with the teachers about individual scholars—at least, this honour was accorded to the ladies—and he would drink tea with them in turns at their fathers' houses.

Each lady in turn was talked about as a possible Mrs. Augustus Stead; but though they were all worthy girls, Augustus was wise. He came and saw and meditated upon their virtues, but his heart remained whole.

The prettiest ones were unfortunately the humblest in rank. The best teachers were lacking in the outward and formal adornments of mere beauty, and had no countervailing charm of personality to amend the yellowness of their skins.

Miss Goldstein, the piano-maker's daughter, was passing rich on £50 a year pin-money, and she could afford velvet and ostrich feathers; but unfortunately she had a hare lip, with a good deal of hair on it, too.

It was libel for Miss Jones to call her the cavalry officer; but the future Mrs. Stead must have no moustache, he felt.

He had not found his ideal, as he constantly told his friends. The older he grew, the more impossible did it seem to find that not impossible she who should fulfil his expectations, and be worthy to accept his hand and share his throne.

Two things conspired to banish her from actual life. First, he had a rising sense of his own uniqueness; and, secondly, his uncle, a most respectable poulterer, of Leadenhall, was rising rapidly in the social scale, and therefore it was the more necessary that the nephew of a liveryman should walk discreetly.

There was a sweet child in Miss Goldstein's class, with a thick head of glossy hair, beautiful, especially when it had been washed with soda, and brushed. Her manner was timid, and yet frank. She had won the first prize for running on school feast-day.

She was affectionate, and would slip her hand into Augustus' palm and walk with him. She always dropped the handkerchief upon him, at that fatuous sport. She was a most regular scholar, and always learnt her lessons.

Her name was Violet Howard, and she had no kith or kin (except an old grandmother) who could interfere with any plans for her future greatness.

Augustus made a decree that Violet Howard should be selected and used as the raw material out of which his ideal should be made to order. It is needless to say that he did not consider that she, too, being not born of a stock or of a tree, but being also human, might possibly have an ideal of her own to which he might fairly be asked to conform. Pooh! a chit like that would have no business to make demands upon a man such as Augustus Stead. Out upon it! Was he not already ideal enough for any maid? And besides, is the free soul of man, and, above all, of a superintendent to be fitted perforce to any bed of Procrustes called an Ideal?

Augustus, like Napoleon and other great men, was rapid in his actions. He resolved, as he chewed a quill in office hours; and his plan was wise and easy. He knew a decayed gentlewoman in Surrey, who was pensioned by her friends.

Violet should board with her, partly as companion, partly as pupil. He, the great one, should pay for the girl's board, and the decayed one should educate her in the ways of the truly genteel.

The plan was well conceived. Grandmother Howard thanked him for finding so good a place; Mrs. Chapman was grateful for a free companion and help, whom she might use as a servant at a pinch; Miss Goldstein was relieved of a "forward and inquisitive" pupil; and, of course, Violet herself would be more than grateful when she knew the end. She would repay her exaltation with the enthusiasm of a life of cheerful service.

For two years and a half Mr. Augustus Stead was a happy man.

He made a point of spending two evenings a week in Surrey, where he examined his pupil in good learning and piety. The decayed gentlewoman had a decayed piano, and Violet practised wild melodies upon it, and learnt to accompany Augustus in his rather slow and flat rendering of his wish to be a butterfly and other enviable things.

There was great insistence upon the letter 'h'; a little French was added, and physical geography, with some excursions into history, including the dates of the Conquest, the Edict of Nantes, and Waterloo. Divinity, too, was most carefully studied in the lives of Gideon, Ahab, and Nathaniel, and St. Paul's missionary journeys.

Happy conscious Augustus! Happy unconscious Violet! And since the design was still unknown, we may add that the Sunday-school teachers, who still hoped and adored, were happy too. But pleasant dreams, even though they endure for thirty revolving months, must end at last.

Violet was eighteen to the day, Augustus, twice her age, when he explained to her the splendour which was in store for her, in a long, formal speech.

He touched upon the cheerful steadiness of her behaviour, her clean habits, her personal comeliness, her quickness of learning, her assiduous attention to duty.

"And so, dear girl," he said in a prize-giving voice, "I have determined to ask you to be Mrs. Augustus Stead."

She heard him without any show of surprise. Indeed, she had expected this long ago, and yet, actually, some light, quick tears stood in her round eyes, no doubt tears of gratitude. She did not spring up from her chair as he had expected, but on the contrary, she said:

"Thank you, Mr. Stead. I—I'm not in love with anybody else, and, of course, if you think it best——"

He then unbent a little and dried her tears, bade her sit upon his knee, which she did; and in a little time she laughed and became quite cheerful, and tried on the tan gloves (at 2s. 11½d.) which he had bought for her birthday and forgotten to give her, and she asked him very archly for a troth ring.

Indeed, she was a sweet and innocent young thing, and he could not but feel that, except for her almost babyish way of looking at things, she would be a most satisfactory consort, for she was in every respect made to order.

But, alas! marriage is a lottery indeed, and Mr. Stead soon bewailed the revolting ingratitude of womankind. First of all, the teachers, though they dismissed him with a heavy marble clock emblazoned with a nickel tablet, quite brutally refused to take any further interest in him. Then he was distinctly disappointed. Mrs. Stead's first offence was to show an unbecoming and snubbing disposition towards the whole body of the lady teachers. And next she actually told her own Augustus that he was selfish and lacking in taste, and once she added that he was a toady—"a word no respectable woman ought to use," he told her.

But the following unfeeling and undated letter from one of his old schoolfellows, will reveal to the curious the full guilt of the ungrateful girl:

Dear Emmie,—After all, I went to call on old Gus and his pretty wife at Peckham. My word! She's lovely, and just exactly the thing for him. You know his way of riding the high horse? She simply won't stand it, and he has to behave himself like an ordinary mortal. If he prophesies, as you call it, she simply laughs at him in the prettiest way, and if he begins any of those tedious old yarns of his, she just remembers the point for him, and then gets him away before he bores one to death. She's awfully clever, too, and makes him read to her while she sews. In fact, you'd hardly know him again, he's ever so much nicer. Every one likes her awfully, and thinks her too good for him, but he's not such a brute as he was by any means. He's rather brutal to her, but she keeps him in jolly good order without jumping on him. He solemnly told Tom he was unhappy for the first three years, but is now resigned to his fate. She has made him shave off his moustache. Do let's go and call together soon. I want you to know her.—Yours, R. V.

P.S.—He boasted that he had her made to order. She seems made to order him.

A GRAND NEW SERIAL STORY by JOAN BARRETT,

ENTITLED

"A BROKEN VOW,"

WILL START NEXT WEEK.

The Trumpeter.

Those who have not assisted in great battles, and know of them only from brilliant description, have little idea of these desperate conflicts, where the massed armies launched against each other struggle through the whole day in an atmosphere of flame and iron rain.

Dwelling upon the victorious result, they ignore the uncertainties, the detours and the unexpected happenings of these terrible days. Reading in the narratives of historians of the strategy of generals, one is led to believe that all that takes place is like a parade—a kind of mathematical chess carried on by players who have soldiers for pawns. It is necessary to take part in this mêlée to understand the sanguinary chaos. The plan of a battle, so easy to follow in a history, cannot be comprehended so clearly upon the ground. Enveloped in clouds of dust and smoke, one knows nothing of what is transpiring around him, distinguishes with difficulty a corps of friends from that of enemies, and dies without becoming aware with which side rests the advantage. Each one does his duty blindly, and often knows of victory but from the order of the day.

It was thus with certain regiments at Auerstadt. The Prussians, who presented a battle front of six leagues, were attacked along the whole line at nearly the same time, and there resulted a series of conflicts which led, as one may say, to two battles, one won by Napoleon, the other by Marshal Davoust.

Our company, sent into one of these encounters, was successful after a struggle of several hours, and drove the enemy from a village which they abandoned only after it was set on fire. I was pursuing the last skirmishers, who were retiring towards the wing commanded by the Prince of Hohenlohe, when in scaling an inclosure I was struck by a musket ball which knocked me over and caused me to lose consciousness almost instantly.

When I regained my senses I found myself alone at the foot of the wall I had attempted to climb. The other houses were still burning; some dead bodies were dispersed here and there, and there could be heard in the distance the boom of cannons and the crack of musketry.

I partially arose, and with difficulty drawing myself upon my knees, sought to discover some near point to which to proceed for succour; but all was silence. Evidently the battle had concentrated itself in the two extremities of the enemy's line, and I was abandoned.

This conviction, together with the blood I had lost, reduced my courage. I saw myself condemned to perish miserably amidst this ruined hamlet. However, I made a last effort to gain a small isolated dwelling, which seemed the only one that had escaped destruction.

The inhabitants had obviously abandoned it before the approach of the two armies, for it was entirely vacant. The Prussian soldiers, who had bivouacked there the preceding night, had broken the furniture up for fuel. I found but the four walls and scattered débris.

Of all the sufferings I endured, that of thirst was the most intolerable. In crossing the court I had perceived a well, but it was deep; I had no means of drawing from it, and, like a true Tantalus, it was in vain for me to bend towards this water the lips that could not reach it.

I was at the end of my strength and courage. My leg, stiff from the bleeding of the wound, did not permit me to take another step. Everything began to swim before my eyes; a coldness seized me, and darkness came on. I gained a corner of a room on the ground floor, where I fell, groaning. A sort of numbness dulled the pains which penetrated my body: I gradually lost the perception of my suffering.

I had, as might be said, accepted my miserable situation as one buried alive.

A considerable time elapsed. I thought that all was at an end for me, when a step sounded at the door of the cottage. With an effort I raised my head and tried to give a cry for help, but my voice was extinguished between my teeth, convulsively set together. I could only perceive by the lingering evening light a trumpeter of our regiment, who was about to enter, seemingly himself seeking shelter. He crossed the porch with caution, and looking into the depths of the apartment, perceived me.

"A comrade," he cried, approaching me. "I see you have had a bad encounter. Some ball wanted to chat with you too near. But how happens it that you are alone here, far from the ambulances?"

I attempted to explain what had occurred.

"I understand—I understand," he replied. "The company has followed its course without regarding those who have been left behind. It is the same with mine, which, drawn to the left wing, was set on by a regiment of cavalry and swept so far away that I was not able to regain the detachment."

"Where is the fighting?"

"I don't know. When I found myself alone and night approaching, I thought of seeking a nook in which to rest till morning. Only I expected to fall into a better place than this. There does not seem to be much luxury of furniture here—the planks for a feather bed and the walls for covering. You have found your couch a little military."

Digitized by Google

I replied with chattering teeth that such a trifle mattered little to a dying man.

"Fie, fie," interrupted the trumpeter, approaching me. "Die because of a damaged stump? I'll wager you are thirsty!"

"I burn!"

"I will go and draw some water from the well."

He turned towards the doorway, when I cried to him that the bucket was broken and the rope removed.

"No matter," said he. "I must try other means. It shall never be said that one Frenchman allowed another to die for want of drink."

He went out and I turned my face to the wall, certain that his endeavours would be useless. The length of his absence led me even to believe that he had departed, but at length he reappeared, bearing his shako within his hands; it was transformed into a water bucket; from the chin strap depended a long withe in place of rope.

"Victory!" he cried. "We have the fluid! I have been gone some time. The merchants of this place having shut up their shops, it was needful to fabricate something; but at last I am here. Drink in discretion."

He presented the shako to me, and I drank with avidity. He then informed me that the cannons had ceased to make themselves heard; the battle was ended, and, according to all appearance, to our advantage, for the line occupied the previous evening by the Prussians as bivouac had been abandoned. We need only to wait till morning for succour.

While giving me some encouraging details the trooper sought about us for means of rendering our condition less painful. The night wind which penetrated the apartment through the door and broken window froze me. He departed for a few minutes, and reappeared with several old bundles of straw which he fastened over the apertures so securely as to defend us against the cold.

He bathed and dressed my wound, declaring it to be a good one, and likely to make me a major. I allowed him to do all this without resisting, and also without thanking him. I was so cast down by my misfortunes that I had lost the instinct of self-preservation. Lying upon the earth in my obscure corner, I awaited the end of my sufferings with more of longing than of fear.

The trumpeter, who had rested a moment, bent over me and shook his head.

"My comrade has not much desire for life," he murmured. "Yet, nevertheless, the wound is nothing—a little lead in the shank. These poor quarters have beaten down his moral courage. Cannot I enable him to sleep more decently?"

He made the tour of the chamber, mounted to the storey above, and descended without having found anything.

As for myself, plunged into a half somnolent state, I followed his movements as seen in a mist. At intervals I lost all sense of his presence; then I perceived him again without comprehending what he was doing. He seemed now to me to be examining a partition which divided this lower room into two parts. He set himself to demolish it. First I saw fall under his sabre the light pine carpentry work; then he detached some large pieces of packing cloth. Here there ensued a blank. When I regained consciousness of what was going on, the trumpeter was returning from outside, and the packing cloth had been transformed by him into a pallet which he had stuffed with moss and leaves. I saw him extend it along the wall; he came to me and assisted me to rise, and soon afterwards I felt myself lying upon this improvised bed, and speedily fell asleep.

I was awakened by a sensation of gentle warmth. A fire burnt brightly upon the hearth, where the trumpeter had heaped the fragments of the partition. I raised myself with an exclamation of surprise and pleasure.

"Ah! this resuscitates you!" he cried gaily. "You see there are always means of ameliorating one's condition if time is not wasted in contemplating the buttons of one's gaiters."

"You are a magician!" I cried.

"A little, my friend," he replied, as he manufactured a seat from the remnants of the broken woodwork; "but it is white magic, with a wand having four fingers and a thumb. You think perhaps that I lit this fire merely for warmth—that it is a parlour fire? You are in error, my dear fellow; this is a fire to cook by, and destined to be a pot-boiler."

"They have distributed rations to your company then?" I said.

"Cartridge rations," responded the trumpeter. "But we can't eat them. We shall take some from the Prussians."

"Where do you expect to find their food?"

"Where? Why here. Do not the vanquished feed the vanquishers?" Understanding my gesture of doubt, he continued: "Ah, you have not much confidence in their larder, have you? The fact may be that the locality is a little bare, but a true Frenchman never despairs. Provided his general distributes to him his share of glory, it is for him to procure something to eat. At the time when I was gathering in the garden those dry leaves to make you a bed of eider-down, I perceived some little heaps in a corner. They suggested potatoes. I dug into them with my steel, and exposed to the light of day some twenty of these virtuous tubers. The whole lot are under the ashes there, and ought to be already cooked. We will, in consequence, proceed to feast. Oh! master of the hotel, say grace at once, and serve up hot!"

As he repeated this army phrase in the tone of a master of ceremonies, the trumpeter drew forth, one after another, from underneath the coals, the smoking potatoes, and ranged them symmetrically upon the hearth.

I had eaten nothing since morning. The savoury odour had awakened my hunger. I made an effort to sit up, and was about to partake of the supper prepared by the trumpeter, when I saw him all at once lift his head and listen.

"What is it?" I asked.

He imposed silence by a gesture, rose quickly, caught up his gun which he had placed against the wall, and advanced rapidly towards the door.

At this moment, I, in my turn, distinguished the sound of footsteps outside. Suddenly they became silent, as if the person were approaching with distrust. At last, however, they paused on the threshold. There was an interval, then a hand lifted gently the straw which closed the entrance; a man dressed in the costume of the country appeared at the opening; he looked within and made a step forward.

The trumpeter's gun was at his shoulder and arrested him promptly. He recoiled with a cry.

"Make one movement and you are dead!" said the soldier.

The German clasped his hands and stammered forth a prayer for quarter.

"Do not fire!" I cried to my companion. "He asks for mercy."

"I understand that," replied the trumpeter; "but it is necessary to know what brings him hither."

"Let him approach; I will speak with him," I said.

"So you know German? Bravo. Then we are going to have some prattle. Come, deliver yourself up, mein Herr, to this person you see here who speaks your savage language. Ask him who he is, whence he comes, what he wants, and, if possible, procure some butter for our potatoes."

Thus speaking, he forced the German to advance towards me.

When the stranger perceived that I was wounded he expressed much compassion, and asked over and over again where I was hurt, if I were in pain, whether I would not be able to gain the French encampment.

The last question led me to believe that the Prussians had retreated all along their line. The trumpeter, to whom I imparted this good news, cried: "Long live the Emperor!" and presented arms. The German stated also that he had quitted the burning hamlet the same morning, and that the only house remaining, the one in which we found ourselves, was his. As to the reason of his coming here in the midst of so much danger, and at such an hour, he appeared embarrassed to explain it and became involved in confused statement.

However, my companion appeared to rest contented with the information given, and invited him, with a sort of soldierly cordiality, to approach the fire.

"We have broken up the barracks a little," added he, "but that was your fault. You should have left the key to your wood-shed."

The German excused himself, through me, saying that all had been consumed by the Prussians, who occupied the village.

It was with difficulty that he had been able to transport some furniture and other effects which had escaped pillage to the house of a relative who dwelt at some distance, and who had consented to receive his family.

"Yes, yes," said the trumpeter, "one knows that. In the time of the Republic the Austrians came thus into France; they were quartered in our village, and my mother tells what the poor people had to undergo. War is good enough for the soldier; he returns the blows he receives, but the home dweller is always the sufferer, and it is necessary that he pay the expense. Seat yourself, my old friend, and if your heart allows, eat, drink, and shelter yourself. You may act as in your own house."

This nonsensical joviality of the soldier reassured the German more than would any amount of protestations. He seated himself upon the bench, and after some moments of conversation, cried:

"Upon my soul, gentlemen, you are worthy men."

"As one of those worthy men, I feel flattered," said my companion, blowing upon a very hot potato.

"Though I am ruined, I should like to treat you as my guests," continued the villager. "Wait for me here."

"We will wait for you, gladly."

He crossed the room, entered the shed which adjoined it, and remained there some time. The trumpeter carelessly hummed to himself, without appearing to wonder what the other might be doing. Finally, after a long absence, the German reappeared with a small bottle of brandy.

"It is the last," he said. "I hid it from the Prussian Hussars. But I could not find a better occasion to drink it than now."

"It comes in good time," exclaimed the trumpeter joyously. "Here's to the health of the Emperor Napoleon. You are not obliged to propose him, mein Herr. Each may celebrate his saint, it is said; and we, who are of the grande nation, we have the right to drink to the Little Corporal."

He had uncorked the bottle, to which he made a long application. He passed it to me. I took a draught; then it was the German's turn.

The effect of this fiery liquor was not long in showing itself. Our blood began to circulate with great rapidity, and the frugal supper concluded as if it were a feast.

When the bottle was empty the villager rose, and spoke of departing. He was in haste to announce to his wife and children that the house had escaped the general conflagration. I urged him to set forth without delay, and the trumpeter joined his entreaties to mine. The German wished us all manner of prosperity, gained the door, and disappeared.

When the sound of his footsteps was lost in the distance the trumpeter, who was filling his pipe by the hearth, looked towards the door, and shrugged his shoulders.

"Simple fellow," said he, laughing, "to believe I was hoodwinked!"

"What do you mean?" I asked, astonished.

"Do you suppose I let myself be caught in his explanations? He has known since morning that his 'cage' had not been burnt, so that he need not have come to assure himself of it."

"But what then do you suppose his intention to have been?"

"His intention? Why it is as clear as spring water. When the Prussians came this man hid his hoard in some corner."

"What! You suppose——"

"I am sure of it. I saw, and when he came out of the shed with the bottle, that the pockets of his blouse were stuffed full. I appeared not to observe this, lest he might believe that one would rather drink treasure than brandy; but happily I have no hunger for such bread. We are soldiers and not despoilers of peasants. If ever I return home I wish to enter there saying: 'Nothing in my hands and nothing in my pockets.' All I ask is to have the chance of wearing on my breast as decoration, a little ribbon."

"And you merit it," I cried, extending to him my hand. "While you have been here you have shown proof to me of the humanity and ingenuity of the French soldier, and I now know of his honour."

CHAPTER XXV.

The Shadow-Hand.

Almost immediately after the cry of "Fire! Fire!" was raised far for'ard on the schooner containing Lemaitre and Cécile, the whole oil-laden ship might be said to burst into flame. The schooner carried a cutter on her stern-davits, and a light gig on her bow-davits. These, with frightful haste, the men managed to lower and bring round to the starboard side, amidships. There was an instant danger that the boats would be swamped, for now they were towering up on a level with the ship's beam, and now weltering far down under her copper-line, and at what moment the burning schooner would blow up and vanish before their eyes, no one knew.

The men tumbled pell-mell into the boats, one of the first to jump into the gig being the captain. Suddenly the huge form of Lemaitre, half-dressed, with wild eyes and rumpled hair, appeared in the glare, rushing up the companion-way towards the boats, and immediately behind him Cécile. The men stared at her, as though they saw a ghost. But without hesitation, without waiting for help, she leapt upon the cutter which was then nearest the ship, and already contained six men. She was caught by the strong arms of a stalwart bo'sun, and the cable of the cutter was at once loosed.

The difficulty was Lemaitre. The huge weight of his jump would swamp almost any boat if he alighted at all on her side. The remaining five of the ship's crew were already in the gig with the captain, and Lemaitre stood alone at the ship's side in an agony of hesitation, swaying forward and back. Suddenly he seemed to have gone mad. "Wait! Wait for me!" he bellowed. "I have forgotten!" He rushed backward toward the companion-way.

"Oh, the man's mad!" cried the captain. "Push off!"

Lemaitre by that time had dived down into the cabin. He was thrown back by the scorching breath of the flames, but with a rapid dash he rushed forward again, stifling under the reeky, flame-stained whirl of the smoke. He came to his cabin door, fighting hard for life, dashed in, and seized his overcoat. It contained the bulk of his fortune and the photograph of his murdered wife.

In hardly more than a minute from the time he had left it he was again at the ship's side. But he was no longer Lemaitre—he was Danton. The fire had singed away every particle of his disguise. As he stood there in the bright glare, Cécile, a cable's length away, her eyes fixed upon him, saw into and knew him—knew him utterly, and the secret of his life. The gig had just pushed off. He made a wild leap and fell into the sea.

But his hand caught the gunwale, and the men managed to draw him in.

As the oars of the two boats began to ply, and they moved apart, Cécile stood up unsteadily, lifted her voice shrilly above the screaming wind, and sent forth these words upon the night:

"Edith is the daughter of the woman you murdered!"

And Armand Lemaitre heard them as distinctly as though a thousand spirits had shrieked them into his ear.

* * * * *

They were not many miles from the coast, and though every moment in danger of foundering, before night of the next day the cutter, with Cécile, made for a small fishing town called La Piblouette, where her crew were kindly treated and carted to Dinan, where they took train for Calais. The gig, further south with the captain and Lemaitre, was dashed upon a reef near the coast-wall, and foundered. Lemaitre, who had taken no part in the labour of rowing, was practically fresh, and saved himself by swimming. He reached the sands under cover of night. The others were drowned.

If Lemaitre had planned these details in order to wipe out his identity, he could not accomplish them more effectually. The world henceforth must believe him dead.

The first thing which Cécile did on reaching Calais was to telegraph to Jack Heathcote in Paris. Poor Jack, having no notion where she was, was dying of desolation.

"Edith," she wired, "may be at D.'s château near Avignon. I go there straight to look. You come too. Search hotels of Avignon for me. Don't know names."

While she was travelling south from one point, from another Mr. Hawke was also speeding by train to seek Danton. Hawke had had a great misfortune—one drunken night he had run through nearly £5,000 at the gaming-table, and was now nearly penniless. He had last heard from Danton from the château, and having written lately and received no reply, he was anxiously hastening after fresh supplies, half afraid that Danton had given him the slip.

He reached the château in the forenoon; Cécile towards evening. Jack Heathcote had not yet arrived at Avignon. Cécile, with hurrying heart, walked through the park, up the vast low terraces of the lawn to the wide-fronted old house. Was she about—at last—to see Edith? The first words which she heard from a servant in the hall drove the blood to her heart: Edith had been there—and had gone!

"Where to?" asked Cécile.

"To Italy, I believe, mad'moiselle."

"What part?"

"I do not know at all."

"And no one is here but servants?"

"Dr. Danton is here, mad'moiselle."

"Dr. Danton—here?"

She could not believe her ears. Pieces of the gig, in which Lemaitre was supposed by all France to have perished, had been picked up on the shore.

"He is here, mad'moiselle. He arrived early this morning on foot."

"Did he wear his own clothes?"

"His own clothes? Certainly."

"The reason I ask is because I know that he has lately suffered shipwreck. Dr. Danton—is a friend of mine, you know. When I last saw him he wore a mauve-coloured overcoat. Had he that on when he arrived?"

"I think so — yes, decidedly."

"Where is he now?"

"In his bedroom."

"Is that on this side of the house?"

"Yes. The central room of the suite opening on the corridor on the first floor, just overhead."

"Well, will you announce me? I wish to see him. But I cannot wait, tell him: if he keeps me waiting two minutes I must run away, and come back to-morrow."

"I fear he won't be able to see you to-day. He is very strange, unwell. But I will announce you. What name?"

"Mademoiselle Huguenin."

The servant led the way to one of the rooms of Danton's suite above, and left her. The sending of the false name in to Danton was merely a trick of Cécile's to get rid of the servant; and when the latter came back to say that Dr. Danton could see no one that day, Cécile was nowhere to be seen.

"She was, truly, in a hurry to be off!" said the servant.

But what was the matter with Lemaitre? Had he triumphed so far on every hand only to come home to die of the vengeance of the murdered dead? Had he seen a vision? Had he caught a glance into hell?

"Do not leave me, Hawke—be a good, kind friend to me, Hawke, won't you? Do not leave me, man! I will brain you if you move a step from me——"

As he chased rapidly to and fro in the room he clutched continually at Hawke's sleeve. He walked like a drunken man, with bare feet, in shirt and trousers, one brace fallen over his arm. His eyes had, in them the far-away stare of a state of trance, as though he saw some awful invisible thing continually before him. His sharp white teeth chattered.

"Edith is the daughter of the woman you murdered," he said continually over and over—"the daughter of the woman you murdered—of the woman you—— Ah, Julie! Julie! Spare me, good Julie! Do not look so——"

"Come, mate, pull yourself together!" Mr. Hawke kept saying. "Who would have thought, now, of ever seeing you with the D.T.'s!"

Cécile, concealed behind a huge escritoire in the drawing-room was thinking that Lemaitre, at last, beyond the tricks of chance, had achieved his ends. His past existence was buried. The crew of the cutter, she knew, had not even noticed that when he came to the ship's side a second time he was a man stripped of a disguise. The cutter's crew would be utterly unable to identify Danton with Lemaitre; and the gig's crew had perished. She was the only living witness in the world; in addition to her there was the overcoat, and there was the photograph in its pocket. And it was the coat and the photograph that she had determined at all costs, at whatever peril, to get at once—that night—if Lemaitre had not already had the cunning to destroy them.

Cécile shrank, in blanched terror, backwards.

Unfortunately, the coat and photograph were no more. Danton, in a paroxysm of his new frenzy, had, soon after his arrival that morning, consigned both to the flames. At every point, therefore, he was the master of events.

Cécile waited till every sound in the house was still. The room in which she stood was utterly dark. She reasoned that, as the coat was worn only that morning, it would now be found merely hanging on a peg, not put away anywhere. When she thought that it was about midnight she crept from her hiding-place. She had carefully noticed the position of the bedroom. Her heart beat fast, but not with fear.

Suddenly, as she stepped from behind the escritoire there was a sound—a sudden light blinded her—and before her, framed in a doorway, stood Dr. Lemaitre, looming huge in a long, white night-robe, holding a lamp in his hand.

Cécile shrank, in blanched terror, backwards. His face was toward her. Were his dreadful eyes searching her in her crouching panic? No—his eyes were closed.

He was fast asleep. But on his convulsed and distorted visage was a look of such ghastly horror that the girl for a moment could not bear the sight. She turned her face away.

With long, slow, spectre-like stalk he came straight toward her. She could have shrieked aloud in the tension of her affright. But when Lemaitre came near, instead of touching her, he moved a chair to the leaf of the escritoire, sat down, and took pen, ink and paper. All the time he was looking upward, upward, with closed eyes, as the blind look upward, with eyeballs groping for the light. A low, continuous, whimpering murmur came from his lips.

He commenced to write, with closed eyes still poring upward upon the vision he saw. Every word he wrote he repeated aloud with his lips. Cécile crept behind him, overpeeping his shoulder.

"Julie," he wrote, "take your hand from mine. I will write as you will—but take your hand from mine. God! how purple is your murdered face, Julie! And your hand—your hand, Julie—ah, take it from mine; it is colder than a thousand deaths. I will write as you say; I murdered you in a train between York and Scarborough in England; I cast your body into a ravine. I was seen by a man called Hawke, who was concealed beneath the seat of the carriage. I have kept him in my pay. I told your Edith, your daughter—yours, Julie—ah, that was a bitter fate, my wife! —I told her that Hawke was her father, not knowing who her mother was. I caused her to fly from her home. And she is now at the Casa Calvo, near Lake Como. I have finished. I have confessed. I am ready to die.—Armand Lemaitre."

Cécile stood behind Lemaitre, and behind Cécile stood another crouching figure, watching her. It was Hawke. He had been sleeping on a sofa beside Lemaitre's bed, and waking up and missing him, had come out, and stood staring bewildered at the sight he saw. He soon realised, however, what was happening; Lemaitre was asleep. Who the girl was he could not guess; but he felt that she was an enemy.

Slowly he drew from the pocket of his trousers a large knife, and crept nearer. Some of the words murmured by Lemaitre he heard. That document in the hands of the police would mean ruin for himself. As Lemaitre ended, and Cécile put out her hand to take up the sheet, Hawke, with a cry, with uplifted knife—rushed forward to stab her.

Hawke's cry saved Cécile. She, too, glancing backward, uttered a scream—and dodged the blow. The paper was in her hand, and she darted for the door. Hawke was after her. Outside the darkness was not quite complete owing to the light from the open door. Cécile dashed down the great staircase. "I'll pin you like a fly, you little beast!" panted Mr. Hawke. He was close upon her; half-way down the stairs he was so near that he snatched a handful of hair from the back of her head. The rest of the stairs Cécile cleared at one leap. This was a feat impossible to heavy Hawke. Yet he rolled and plunged downward at an agile rate, bent upon nothing less than murder.

Cécile flew towards the front portal. But this was precisely the point for which she feared. If it were bolted? She knew that a moment's delay meant the loss of all. As she rushed along, her fingers struck out against a chair near-by. She seized, and placed it quickly in Hawke's way. The darkness was now utter, and the next moment Hawke was on his chest on the marble floor.

Cécile reached the front portal; to her joy it was not bolted, only locked. She drew back the spring, and by the time Hawke had come up, she banged the door in his face, and started running over the lawn.

But he was still close behind her with his uplifted knife; and now there was light from the moon. Her wind began to fail; and the longer he ran, the fresher seemed Hawke. He gained slowly on Cécile, once more he put out his hand, and grabbed at her hair. She uttered a cry of despair.

They were then running close by a hedge-row of tamarisk. The next moment Mr. Hawke was lying flat on the ground, stunned by a blow on the head from a heavy stick.

It was Jack Heathcote's stick. He had been waiting by the hedge, looking at the house. All the inns of Avignon he had searched for Cécile in vain; then had concluded that she was at the château with Edith. He had come out late to see her, had found the house closed, and had loitered a little by the hedge.

Cécile lay, gasping, on his breast.

But she held in her hand the confession of Lemaitre.

It was useless, however, as far as he was concerned. They found him in the morning near the spot where he had written it, lying on the floor, with horribly black and twisted face, dead. His heart had burst.

CHAPTER XXVI.

The Battle.

Away in the desert, about this very time, a great battle was fought.

It was the 28th of August, in the afternoon. Some officers stood chatting together before a tent-door. Their skins were tanned; they had just returned from a hot day's riding under the grilling Egyptian sun.

"What is the meaning of the enemy's tactics?" asked Pendragon. "They are massed in overwhelming numbers, yet they do not move at all."

"I have a fancy that something should happen before long. Graham will soon madden them to action," answered Arthur, mopping his wet brow. "Wolseley is hardly the man to lose time when he feels that he can strike; and the troops are getting well up to the front now."

"Lord!" cried Jack Lascelles—"will that tea never be ready? My throat feels like the dustbin of Africa."

The troopers were busy unsaddling horses, and providing them with forage, while the regimental messmen were hard at work preparing refreshment for the soldiers. They had just come back to camp from a long ride over the glaring, burning desert.

The camp was pitched just south of Mahsameh, and consisted only of cavalry. The infantry division, under General Graham, was at the moment engaged in holding the enemy in check at the Kassassin Lock, on the Sweet-water Canal. Musgrave's regiment had only that morning arrived at Mahsameh from Tel-el-Mahuta; but he, Pendragon, and Lascelles had been selected for service on the staff, and were thus, for the time being, serving with the main body of cavalry, consisting of the Household Cavalry, the 7th Dragoon Guards, and a battery of the Royal Horse Artillery. These formed, for the present, the entire cavalry brigade under General Drury Lowe.

Digitized by Google

They had advanced upon the enemy that morning, only to be ordered back again, when the Egyptian attack, with a much superior force, had necessitated a retirement from the rather exposed position held by the cavalry troops.

The heat had been almost insupportable during the hours of enforced inaction. The sun glistened down upon the arid, leafless waste of desert sand. Storms of sand and dust raised by the hot sirocco swept the desert like breaths from an open furnace.

The Egyptian tactics throughout the early hours were inexplicable: though massed in large numbers, and well supported by cavalry and artillery, they had delivered no real assault. General Graham had concluded that the cavalry brigade might be relieved from further toil that day. Canvas afforded the only possible shelter, and the cavalry towards afternoon accordingly fell back upon Mahsameh and camp.

"Yon's t' officers' mess," said Tom Wilson, standing near, with three horses' reins thrown over his arm. "A'd have some tea now, sir; A doan't think thoo'll have much time to drink it in."

"No, Tom?—and why not?" asked Arthur.

"I hear something. Hark!"

"Do you hear anything, Lascelles?"

"No, I don't think so."

"I do," said Tom.

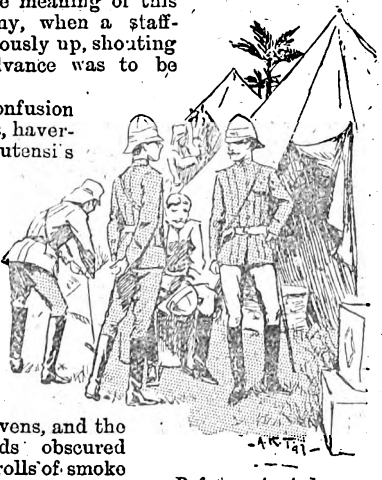
"Do you, Pendragon?"

"No—yes, I do! A faint booming."

Presently all heard it; it had deepened into a dull roar of heavy guns in the direction of Kassassin.

A determined attack was being delivered on Graham's small force, which was composed of the 46th, the 84th, some companies of marines, and a troop of mounted infantry—about 1,800 all told.

The officers returned to the mess, and were washing the dust from their throats with copious draughts of tea, discussing the probable meaning of this move by the enemy, when a staff-officer galloped furiously up, shouting that a general advance was to be made at once.



Before a tent door.

A scene of wild confusion followed. Mess-tins, haversacks, and cooking utensils were flung and bundled about in all directions, before the troopers flew to saddle their already tired horses; but in ten minutes the brigade had formed, and was proceeding to the front at a smart trot.

The blazing sun still rode in the heavens, and the hurrying sand-clouds obscured everything, though rolls of smoke and deep red jets of flame were visible through the sandy murkiness of the air, while the ear could detect the deep roar of the conflict now proceeding. After a weary ride, the cavalry took up a position on the right of the fighting line. The sun set beyond the sand hills, leaving a deep crimson glare; but the dust, which rolled in one enveloping coverlet over the scene of action, rendered any idea of what was going on impossible.

The Duke of Cornwall's Regiment and the Marine Artillery were bearing the brunt of the attack, the former regiment having thrown forward a fighting line of skirmishers in extended order. Later on the York and Lancaster, which had been held in reserve, deployed to take their share in the defence of the position. The enemy kept up a continual murderous cannonade, firing salvoes of four guns with shell and shrapnel.

General Graham sent word to General Drury Lowe that "he could do no more than hold his position and attack the enemy's skirmishers."

A shot entered the breast of Arthur.

The cavalry commander at once made his decision. Though his brigade consisted of wearied men and horses, he knew that he could depend upon them. But his plan was desperate. It was nothing less than to make a sudden dash upon the enemy's rear, against unknown odds, in the deepening darkness.

Sir Baker Russell, acting as Brigade-Major, gave the word, and the body of cavalry moved off quietly to the right, unseen by the enemy. They were soon hidden by the sand-hills, and urged their horses at a quicker pace.

Once, as Arthur turned his head, to his surprise he noticed somewhat behind him, Tom Wilson. The last light was just then fading. He called Tom to him.

"What is the meaning of this, Tom? Why are you not in camp with your regiment?"

"A'm going into action, sir."

"But that is not an answer to my question. You must not do mad things of that sort. Return at once!"

Pendragon came riding towards Arthur just then, and Tom fell back among the mass of horses nimbly treading over the dry and yielding sand. But Tom did not fall far back. He had the behests of a higher power than Arthur to obey—the behests of Cécile Delisle.

It was quite dark when the cavalry brigade dashed in one wide storm upon the enemy's rear; but the scene was soon lit up by a vast red vault of glare, like the dawning of day in Hades. A scene of frightful carnage followed.

Captain Musgrave, with his helmet shot away, with torn clothes, with snow-white hair, with sword hewing its advancing way into the thick of peril, would have seemed to anyone to be courting death. But he was simply careless of life. His whole soul was intent upon one thing only—the slaughter of as many Egyptians as two arms could kill.

He was on foot. His horse was dead. Behind him, also on foot, was Tom Wilson. For every forward step that Arthur took, Tom took one.

At last it was clear that the enemy were in flight. The indefinable instinct of victory began to be felt by the British troops. The throng of battle grew less dense.

Arthur, rushing across a small open space upon a scimitar-brandishing Bedouin, slipped in a pool of gluey blood and fell. The Egyptian made a slash at him which must inevitably have ended him. But Tom Wilson had thrown himself above him. The blade passed slanting through Tom's right shoulder and cut his lung in two. He dropped at once, and in a moment Arthur was bending over him.

"I told you, Tom—ah, my boy, you have died for me!"

Tom opened his mouth to speak, but could not. Arthur bent low down, listening. Tom tried again, and this time a rasping sound escaped his lips.

"Tell Cécile——" he said.

He stiffened and was dead.

At the same moment a shot entered the breast of Arthur and he fell upon the lifeless body of Tom Wilson.

A Night of Tragedy.

A Story of the Time of the Revolution.

On the wooded heights which overlook the village of Hericourt-en-Caux, at the close of a September afternoon in 1800, a lady of youthful appearance was sitting on a stone bench beside the door of an old castle.

All was silence around her.

The only noise which broke the stillness of the evening was the murmuring of a little brook which flowed at the bottom of the valley. Twilight veiled earth and sky in haze, and slowly the night came.

The woman was seated with her hands folded over her knees, in an attitude of deep reverie. Of what did she dream? When it is known that she was twenty-eight years old, and consequently must have passed through many joys and sorrows, we may well believe that her dream was of past memories, and if we remember that the French Revolution ended in suffering, we can understand why the captivating beauty of her face was made gloomy in this time of sadness.

Suddenly she was aroused from her meditations. She heard a footstep on the gravel, and pulling herself together, not wishing to be seen so sad and dejected, in a voice bearing no trace of sorrow, she cried:

"Is that you, Clement?"

And as no one answered, she got up, went to the side whence proceeded the voice, and looked out. Alone on the deserted road, a man advanced towards her.

For a moment she stared at him.

He was tall, broad-shouldered, alert, and vigorous, clad in a brown open coat with a blue waistcoat, and wearing boots of Russian leather. His hat was of black felt. There was nothing that would attract attention in his appearance but his face, the proud and noble expression of which showed that he was of good birth, and made a striking contrast to the disorder of his soiled clothes, the want disclosed by the worn-down-at-heel appearance of his mud-bespattered boots. While his bearing and features were those of a gentleman, his attitude, on the contrary, resembled that of one of those vagabonds who, for some years past, had over-run all the roads stopped the vehicles, and molested the travellers, and who were a witness of the weakness of the police and their inability to establish security in France.

Surprised by the appearance of this unknown, the young lady asked:

"What do you want, sir? Who are you?"

But instead of answering her question, he asked another in a supplicating tone:

"Am I so changed in eight years, dear Clary, that you don't know me?"

The girl bent forward to see him better, and, agitated and trembling, she cried:

"You, Albert, you?"

"Yes, I, Albert de Saint-Frémont."

"But what are you doing here, you poor thing?"

"Seeking refuge for a few hours. I am an outlaw, a fugitive. Suspected of having taken part in a conspiracy, followed, surrounded by police-spies, I left Paris two days ago hoping to reach St. Valery and find there means of crossing to England. But the journey has been hard. I have travelled without rest and have scarcely eaten. I am worn out; I can't go any further. I remembered that this castle was on my road, where formerly I was received as a friend, a fiance, that the beautiful young girl who lived there with her parents had promised to wait for me, and I came, not to remind her of her promise, from which time, a long absence, and my misfortunes have released her, but to beg for a temporary shelter. If you don't consent to receive me, Clary, I am lost."

She clasped her hands with a gesture of despair. She was moved with pity, and in a broken voice she murmured:

"To receive you is, alas! impossible. I am not alone here. My husband lives with me. He has been absent for some days, but is returning this evening, and if he finds you in his house he will betray you. He is a follower of Bonaparte."

Albert drew himself up:

"Your husband! You have married in spite of your engagement?"

There was reproach in his cry.

"Do not hate or blame me," continued Clary. "If I have sacrificed you, if I have feigned to have forgotten you, it was because I was compelled to. Yes, compelled, six years ago. My father, accused of treason, was arrested, tried by a Revolutionary Tribunal, and condemned to death. Resolved to save him or perish with him, I decided to go to Paris and beg for mercy. I knew none of the powerful men of the day, but some one recommended me to go to a member of the National Convention,—Clement Javarin."

"Clement Javarin. A terrorist, a regicide!" exclaimed Albert. "You dared to go to that scoundrel!"

"I had no choice. And then, he was our fellow-countryman, the deputy from our department; we had known him in happier times. For these reasons I threw myself on his mercy. At first he repulsed me sternly: then he yielded and consented to speak for us to Robespierre. I thought he would carry out his promise. Alas, I was greatly mistaken. On my second visit he declared he would only give us his protection on condition that I consented to marry him. 'You are beautiful,' he said to me, 'you are rich, and I like you. Be my wife and your father will be saved.' I protested, I stormed, I entreated, all in vain; he was inexorable. My father was released, and I became the wife of Clement Javarin."

"And your father accepted this sacrifice?"

"He didn't know until it was too late to prevent it. He didn't survive it. Some months after his release he died of grief, declaring that to save him I had vowed myself to perpetual unhappiness."

"You do not love your husband?" demanded Albert, who, his anger explained away, was the picture of grief and sympathy for his friend.

"Love him!" exclaimed Clary. "How can I love him when I am his victim? No, I don't love him; I hate him. But he loves me." And after a pause she added: "You understand, Albert, I couldn't protect you here. Oh, dear—oh, dear, what can I do?"

"Don't be unhappy," he said. "If my presence frightens you so I will go. Though painful, I must bestir myself. I can't see you worried, Clary," he cried suddenly.

He staggered and would have fallen if he had not leant against the wall. As for Clary, perplexed, bewildered, and undecided, she gazed at this spirit whose sudden return filled her heart with trouble and anguish.

"He loves me."

"Did you meet anyone on your way to the castle?" she asked at length.

"No one, and I don't think anyone saw me."

"Then come. I can only save you by one way. We will try it. May Heaven protect us."

"What are you going to do?" he asked.

"Hide you until to-morrow," she replied. "Come."

She offered him her arm, and putting his trembling hand upon it he let her lead him through the gloom.

They passed together the threshold of the castle and entered the vast hall at the end of which they could see, through a half-opened door, a room lighted by two lamps, where the servants were spreading a meal. By the light which came from this apartment Albert perceived, at the end of the hall, the beginning of a large staircase. A word from Clary made him understand that he had to reach this staircase without being heard or seen by the servants in the dining-room. Following the example of his conductress, he held his breath and walked on tip-toe.

"The most difficult part is accomplished," she said in a low voice, when they had arrived safely at the foot of the stairs. Then they cautiously mounted and in a moment were at the first landing. Clary hastened along, with Albert following in her footsteps. They crossed the landing, and opening a door which faced them, Clary ushered Saint-Frémont in.

"Wait patiently till I return," she whispered. "You are safe here."

Without giving him time to answer she shut the door behind her. He heard the key being turned in the lock. He was alone and imprisoned. At first he could see nothing, but gradually his eyes became accustomed to the darkness. He was in a luxurious room. In an alcove, under light curtains, he saw a big white bed; nearer to him a toilet-table, a mirror, a bureau, an embroidery-frame, a book-case, and a harp, and in the vases on the mantel-piece flowers and grasses. Seeing these knick-knacks, this comfort, and all the luxuries of life, arranged with touches of coquetry and grace by a woman's hand, he realised that, not knowing where to hide him, Clary had not hesitated to put her own room at his disposal.

At the thought that he was in her home, surrounded by the familiar tokens of her daily life, a great tenderness came over him, and the love which all these years had not been destroyed, but increased, awoke within him, as powerful, as strong and true as in the far gone time when it was his right.

Suddenly the key was turned in the lock, the door opened and was shut again, and Clary stood before him. She carried in a napkin some food, a bottle of wine, bread and fruit.

"It is all I could get without being seen," she said, arranging them on the table.

"Where are we?" he ventured to ask.

"In my room," she answered. "If Javarin finds us here he will kill us both, but he won't know you are in the house: he never comes in here. You will hide yourself, so that if by chance he did come in he wouldn't see you."

While she spoke she struck a match and lighted a candle.

By this pale light they looked at each other, and started, surprised at the embarrassment shown on each face.

Clary was the first to recover herself.

"I brought you here," she said, "because it is the only room in the castle in which it is in my power to give you a safe refuge. Anywhere else would have been risky. I give it you for some hours. No one will think of looking for you here."

"But you, Clary, where will you pass the night?"

"In a neighbouring room, where I will keep watch until the morning. Before the sun rises I will help you make your escape. You will have rested, and in a short time you will be at Saint-Valery."

"It was ordained then that I was to owe my life to you," he murmured. "Ah, Clary, how can I show you my gratitude?"

"How? By remembering me."

"To what end?" he groaned.

"Why despair?" she replied. "Who knows that the future will not make amends to us for the hardships we have suffered in the past and in the present?"

"You still love me, then?"

"I love you, and will love you as long as you love me."

"Ah, Clary, Clary!"

He stood up, holding out his arms, his eyes sparkling with the joy her words had evoked. But a noise which they heard from without rooted him to the spot. It was the sound of carriage wheels, of horses' hoofs, and the jingling of bells.

"It is Javarin," exclaimed Clary. She put her finger on her lips to imply the need for prudence, and going out, she shut and locked the door behind her as she had done before.

* * * * *

An hour later, in the spacious dining-room, the old member of the Convention and his young wife had finished their meal. Javarin had come straight to the table from his carriage without waiting to change his dusty travelling attire. He had travelled post-haste from Paris, stopping only to change horses, and after a hasty meal he promised himself a good night's rest after his weary journey.

The disorder of his dress, his ruffled hair, and his untidy appearance betrayed the vulgarity of the man. On his coarse features the signs of his brutal nature were even more visible than usual. His low forehead, his fat, heavy chin, his big round eyes, all revealed the disposition of a despot, the grossness of his tastes and his depraved instincts.

To see him beside Clary, so delicate and so gracious, made one wonder how such a charming woman could have been persuaded to marry one so unsuited to her.

For six years, however, she had lived with him, without complaint, hiding under her reserve the repulsion she felt to the man. Yes, she hated him, and only hid her feelings that by so doing she might, one day, have the chance of wreaking her vengence upon him.

The disparity of age between them only aggravated the dissimilarity of their tastes. At forty, Clement Javarin seemed to have buried all his better feelings and only lived to accumulate money.

"What does this mean?"

Already very rich, having added to the fortune which came to him through his wife, he dreamed of more, and welcomed the rise of Bonaparte, his idol, by whose elevation he saw a means of gain to himself.

But Clary took no part in his dreams or ambitions; she lived, retired, in the castle where she was born, and dreamt other dreams, had other ambitions, and treasured another ideal. She dreamt of liberty and love.

It was into this state of affairs that Saint-Frémont had stepped. At sight of him Clary had realised that he loved her still, and she put forth all her strength to save him.

During dinner Clary had been tormented by agonising thoughts of her loved one hidden away, of catastrophes which might befall and troubles which might come, but outwardly she remained calm and sedate, hiding her anxiety bravely.

To disarm suspicion she had simulated an interest in the return and the doings of her husband, and the events in Paris. Surprised by her unusual behaviour, Javarin talked of the attempt on the life of Bonaparte, the explosion of the "infernal machine" on his route, and the means the police were taking to find those accused of being implicated in the plot.

"They are pursuing them, they are hemming them in on all sides," Javarin said. "Already many of them have been arrested, soon all will be, and then they will be punished as they deserve."

"But do they know who they all are?" asked Clary.

"Those they have arrested have given the names of the others."

Afraid of betraying herself if the name of Albert de Saint-Frémont were mentioned before her, Clary asked no more questions, but showed an indignation equal to his own against the authors of this outrage. In spite of her marriage she had remained a Royalist, so Javarin was rejoiced to hear her utter such sentiments, and speak of Bonaparte as she did.

"I am glad to hear you do justice to the saviour of our country," he said. "If all the French were as open-minded as you, Clary, the dangers which threaten us would exist only in imagination."

"I am convinced of it," she answered, wishing to please him.

"Then suit your actions to your words."

"How?"

As she asked the question she left the table, he rose also, and coming towards her, took her hand, and putting his arm round her, he kissed her.

Feeling contact with him odious, Clary attempted to disengage herself, longing to tell him how she hated him and looked on him with loathing and disgust. But she suddenly remembered the refugee hidden in her room, and to save him, she not only remained passive in her husband's embrace, but returned his caress. Then to cut short this scene which humiliated her so, she repeated her question.

"You ask me to make my actions agree with my words, what do you mean?"

"That since you admire Bonaparte, you should go to pay your respects to him."

"I!" she exclaimed. "You would like me to go to Paris?"

"You won't be the first or the last to give homage to the Premier Consul. In offering yours, you will strengthen my influence over him. You will never regret it. Bonaparte is the man of the future; France is already at his feet. Promise to come with me the next time I go to Paris."

"If you think my presence is necessary to your interests I will go," she answered.

"Oh, that is good," he said joyously. "Believe me, Clary, I am deeply grateful. If there is any way in which I can show you how I feel about it, tell me; I shall be delighted to obey you."

Then feigning to be greatly impressed by his offer, she said:

"Grant me this boon at some future time. I cannot use it at present, but when the necessity arises I will claim it."

At that moment a servant entered, and Javerin asked:

"What is it? Who wants me?"

"The Mayor of Hericourt desires to speak to you outside, sir," answered the servant.

"The Mayor of Hericourt. Show him in."

The Mayor entered, accompanied by an individual in black, whom Clary didn't know, and two gendarmes.

"What does this mean?" demanded Javarin in an imperious way, "these gendarmes in my house!"

"Pardon me, M. Javarin," replied the Mayor, quite overwhelmed by the bold step his duty compelled him to take, "Monsieur will explain to you," pointing to the man in black, "he is from Paris and has his orders."

More and more surprised and excited, Javarin turned to the stranger.

"Speak, sir," he said to him, "for in truth I do not understand."

"You will understand, monsieur, I am commissioned by the head of police to look for the men who wished to assassinate the Premier Consul, and I have reason to believe that one of them has taken refuge here."

"Here!" cried Javarin in a tone which showed an incredulity equalled only by his evident amazement. "What folly! If he had come into my house I should know of it. My people would have told me, I can trust them."

Clary stepped forward and said resolutely:

"And I would have seen him myself. I sat in front of the castle all the afternoon, waiting for M. Javarin, who was to return from Paris. I only left at his arrival. No one could have entered without passing me."

"You hear, sir," exclaimed Javarin. "Do you imagine anyone would beg for shelter at the house of such a notorious upholder of the Premier Consul as I am? To come to the house of Javarin would be to give oneself up."

"These brigands are bold enough for anything. Just because your house would be such an unlikely place to be searched, they would think it a safe refuge."

The force of this argument struck Javarin:

"Yes, perhaps you are right," he said.

The police officer continued:

"He left Paris two days ago for Saint-Valery-en-Caux where he meant to embark. Hearing of his intentions from one of his accomplices, I was on my way to intercept him there when, in passing through this village, I heard of a stranger having been seen. On inquiry I recognised my man. When last seen he was at the entrance of your park. I desired Monsieur the Mayor to put these gendarmes at my service, and came here, knowing that you would second me in my efforts to capture this criminal."

Javarin bowed, and in a condescending voice replied:

"You have every reason to count on my zeal. General Bonaparte hasn't a more faithful servant than I. Everyone here is under your orders. What do you think of doing?"

"First of all I will search the park, and if he isn't found there, I'm afraid we must look through the castle."

"I will guide you myself, sir," replied Javarin. And turning towards the servants assembled round the door he gave his orders:

"Light the lanterns, let the dogs loose, and conduct Monsieur to the boundaries of the park, and show him all over."

All this time Clary was enduring the utmost torture. Hope of saving the man she loved was disappearing. She knew that after the search in the park, every room in the castle would be peered into, and how could she protect him from these people? No solution of the problem occurred to her. She saw, in imagination, Albert arrested before her eyes, imprisoned, tried, and shot.

"What can I do, what can I do?"

All at once she realised that she was alone with her husband. The police officer, accompanied by the Mayor and the gendarmes, had gone out. One could hear them calling to each other in the park, and the barking of dogs. Clary saw the peril that Saint-Frémont was in. She threw a despairing look to wards Heaven, as if taking it as a witness of the dire necessity which drove her to this last step, and going up to Javerin, she said:

"Listen to me. A few minutes ago, after I had promised to go with you to Paris you offered to prove your gratitude when the occasion arose. Prove it now, on this occasion, at once."

"This occasion!" he exclaimed in surprise. "Where? How?"

Then taking another step towards him she replied in a low voice:

"The man who you are looking for is here."

"Here! In my house?" he cried. "But who let him in without consulting me? Who gave him permission to enter?"

Not answering this double question, but clasping her hands, she repeated:

"He is here, and I beseech you to help me to save him."

* * * * *

Standing before her husband in an attitude of entreaty, Clary waited anxiously for him to speak. But he kept silence. It was terrible, more awful than a burst of fury.

"Why do you not speak, Clement?" asked Clary in

A shot was fired and Javarin fell to the floor.

a voice broken by emotion. "Will you not grant my request?"

He gave no answer, but tried to make her utter the words which would betray her.

"So," he said, "you have sheltered this man, and you do not fear the risk to me of being taken for your accomplice? You cannot be ignorant of the law of the Premier Consul, that all who conceal conspirators shall suffer the same penalty as they do. You did not hesitate, you received him and hid him: and you only confess your imprudence to me when you know that he will be found. Why are you so interested in him? Do you know him? What is his name? Explain yourself, I'm waiting."

"He is the Chevalier de Saint-Frémont."

"Saint-Frémont? You have given refuge to him? Miserable woman, do you not know that he is the tool of Georges Crydoudel? And you ask me to aid you in saving him—him, the most violent, the most dangerous of the enemies of the Premier Consul. You thought that I would grant your request?"

"I think so still," replied Clary. "I will tell you my reason, and then perhaps you will understand me. Once, before I knew you or thought that I would ever be your wife, I was engaged to M. de Saint-Frémont. We were to have been married, when he emigrated, and I have not seen him since. But the memories that he awakened in me when he came to seek shelter under our roof prevented my sending him away. I hoped he would continue his flight to-night after a rest, but he is still here."

The frankness of this confession seemed to impress Javarin.

"Why didn't you tell me this six years ago when we married?" he asked.

"Because I did not wish to humiliate you further, when you refused to defend my father unless I married you, by telling you that I could never love you as I loved another, and that I was absolutely sacrificing myself."

"But, perhaps, as you love this man, he loves you, too."

"I believe he loves me," replied Clary simply. "As for me, what do my sentiments matter to you? Ah, Clement, if you want me to forget him, save him. Save him. I beg of you, and I will forget him, so that all my life I will remember your generosity and be grateful with all my heart"

She had never looked so beautiful, and Javarin was touched.

He came across to her and said very gently:

"With all your heart, is that true?"

She looked him straight in the face:

"I have never told a lie," she affirmed. "Save Albert, and I will have no other wish but to please you."

He strained her to his heart.

"Ah siren, what do you wish me to do?"

"You consent?" she cried.

"I must, when your tenderness, which has been withheld for so long, is the prize."

She was rejoiced, and for a moment he felt her kisses freely given. Unhappily for her, in her frenzy, she had ceased to observe him. She did not see what his eyes betrayed.

"Where have you hidden him?" he asked.

"In my room."

"Bring him here."

"Here!" she exclaimed stupified. "But they will see him."

"No, they won't, they are far away in the park. We have plenty of time to send him safely away. Only, be quick. Give him one of my cloaks, and money if he needs it. Go, quickly."

She obeyed him, and disappeared. Then Javarin ran to the door which opened on to the park. A gendarme was acting as sentinel.

"Run and tell the officer that I want him here at once. I think we have what he is looking for."

He turned to the room, his eyes shining with joy.

"We are here," the voice of Clary said suddenly. She was there, and beside her Albert de Saint-Frémont.

"Come, sir," said Javarin. "I am going to take you to the park gates and show you your road, while my wife detains the people who are looking for you."

He dragged him, amidst many expressions of gratitude, to the door. They had only gone a few steps, however, when the officer, followed by his men, came hurrying up, and at the call of Javarin ran towards them.

"Too late" murmured the latter to Saint-Frémont, pushing him back into the room they had just left.

Clary, overcome by surprise and trouble, screamed. Convinced that ill-luck only had stopped her husband from carrying out his good intentions, she came towards him. But waving her aside he turned to the police officer and pointing to Saint-Frémont, said:

"There is the man for whom you are looking."

Then she understood.

"Wretch! Wretch!" She threw these words at him in a voice stifled by sobs. But he remained unmoved, only saying in a low voice to her:

"By confessing that you loved him you condemned him."

Meanwhile the gendarmes tried to seize Saint-Frémont. He, however, set them at defiance, placing his back against the wall and covering them with his revolver. But one of them struck his arm so heavily that it fell to his side, useless, and he stood before them defenceless.

"I hope, sir," Javarin then said to the officer, "that you will inform the Premier Consul of my zeal in his service."

"Justice will be done to you," replied the man.

"Tell him," Jarvin added, "that it was owing to me that you caught your man, and owing to madame."

A cry of horror from Clary greeted this awful accusation. Drawing herself up she denied the charge, but Jaravin repeated:

"It was she who delivered him to you. She wished to prove her devotion to Bonaparte."

At these words, which Saint-Frémont heard as he was being taken from the room, he turned. His angry eyes fell on Clary, who read the reproach in them. Suspected by him! That was more than she could bear. Javarin's words had aroused his suspicions, destroyed his faith in her.

He signed to the gendarmes to continue their way. She intercepted them. She would not let her lover go before she had justified herself. She entreated him not to believe Javarin, but she saw by his coldness that he thought her guilty.

Suddenly she ceased her protestations, they were all in vain. Mad with despair her eye caught the gleam of the revolver which had been forced out of Saint-Frémont's hand. She picked it up and, overcome by a desire for vengeance on Jaravin, she approached him.

"I will prove that I am not your accomplice," she said.

A shot was fired and Javarin fell to the floor.

* * * * *

Some days after the Chevalier de Saint-Frémont was brought before a court-martial and condemned to death, and was executed at Paris, on the plain of Grenelle.

As for Clary Javarin, at first arrested for the murder of her husband, she was soon liberated. Bonaparte, after due consideration, had decided that she should not be prosecuted.

Busaco is, perhaps, the most picturesque of Peninsula battles. In the wild nature of the ground over which it raged, the dramatic incidents which marked its progress, the furious daring of the assault, and the stern valour of the defence, it is almost without a rival.

The French had every advantage in the fight—save one. They were 65,000 strong, an army of veterans, many of them the men of Austerlitz and Marengo. Massena led; Ney was second in command: both facts being pledges of daring generalship. The English were falling sullenly back in the long retreat which ended at Torres Vedras, and the French were in exultant pursuit. Massena added that he was going to "drive the leopard into the sea," and French soldiers, it may be added, are never so dangerous as when on fire with the élan of success.

Wellington's army was inferior to its foe in numbers, and of mixed nationality, and it is probable that retreat had loosened the fibre of even British discipline, if not of British courage. Two days before Busaco, for example, the Light Division—the very flower of the British army—was encamped in a pine-wood which a peasant had warned them was "haunted."

During the night, without signal or visible cause, officers and men, as though suddenly smitten with frenzy, started from their sleep and dispersed in all directions. Nor could the mysterious panic be stayed until some officer, shrewder than the rest, shouted the order: "Prepare to receive cavalry," when the instinct of discipline asserted itself, the men rushed into rallying squares, and recovered from their panic.

But battle is to the British soldier a tonic, and when Wellington drew up his lines, in challenge of battle to his pursuer, on the great hill of Busaco, his red-coated soldiery were at least full of a grim satisfaction. One of the combatants has described the diverse aspects of the two hosts on the night before the fight:

"The French were all bustle and gaiety; but along the whole English line, the soldiers, in stern silence, examined their flints, cleaned their locks and barrels, and then stretched themselves on the ground to rest, each one with his firelock within his grasp."

The single advantage of the British lay in their position. Busaco is a great hill, one of the loftiest and most rugged in Portugal, eight miles in breadth, and barring the road by which Massena was moving on hither.

"There are certainly," said Wellington, "many bad roads in Portugal, but the enemy has taken decidedly the worst in the whole Kingdom."

The great ridge, with its gloomy, tree-clad heights, and cloven crest, round which the mists hung in sullen vapour, was an ideal position for defence. In its front was a valley forming a natural ditch so deep that the eye could scarcely pierce its depths. The ravine at one point was so narrow that the English and French guns waged duel across it, but on the British side the chasm was almost perpendicular.

From their aëry perch on September 28th, 1810, the English watched Massena's great host coming on. Every eminence sparkled with their bayonets, every road was crowded with their waggons; it seemed not so much the march of an army as the movement of a nation.

The vision of "grim Busaco's iron ridge," glittering with British bayonets, arrested the march of the French; but Ney, whose military glance was keen and sure, saw that the English arrangements were not yet complete: an unfilled gap, three miles wide, parted the right wing from the left, and he was eager for an immediate attack. Massena, however, was ten miles in the rear. According to Marbot, who has left a spirited account of Busaco, Massena put off the attack till the next day, and thus threw away a great opportunity.

In the gloomy depths of the ravines, however, a war of skirmishers broke out, and the muskets rang loudly through the echoing valleys, while the puffs of eddying white smoke rose through the black pines. But night fell, and the mountain heights above were crowned with the bivouac fires of a hundred thousand warriors, over whom the serene sky glittered. Presently a bitter wind broke on the mountain summits, and all through the night the soldiers shivered under its keen blast.

Massena's plan of attack was simple and daring. Ney was to climb the steep front on the English left, and assail the Light Division under Crauford; Regnier, with a corps d'élite, was to attack the English left, held by Picton's division. Regnier formed his attack into five columns while the stars were yet glittering coldly in the morning sky. They had first to plunge into the savage depths of the ravine, and then climb the steep slope leading to the British position.

The vigour of the attack was magnificent. General Marle, who had won fame at Austerlitz, personally led the charge. At a run the columns went down the ravine; at a run, scarcely less swift, they swept up the hostile slope. The guns smote the columns from end to end, and the attack left behind it a broad crimson trail of the dead and dying. But it never paused.

A wave of steel and fire and martial tumult, it swept up the hill, broke over the crest in a spray of flame, brushed aside a Portuguese regiment in its path like a wisp of straw, and broke on the lines of the Third Division.

The pressure was too great for even the solid English line to sustain; it, too, yielded to the impetuous French, part of whom seized the rocks at the highest point of the hill, while another part wheeled to the right, intending to sweep the summit of the Sierra. It was an astonishing feat. Only French soldiers, magnificently led and in a mood of victory, could have done it; and only British soldiers, it may be added, whom defeat hardens, could have restored such a reverse.

Picton was in command, and he sent at the French a wing of the 45th, the famous Connaught Rangers, led by Colonel Wallace, an officer in whom Wellington reposed great confidence. Wallace's address was brief and pertinent.

"Press them to the muzzle, Connaught Rangers; press on to the rascals!" he cried. There is no better fighting material in the world than an Irish regiment, well led, and in a high state of discipline, and this matchless regiment, with levelled bayonets, ran in on the French with a grim and silent fury. Vain was resistance. Marbot says of the Rangers that "their first volley, delivered at fifteen paces, stretched more than 500 men on the ground," and the threatening gleam of the bayonet followed fiercely on the flame of the musket.

The French were borne, shouting, struggling, and fighting desperately, over the crest and down the steep slope to the ravine below. In a whirlwind of dust and fire and clamour went the whole body of furious soldiery into the valley, leaving a broad tract of broken arms and dying men.

According to the regimental records of the 88th, "twenty minutes sufficed to teach the heroes of Marengo and Austerlitz that they must yield to the Rangers of Connaught!" As the breathless Rangers re-formed triumphantly on the ridge, Wellington galloped up and declared he had never witnessed a more gallant charge.

But a wing of Regnier's attack had formed at right angles across the ridge. It was pressing forward with stern resolution; it swept before it the light companies of the 74th and 88th Regiments, and unless this attack could be arrested the position and the battle were lost.

Picton rallied his lines within sixty yards of the French muskets, a feat not the least marvellous in a marvellous fight, and then sent them furiously at the exulting French, who held a strong position amongst the rocks

It is always difficult to disentangle the confusion which marks a great fight. Napier says that it was Cameron who formed line with the 38th under a violent fire, and, without returning shot, ran in upon the French grenadiers with the bayonets and hurled them triumphantly over the crest

Picton, on the other hand, declares that it was the light companies of the 74th and the 88th under Major Smith, an officer of great daring—who fell in the moment of victory—that flung the last down over the cliff. Who can decide when such experts—and actors in the actual scene—differ?

The result, however, as seen from the French side, is clear. "The French," Marbot records, "found themselves driven in a heap down the deep descent, up which they had climbed, and the English lines followed them half way down, firing murderous volleys.

"At this point we lost a general, two colonels, 80 officers, and 700 or 800 men.

"The English," he adds, in explanation of this dreadful loss of life, "were the best marksmen in Europe, the only troops who were perfectly practised in the use of small arms, whence their firing was far more accurate than that of any other infantry."

A gleam of humour at this point crosses the grim visage of battle. Picton, on lying down in his bivouac the night before the battle, had adorned his head with a picturesque and highly-coloured nightcap. The sudden attack of the French woke him, he clapped on cloak and cocked hat, and rode to the fighting line, when he personally led the attack which flung the last of Regnier's troops down the slope.

At the moment of the charge he took off his cocked hat to wave the troops onward; this revealed the domestic head-dress he unconsciously wore, and the astonished soldiers beheld their general enflamed with war-like fury gesticulating martially in a night cap! A great shout of laughter went up from the men, as they stopped for a moment to realise the spectacle; then with a tempest of mingled laughter and cheers, they flung themselves on the enemy.

Meanwhile Ney had formed his attack on the English left, held by Crauford and the famous Light Division. Marbot praises the characteristic tactics of the British in such fights.

"After having, as we do," he says, "garnished their front with skirmishers, they post their principal forces out of sight, holding them all the time sufficiently near to the key of the position to be able to attack the enemy the instant they reach it; and this attack, made unexpectedly on assailants who had lost heavily, and think the victory already theirs, succeeds almost invariably. We had," he adds, "a melancholy experience of this art at Busaco."

Crauford, a soldier of fine skill, made exactly such a disposition of his men. Some rocks at the edge of the ravine formed natural embrasures for the English guns under Ross; below them the Rifles were flung out as skirmishers; behind them the German Infantry were the only visible troops. But in a fold of the hill, unseen, Crauford held the 43rd and 52nd Regiments drawn up in line.

Ney's attack, as might be expected, was sudden and furious.

The English, in the grey dawn, looking down the ravine, saw three huge masses start from the French lines and swarm up the slope. To climb an ascent so steep, vexed by skirmishers on either flank, and scourged by the guns which flashed from the summit, was a great and most daring feat—yet the French did it. Busaco indeed, is memorable as showing the French fighting quality at its highest point.

General Simon led Loison's attack right up to the mouths of the English guns, and in the dreadful charge, its order was never disturbed, nor its speed arrested.

"Ross's guns," says Napier, "were worked with incredible quickness, yet their range was palpably contracted every round; the enemy's shot came singing up in a sharper key; the English skirmishers, breathless and begrimed with powder, rushed over the edge of the ascent; the artillery drew back"—and over the edge of the hill came the bear-skins and the gleaming bayonets of the French!

General Simon led the attack so fiercely home that he was the first to leap across the English entrenchments, when an infantry soldier, lingering stubbornly after his comrades had fallen back, shot him point-blank through the face. The unfortunate general, when the fight was over, was found lying in the redoubt, amongst the dying and the dead, with scarcely a feature left. He recovered, was sent as a prisoner to England, and was afterwards exchanged, but his horrible wound made it impossible for him to serve again.

Crauford had been watching meanwhile with grim coolness the onward rush of the French. They came storming and exultant, a wave of martial figures, edged with a spray of fire, and a tossing fringe of bayonets, over the summit of the hill; when suddenly Crauford, in a shrill tone, called on his reserves to attack.

In an instant there rose, as if out of the ground, before the eyes of the astonished French, the serried lines of the 45th and 52nd; and what a moment before was empty space was now filled with the frowning visage of battle.

The British lines broke into one stern and deep-toned shout, and 1,800 bayonets, in one long line of gleaming points, came swiftly down upon the French. To stand against that moving hedge of deadly and level steel was impossible; yet each man in the leading section of the French raised his musket and fired, and two officers and ten soldiers fell before them. Not a Frenchman had missed his mark! They could do no more!

"The head of their column," to quote Napier, "was violently thrown back upon the rear, both flanks were overlapped at the same moment by the English wings, and three terrible discharges at five yards' distance shattered the wavering mass.

Before those darting points of flame the pride of the French shrivelled. Shining victory was converted, in almost the passage of an instant, into crushing defeat; shattered mass, with ranks broken, and colours abandoned and discipline forgotten, the French were swept into the depths of the ravine out of which they had climbed.

One of the dramatic episodes of the fight at this juncture is that of Captain Jones—known in his regiment as "Jack Jones," of the 52nd. Jones was a fiery Welshman, and led his company in the rush on General Simon's column. The French were desperately trying to deploy, a chef-de-bataillon giving the necessary orders with great vehemence. Jones ran ahead of his charging men, outstripping them by speed of foot, challenged the French officer with a warlike gesture to single combat, and slew him with one fierce thrust before his own troops, and the 52nd, as they came on at the run, saw the duel and its result, were lifted by it to a mood of victory, and raised a sudden shout of exultation, which broke the French as by a blast of musketry fire!

For hours the battle spluttered and smouldered amongst the skirmishers in the ravines, and some gallant episodes followed. Towards evening, for example, a French company, with signal audacity, and apparently on its own private impulse, seized a cluster of houses only half a musket shot from the Light Division, and held it while Crauford scourged them with the fire of twelve guns. They were only turned out at the point of the bayonet by the 43rd. But the battle was practically over, and the British had beaten, by sheer hard fighting, the best troops and the best marshals of France.

In the fierceness of actual fighting, Busaco has never been surpassed, and seldom did the wounded and dying lie thicker on a battle-field than where the hostile lines struggled together on that fatal September 27th. The mêlée at some points was too close for even the bayonet to be used, and the men fought with fists or with the butt end of their muskets.

From the rush which swept Regnier's men down the slope, the Connaught Rangers came back with faces and hands and weapons literally splashed red with blood. The firing was so fierce that Wellington, with his whole staff, dismounted. Napier, however—one of the famous fighting trio of that name, and who afterwards conquered Scinde—fiercely refused to dismount, or even cover his red uniform with a cloak.

"This is the uniform of my regiment," he said, "and in it I will show, or fall this day." He had scarcely uttered the words when a bullet smashed through his face, and shattered his jaw to pieces. As he was carried past Lord Wellington he waved his hand and whispered through his torn mouth: "I could not die at a better moment!"

Of such stuff were the men who fought under Wellington in the Peninsula!

Answers to Correspondents.

Come, now, the Fresh Air Fund does not seem to be exciting your interest and compassion this year as it has done in the past. How is this? Have you already subscribed to the Prince of Wales' Hospital Fund, or to the Indian Famine Fund, or to one of the other many excellent schemes for mitigating the sufferings of humanity? If so, you probably do not feel called upon to make a further donation. But, is not the F.A.F. an old friend of yours? Should you neglect it? There are over a hundred thousand children anxiously waiting, with tear-stained faces, for your little contribution. A few pence will be as appreciated as an equal number of sovereigns, for the spirit which prompts the giver in either case is the same. If you have already handed out all the spare cash you have to the Jubilee Celebration charities, send us your old clothes, your worn-out mail-carts, your last year's dresses, and they will be sold and the proceeds put towards the Fresh Air Fund in your name. All contributions will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly. Really, now, can't you find an old shilling to send?

In these Days of High Pressure when the incessant grind necessary for a decent existence is severe enough to knock vital sparks out of the constitutions of the best of us, who shall deny that they are wise in their generation, who, without waiting for a danger signal, appeal periodically to some proved medicine which can be implicitly trusted to cleanse and renovate the marvellous mechanism of the human system? At no time since the days of Adam have breadwinners, whether man or woman, stood in such pressing need as they do nowadays of a sure, convenient, and at the same time perfectly harmless antidote against brain fag, irritability, and drooping spirits. Well, to balance the bitters, you will generally, even in this hard world, find the genuine sweets somewhere, and undoubtedly it is just here where come cheerfully, and cheaply, to the rescue. A remedy always pleasantly speedy—for we have no time to rest by the way—certain in its curative power, safe and gentle in its action, and permanent in its results, is it any wonder that BEECHAM'S PILLS have found, and are ever finding, their way into the waistcoat pocket of every wise man, and into the cupboards of every thoughtful woman, maid or matron? BEECHAM'S PILLS have long been prized for their distinct virtue of pleasingly appealing to the brain via the stomach, and by dispersing all "cobwebs," at once fitting us to face the struggle of modern life. Vast numbers owe their good health to BEECHAM'S PILLS, nay, more, we repeat the old, bold, but honest statement that BEECHAM'S PILLS save thousands of lives yearly. Therefore, we consider the forcible assertion that first caught your eye on this page to be the plain truth, viz.—that "in these days of high pressure," BEECHAM'S PILLS

Are an Absolute Necessity.

A BROKEN MASK

BY JOAN BARRETT.

CHAPTER I.

THE ARRIVAL OF A STRANGER.

EVERY pot and pan in the old-fashioned kitchen shone with great brilliancy, and some of them that had the good fortune to be suspended opposite the turned-up leaf of the oak table might have been pardoned if they imagined that their lustre being reflected in the well-polished board added to the beauty of the shining table.

Aunt Shales, the housekeeper at Honey-pots Farm, had been hard at work all the October morning, scouring and rubbing and cleaning, until Emily, her one much-tried assistant, had given unmistakable signs of rebellion which Aunt Shales had promptly resented.

"Some gals be born muddlers, and some be born fools," said Aunt Shales to her nephew's wife, a pale, dark-haired, wiry-looking woman, who had dropped in to take tea with her husband's relative. "In my 'pinion that Em'ly's a sight worse than either. She's got no more idea of rubbin' up a stick of furniture than that duck a-hangin' up over your head. To see her making believe that she's polishin' sets me all on a twitter. She rubs for all the world as though she thinks she's a-dustin' a peach. I'd rather be married forty times over—and you knows what married life is, Polly, and how tryin' the best of men can be when the fit takes 'em, which was too often the case with Shales—than have the knockin' under and the makin' of a good servant girl out of one flighty headed gal. Not as Em'ly'll ever be wuth the salt she eats, and many's the time I've told her so. But gels be like thrashin' machines—whatever you puts in 'em, out it all goes."

"I've got no cause to complain of my husband," said Polly, with a compression of her thin, thread-like lips. "He never goes about makin' disturbances in fam'lies and inventin' the Lord knows what, like some people as I knows of."

Aunt Shales opened the tea-pot lid and gently stirred its steaming contents with a spoon as she remarked suavely, but with an uneasy light in her small, twinkling eyes: "Oh, don't mention her, Polly. The very name of our John's 'Riar makes me feel like never openin' my Bible again. The ructions she've caused! And, as I says, I can't for the life of me see why. Oh, she's a bitter weed is John's 'Riar!"

"I don't say as John's 'Riar is free from blame," said Polly, going red in the face. "But there's them as is older than her and a deal wuss." She took a cup of tea from the tray and began to stir it violently. "I was in at Aunt Jane's last night," she added, fixing her eye accusingly upon her relative's fat, rosy face, "an' I heard from her as you'd bin tellin' as I said that Aunt Jane had never paid Farmer Strange for the pig she had of him come Christmas twelvemonth!"

Aunt Shales wrinkled her plump forehead

"Oh, don't mention her, Polly."

Aunt Shales opened the door.

in strong amazement, and looked the very personification of injured innocence.

"Lawks, Poll," said she. "Didn't you tell me so? Well I never; I could have sworn you did, my dear," as Polly burst out into an excited and indignant negative. "But, of course, if you says as you didn't, why you didn't, and that's enough. Oh, I never argifys about nothing, I don't."

"It's a pity as your mem'ry's such a short 'un," said Polly with a snort. "I'm sure that I was never so took in all my life as when Aunt Jane asked me what I meant by setting about Thorneydene as she was no better than a thief. You could have knocked me down with a feather! As if I, with six children and the baby down with the measles, have got any time for gossiping about Aunt Jane's affairs!"

"Course you ain't! If Jane wasn't an old maid, and had been blessed with a better head-piece—not as it's her fault, poor thing, that she's never married—and ain't much better than a fool, as you may say—she'd know that! But there, some folks they won't reason, and you couldn't knock sense into 'em, not if you tried with a sledge-hammer. So it wasn't you as told me about her owin' Farmer Strange for her pig!" exclaimed Aunt Shales in tones of dubious surprise and soft wonderment. She rested her double chin in one small, fat hand and stared with a fixed expression at a plate of steaming tea-cake. "Now I wonders who it was. I knows somebody told me on the very day that Em'ly broke one of the best chiney plates. It must have been 'Lizer's Nell, if you says as it wasn't you, Poll." She refused to hear the words of dissent that began to bubble from the younger woman's lips, and continued with the same placid serenity. "I knows I saw her the same afternoon 'cause she warned me against buying any chiney cement from Roger's shop. 'Tain't a bit of good,' she says. Nell's a rare 'un for getting a stack of wheat out of a single straw, she is."

"I dunno who told you, but I do know as I didn't, Aunt Shales," cried Polly very loudly this time, and growing redder in the visage and more fiery in the eyes. "I shouldn't wonder if Aunt Jane goes back from her word now, and don't give my poor little Lottie the corals she promised her for a Christmas box! I do wish as some people 'd stick more to the truth, and not go spreadin' things about folks as don't even know the meanin' of backbitin' and slanderin'."

"So do I, Poll," said Aunt Shales with great feeling. "The mischief as them people can do ain't to be believed, is it? Oh, you may make up your mind to losing them corals. Jane told me she shouldn't spend a brass farthing on any of your children after hearin' that. 'Tain't to be expected, is it now? Lawks, Poll, we should feel the same if we was in her shoes, shouldn't we——"

Polly deposited her cup with a vicious rattle upon the tray, and glared wrathfully at the smiling amiable face opposite her.

"Considerin' as I never said it——" she began at the top of her voice, when Aunt Shales rose, winked mysteriously, and proceeded to unlock a cupboard by the side of the fireplace.

"You ain't got no rum in your tea," she said. "A drop in the winter time is good for spasms——"

"I ain't got no spasms. What I was sayin' was that considerin'——"

"It keeps out the cold," said Aunt Shales sweetly, as she returned with a bottle and placed it by Polly's elbow. "As you was sayin'—Oh, I shall tell Jane as you says you didn't tell me, oh, I shall, Poll. Right's right all the world over, 'cept when it's wrong, as I says. An' seeing as we ain't here for long, and allays going about with one leg in the grave, as you may say, why, let's be happy while we can. Oh, I can't abide them backbitin' folks—help yourself, now, do, Poll. 'Tain't often as I takes a drop of anything, as you knows, but seein' as you've come to tea, and that Em'ly's bin worritin of me so——" She stretched out her hand for the bottle, and poured a very small quantity of rum into her tea-cup, eyeing the contents of Polly's cup, and then measuring the bottle with her eyes before replacing it upon the table.

"It don't do no good to say what you thinks, do it? An' to hear some folks talk, an' 'specially our 'Lizer's Nell, you'd think as she could have made the world better than God A'mighty and wanted no rest on the seventh day, too. I do declare they puts me out of all patience. 'Taint bad rum, is it, Poll? Brings out the flavour of the tea, don't it? Oh, I shan't buy no more tea at Rogers'. The last was half powder, and Mr. John did go on. I s'pose you've heard as he'll soon be in the Bankrupt Court?"

"What, Mr. Gillway!" cried Polly, quite forgetting her own grievance in the excitement caused by this news.

"Mr. John! I dunno nothin' about him. He's like the cobblers' wax—too close to squeeze much out of. No, I means Rogers. Oh, it's gospel truth, Poll."

"You don't say so, Aunt Shales! And him seemin' so prosperous, too——"

Polly broke off abruptly. Someone had given a vigorous knock upon the kitchen door. "Em'ly was upstairs cleanin' herself," as Aunt Shales expressed it. The two women exchanged glances in the almost darkened room.

"Light the lamp, Poll, while I sees who it is," whispered Aunt Shales, rising and going to the door.

Visitors, familiar visitors, at Honey-pots never knocked. They entered boldly without superfluous ceremony.

Aunt Shales opened the door. In the grey wintry light she saw a short, thin man, with a clean-cut face, and eyes of remarkable keenness. Even in the murkiness of the winter evening they arrested Aunt Shales' attention. The stranger was well dressed in black and wore gloves.

"I beg your pardon," he said, in a low, clear voice, "for disturbing you, but I am told you have rooms to let——"

"Rooms to let here!" interrupted Aunt Shales, peering up at the stranger in surprise and some resentment. "Oh, lawks no, sir. Mr. Gillway, my master, ain't likely to be wishin' to let no rooms. Who in the world could have sent you here?"

"I was inquiring for apartments in the village," said the stranger in his clear, penetrating voice, "and I was distinctly told that I should obtain lodgings at the big farm upon the high road to Leigh. Perhaps there is another farm close at hand——"

"Farmer Strange can't be goin' to take in lodgers, can he, Polly?" called Aunt Shales, turning her head towards the tea-table. "Greyhouse Farm is close agin our own. You can see its roof from the meadow yonder, an' our fields joins further on. Maybe it is at Gray-House after all, though it 'ud be a rare blow to Miss Kitty's pride if the farm's turned into a lodgin' house!" she added, turning now to the stranger.

He had advanced over the threshold of the kitchen with a soft velvety tread that bore some resemblance to the cautious movements of a cat, and his keen eyes roved round the apartment with an eager curiosity that did not escape the watchful Polly.

"What a delightful kitchen!" he exclaimed, and Aunt Shales beamed with gratified pride at the stranger's evident admiration of her copper vessels, the long snowy deal table, the equally spotless dresser, with its brave array of pink and white china, and the best oak table, with its turned-up leaf. "How very much I regret having disturbed you, and how sorry I am that it is out of your power to acccommodate me. You feel quite sure that your employer would not let me have a couple of rooms?"

"Oh, there ain't no doubt about that!" cried Aunt Shales, jerking her grey head. "He ain't fond enough of strangers to take 'em under his roof, nor bad enough off, I hopes, though, to be sure, I don't know nothin' about his affairs, seein' he's not one to make free with you, nor tell you nothin' himself, as some men will. Now, the Stranges, they be poor, for all as Mrs. Caffyn's the gals' aunt, an' their mother was the youngest daughter of Squire Hawthorn, an' came out of as good a house as you'll find in all Sussex."

"Your employer is not at home?"

"He's gone to Leigh to buy some sheep. But lawks, if he was here, sir, you couldn't get no furrader than I can send you. Mr. Gillway ain't the one to let rooms in his house. Little as I knows about him, I knows that much."

"Gillway! Gillway!" repeated the stranger. "What an odd coincidence that the name of your employer should also be the name of a very old and valued friend of mine. He had a son, a fine strapping young fellow—but of course your employer would not be a connection of that family, no, no, the idea is ridiculous!"

"'Tain't such a common name," said Aunt Shales, "an' Mr. Gillway's mighty close about hisself and fam'ly. He's a stranger in these parts, too. He got the farm through an advertisement in the West Sussex Gazette just six weeks ago. He's a young man, sir; Christian name, John."

"The name of my friend's boy! And what a strange circumstance—I happen to have a photograph of the lad in my card-case—I was greatly attached to them all, being a widower with no children of my own. Might I ask you, my dear madam, to look at the portrait and tell me if it in any way resembles your employer? A thousand thanks. What a very extraordinary affair."

Aunt Shales carried the portrait to the light of the lamp, adjusted her tortoise-shell spectacles upon her little turned-up nose, and peered carefully at the photograph of a thin young face with a firm, determined mouth, and big prominent chin.

The dark eyes bore a stern expression, strange to encounter in so youthful a face. It was the look of a lad who had discovered from the very outset that life was a hard battle in which he had determined to fight to the last, and to fight crookedly rather than not at all.

"Oh, it's him right enough. Just you squint at it, too, Poll. He looks a sight older now, sir, and more gloomy-like. Not as he seems over cheerful in the picture, do he? An' so he's the son of an old friend of yours, is he, sir? To what part might he belong, if I may make so bold as to ask, sir?"

"He was born in Devonshire," answered the stranger curtly, reading the great curiosity in Aunt Shales' face. He took the photograph from Polly's fingers, and replaced it in his breast pocket. "I will not keep you longer from your tea——"

"Oh, lawks, sir, sure-ly you'll stop an' take a cup, and wait till Mr. John comes home!" cried Aunt Shales. "I'm sure as he'll be glad to see a friend of his father's, unsociable and keep-hisself-to-hisself as he is——"

"I think not," said the stranger after a little hesitation. "Indeed, I almost think that it would be better if you and your friend will have the kindness not to mention my visit to Mr. Gillway," he coughed behind his hand, as he edged his way towards the door, followed by Aunt Shales. "You'll understand," he said very low, "painful family rupture; no desire to awaken old memories. Thank you, my good lady. I hope you will maintain silence——"

"Oh, if you'd rather as I don't say nothin', why of course I shan't," said Aunt Shales with mingled curiosity and disappointment in her round face. "What a nuisance them fam'ly ructions be, to be sure," she added, with a feeling sigh. "Causes a sight of unpleasantness, don't they, sir? Might it have been with Mr. John as you happened to have your little ——"

"Exactly. Thank you very much. I am glad that I came here instead of going to the other farm. I shall not make further inquiries for rooms now. Good-evening to you."

Aunt Shales waited in the open doorway until the stranger's form was lost in the gloom. As she closed the door with a resounding bang, she said to Polly:

"Lawks, Poll, what queer things do happen in this world! An' Mr. Gillway tellin' me as sharp as you please when I asked him the question as he'd no fam'ly! Not as I believed him, as you knows, for many's the time as I've remarked to you that a man don't lock up drawers in his writin' table for nothin'; nor yet turn the key in the locks of them two big boxes as he's got in his room. I've never seen them opened but once since here I've been, and then 'twas only when I happened to go into his room not knowin' as he was there, an' there he was kneelin' before one of 'em, an' he jumped up an' slammed down the lid as if he'd sin sudden death jumpin' out on him, instead of me comin' in at the door as innocent as any lamb unborn! Oh, I've allays said, and shall say to my dying day, as there's something queer about Mr. Gillway. Why, he never gets a letter like other Christian-folk, an' then the way as he looks through and through you, an' shets hisself up, an' stays that quiet as many's the time I've said to myself as I might jest as well have a funeral in the house. As I says, it does you good to open your lips. It's like taking in a bit of nourishin' food, ain't it, Poll? An' as for settin' as mum as that Chiney boy on the mantel-shelf, why I couldn't, not if you was to pay me in golden guineas."

"I can't say as I liked the look of him," observed Polly reflectively and with a nod of her head in the direction of the door. "He moves about too quiet, and he's too soft spoken to please me. I can't abide them buttery-mouthed folk."

"No more can't I, Poll," declared Aunt Shales. "He was quiet, now I comes to think about it. An' he didn't seem as though he wanted to let too much out of the bag, did he? I wonders who he was? Lawks, I might have asked him his name, mightn't I?"

The kitchen door opened with startling abruptness, and a young man strode hurriedly into the room. He turned a dark face lit by flaming, passion-filled eyes towards the door which he had left open. "Will you go?" he shouted, and as Aunt Shales and Polly rose from their seats in alarmed surprise, he stretched out one strong, vigorous arm and wrenched a hunting whip from its nail. "I'm trying to earn an honest living, and by Heaven, no words, no threats, that you can utter shall turn me back from my purpose!"

Striding towards the door he cracked the whip in the air. Aunt Shales heard the sound of hurrying footsteps that died away upon the bricked court-yard which stretched in front of the kitchen.

John Gillway listened for a moment with an ugly look upon his strong, masterful features. Then, slamming the door, he tossed the whip with a loathing gesture upon the floor.

"Bring my tea in the gun-room; there is a fire there, I hope," and, as Aunt Shales nodded, he added in the same curt tone of exasperation, "put a plate of meat on the tray; I shall want nothing more to-night."

Without deigning to notice his housekeeper's visitor, who had dropped a couple of hasty courtesies during his speech to Aunt Shales, he strode from the room.

Polly waited until she felt sure that he was not within hearing. Bending over the table, where Aunt Shales was now arranging a small tray, she whispered:

"Did you ever! Do you think he was talking to that man, Aunt Shales?"

Aunt Shales pursed up her lips and cut with great carefulness a very delicate slice of ham, which she placed between two pieces of well-buttered bread.

"It's best not to think at all, Poll," said she. "As I says, still waters runs deep, an' if you lets nothin' out, why nobody short of an Ananias an' a Sapphiry rolled into one can up an' say as you did. Mark my words, Poll, the least one says is the soonest mended, an', as I've said and shall say times without number, I do like them as can keep a quiet tongue in their heads."

In the little gun-room, John Gillway stood before the almost dead fire, and stared with sombre eyes into the grey and white ashes. The ferocious expression in his dark face was not pleasant to see.

"I might have known that I should be tracked down and unearthed," he muttered between his set teeth. "I've expected it; the marvel is that I have hidden myself from him for so long."

CHAPTER II.

The Loves of Kitty Strange and John Gillway.

Greyhouse Farm stood upon the edge of the broad common. It was an old-fashioned, oddly-built dwelling, very plain and homely, but exceedingly comfortable for those who did not object to low ceilings and narrow, short doorways in their bedrooms. It had a commodious garden, with a broad gravel path flanked upon each side by mahonia bushes, roses and arbutus, and beneath the sitting-room windows there was a pretty lawn dotted with funnily-shaped flower beds. The remainder of the garden was occupied with vegetables and fruit trees, which the broad hedges of mahonia and shrubs did their utmost to screen from visitors' eyes. Upon the left-hand side of the garden was the farmyard, with its long row of pig-styes, its cow-house and stables, and at the back of the house lay a rick-yard where fowls and ducks and geese and wobbling, self-important turkeys lived their short lives.

There were a good many buildings in the rick-yard. It had a boiler-house, where the dead pigs were scalded before passing into the hands of the butcher for cutting up; a long wood-house, where Diana and Kitty Strange had kept their rabbits when they were children; a meal-house, stacked with sacks of oil-cakes and bins of meal; a chaff-house, where the farm lads cut up juicy mangel-wurzel and yellow swedes for the cows; and a big new cart-shed that Farmer Strange had built expressly to accommodate the smart little dog-cart which Mrs. Caffyn, his rich sister-in-law, had given to Kitty upon the girl's last birthday.

Once upon a time, long, long before George Strange was born, a part of this large yard had been an orchard. A few fruit trees still remained, rising here and there between the fat, bloated ricks like grey-headed survivors upon a battle-field. The front of the house was certainly pretty. It had a rose-covered porch, with a quaint little seat upon each side, and the flowers climbed right up to the girls' bedroom window to nod "Good-morning" and "Good-night" to them.

Kitty Strange was very proud of the fact that there were three large sitting-rooms in the old farm house. She called them "dining-room," "drawing-room," and "morning-room," but her father always spoke of them as "parlours," although in the early days of his marriage to his pretty, weak, repining little wife he had tried hard to adopt her style of vocabulary.

Mrs. Strange, as Aunt Shales had stated, came from one of the oldest and proudest families in Sussex. She had fallen in love with handsome, stalwart George Strange in the hunting field, where a man's fine figure and manliness are shown to the best advantage.

George Strange adored Miss Hawthorne for a long while in secret, until one day the girl was thrown in the field and his love betrayed itself in his passionate anxiety for her safety. He knew full well the utter folly of asking haughty old Squire Hawthorne for the hand of his prettiest daughter, and, finding that Dorothy was willing to run away with him, he sold his little estate, eloped with her, and after their marriage brought her to Greyhouse.

Mrs. Strange was of too romantic a temperament to find happiness in the humble position of a not very prosperous farmer's wife. She often cried over the "mistake" that she had made, and poor remorseful George Strange blamed himself even more severely than did his wife for inducing her to consent to an elopement. Her family disowned her.

She wrote many times to her father and mother pleading for forgiveness; it was never granted, and it was not until she was dying that her sister, Mrs. Caffyn, the widow of a wealthy Irish barrister, condescended to visit her. Mrs. Caffyn was shocked to find that Dorothy was dying.

In her remorse she offered eagerly to do all that she could for the two tiny twin girls who were soon to be motherless. Mrs. Strange begged her to adopt them; to take them far away from the farm, and, above all, to prevent their marrying men in their father's position.

Mrs. Caffyn was childless. If she was worldly, she was good-hearted, and she fell impulsively in love with the two pretty children. She never suspected that Farmer Strange would raise any obstacle to her adopting them. But when Dorothy had been lain to her long rest in the elm-shaded churchyard, and the children were still piteously asking: "When will Mummy come back?" Good Mrs. Caffyn found upon making her proposal that the farmer was most unreasonably indignant at the idea of being separated from his little ones. At first he refused to hear more about the matter, and it was not until his sister-in-law had accused him of selfishness, and had pointed out the many advantages that the children would enjoy with her that a compromise was effected.

Farmer Strange suggested that Mrs. Caffyn should take the children to live entirely with her until they were old enough to be sent to school. Their holidays were to be passed at the farm. When their education was completed, they should spend six months of the year with him, and the remaining six with their aunt. At the age of twenty-one, the girls themselves should decide with which relative they preferred to live entirely.

She stood by the kitchen window.

Mrs. Caffyn laughed in her sleeve when she agreed to the proposal. She felt confident that her neices would have no hesitation in casting in their lot with hers. What girls would prefer to live in a lonely farm-house with a middle-aged father, where only one maid was kept, and where there was an absolute lack of society, to being petted and waited upon by a devoted aunt and her servants, and enjoying every luxury that wealth could provide? Of course, the girls would live with her.

Mrs. Caffyn told herself that she really felt quite sorry for their poor stupid father, who actually seemed to think that he stood an even chance with her in winning his daughters' love.

Kitty Strange was thinking of her approaching return to her aunt, as she stood by the kitchen window one afternoon in January, and listlessly watched Diana feed a large group of poultry in the yard. She could not understand how Di could take such interest in those stupid fowls. Kitty disliked fowls—sometimes she declared that she hated everything and everybody at Thorneydene. Old Betty, the middle-aged servant, had addressed her once or twice, but had received no answer.

She made another attempt, pausing in the act of rolling out a "lardy-roll" upon the spotless pastry-board, to ask with plaintive shrillness:

"Is he comin' to tea, or ain't he comin', Miss Kitty? That's all I want to know before puttin' the lardy-rolls into the tins. It ain't worth while to bake extry if there's only ourselves to tea."

Kitty turned, wrinkling her white forehead into a petulant frown.

"What are you talking about, Betty?" she asked crossly.

"I want to know if that Mr. Gillway's comin' to tea or not?" retorted Betty.

Kitty flushed to the roots of her dark curling hair as she answered:

"How should I know?"

"If you don't know, I dunno' who should," said Betty, rolling her pastry with unnecessary vehemence. "I shan't make extry," she added. "So if he do come he can just put up with what's goin'."

Kitty shrugged her shoulders and turned again to the contemplation of Diana and the fowls. She was not very fond of old Betty, who really had a bad temper, poor soul, and who had been at the Grey House ever since the death of Mrs. Strange.

So little did Kitty care for the woman, that she had once entreated her father to send Betty away and to substitute, in her place a young girl who would be willing to wear those pretty white caps, and dainty frilled aprons which Betty had looked upon so scornfully when Kitty had once brought some back with her after a visit to London.

Farmer Strange had resolutely refused to accede to Kitty's request. It was seldom that he denied any whim of Kitty's, but he was firm in his determination that Betty should remain at Grey House as long as she cared to stay.

The kitchen clock struck four. Kitty glanced hesitatingly at its square face, looked again at Diana, who was now talking to a couple of shaggy sheep-dogs, and then went quietly from the kitchen to her bedroom.

"I'd better meet him," she said to herself. "I must get it over somehow or other, and the sooner the better."

It was pretty to watch Kitty as she coquettishly arranged a very becoming hat upon her dark curls. The mirror framed a charming face with eyes so blue and bright that they seemed to reflect a nature of transparent honesty. Kitty was considered a beauty by most of her acquaintances, and no one concurred more fully in that opinion than Kitty herself. She made a careful toilette, buttoning a long pair of new gloves as she descended the stairs, and peeped into the kitchen.

"Tell Diana that I've gone to the post," she said to Betty.

Betty nodded, scanning Kitty with her sharp, almost colourless eyes.

"You've made yourself fine to go to post," she observed.

Kitty shut the door without answering. She had never disliked Betty so much as she did at that moment.

"A hateful, prying old thing!" she muttered angrily, as she passed through the garden and went out upon the common.

The air was chill and raw. A keen wind blew a few dead brown leaves before her as she hurried along, and a great bank of black fringed clouds told that rain was coming.

"I wish," said Kitty, "that I had never seen him. He is so unlike any of the others."

She posted her letter to Mrs. Caffyn and slowly turned her steps in the direction of a little copse where she knew John Gillway was waiting impatiently for her arrival.

Kitty had not mentioned his name to Mrs. Caffyn. Her letter had been filled with joyful ejaculations at the prospect of her speedy release from bondage in the monotonous desert of Thorneydene. Kitty never made many confidences, not even to Diana, who, being of a reserved disposition, was not at all likely to betray them.

She quickened her steps when she approached the wood. It would never do for John to see her lingering. He was already jealous and suspicious, and without cause, she thought resentfully. Kitty felt angry with John. She was vexed because she regarded him as being responsible for the predicament in which she was now placed. But how was John to know the sensations which ruffled her, when she met him with her sweetest smile and even held up her face for a kiss?

"Oh, Kitty," he said, "you have been a long while! I began to think that you were never coming!"

"I ought not to have come," she said. "I am behaving very wickedly—I don't know what ever Di or dad would say if they knew."

She raised her blue eyes with the saddest most self-reproachful look in the world to the man's dark face, and he flushed with eager hope as he cried:

"Why shouldn't they know? Why won't you let me tell them?"

"Because I daren't. In the first place, dad has made up his mind that neither Di nor I are to marry—or to be engaged even—before we are twenty-one. Oh, I could never let you speak to dad, John; you don't know what a bad opinion he would have of me when he found out that I had been meeting you secretly for the past six weeks. I—I—should die of shame."

"But I saw you first of all in your father's house. And it is all my fault! You would not have met me like this if I had not begged you," said Gillway. "I think that you exaggerate the difficulties of our position, Kitty. Even if your father refused to consent to our engagement at this present moment, he would know that we loved each other, and that would do away with all this bothering concealment that worries you so, my poor, sensitive little darling."

He bent to kiss her again. Kitty drew back and resolutely removed the arm which he had placed round her waist.

"Don't," she said. "I hate being—being courted like—like—a milk-maid!"

"Is this how milk-maids are courted?"

Kitty grew pale beneath his kisses. She jerked her head from side to side to avoid the touch of his lips.

"You are very cruel," she cried with a sob. "You know that I don't like it, and you only do it to show how masterful and horrid you can be."

Gillway released her immediately. His face clouded as he looked at her.

"You did not call me masterful and horrid a week or so ago, Kitty. Have you changed in your feeling towards me? Or"—he bent forward and took her hand—"have you heard anything about me?"

"As if I could hear anything about you when nobody knows who you are or where you came from," said Kitty pettishly.

"Then what has changed you?" he demanded with such fierce suspicion in his hard voice that she shrank and trembled before him.

"I have not changed, you silly John. I am only very miserable. Di and I have to go to London to-morrow!"

Gillway set his lips together. His sombre expression deepened, and a mistrustful look came into his eyes. They seemed to narrow.

"You must have known this yesterday, Kitty. Why didn't you tell me then?"

"Aunt's letter only came last night," she faltered. "Oh, John, don't look at me like that. You frighten me."

With a tender gesture, Gillway drew her hand through his arm. The hard suspicion died from his face at the distress in Kitty's voice.

"My darling!" he said in self-remorse, "forgive me. Be gentle with me, Kitty. I have found so much knavery and deception in the world, that—Heaven pardon me—I have grown to doubt even you! Don't tremble, dear. I'm a brute and a cad to behave like this toward you. As if you would break faith with me. Tell me again, Kitty, that you love me."

"I love you," she whispered, clinging to him not in affection, but in abject terror.

"You won't break your promise to me, Kitty? You will wait for me—and later on you will be my wife?"

"Yes, yes," murmured Kitty, hiding her pale face upon his shoulder.

"Thank God for the assurance of your love. It ought to drive the demons from my heart," said Gillway. "My little Kitty!"

"If—if—I were to break my word," she asked without raising her face, "what should you do, John?"

"Kill you, I think."

She shivered and clung yet closer to him.

"Not really? You couldn't be so wicked, John, though you do look so black and ugly and stern. And if I—married?"

"If you married me, it would be all right. I'd move Heaven and earth to gratify every caprice and to please you. But if you married another man——" he hesitated and smoothed her hair with loving, gentle fingers. "What a mad suggestion," he added. "The idea of your ever belonging to anyone but me!"

"It does seem absurd, doesn't it, John? Still, supposing that I—I—did marry some other man—would you forgive us?"

"No, by Heaven, no!"

"You wouldn't do us any harm, you revengeful thing!"

"There would be no harm too deadly that I would not do to the man. You don't understand, Kitty. I have never loved any other woman but you—except my mother."

Kitty raised her head, withdrawing herself softly from his arm.

"Is she living, your mother?"

"No. Why have you asked me all these questions Kitty? There is no one waiting in London for you?"

The cloudy suspicion was returning once more to his face. Kitty laughed as she shook her head.

"On my honour, no—at least, not to my knowledge. Of course, there may be a dozen or so of inconsolables anxiously looking out for my advent. You are frowning again, sir. I never knew anyone so unreasonable and jealous as you are in all my life. I wish you would look in the glass every time that you feel disagreeble."

"Why?"

"Because the sight of your ugliness would show you how terrifying you are in that condition. I could imagine you capable of murder when you look at me with such a ferocious expression."

Gillway passed his hand over his face and rubbed it as though to brush away the expression to which Kitty objected.

"I'll be good now," he said. "It's too bad of me to spoil our last few minutes together by giving way to my jealous feelings. Are you really going to-morrow? Can't you stay longer?"

"Oh, no," she answered with a sigh. "Di won't hear of it. She is determined to start to-morrow," and to herself she added, "and so am I."

"You would stay if your sister would?"

"Of course—only," she added uneasily, "it is not in her power to alter the plans that dad and Aunt Lulu made between them. Poor Di can't do anything except submit. And I must do the same, too."

"I shall come up and see you. In what part of London does your aunt live?"

Kitty hesitated. Her heart was beating rapidly with nervousness. It would not do to tell John Gillway a direct lie. She stifled the involuntary temptation.

"At Prince's Gate. But we shan't be there long. Aunt has a lot of invitations to country seats. We are only going to stay in town while we are buying new clothes, you know, and very likely we shall go to Italy after Christmas. But,

"Di will be so cross with me if I bring you back."

of course, I shall write to you," she added quickly. "And if there is a chance of our meeting anywhere, I'll let you know. It would be such an awful disappointment if you came to London and didn't see me."

She drew out a dainty little gold watch.

"I must go home, John. It is past their hour for tea."

"I am coming back with you," said Gillway.

"I don't think you had better. Dad won't like it. He likes to be alone with us upon our last night with him."

"Poor old chap!" exclaimed Gillway with compassion. "How he must miss you! Oh, he couldn't mind my having tea with you, Kitty. It isn't as if I proposed staying all the evening. Besides, he asked me to drop in whenever I liked."

"Di will be so cross with me if I bring you back," objected Kitty, rubbing her soft cheek with a caressing movement against his hand. "What nice white hands you have for a farmer, John. I think it was your being so utterly different to all the men of dad's acquaintance about here, that made me like you. And then you know such a lot about music, and books and theatres and foreign countries, too! Do you know that you have never told me one little, teeny, weeny word about your past, sir? And I am dying with curiosity to know all about it, and what induced such a fine gentleman to buy a pokey little farm, and hide himself——"

"Hide!" interrupted Gillway harshly. "What do you mean, Kitty? I am not hiding!"

"Now, don't get cross again," she said smilingly. "You are full of thorns, John. Say good-bye to me like a good boy, and perhaps, only perhaps, mind, I'll send you a letter somewhere before Christmas comes."

"You had better. If you don't, I shall come after you. I shall expect a letter—let me see, you go away to-morrow, Tuesday—very well, on Thursday I must have a letter, Kitty. If not——"

"Don't frown again! I never saw anyone like you. If I don't write, John?"

"I shall come up and discover the reason of your silence."

Kitty looked at the strong, masterful face with half-admiring, half-shrinking eyes. She laughed, and the laugh hid her fear.

"I had better not write in that case," said she, "for I shall want to see you dreadfully."

"Oh, Kitty!" the man cried brokenly. "How can I let you go! If you only knew how far you have crept into my heart!"

"And you into mine, dear John."

"Let me come home with you? Every moment is precious to me now——"

"No," she answered with a pretty movement of sorrowful decision. "I mustn't make Diana angry. We must be very careful not to let her suspect our secret. Do you ever think what a horrid life Aunt Lulu and Di would lead me between them in London if they only suspected that—I loved you, John? You must be reasonable and wait until I am my own mistress."

"And then?" he asked, drawing her again to him and kissing her. "We will never be separated, please Heaven!"

Kitty went home through the fields, burning with shame at her weakness. She had intended to break with John Gillway, and she had been led by fear to make him solemn promises of fidelity.

"Oh, I do wish I had never met him!" she said to herself, clenching her little hands. "I am afraid of him!"

And Gillway as he retraced his steps to the lonely farm house, where Aunt Shales was waiting tea for him, looked up at the darkening skies with reverential and grateful eyes.

"Thank God for the love of a good woman," he murmured. "Heaven alone knows what would have become of me had I not met with my little Kitty. I must have gone to the bad! I know that I shall go wrong if I lose her."

People often ask me why I gave up a promising business career and devoted myself to travelling, in which I find no pleasure; exploring, for which I have no taste; and archæology, which is to me the most tiring of pursuits. The question has never been answered, save by the statement that there is no reason to give, which involves the telling of an incredible story.

There are two or three to whom I would like to tell it. If they survive me they shall know—to that end these pages.

It is my conviction that whatever intelligent man has known he has tried to record in some way—that living truths, new to us, may be gleaned from the stone tablets of races extinct for ages. For such a truth I am searching. One man found it, but he is dead. His spirit I have called up, as the woman at Endor called up Samuel, and questioned it. He told me that the knowledge had sent it to the world of shades before its time, and had put power into the hands of an evil one, who had bidden it never in any place to reveal to any mortal what it knew.

"Even yet I must obey her," said the spirit of Paul Glen; "but what you seek is written."

As yet I have not read. Many strange things have I unearthed, but never this that I seek.

Now, I will write my story. You who read it may believe it or not, as you see fit. I know that it is true.

Floated to the middle of the pathway.

It is many years now since I went to South America to visit my sister Helen. I had not seen her since the day of her marriage, three years before, till she met me at the door of her own home and welcomed me in her old sweet and quiet manner. It seemed to me, at the first glance, that her face had aged too much, and that a certain fine expression—a suggestion of latent determination—had over-developed and marked her with stern lines. From the first moment, too, I feared the existence of a trouble in her life, of which her letters gave no hint.

She seemed, though, cheerful enough. She led the way into a great room that was shaded and cool, and full of the scent of lilacs. With a motion of her hand, she dismissed three or four black maids, whom she had been assisting or instructing at some sewing work, and they went out, courtesying and showing their white and even teeth at the door.

A fourth did not leave, but retired to a far end of the room, and went on with the sewing. I noticed what a tiny garment she was making, and what a sharply cut silhouette her face made against the white curtain by which she sat.

Helen chatted away, apologising for her husband's absence, asking a host of questions, and planning some pleasures for every one of the days of my stay with her. I lay back in my chair, with a feeling of languid content, and listened. When Helen suggested sleep and refreshment, I declined both, feeling no need for anything but her presence and that delicious room, the atmosphere of which was laden with rest as with the scent of the lilacs.

The black woman sat directly in the line of my vision, and I remember now that my gaze never strayed from her. I noticed, idly at first, then with interest, the regularity of her features, and the grand proportion of her head and bust. Her hair, brownish in colour, with dull copper tints, was as straight as my own, and she had hand and arm so perfectly moulded that, except for their black skin, they might have been those of a lady of high degree. But it was the pride, speaking from every line of that dark face, that most attracted my notice. There was in it, too, an exultant sense of power, and it was the most resolute face, black or white, that I ever saw.

Presently I began to feel that it required an effort to keep the thread of what Helen was saying, and to reply. Her voice seemed to get faint, then to come in snatches with an indistinct murmur between them, at last not at all, though I knew she was still speaking.

I was not unconscious, but perception was contracted and concentrated upon one abnormal effort. From me a narrow path of light stretched down the room to the black woman. She seemed to expand and to grow luminous; a vapour exhaled from her, floated to the middle of the pathway, and there assumed her own form almost nude, perfect like her face in its every line, motionless as if carved from ebony, but with fierce, impure eyes that looked straight into mine, and from which there seemed to be no escape.

Their gaze begot an overwhelming sense of disgust. My soul shuddered, but my body could not move. The evil face smiled. A cloud floated over the form of ebony, slowly passed away, revealing one like polished ivory, but the eyes changed not.

How long their gaze held me motionless and helpless I do not know. Suddenly, something white shut out the vision, and my sister's voice, now harsh and loud, struck upon my hearing like a lash. Instantly the room assumed its ordinary appearance, the scent of the lilacs greeted me as if I had newly come into the atmosphere, and Helen, in her white dress, stood before me trembling.

The negress at the window looked at us both with insolent amusement. It was to her that Helen spoke.

"How dared you!" she exclaimed; "oh, that I could punish you as you deserve."

The girl smiled and slowly drew her needle through the cloth in her lap.

"Go out to Lucas," commanded Helen. "Go."

The girl drew herself up, and her face took on an expression of sullen defiance. It seemed for an instant that she would not obey. She clenched her hands, and I heard her teeth grate together. But she hesitated only a moment, then went slowly out of the room. Presently she passed by the window, pushing a heavy barrow full of earth. Lucas, the gardener, followed, carrying a large gad. In a minute or two they passed again, going in the same direction, and afterwards again and again. The girl was pushing the barrow round and round the house.

"That is the heaviest and most menial employment I can devise for her," said Helen; "I wish there were something worse. She grows more impudent every day, but this is the first time she has dared to exert her snaky power upon a white person in my presence. How did you feel while you were under that spell?"

"Now, Helen, for Heaven's sake don't imagine——"

"I imagine nothing," she interrupted, in a low voice. "I know that girl. She can do strange things. If ever human creature was possessed of a devil, she is."

"Why, Helen!"

She went on, without heeding my astonishment: "Every negro on the plantation, except Lucas, is mortally afraid of her. My birds cower in a corner of their cage if she approaches them, the gentlest horse we have will rear and kick at sight of her, and if she goes into the poultry-yard the hens cover up their chicks as if night had come. She has affected others as she did you. She has done worse. When I first came here, she was given to me for a maid; but, not liking her, I took, instead, a little mulatto girl, who was bright and smart then, but who is now idiotic through fear of Asenath."

I did not think it best to dispute with Helen, knowing her well enough to be sure that any argument I could adduce against her belief she had already weighed and found wanting. She was not a superstitious woman, nor a hasty one, but one whose very mistakes deserved respect, since she always took that course of action which she believed to be wisest and best, even if it were to her own disadvantage. I simply asked:

"Why do you not get rid of her?"

"I have tried, but something frustrates every effort

Lucas, the gardener, followed.

of that kind. Robert objects to sale—it is unusual on the plantation. We once offered her her freedom if she would go away; but she only looked as if she scorned the freedom we could give, and laughed in a way that chilled my blood."

"She seems very insolent."

"Insolent—that is a weak word! I sometimes think she is birth-marked with impudence as she is with straight hair."

"That hair, then, is a birth-mark? I thought it must be a wig."

"She was born with it and with an insane craving to be white. When a child, she used to scream and shriek over her blackness for hours at a time. Mother Glen whipped that out of her."

"It is a pity she did not whip out some of her other peculiarities."

"Mother Glen was much to blame for some of them. You knew Paul Glen, and what a strange, silent being he was—always absorbed in some mysterious pursuits, roving from one lost region to another, coming home now and then for a day and leaving, as if for a short time, to be heard of again after months of inquiry in Hyderabad, or Jerusalem, or the heart of Guinea. Well, after he came home the last time he made Asenath the subject of numerous psychological experiments. He could mesmerise anyone—what other gifts he had was not known; but he called mesmerism child's play.

"Mother Glen did not object to his making this use of the girl, because she did not wish to cross Paul and have him go away again. It is my belief that Asenath discovered, through some of his experiments, the existence of an occult power in herself. Before long she had Paul completely under her control. I had not yet come here, but Mother Glen told me about it, and that any effort to break the spell made Paul completely furious. He taught her to read, and to sing, and obeyed her in everything—think of it. After a while he fell ill, but it was thought not dangerously. Asenath nursed him, and he would not eat or drink unless she bade him."

"That, though, may have been a mere whim, such as the sick often take."

She shook her head. "You have not heard all. Two of the servants—Mammy Clara and Belinda—declare that they overheard Asenath forbid Paul ever to touch food again, and tell him that she would pretend to bid him eat, but he must not do so. And it is certainly true that he at last refused all sustenance and died of starvation."

"What a horrible idea!"

"Shortly before Paul was stricken down," Helen proceeded, "he disposed of all his property—it was in securities of various kinds—and we have never been able to find out what he did with the money he received. Thousands and thousands of pounds took wing somehow. It was never brought here, so she could not have stolen it actually, but I am as sure that Asenath knows where that money is as I am that I live."

"Now Helen, be sensible, do."

"Mother Glen was a sensible woman, and she believed as I do. She said the girl was uncanny. Moreover she declared to me that Asenath had set out to conquer her as she did Paul, and that it was only by constant resistance that she prevented her from gaining her object. There was a psychic contest between them. Mother Glen's brain was in a condition of seige for months. It could not stand the strain. She was seized with paralysis and died. I blame Asenath for her death."

We followed again.

I did not say much in reply. My odd experience of a few minutes before puzzled me. Helen's account of the girl threw a weird light upon what I felt bound, as a reasonable man, to consider merely curious phenomena, subjective in character and due to some unexplained physical cause. I determined to say a few decided words to Robert Glen about the culpability of allowing his delicate wife to contend with such an annoyance, as Asenath, if not a sorceress, certainly was a fractious and troublesome servant.

"It is strange that Robert does not remove her," said I.

Helen's face flushed and was drawn by a momentary spasm. She looked at me in troubled silence as if she could not decide to say what she wished to tell me.

"I am afraid about Robert," she said at length, almost in a whisper; "there is something in that girl's demeanour to him that it sickens me to think of—and which I dare not try to explain, even to myself. It seems impossible that she can dare to think that he——" She went on hurriedly after a pause: "You see, he believes in no psychic powers and is not on his guard. He calls her unearthly pranks mere mischief that a few years' discipline will take out of her. Robert intends her to marry Lucas."

She spoke the last sentence quite loudly, and, as the girl and her driver were passing by the window, they overheard Lucas, a squat, stolid-looking mulatto, with a face like that of a satiated animal, chuckle and poke at Asenath with the gad.

The girl stopped. She threw down her burden, flung back her head, and turned upon Helen a wild and vicious stare. Her face, streaming with perspiration, was full of threat. She gasped for breath from emotion or the heaviness of her toil. She raised one hand, wiped her brow with its open palm, and flung the drops of sweat in a shower at Helen.

"May every drop burn you!" she said, between her laboured breaths.

Helen looked at her with quiet scorn. "Go on, Lucas," she said calmly.

Asenath shook herself like a chained animal. She ground her teeth and turned upon Lucas in fury, as if she would rend him. He did not quail, but raised his gad threateningly and pointed to the barrow-handles, and, after a momentary struggle with herself, the girl took them up and went on, panting under her toil.

"She shall continue that until she drops," said my sister.

"But, Helen, that surely is cruel."

"Not more so than drawing the fangs of a snake. I have discovered that she is physically powerless when physically exhausted. All the negroes on the place know this and are rejoicing now—they all feel more secure for knowing that she has been disciplined."

While she was speaking, I saw Robert Glen coming along the walk to the house. Helen saw him, too. Leaning out of the window, she called to Lucas and bade him take his charge "to the old barn." He hurriedly departed, driving the girl—who now seemed doubly unwilling to drag her load—literally like an ox, and very unsparing of the gad.

Robert greeted me cordially; but it was evident to me that there was a cloud between his wife and him. His ruddy face assumed a stern expression when he looked at her, and his voice had a hard tone when he addressed her. Her manner to him had an appealing, almost fawning, air, which it distressed me to see.

It was some days before I found a chance to speak to Robert on the subject of the girl, I had better have held my tongue, for he was nettled in an instant, shrugged his shoulders, and curled his lip.

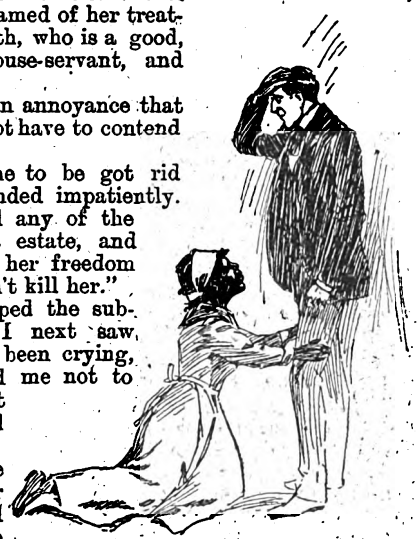
"You English people know nothing whatever about the management of slaves. Helen leads that girl the life of a toad under a harrow, because the other darkies say she 'hoodoos' them, and because my mother had some irrational ideas about demoniacal possession. I declare to you, Tom, that if I did not know Helen's delicate condition and nervousness were much to blame, I should be ashamed of her treatment of Asenath, who is a good, well-trained house-servant, and valuable."

"But she is an annoyance that Helen should not have to contend with now."

"How is she to be got rid of?" he demanded impatiently. "We never sell any of the people on this estate, and she won't take her freedom as a gift. I can't kill her."

Then I dropped the subject. When I next saw Helen, she had been crying, and she begged me not to speak to Robert about the girl again.



"Oh, Massa Tom, she am witched."

I saw no more of Asenath for some time, and learnt that she had been put steadily to work at the loom the day following my arrival.

One morning news came that the loom-house had been entered in the night, all the yarn carried off, the woven cloth cut to pieces, and the loom and wheels so shattered that new ones would be necessary. Even the walls of the building were half destroyed.

"This is some of Asenath's work," said Helen.

Robert, who had been annoyed by the news, now seemed additionally so.

"Pshaw, Helen!" he said sharply; "it would take the strength of several men to do some of this mischief."

"She has it at command. Lucas shall take her in hand again."

"No, we will have no more of that," Robert said sternly. "Now, hear me, Helen, I have told Lucas that if he obeys you in that respect again he shall be flogged within an inch of his life, and I mean it."

Helen's face turned very white, her hands fell into her lap, and she sat as if stricken helpless and hopeless. I hastened away to avoid hearing more, comprehending now what the trouble in my sister's life was, and with a presentiment of coming evil that it would be greater.

It was that very night, that, having strolled into the shrubbery to smoke my cigar, I fell asleep upon a rustic bench there and awoke to find it was late at night with the wind moaning as if a storm were brewing in the cloudy heavens.

As I arose to go to the house, something—that was not visible—seemed to come from every quarter at once and smite me. I felt a sharp, electric thrill followed by a sensation as if I had been flung from a height and raised up again, with some of my faculties benumbed by the fall. My hair stood up, but I felt no fear, only a passive wonder, mixed with expectation. Turning, I saw, by a transient gleam of moonlight, the girl Asenath, standing in the path near by, pointing at me with a long slender rod. The ray passed and left a black shadow there, which moved slowly away, beckoning to me. I followed.

The shadow led me out of the shrubbery and along the wide avenue between the two rows of huts occupied by the negroes, and ended at the big house. I had no will or thought but to follow it exactly. It stopped before one of the huts, and bent itself nearly double. I, too, bent over involuntarily, and every muscle of my body seemed to become strung. The perspiration started out of me, and my will was like a bar of steel ending in great fingers, which grasped something and pulled upon it with such force that my inner self was a-tremble with weakness when the tension relaxed, which it did at the opening of the cottage door and the coming out of a little lad—a mere child—who looked ghastly as one of the dead walking. He placed himself beside me, and together we followed the shadowy woman to another house, dragged at the invisible cords of another human soul, and brought it out into the night. It was a woman, this time in the scantiest of night-robes.

And so we went on, stopping at every door, and from every door someone came forth, except from that of Lucas. There, grasp as it would, the steel fingers clutched nothing and the door remained shut.

The woman Asenath muttered to herself, and all the crowd of followers muttered, too. With them, my own lips formed words, of which I did not then comprehend the meaning: "Soulless beast!" We went on beyond the quarters, stopped at the big house, and dragged at something that resisted with all its strength, which was weaker than ours, for it yielded at last, and came slowly, slowly down the steps and stood among us. It was my sister Helen.

Asenath laughed, and ghastly laughter broke from all, even from Helen herself.

I had no feeling of compassion for her, nor of fear for her or myself, but was simply a force which another exerted. The wills of those who followed Asenath were but strands in the cable of her power, and their strength was in her hands for good or ill.

We followed again—out of the plantation, through a forest of pines, over a bridge that spanned slow-crawling black water, past a fallen church surrounded by forgotten graves, to the top of a hill where there were stones laid in the form of a serpent—a great stone, like open jaws, forming the head. There Asenath paused and cast down her rod. She stretched out her hands, and in a moment we were formed into a circle about the rod.

And then once again those fingers of steel grasped something—something that all their strength seemed unable to move. Our breath came in gasps, our forms shook like the leaves of the aspen-tree, and in the heart was a fear, too great to be measured, of failure. Long, long the effort lasted—lasted until the will seemed to discard its own puerile strength and to fling itself upon the bosom of impersonal force, seize the reservoir of the universal will, and turn its power in a mighty stream upon the burden of one desire—one unyielding demand that the door be opened. And with that borrowed force came the sense of unlimited strength. Faith was born.

We stretched out our arms in gestures of which I can only remember that they were first those of invitation, then of welcome. Nature began to pulsate. There was a sound like the slow, regular beating of a heart, in the chambers of which we were inclosed. The inner life throbbed with it so fiercely that the blood seemed almost to leap from my body. All about us were the movements of awakening birds and insects; from afar came the lowing of kine, the crowing of cocks, and the crying of children, as if they were suddenly startled into fear.

In the centre of the circle appeared a square of strange light.

We looked upon it, and beheld a place of which the darkness and the light of this world are but the envelopes. We saw there, afar off, a vast crystalline globe, from which extended, in all directions, millions of filaments of clear light. The globe scintillated as a diamond does, and its sparks floated away upon the endless filaments of light. Nearer to us, moving about, were beings not human, and not resembling each other further than that they were all gigantic and all possessed of some human attributes. Some were beautiful, some hideous.

Upon some the writing was fantastic, as if put on in mockery. Upon others it shone with a clear and cruel radiance that pained the sight. Some bore it faded and dim, as if the pretension it set up had fallen like a leaf into the stream of the ages and been almost forgotten.

A great fear fell upon us all, so great that all, except the woman Asenath and myself, fell down and seemed as if dead. The woman trembled and murmured to herself, and again my lips formed her words.

"Is it worth while, when human desires are so poor, human life so short?"

Through that door there floated not a voice, for the silence was only broken by a faint, soft hum, like very distant music, but an unspoken command that impressed itself upon the spirit.

"Speak!"

Still the woman hesitated. Suddenly her lips moved again, mine following them:

"But only through this can he be won."

"I would have the desire of my heart," she said aloud.

"It is thine," was the silent answer; "to him who knocks at this door shall it be opened, and what he asks for there shall he receive, whether for good or ill. It is the law."

"I would be fair, like those who enslave me. All that she has"—she pointed to my sister—"I would take from her and have for my own."

"The power to obtain thy will is thine, whether thou be of the just or of the unjust. The spirit which commands shall be obeyed. It is the law."

"And is there a penalty to be paid?"

"Thy act is the seed from which its penalty shall grow."

The woman sighed.

"What penalty?"

"Thou knowest the law."

Sighing again bitterly, Asenath stretched out her hand. The square of light went out. Across the spot where it had been drifted an indistinct form which passed into invisibility on either side. Under their feet ran a serpent of fire, which leapt at the woman. She grasped it, and it seemed to become the rod she had cast down.

I remembered nothing more until I came slowly to myself, stretched upon the bench in the shrubbery, with the morning sun shining into my face. My limbs were stiff, my head ached, and my heart was heavy with a foreboding of evil. It was impossible for me to decide whether the experience of the night was a dream or a reality, but I was sorely troubled; I could not think of Asenath without a creeping of the flesh.

On approaching the house, I saw Robert standing in the doorway. My first glimpse of him set me to trembling with fear of evil tidings, he looked so agitated and distressed. When he perceived me, he wrung his hands and burst into tears.

"Oh, Tom!" he cried, "Helen is dying. She was taken with convulsions early this morning. She does not know me. The baby was born dead, and Helen cannot live. I must lose her! Oh, God, I must lose her!"

He ran through the hall and up the stairs like a wild man. I followed, but the heaviness of the shock was so great that it was but slowly and with a feeling as if the floor were rising up to my face. Asenath was moving stealthily about the hall. I bade her begone. She looked at me like a startled cat, but did not go. A black girl, coming down the stairs, passed me, and I recognised her as the first of the women who had joined our ghastly crowd the night before. She gazed straight before her, with wide-open, horrified eyes, and her face had the same pinched look the hall mirror had shown upon my own as I glanced into it involuntarily when passing it. At the top of the stairs, Belinda, Helen's poor little maid, flung herself at my feet and clasped my knees.

"Oh, Massa Tom," she cried, "she am witched. Go an' git d'witch t'—tak'—de spell off'n her. Nuffin'll save her ef yo' don't do dat."

As I stopped to put the poor creature aside, old Mammy Clara, her face streaming with tears, came up to me.

"Massa Tom," she said solemnly, "de good God hab tooken Miss Helen. She's in Heben wid her li'l baby."

The blow overcame me. It will be best to pass over that time. I shut myself into my room and bore my agony alone, I went once more into the room where Helen lay, and looked at her face. It was the face of one in peaceful rest, but it had aged twenty years in twelve hours. Her maids, directed by Mrs. Grayson, an old friend of the family, were ready to prepare her for the grave.

He threw himself at her feet.

"They think," whispered Mrs. Grayson, "that she had walked in her sleep. Her feet are scratched and torn, as if she had been among briars barefooted, and the doctors say that her convulsions probably came on from the shock of awakening. She was found at daybreak, unconscious, in the hall, and the outer door was wide open."

I left the plantation a few days after the funeral, and for years neither saw nor heard directly from Robert Glen. I never could forgive his indifference to Helen's peace of mind while she lived, nor get over a certain disgust with which his lack of self-control at the time of her death inspired me. I never liked him, and, after that sad time, I had less regard for him than ever. I never told him the story I have written. He would only have pronounced me mad, and I did not wish to obtain that reputation for the mere sake of warning him.

Besides, I tried to believe the experience of that night a dream, but I found that impossible, and was always looking for a sequel to it. The sequel came in its appointed time.

Years passed away. At the outbreak of the Civil War, the Graysons came to England. From them I learnt that Asenath had disappeared from the plantation long before, and was supposed to have drowned herself in the black creek and to haunt the plantation in the form of a black-and-white snake. Dr. Grayson blamed himself for her death.

"Some of the Glen negroes," he said; "told some of mine that the girl was turning white, and that, with the exception of her face and hands, her whole body had changed its colour. Now I had heard of such cases, but never had seen one, and, in spite of what Buffon and other naturalists say on the subject, felt doubtful of the possibility of such a thing taking place. I rode over to Glen's one day to investigate the matter. Glen was not at home; but, presuming upon old friendship with him, I saw the girl and told her the object of my call.

"I wish you had seen her; she flew into an outrageous passion, calling me vile names; said there was not a white spot on her person, and that if I touched her it should cost me dear. Of course I paid no attention to her threats, and called that Lucas of Glen's to help me turn up her sleeves. Her arms really were white, but before I could half examine them, she broke away from us and tore out of the house.

"We followed, but lost sight of her in the shrubbery, and to this day she has never been seen again. The negroes say she drowned herself. Glen, when he returned, seemed to believe so. He took me to task in a most ungentlemanly manner for what had happened, and we have not been on speaking terms since. He has now gone abroad until this little squall blows over, I hear."

"I trust that he may—and longer," I said. The doctor chuckled a little and changed the subject. In secret, I said to myself:

"I don't believe the girl is dead, and I do believe that Robert Glen knows where she is. The sequel will come."

A year later, Robert returned home, bringing a wife with him. He wrote me a formal announcement of his marriage, to which I replied with equal formality.

It was rumoured that the new wife was rich in her own right; that she was of English parentage, but born and reared in Calcutta. Later, I heard that Robert's old neighbours had not taken to her at all, and that she had an ungovernable temper, being unable to keep any servant, except a couple of East Indian women, whom she berated continually in their own tongue, but who could not speak English enough to impart any information about their mistress to her neighbours.

The year after Robert's marriage, while in America, I accepted an invitation to spend a few days with the Graysons. Feeling that I owed Robert the courtesy of a call, I rode over to the plantation, not so much to discharge a social duty as to see the new Mrs. Glen, about whom I noticed, on the part of the Graysons, a marked reluctance to speak.

They edged away from the subject, when I brought it up, with nervous looks at each other.

Leaving my horse at the outer gate, I walked along the wide avenue nearly to the house. There was a spectral stillness upon the place. Sadness exhaled from everything, to be drawn in with every breath. The old servants were all gone. I had met the once sleek and stolid Lucas, now rheumatic and ragged, begging in the village.

Belinda was in the county asylum, and the others were scattered or dead. The scent of the lilac was gone from the air—the very bushes were rooted up, and lay, sere and dead, by little heaps of earth. A triangular cloud in the sky cast upon the earth a triangle of shadow, in the midst of which Robert Glen's home lay as if it were entranced. No sign of happy life met me; but as I turned aside to look at a certain bench in the shrubbery, a black-and-white snake ran over my foot.

I went no further. A woman was seated upon the bench—a fair woman, with hair like dull copper reflecting sullen fire, with a face and form perfect as those of the goddesses of old, a face which betokened an indomitable soul, which knew the secret of the power wielded by the gods. She was bending over her clasped hands, her face was turned aside in an attitude of eager waiting and wore a smile that transfigured it. Slowly approaching her, walking as a man walks in his sleep, came Robert Glen. He threw himself at her feet and laid his head upon her knee. She bent to him with a little rapturous caress, and both faces were as happy as those of the people in Paradise.

I turned and went away from the place, and entered its precincts no more. From that hour I was self-devoted to one purpose—to seek the knowledge that should open the door to her degradation and destruction. In the midst of her success, and in the height of her pride, she should turn black as she was in the day when Lucas drove her. I swore it. So should my friends and my sister, whom she robbed and slew, be avenged.

COUSIN GIDEON.

No, I'm not a spiritualist; I never was educated well enough to study the occult sciences, as you call them. But I had an experience some years ago which, perhaps, you can explain, as you believe in such things. I have only told it to a few friends, and they looked as if they thought I was telling lies. But I'm a truthful man, and never told a lie in my life except once, and that was when I told my wife that she was the only woman who had ever attracted me. I owned up to that lie during the honeymoon. A friend of mine met us, and not knowing I was married, he clapped me on the shoulder and cried:

"You know how to find the pretty ones, my boy. Ha, ha! That's all right!"

But it wasn't all right. However, that was soon settled.

Well, I was going to tell you about Cousin Gideon; and I may say here that I can bring witnesses to prove that it's true. He wasn't my cousin; that was the name he went by in our neighbourhood. There were two cousins, Gideon and Simeon, both old men. Their mothers were Jewesses, I believe, but their fathers were not, and the cousins were nothing in particular that I know of.

They were in very different circumstances. Simeon was always well dressed; his clothes were of good material, and fitted well. Gideon was poor; he wore a greasy frock-coat, threadbare, torn, and much too long for him. It was given to him by some kind neighbour. The heels of his boots were worn so much on one side that I used to wonder sometimes how he managed to walk in them.

He had a room in the cottage of a man I knew a mason. It was sheer benevolence on the part of this man, for I don't suppose Cousin Gideon paid any rent. He earnt a little somehow, but hardly enough to keep body and soul together. Simeon occupied a house in a good street, and had a lot of fine people come to him. That was to borrow money, not for his society. He was an ugly little man, with ears like a bat, a yellow skin full of wrinkles and blotches, dirty grey hair, and swollen, cracked lips. Only twice did Simeon call on his Cousin Gideon while alive, and I am going to tell you about those visits. If they happened to meet in the street, Simeon passed his poor relation without making a sign.

Cousin Gideon had two or three pieces of furniture which he had inherited from his mother. One of these was a chest which must have been centuries old; it was a massive thing, beautifully carved, with a big, strong lock and a heavy key. The lock and key were very ornamental, and the whole thing was what you might see in an exhibition of antique furniture. This chest was worth a fair amount of money; Gideon knew that, but he had never attempted to part with it.

Simeon knew the value of the chest, and that was the object of his visit. He wanted to purchase it, not to assist his relative in any way, but because he thought he could do a good stroke of business. He knew people who would give a lot of money for it, and as Gideon was certain to be in great straits in the winter time, he believed the poor man would jump at the offer of a few pounds. So he climbed up the narrow staircase into the back room—a miserable place with sloping roof, broken walls, and a window that would not shut properly—and he stood before Cousin Gideon and offered him five pounds. But the owner wouldn't hear of it.

Simeon offered five shillings more, and ten shillings more, and kept raising the price; but the more he offered the more determined Gideon seemed that he would not sell. At last he told Simeon flatly that he would sooner starve and freeze than let him have it; and the money-lender went away reviling and swearing, while Cousin Gideon, usually such an inoffensive old man, danced and laughed with unaccountable energy.

Only a few days afterwards the old man fell ill. He became delirious, saw his own shadow on the wall, and talked all sorts of stuff about the old chest and Cousin Simeon and what not.

I went to see him, and sat up with him an hour or two just to give my friend a rest. The mason was a widower, and Gideon wanted attention in the daytime, to say nothing of better food, so I advised my friend to call on Simeon and tell him. And Simeon made his second call.

I was there when he came. He made his way to the bed, sat down on the edge, and looked at the sick man, who was half conscious, half delirious.

"Well, Cousin Gideon," he said.

The sound of his voice seemed to bring Gideon to himself with a start.

"What do you want?" he asked.

"He, he! What do I want?" sniggered the money-lender. "I've come to see how you are, dear Cousin Gideon. He, he! You'll sell me the chest now, won't you? You have no use for it. The money will buy you medicine and food and get you a fire." He got off the bed and went to the chest. "The money will make you quite well again. If you don't sell the chest, you'll die of cold and hunger and—— Yes, you will!"

Digitized by Google

Gideon raised himself slowly in the bed. His breath came with difficulty, his eyes glowed like red-hot coals.

"You shall never have it!" he said passionately. "Never! You have seen me hungry, thirsty, cold—many times—and you have never helped me! You know that my mother was the sister of your mother; you know that my mother performed the last offices for your mother before she was laid in her coffin——"

"He, he! Don't take on so, Cousin Gideon. I'll see that the same is done for you—I will! But you'll sell me the chest? It will give you food to keep you alive. Besides, it will come to me anyhow after your death, because I'm the next of kin!"

"Never!" screamed Gideon, his passion giving him strength. "And if you dare to lay a finger on anything of mine—even if I'm dead, I'll stop you!" And he fell back exhausted.

A shivery feeling went over me at his last words. Simeon looked at him contemptuously, glanced at the chest, and went out.

The end came that night. My friend and I were both in the room. Gideon had been talking wildly; suddenly he lifted himself on his elbow, and pointed to the chest.

"I told him—I told him——" His eyes glowed again. He strove to say something else, but it ended in a wild cry, and he fell back dead!

The third day after Gideon's death was a holiday, and we had arranged to bury him on that day. No news had been sent to Simeon, but in the morning, just as the man had come to screw down the coffin, in came the old rascal.

"So he's dead, eh? Well, he was very foolish. I offered him money for it, and he wouldn't take it. It would have saved his life. I told him so! How much will the funeral cost? What? Too much, a great deal too much! I suppose I must pay it." (We hadn't asked him; we had done it as cheaply as possible, on purpose.) "I shall have to take the chest for it!"

We didn't answer him, and he walked into the back-room where Cousin Gideon lay. We were in the front room, the door was wide open, and Simeon left the door of the back-room ajar. We had an idea at first that one of us had better follow him, but we decided to leave him to his own thoughts.

While we were waiting, we were startled by the sound of a voice in the other room. My friend, the mason, looked at me and I looked at him. It wasn't Simeon's voice! We listened again, and we both said "Gideon!" in a scared whisper. You may say we were mistaken, but we knew the tone of his voice too well. We listened again, and all of us in that front room heard these words:

"My mother was the sister of your mother; you know that my mother performed the last offices for your mother before she was laid in her coffin——"

We sat horror-stricken. Then we heard a cry that chilled us to the marrow—a cry such as I cannot describe. I hope I shall never hear such a cry again. Then the sound of a body falling. We rushed in and saw Simeon on the floor, bleeding from a wound in the head. We took him into the other room and sent for the doctor. When we went to the coffin again we found that there was a change in the position of the dead man!

What took place in that room? Simeon went mad, and is now in an asylum in Vienna. He constantly raves that Cousin Gideon rose from the dead and threatened him as he was touching the chest. He never says one single word on any other subject. Was Gideon only in a trance? Or what? I do not know, but perhaps you spiritualists can explain such things, or may be able to some day. I have related facts, for I'm a truthful man, and have only told one lie in my life—you know about that.

The Dead Wife.

Hélène had married Paul de Chavannes, a widower of thirty, and already father of two children. The younger was only a few months old when it became an orphan.

During three years the father and his little ones had mourned the wife and mother, the children dressed in black, Paul lost in the memory of the past. On all the walls of the house hung portraits, showing her living, some as a young girl, fair, with deep, candid eyes, others, the young wife in ball dress, or outdoor costume, covered in velvet and furs.

And in all—despite the smile of the fresh lips—the sunken eyes, bordered with lilac, told of hidden suffering, and seemed to hold a sad presentiment that all this happiness would be brief.

Since he had become a widower, Paul had never passed an evening nor taken a meal out of his own house.

Seated at table, between his babies' two tall chairs, he gazed sadly at the empty place in front. But that moment was not without its consolations. He suffered more when forced to go where duty and business called him, when he shut the door on the last "adieu" of the little voices.

Paul remembered that he did not leave with them a tender mother, watching their play and ever ready to sympathise in the sudden despairs and quick repentances of childhood.

So, against his own wishes, he began once more to think of building a home. His choice, made calmly and without passion, fell on Hélène, an old playmate, almost of his own age, quiet, and who, it was said, had remained unmarried because of some mistaken love of irreparable loss.

"Since Hélène has mourned," thought Chavannes, "her heart will be less exacting than another's, more open to pity. She will not expect me to pretend a passion which I can feel no more. She will appreciate my respect for her secret, my gratitude for the affection which she will bear for my children."

And he married Hélène, never dreaming that he himself was the man she adored.

So Hélène entered his house, in place of her whom she had so greatly envied.

Joy shone in her eyes and illumined her face. She forgot that Paul had wished less to take another wife than to give a mother to his own children.

"His heart," she thought, "has been so cruelly frozen by the bitterness of parting that he has no more confidence in love. That is all. The wound must be left to heal."

She had feared, on entering the house, to be confronted everywhere with memories of the dead woman—on the walls, in the decoration of the rooms, the arrangement of the furniture, the colour of the hangings—but with a delicacy which charmed his bride, the widower had effaced from his dwelling every souvenir of the past.

Hélène could have believed herself the first mistress of that house, had it not been for Paul's melancholy and the presence of the two children.

She forced herself to love them, caressed them with assumed tenderness, only wishing through them to reach their father's heart, now happy in spoiling them to please Paul, then miserable to think that in them he kept alive his love for his lost wife, and her heart jealously reproached Chavannes with an incurable sadness, a vague mystery in his conduct.

Wearied with this faith to a memory, to an intangible phantom with which she could not combat, Hélène began to wish her husband to fall under some other influence, which, if more dangerous, would at least be material. This wish gave a kind of comfort, and soon she began to believe it true. She set spies on her husband and found out that every day, at a certain hour, he visited a house, always the same. She went there.

The building, let in flats, had not the appearance of an office. Standing on the pavement, Hélène asked herself, with anguish, what secret was hidden behind the drawn curtains of the high windows. Sure of treachery, she felt so profoundly wounded that, for a moment, she thought of throwing herself under the wheels of a passing waggon.

But curiosity and anger proved the victors. She was consumed by an ardent desire to know—to avenge so many tears shed in secret—and, who could tell? perhaps to crush Paul with the shame of his deceit, with the magnanimity of a pardon from which would spring gratitude and love.

She crossed the courtyard, entered the concierge's lodge, and asked falteringly:

"Has M. de Chavannes been here?"

The man looked at Hélène with surprise. She thought: "He is bribed. My visit has been foreseen. He will tell me a lie."

But the concierge, after glancing at the clock, replied: "We have not yet seen him to-day, and now it is a little late for him to come. However, it is not impossible. If madame wishes to await him she must ascend to the second stage, first door to the left. My wife is lighting M. de Chavanne's fire."

Hélène went up to the second storey. All the left side of the building was occupied by bachelors' apartments. She said to herself: "Paul has hired an apartment here to receive a mistress secretly. I will go in and wait. Perhaps he or she will come. They will find me ready."

She was so overcome that she had scarcely strength to pull the bell.

"M. de Chavánnes," said she to the woman who opened the door, "will probably be here soon, or perhaps——"

She hesitated, then continued in a lower voice and very quickly:

"Or, perhaps it may be another person—a lady. Do not say that I am here. I want to surprise him," and she forced herself to smile, so as to reassure the woman, who retired.

When she was alone in the ante-room Hélène thought she was going to faint.

One minute she stood irresolute, holding the handle of the door. At last she entered.

Immediately she recognised the blue hangings fringed with silver, and the Louis Quinze furniture. It was the boudoir of the first Mme. de Chavannes. She had already seen it once, years before, when she had come with her mother to pay a wedding visit to the young wife, who, not being in good health, had received them there, reclining on a lounge.

She had not forgotten a single detail of that first and last visit. Here she found arranged, just as before, the table, the chairs, and the lounge. Near at hand, on a bracket, was placed a small mirror, and in a Sèvres vase a bunch of fresh violets. It was Paul doubtless who had brought them, and before that delicate token of affection for the dead, Hélène felt her heart seized with a jealousy far more violent than if she had indeed found there the proofs of a baser love.

She burst into tears and sank to the ground.

She wept for a long time, sobbing violently like a hurt child, her head leaning against the bed on which the other had died. She could hear the noises of the street, at the same time distinct and confused; the throbbing of her temples mingled with the tic-tac of the clock.

All at once she heard a sound of footsteps in the corridor, near the door. She felt a mad terror at the thought that perhaps Paul would come in to find her there, to reproach her bitterly with having sought out his secret, and sullied by horrible suspicions his love beyond the tomb.

She got up. The footsteps passed the door, mounted to the flat above, and were lost.

Her eyes fell on a portrait of her rival, which, pallid like an apparition, seemed to watch her grief.

For a moment Hélène regarded the portrait without anger. Its dead and pitying look fell from the picture into the heart of the sorrowful wife like balm. Hélène sat down at the table. In a drawer which she opened was a roll of paper, tied with blue ribbon. She opened it, and, with a beating heart, still shaken by her sobs, she read:

"Last pages of my diary."

And beneath these words, written by a hand trembling with weakness:

"These are the last words I shall ever write. I feel that the end is near. The doctor gives me no more medicine, my dear Paul never leaves me, and the other day he forbade my old nurse to enter my room because he found her weeping at the foot of the bed."

Hélène, leaning on the table, read greedily, her eyes burning with tears, her bosom heaving. She read—her anger turned to tender pity—the pages in which the dying woman expressed her love and her wishes for those she must leave behind. But all at once, under the reader's eyes, and through her blinding tears, the words became dim and confused.

"Paul, my dear Paul," said the last lines of the diary, "you are too young to go through life alone, and above all, to bring up the babies I leave you. Some day, not too soon, but some day, you must take another wife. I wish it, I entreat it—only choose her such as I would have chosen, and oh! may she never quite banish me from your heart, and the memory of my little ones."

Hélène rose, shaking in every limb, and approaching the bed—the place where the dead woman had laid her head for the last time—she hid her face in the draperies and sobbed:

"Oh, no! I swear it—I swear it!"

Then she lowered her veil, and went out, after having, with trembling hands, removed all traces of her presence, so that Paul should never know of her visit.

IX.—OF NELSON AND THE NILE.

Aboukir Bay resembles nothing so much as a piece bitten out of the Egyptian pancake—a crescent-shaped bay, patchy with shoals, stretching from the Rosetta mouth of the Nile to Aboukir, or, as it is now called, Nelson Island, that island being simply the outer point of a sandbank that projects from the western horn of the bay.

Flat shores, grey-blue Mediterranean waters, two horns of land six miles apart, that to the north projecting furthest and forming a low island—this, ninety-eight years ago, was the scene of what might almost be described as the greatest sea-fight in history.

On the evening of August 1st, 1798, thirteen great battle-ships lay drawn up in a single line parallel with the shore, and as close to it as the sand-banks permitted. The head ship was almost stem on to the shoal, which, running out at right angles to the shore, forms Aboukir Island.

The nose of each succeeding ship was exactly 160 yards from the stern of the ship before it, and, allowing for one or two gaps, each ship was bound by a great cable to its neighbour. It was a thread of beads, only each "bead" was a battle-ship, whose decks swarmed with brave men, and from whose sides gaped the iron lips of more than a thousand heavy guns.

The line was not exactly straight. It formed a very obtuse angle, the projecting point at the centre being formed by the Orient, the biggest warship at that moment afloat, a giant of 120 guns.

Next to her came the Franklin, of 80 guns, a vessel which, if not the biggest, was perhaps the finest sample of naval architecture in existence. The line of ships was more than one mile and a half long, and consisted of the gigantic flagship, three ships of the line of 80 guns, and nine of 74 guns. In addition, it had a fringe of gunboats and frigates, while a battery of mortars on the island guarded, as with a sword of fire, the gap betwixt the headmost ship and the island.

This great fleet had conveyed Napoleon, with 36,000 troops crowded into 400 transports, from France, had captured Malta on the voyage, and three weeks before had safely landed Napoleon and his soldiers in Egypt.

The French Admiral, Bruéys, knew that Nelson was coming furiously in his track, and after a consultation with all his captains he had drawn up his ships in the order which we have described, a position he believed to be unassailable; and at 3 o'clock on the afternoon of August 1st, 1798, his look-outs were eagerly watching the white topsails showing above the sea line, the van of Nelson's fleet.

Napoleon had kept the secret of his Egyptian expedition well, and the great Toulon fleet, with its swarm of transports, had vanished round the coast of Corsica and gone off into mere space so far as a bewildered British Admiralty knew.

A fleet of thirteen 74-gun ships, and one of 50 guns, was placed under Nelson's flag. He was ordered to pursue and destroy the vanished French fleet, and with characteristic energy he set out on one of the most dramatic sea-chases known to history. With the instinct of genius, he guessed that Napoleon's destination was Egypt; but while the French fleet coasted Sardinia, and went to the west of Sicily, Nelson ran down the Italian coast to Naples, called there for information, found none, and, carrying all sail, swept through the straits of Messina.

On the night of June 22nd the two fleets actually crossed each other's tracks. The French fleet, including the transports, numbered 572 vessels, and their lights, it might be imagined, would have lit up many leagues of sea. Yet through this forest of hostile masts, the English fleet, with keen eyes watching at every mast-head, swept and saw nothing.

Nelson, for one thing, had no frigates to serve as eyes and ears for him; his fleet, in sailor-like fashion, formed a compact body, three parallel lines of phantom-like pyramids of canvas sweeping in the darkness across the floor of the sea. Above all a haze filled the night; and it is not too much to say that the drifting grey vapour, which hid the French ships from Nelson's look-out men, changed the face of history.

Nelson used to explain that his ideal of perfect enjoyment would be to have the chance of "trying Bonaparte on a wind"; and if he had caught sound of bell or gleam of lantern from the great French fleet, and brought it to action in the darkness of the foggy night, can anyone doubt what the result would have been?

Nelson would have done off the coast of Sicily on June 22nd, 1798, what Wellington did on June 18th, 1815; and in that case there would have been no Marengo or Austerlitz, no retreat from Moscow, no Peninsular War, and no Waterloo. For so much in distracted human affairs may a patch of drifting vapour count.

Nelson, in a word, over-ran his prey. He reached Alexandria to find the coast empty; doubled back to Sicily, zig-zagging his way by Cyprus and Candia; and twelve hours after he had left Alexandria the topsails of the French fleet hove in sight from that port!

Napoleon's troops were safely landed, and the French Admiral had some four weeks in which to prepare for Nelson's return, and at 3 p.m. on August 1st, the gliding topsails of the Swiftsure, about Aboukir Island, showed that the tireless Englishman had, after nearly three months of pursuit, overtaken his enemy.

The French, if frigates be included, counted seventeen ships to fourteen, and, ship for ship, they had the advantage over the British alike in crew, tonnage, and fire. In size the English ships scarcely averaged 1,500 tons; the French ships exceeded 2,000 tons. Nelson had only 17's, his heaviest gun being a 32-pounder. The average French 80-gun ship in every detail of fighting strength exceeded an English 98, and Bruéys had three such ships in his fleet, while his own flagship, the Orient, was fully equal to two English 74's. Its weight of ball on the lower deck alone exceeded that from the whole broadside of the Bellerophon, the ship that engaged it. The French, in brief, had an advantage in guns of about 20 per cent., and in men of 30 per cent. Bruéys, moreover, was lying in a carefully chosen position in a dangerous bay, of which his enemies possessed no chart, and the head of his line was protected by a powerful shore-battery.

Nothing in this great fight is more dramatic than the swiftness and vehemence of Nelson's attack. He simply leapt upon his enemy at sight! Four of his ships were miles off in the offing, but Nelson did not wait for them. In the long pursuit he had assembled his captains repeatedly in his cabin, and discussed every possible means of attacking the French fleet. If he found the fleet as he guessed, drawn up in battle-line, close in shore and anchored, his plan was to place one of his ships on the bow, another on the quarter, of each French ship in succession.

It has been debated who actually evolved the idea of rounding the head of the French line, and attacking on both faces. One version is that Foley, in the Goliath, who led the British line, owed the suggestion to a keen-eyed middy, who pointed out that the anchor buoy of the headmost French ship was at such a distance from the ship itself as to prove there was room to pass.

But the weight of evidence seems to prove that Nelson himself, as he rounded Aboukir Island, and scanned Bruéy's formation, with that swiftness of glance in which he almost rivalled Napoleon, saw his chance in the gap between the leading French ship and the shore. "Where a French ship can swing," he held, "a British ship can either sail or anchor," and he determined to double on the French line and attack on both faces at once.

He explained his plan to Berry, his captain, who in his delight exclaimed: "If we succeed, what will the world say?" "There is no 'if' in the case," said Nelson; "that we shall succeed is certain; who will live to tell the story is a very different matter."

Bruéys had calculated that the English fleet must come down perpendicularly to his centre, and each ship, in the process, be raked by a line of fire, a mile and a half long; but the moment the English ships rounded the island they tacked, hugged the shore, and swept through the gap between the leading vessel and the land. The British ships were so close to each other that Nelson, speaking from his own quarter-deck, was able to ask Hood, in the Zealous, if he thought they had water enough to round the French line. Hood replied that he had no chart, but would lead and take soundings as he went.

So the British line came on, the men on the yards taking in canvas, the leadsmen in the chains coolly calling the soundings. The battery roared from the island, the leading French ships broke into smoke and flame, but the steady British line glided on. The Goliath by this time led; and at half-past five the shadow of its tall masts cast by the setting sun fell over the decks of the Guerrier, and as Foley, its captain, swept past the Frenchman's bows, he poured in a furious broadside, bore swiftly up, and dropped—as Nelson, with that minute attention to detail which marks a great commander had ordered all his captains—an anchor from the stern, so that, without having to "swing," he was instantly in a fighting position on his enemy's quarter.

Foley, however, dropped his anchor a moment too late, and drifted on to the second ship in the line; but Hood, in the Zealous, coming swiftly after, also raked the Guerrier, and anchoring from the stern at the exact moment, took the place on its quarter Foley should have taken.

The Orion came into battle next, blasted the unfortunate Guerrier, whose foremast had already gone, with a third broadside, and swept outside the Zealous and Goliath down to the third ship on the French line. A French frigate, the Sérieuse, of thirty-six guns, anchored inside the French line, ventured to fire on the Orion as it swept past, whereupon Saumaurez, its commander, discharged his starboard broadside into that frigate.

The Sérieuse reeled under the shock of the British guns, its masts disappeared like chips, and the unfortunate Frenchman went down like a stone; while Saumaurez, lying himself on the larboard bow of the Franklin and the quarter of the Peuple Souvrain, broke upon them in thunder.

The Theseus followed hard in the track of the Orion, raked the unhappy Guerrier in the familiar fashion while crossing its bows, then swept through the narrow water-lane betwixt the Goliath and Zealous and their French antagonists, poured a smashing broadside into each French ship as it passed, then shot outside the Orion, and anchored with mathematical nicety off the quarter of the Spartiate. The water-line was not a pistol-shot wide, and this feat of seamanship was marvellous.

Miller, who commanded the Theseus, in a letter to his wife described the fight. "In running along the enemy's line in the wake of the Zealous and Goliath, I observed," he said, "their shot swept just over us, and knowing well that at such a moment Frenchmen would not have coolness enough to change their elevation, I closed them suddenly, and running under the arch of their shot, reserved my fire, every gun being loaded with two, and some with three, round shot, until I had the Guerrier's masts in a line, and her jib-boom about six feet clear of our rigging. We then opened with such effect that a second breath could not be drawn before her main and mizzen-mast were also gone. This was precisely at sunset, or forty-minutes past six."

The Audacious, meanwhile, was too impatient to tack round the head of the French line; it broke through the gap betwixt the first and second ships of the enemy, delivered itself, in a comfortable manner, of a raking broadside into both as it passed, took its position on the larboard bow of the Conquérant, and gave itself up to the joy of battle. Within thirty minutes from the beginning of the fight, that is, five British line of battle ships were inside the French line, comfortably established on the bows or quarters of the leading ships.

Nelson himself, in the Vanguard, anchored on the outside of the French line, within eighty yards of the Spartiate's starboard beam; the Minotaur, the Bellerophon, and the Majestic, coming up in swift succession, and at less than five minutes' interval from each other, flung themselves on the next ships.

How the thunder of the battle deepened, and how the quick flashes of the guns grew brighter as the night gathered rapidly over the sea, must be imagined; but Nelson's swift and brilliant strategy was triumphant. Each ship in the French van resembled nothing so much as a walnut in the jaws of a nut-cracker. They were being "cracked" in succession, and the rear of the line could only look on with agitated feelings and watch the operations.

The fire of the British ships for fury and precision was overwhelming. The head of the Guerrier was simply shot away, the anchors hanging from her bows were cut in two; her main-deck ports, from the bowsprit to the gangway, were driven into one; her masts, fallen inboard, lay with their tangle of rigging on the unhappy crew, while some of her main-deck beams—all supports being torn away—fell on the guns.

Hood in the Zealous, who was pounding the unfortunate Guerrier, says: "At last, being tired of killing men in that way, I sent a lieutenant on board, who was allowed as I had instructed him, to hoist a light, and haul it down as a sign of submission."

But all the damage was not on the side of the French. The great French flagship, the Orient, by this time had added her mighty voice to the tumult, and the Bellerophon, who was engaged with her, had a bad time of it. It was the story of Tom Sayers and Heenan over again—a dwarf fighting a giant. Her mizzen-mast and main-mast were shot away, and after maintaining the dreadful duel for more than an hour, and having 200 of her crew struck down, at 8.20 p.m. the Bellerophon cut her cable and drifted, a disabled wreck, out of the fire.

Meanwhile the four ships Nelson had left in the offing, were beating furiously up to add themselves to the fight. Night had fallen by the time Troubridge in the Culloden came round the island; and then, in full sight of the great battle, the Culloden ran hopelessly ashore! She was, perhaps, the finest ship of the British fleet, and the emotions of its crew and commander as they listened to the tumult, and watched through the darkness the darting fires of the Titanic combat they could not share, may be imagined.

"Our army," according to well-known authorities, "swore terribly in Flanders." The expletives discharged that night along the decks and in the forecastle on the Culloden would probably have made even a Flanders veteran open his eyes in astonishment!

The Swiftsure and the Alexander, taking warning by the Culloden's fate, swept round her and bore safely up to the fight. The Swiftsure, bearing down through the darkness to the combat, came across a vessel drifting, dismasted and lightless, a mere wreck. Holliwell, the captain of the Swiftsure, was about to fire, thinking it was an enemy, but on second thoughts hailed instead, and got for an answer, the words, "Bellerophon; going out of action, disabled." The Swiftsure passed on, and, five minutes after the Bellerophon had drifted from the bows of the Orient, the Swiftsure, coming mysteriously up out of the darkness, took her place, and broke into a tempest of fire.

At nine o'clock the great French flag-ship burst into flame. The painters had been at work upon her on the morning of that day, and had left oil and combustibles about. The nearest English ships concentrated their fire, both of musketry and of cannon, on the burning patch, and made the task of extinguishing it hopeless.

Bruéys, the French admiral, had already been cut in two by a cannon shot, and Casabianca, his commodore, was wounded.

The fire spread, the flames leapt up the masts and crept athwart the decks of the great ship. The moon had just risen, and the whole scene was perhaps the strangest ever witnessed—the great burning ship, the white light of the moon above, the darting points of red flame from the iron lips of hundreds of guns below, the drifting battle-smoke, the cries of ten thousand combatants—all crowded into an area of a few hundred square yards.

The British ships, hanging like hounds on the flanks of the Orient, knew that the explosion might come at any moment, and they made every preparation for it, closing their hatchways, and gathering their firemen at quarters. But they would not withdraw their ships a single yard.

At ten o'clock the great French ship blew up with a flame that for a moment lit shore and sea, and a sound that hushed into stillness the whole tumult of the battle. Out of a crew of over 1,000 men only seventy were saved! For ten minutes after that dreadful sight the warring fleets seemed stupefied. Not a shout was heard, not a shot fired. Then the French ship next to the missing flag-ship broke into wrathful fire, and the battle awoke in full passions once more.

The fighting raged with partial intermission all through the night, and when morning broke Bruéys' curved line of mighty battle-ships, a mile and a half long, had vanished! Of the French ships, one had been blown up, one was sunk, one was ashore, four had fled, and the rest were prizes.

It was the most complete and dramatic victory in naval history.

The French fought on the whole with magnificent courage; but, though stronger in the mass, Nelson's strategy and the seamanship of his captains made the British stronger at every point of actual battle. The rear of the French line did not fire or lose a man.

The wonder is that when Nelson's strategy was developed, and its fatal character understood, Tilleneuve, who commanded the French rear, and was a man of undoubted courage, did not cut his cables, make sail, and come to the help of his comrades. A few hundred yards would have carried him to the heart of the fight.

Can anyone doubt whether, if the positions had been reversed, Nelson would have watched the destruction of half his fleet as a mere spectator? If nothing better had offered he would have pulled in a wash-tub into the fight.

Villeneuve afterwards offered three explanations of his own inertness: (1) He "could not spare any of his anchors." (2) "He had no instructions!" (3) "On board the ships in the rear the idea of weighing and going to the help of the ships occurred to nobody."

In justice to the French, however, it may be admitted that nothing could surpass the fierceness and valour with which, say, the Tonnant was fought. Its captain, Du Petit-Thouars, fought his ship magnificently, had first both his arms, and then one of his legs shot away, and died entreating his officers not to strike.

Of the ten French ships engaged, the captains of eight were killed or wounded. Nelson took the seven wounded captains on board the Vanguard, and, as they recovered, they dined regularly with him. One of the captains had lost his nose, another an eye, another most of his teeth, with musket shots.

Nelson, who himself had been wounded, and was still half blind as a result, at one of his dinners offered by mischance a case of tooth-picks to the captain on his left, who had lost most of his teeth. He discovered his error, and in his confusion handed his snuff-box to the captain on his right, who had lost his nose.

What was the secret of the British victory? Nelson's brilliant strategy was only possible by virtue of the magnificent seamanship of his captains, and the new fashion of close and desperate fighting, which Hood and Jarvis and Nelson himself had created.

It is a French writer, Captain Gravière, who says that the French naval habit of evading battle where they could, and of accepting action from an enemy rather than forcing it upon him, had ruined the morale of the French navy.

The long blockades had made Nelson's captains perfect seamen, and he taught them that close fighting at pistol-shot distance was the secret of victory.

"No English captain," he said, "can do wrong who, in fight, lays a ship alongside an enemy."

It was a captain of Nelson's school—a Scotsman—who at Camperdown, unable just as the action began, to read some complicated signal from his chief, flung his signal-book on the deck, and in broad Scotch, exclaimed: "Up with the hellem an' gang in the middle o't." That trick of "ganging into the middle o't," was irresistible.

The battle of the Nile destroyed the naval prestige of France, made England supreme in the Mediterranean, saved India, left Napoleon and his army practically prisoners in Egypt, and united Austria, Russia and Turkey in league against France.

The night battle in Aboukir Bay, in a word, changed the face of history.

TOLD BY THE DOCTOR.

II.—The Secret of an Old Garden.

CHAPTER I.

The Disappearance of Yseult Dunbar.

The old garden in Pulteney Street, behind St. James' Park, has always interested me. Lying secluded and unnoticed behind a tall, red-brick wall, it covers an extent of ground which in that fashionable part of London must be worth a king's ransom. I had often, in passing the end of the street, wondered what lay behind the wall; and when, one day, the door stood ajar, I could not resist the temptation to go a few steps out of my way in order to satisfy my curiosity. It was like a glimpse into an old world—the well-kept grass lawn, the yews benched round, and the moss-grown gravel path, of which I got a view through the open gateway.

I wondered what man could afford to resist, for the sake of this old-time retreat, the golden persuasion of the speculator and builder. I wondered all the more when I found later to what a quiet, unostentatious little house the garden was attached; and I often wished that I could get another glimpse of the old-world garden.

I little thought then that it was to be so intimately connected with one of the most interesting cases ever brought under my notice—a case so mysterious and perplexing at the time, that the particulars are perhaps worth repeating. I will endeavour to give them as concisely as possible.

On August 13th, 1891, there called upon me at my house in Cheyne Walk, a young man who gave the name of Frank Ogilvie, and whose appearance prepossessed me at once in his favour. He was too impatient about consulting me even to take a chair, but started at once on the question which had brought him. He had heard of me through the papers, in connection with the celebrated Dessalene case, with which my name was considerably mixed up, and thought of me as a person likely to take interest in a medical case which suggested villainy.

I asked him to be seated, and assured him of my willingness to give him any assistance in my power.

"Thank you!" he said, still standing. "I should very much like you to come and see Miss Yseult Dunbar, the young lady who was to have been my wife."

"Is she ill?" I asked. His reply startled me.

"They say she is dead."

I looked at my visitor keenly, wondering for a moment whether I had to deal with a maniac, driven from sanity possibly by the death of a sweetheart. It would not have been the first time that I have had such visitors invoking my assistance in the most fantastic exploits.

But it required little more than a glance into the young man's face to assure me that there was no mania in the present case.

Mr. Ogilvie evidently understood the meaning of my glance. He went on quickly to explain:

"Miss Dunbar is lying apparently dead; I believe that she is in a trance."

"How long has this continued?" I asked.

"Three days. On Monday evening she was in perfect health, apparently. On Tuesday afternoon I received a telegram in the City to say that she had died suddenly, and when I hastened at once to her house I found her as I have stated."

"But she has been seen by medical men. Do they pronounce her dead?"

The young man gave a gesture of disgust and contempt.

"She has been seen by Dr. Mitcheller, a decrepid old woman, with a will of water. He has been persuaded into signing the certificate of death, as he could be persuaded into signing anything or stating anything, by Yseult's guardian."

"The guardian wishes to avoid an inquest, I suppose?" I said; "it is the first thought with many people when a sudden death occurs in the family."

"He wishes to see Yseult buried as quickly as possible, rather," returned Ogilvie sternly, "alive or dead."

"Indeed; that is a serious accusation to make against any man. What reason have you for making it?"

My companion glanced at the clock on the mantelshelf.

I asked him to be seated.

Digitized by Google

"If you would not mind coming with me at once," he said, "you will be able to see Miss Dunbar, I think, without any interruption from Mr. Gavin Temple, her guardian; and I can tell you all the particulars on the way."

I could see that the young man was dying with impatience to have my decision on the question, which was of such supreme importance to him—the fact of his fiancée's life or death; and I made no demur, therefore, to his proposal, but put on my hat and accompanied my visitor into the street. He signalled a hansom from the end of Oakley Street, and we were soon driving rapidly in the direction of Pulteney Street, where, my companion informed me, Miss Dunbar lived.

"Now," I said, as soon as we were seated, "let me have all the particulars of the case, please. Firstly, who is Miss Yseult Dunbar—an orphan?"

I supposed so, from the mention of a guardian. "Who is this guardian?"

"Gavin Temple—a cousin of her father's."

"In whom you have no confidence?"

"That I have not," said Ogilvie. "I have found him out to be altogether unscrupulous."

"You think he would have an interest in making out that the young lady is dead, even if she is not?"

"It would be very much to his interest to see her buried," said my companion bitterly. "Miss Dunbar is the only bar between him and an income of two thousand a year. The money was left by her grandfather, Lord Englon, in a rather eccentric will, Gavin Temple, her father's cousin and only relative, as far as I know, being appointed executor and guardian. According to the will, all the money and the property in Pulteney Street, which is very valuable, was to go to the guardian in case Yseult died unmarried."

"And the lady appears to have died just as she was about to marry?—a coincidence which is certainly suspicious in itself," I said.

I was ashamed of alluding so unsympathetically to the marriage when I saw the look of inexpressible pain which came into my companion's face.

"We should have been married in two days' time," he said brokenly. "The banns have been published, even."

"Do you think that this Gavin Temple has killed his ward?" I said. "It is best for us to speak quite openly to one another."

My companion shook his head.

"I have not thought so," he replied gravely. "From what I know of his character, I should say he would not take the risk of doing that. My idea is that Yseult has gone into a trance—she has done so before—and that Temple suspects it, and is anxious to get her buried before she revives."

"Excuse me," I said, interrupting him, "but the previous trances are important. Have you seen Miss Dunbar in a trance before?"

"No; I have heard about them only. When we became engaged, she thought it her duty to tell me that she had had these trances as a child. The last occurred, I believe she said, when she was eleven—that is, nine years ago."

"It is certainly a case in which great caution ought to be exercised," I said, fearing all the while lest I should raise undue hope in the young man's heart. "Has Mr. Temple fixed the date of the funeral?"

"Yes; for to-morrow."

"That is certainly too soon," I said. "Unless I find the clearest proofs of death when I see the lady, we will take measures to have the funeral stopped by reporting the case to the Registrar-General, if necessary. The certificate of death, of course, was out of order, if Dr. Mitcheller did not see the deceased until after death."

"Yes," replied Ogilvie, "that is why I was in such a hurry to get you to the house. I feared that if Gavin Temple had the least idea of what was going on, he might hasten the burial in order to circumvent us. For that reason I have kept a watch on the house every day since the trance commenced."

Driving rapidly in the direction of Pulteney Street.

"If trance it is," I added, fearing that my words had made the young man too hopeful.

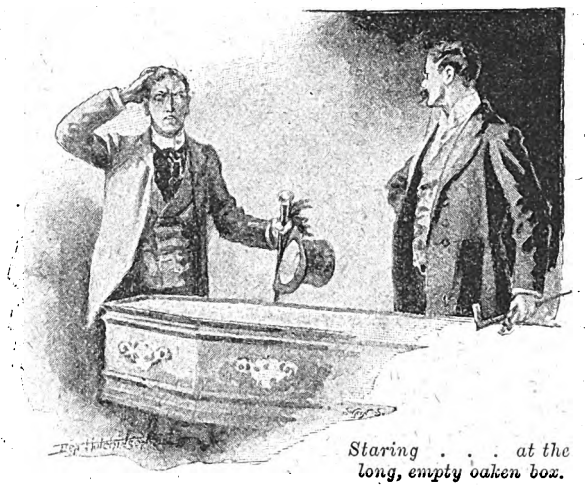
"Thank Heaven! we shall know in five minutes," he replied, as our hansom turned Buckingham Palace Road.

"Possibly," I said. "But you have not told me anything tangible against this man Temple. What makes you suspect him of so much villainy? If he has given proofs of it, I wonder that you allowed your fiancée to remain in his care."

"I blame myself every hour for it," said Ogilvie. "It seems madness to me, now I look back upon it. But any other course would have been difficult; and, in reality, I know little or nothing against the man. It is only what I feel and suspect. For instance, among Lord Englon's property when he died was a very valuable collection of gold ornaments, some of them richly jewelled, and all of them having a value even greater than their intrinsic worth on account of their age and rarity. Well, as soon as the old man breathed his last—six months ago now—the family jewels were found to be lost. They were bequeathed, with almost everything else, to Yseult. Now, of course, it is only suspicion, but I have always put down the disappearance to Gavin Temple. Certainly nobody else had his opportunities. He lived in the house, you know, as a sort of companion to Lord Englon, he and his daughter."

"Gavin Temple is a married man, then?" I asked.

"Yes, a widower. His daughter, Madge, as I said, lives with him in Yseult's house. They were to remain there until she married. The old man seems to have dated everything by his grand-daughter's marriage.



Staring . . . at the long, empty oaken box.

There is a locked trunk, too, in the place, which is to be opened on her wedding-day—or the day of her death. I suppose her guardian has opened it by now."

He broke off suddenly, overcome by the remembrance of his sorrow, and just then the hansom turned into the street with the tall brick wall, and to my suprise stopped at the green door which opened upon my old-world garden.

"Is this Miss Dunbar's house?" I said as we left the hansom and turned into the refreshing shade of the garden. "What a lovely place! I wonder at its preservation in such a valuable neighbourhood?"

"It was a matter of faith with the old lord to preserve it," answered my companion quickly.

We were crossing the lawn under the yews towards the house, and Ogilvie seemed consumed by nervous impatience to reach it.

"If Gavin Temple knows who you are, he will try some devilry to prevent your seeing Yseult," he said. "We will enter by the French windows of the drawing-room, which open on the garden, without announcing our presence, and I will take you straight up to her room."

"Yes, that will be best."

The drawing-room was empty; but in the passage outside, as we passed through, a servant in black went by. She started when she saw us, but my companion nodded reassuringly.

"Is Mr. Temple in, Mary?" he asked.

"No, sir; he has not been in since this morning."

"All the better; we shall not be disturbed," he said to me in an undertone, and led the way up the broad oaken stairs. Frank Ogilvie was acting under excitement, I could see, and I must admit that I was not quite as calm as usual. The young man's story had moved me greatly, and the thought that another few moments would decide whether I must encourage or dispel for ever the hope he was so fondly harbouring—the hope that his sweetheart still lived—made me feel nervous and agitated.

"This is Yseult's room. They have placed her body in the coffin already, in here," said my companion, stopping before a curtained doorway, and he turned the knob softly.

I followed close behind into the room, which seemed to be a lady's bed-room. The coffin stood at the other side of the bed on a couple of trestles. I was so impatient to see the body which it contained, that I passed my companion and walked quickly across the room. Then I turned quickly and faced him.

"I thought you said that she had been placed in the coffin?" I began, but my words died in my throat when I saw that Frank Ogilvie was staring in a strange, petrified manner at the long, empty oaken box. I thought for a moment that he was losing his senses.

Then suddenly his face changed and became inflamed with anger.

"They have buried her!" he cried in a voice of passionate anguish. "Oh, why did I leave her with him—the murderer—the villain!"

I tried to calm him.

"If Miss Yseult had been buried," I said quietly, "the coffin could not have been left here. Are you quite sure she has really been placed in it?"

"I saw her here to-day," answered Ogilvie, looking down into the empty casket. "They have buried her while I was away."

The thought that Miss Dunbar might have recovered from her trance—if trance it was—did not seem for a moment to occur to him, and I hesitated to hazard this explanation of her disappearance for fear of awakening in the young man's heart hopes which might be only doomed to disappointment, especially as the servant downstairs had made no mention of such a remarkable circumstance.

"You expostulated against the body being placed in the coffin?" I asked.

"Yes, most emphatically."

"Then perhaps your remonstrance has had effect, and the body been moved," I said, "until the fact is more certain that it is that of a corpse. Let us call a servant and inquire."

I crossed to the bell-pull as I spoke, and my summons was answered almost immediately by the girl whom we had met on entering the house. I undertook to question her, since Ogilvie seemed so hopelessly assured that there had been foul play, to show any interest. He stood by the empty box on the trestles, while I put my few interrogatories, watching the girl's face keenly while I did so.

There was really no doubting the completeness of her astonishment when she heard that the coffin was empty. She poked her head into the doorway, peeping over at the coffin across the room, as though she could not believe my words.

"Empty, sir? It can't be, surely!" she exclaimed. "Why, there hasn't been anybody in the room!"

"Look for yourself," I said. And the girl crossed the room to the open box.

Frank Ogilvie came over to my side.

"How cleverly the villain has managed it!" he said in a whisper. "The girl evidently has seen nothing of the removal."

"But, my dear fellow," I exclaimed; "you say that you saw the body this morning. Mr. Temple cannot have carried it out and buried it without a coffin in broad daylight."

"Then he has hidden it in the house. We will make a complete search at once."

"Is there nobody of whom we can make inquiries first?" I said. "Perhaps there may have been some honest reason for the removal."

"I am afraid not," replied my companion. "But I will ask Madge—Miss Temple, if she is in."

"You mean Gavin Temple's daughter?"

"Yes."

"Ask her, by all means. I am anxious to see her," I quickly replied.

Miss Madge Temple was a petite young lady of about twenty-six, with a pale little face, and small black eyes. Her eyes looked all the blacker through contrast with her light, colourless hair. She came at once in answer to the request which we sent by the maid, who, during our short conversation together, had been searching all over the room, as if she expected to find the coffin's occupant under the bed, or hidden in the wardrobe.

Miss Temple seemed fully as astonished as the maid had been at our news. She made the suggestion which had occurred to my mind, but which I dared not mention to Ogilvie, for fear of raising false hopes.

"You thought all along that Yseult was only in a trance," she said. "Perhaps she has recovered and got out of the coffin herself."

The young man shook his head sadly.

"Where could she have gone? Why did she call none of you?"

"And what did she put on?" added the maid. "I've looked in the wardrobe and drawers, and none of Miss Yseult's things have been touched."

"Let us have a look through the house, at any rate," I suggested; and as there was nothing else to do, we started in single file, visiting all the rooms in succession. In each room Frank Ogilvie remained to search thoroughly every place in which a corpse could possibly have been hidden. It was easy enough to see that he would not even consider the explanation of Yseult's disappearance which Miss Temple had suggested. He had made up his mind so thoroughly to expect some villainy on the part of that young lady's father, that it did not seem possible for the disappearance to be due to any cause but Gavin Temple's wicked machinations. The maid's statement that none of Miss Yseult's clothes had been touched was quite enough to dispel what faint hopes he might have had of his sweetheart's resurrection. He marched through the rooms, peeping into wardrobes and boxes with a dark frown on his determined face, and he did not speak a word during the whole search. Madge Temple followed him about with tears in her little black eyes, speaking to him now and then words which I could not catch, and which met with no reply.

Only once he spoke. It was when we entered what I suppose was Gavin's study. On the table stood an iron deed-box, bearing the name of Miss Yseult Dunbar in white letters. Ogilvie pointed towards it.

"He has opened it, I suppose?"

Miss Temple shivered before his glance.

"Yes," she answered, in a low tone. "The will said: 'On the day of her death.'"

Ogilvie made no reply.

The search was ended at last, and then we stood and looked at each other in bewilderment. Every room and attic in the place, I believe, we had examined, outhouses included, and not a trace of Yseult Dunbar was to be found, alive or dead.

"Please, miss, I can't stay another night in this house," said the servant, who had accompanied us throughout, getting whiter and more scared-looking every room we entered. "It isn't canny, miss; I shall have to go, if I lose my wages and character as well for it."

And uncanny it really did appear. I began to think that Frank Ogilvie must be right, and that the only explanation of this mysterious disappearance was to ascribe it to the cunning machinations of an interested and unscrupulous man.

CHAPTER II.

On the Track.

I was very much afraid, as I have said throughout, of encouraging in the young man hopes that were almost certain to be ill-founded; but I could not ignore altogether the possibility of Miss Yseult's recovery.

Suppose the lady had been merely in a trance, as Ogilvie seemed at first to imagine, and had recovered and left the house—how dressed I did not stop to calculate—I had to think what would be the most likely refuge to which she could have taken her way. I inquired of Ogilvie where his own residence lay; and when he informed me that it was within five minutes walk of Pulteney Street, I suggested at once that we should repair thither, in the hope of hearing some news of the missing lady. In my heart of hearts I hoped that we should find Miss Yseult herself there; but I did not suggest it to my companion. I was glad I had not done so when we arrived at the house, a substantial residence in Queen Anne's Gate, and found that nothing whatever was known of the mysterious occurrence.

Ogilvie's mother, a sweet, aristocratic-looking old lady, seemed deeply affected by her son's trouble. She took me aside at the end of our talking, and begged me to do all I could to find out the solution of his fiancée's disappearance. Of course, I assured her that now I had taken up the case, I should never rest until I knew all about it.

"You will not think it wrong of me, I know," she said hesitatingly, after she had thanked me, "if I mention to you, as I should certainly not do to anybody less interested in the case, my own suspicions. It is hateful to suggest suspicion of anybody to a third person; but in a case like the present it seems necessary,

Ogilvie pointed towards it.

and I can depend, of course, upon your receiving it as it is given?"

I bowed in silence, wondering what was coming. The old lady's voice sank almost to a whisper.

"Whatever foul play there has been in connection with poor Yseult's death," she said, "I am inclined to credit to Madge Temple, rather than to her father."

I was surprised. Miss Madge Temple had not struck me altogether in an unfavourable light. But very possibly Mrs. Ogilvie knew much more of her than I did.

"What motive would she have?" I asked.

"The same motive as her father. Whatever wealth he gains, of course, by poor Yseult's death, his daughter will share."

She stopped: but I thought there was more to come, and pressed for further information.

We were standing in a room furnished cosily as a library and study, which opened out of the hall, and Frank had left us, to make a hopeless search through the house.

Mrs. Ogilvie glanced over her shoulder, as though afraid that he would return and overhear, as she answered my questioning.

"Yes, she had other reasons. I am sure she was jealous of Yseult."

"She cared for your son?"

"I am afraid so."

I nodded gravely.

"The thought occurred to me when she followed him in his search over the house to-day, but I am fully persuaded that she knows nothing of the disappearance."

"Possibly not. Her father would not trust her with his plans on this very account, lest she should reveal them to Frank; but, from her conduct after Yseult's death, I have grave suspicions that her conscience is not altogether clear concerning it."

"Well, at present the one question is: Where is Miss Yseult Dunbar?" I said in a louder key, as Frank re-entered the room. "Had the young lady any other friends in London from whom we could make inquiries?"

Young Ogilvie shook his head.

"She had absolutely no friends," he said, "apart from us. Gavin has taken pains to make her life as secluded a one as possible. If a happy chance had not taken me to the house, she would have known nobody."

"Then whatever remote hopes we may have had that the young lady left the house herself alive must be abandoned," I said. "If she had recovered, and feared to remain in the house with her cousin, she would certainly have placed herself at once under the protection of your mother. I am afraid there is no room whatever for hope of that sort."

"I had no hope," replied Frank with tightened lips.

I was glad to hear him say it.

"We can do nothing now," I said, "until we have seen Gavin Temple." And both Mrs. Ogilvie and Frank agreed with me, although the former seemed rather afraid at the thought of the meeting between her son and the man suspected of tampering with his fiancée's life.

"I must track him if possible," said the young man, "and discover how he has spent the day. Dare I hope that your engagements will allow you to accompany me, Dr. Tavel?"

His mother's face brightened when I replied that till the mystery of Yseult Dunbar's disappearance was solved, I had no engagements. She had evidently begun to rely upon my exertions a good deal, and I made up my mind that I would prove myself worthy of her trust.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Mr. Hawke Schemes.

The very day after the death of Lemaitre, Cécile and Jack Heathcote started for the Casa Calvo, on the banks of Lake Como. Cécile first telegraphed to Lady Hilton, who was then at Dieppe, telling her that she had discovered the whereabouts of Edith, and would bring her at once to Paris, where Lady Hilton should await her.

But when Cécile and Jack reached the Casa Calvo, Edith was not there. She had fled secretly from the house.

"I say, darling, when are we going to be married?" said Jack, in fresh despair. "Miss Wentworth is becoming too intolerably tiresome, you know."

"Be silent," answered Cécile. "On the same day that she is married you shall be my master, sir. Till then I hold the reins."

"But she isn't even engaged yet, is she?"

"Oh, yes, but it is a private engagement. Be silent!"

Meanwhile Edith had fled again, and was again as lost to them as ever. They could not even remotely guess where she was, not having any clue to the motives of her conduct.

Two hours after them, Hawke, with a red handkerchief bandaged aslant round his bruised forehead under his hat, also arrived at the Casa Calvo, in urgent haste to see Edith. Mr. Hawke was desperately in need of funds, and his ingenuity had contrived a scheme to fill his empty pockets. What had become of Lemaitre's money—where it was deposited—or where Lemaitre, if he had it in a lump, had hidden it, he could not conjecture. The money had, in fact, an hour before Hawke's arrival at the château on the morning of Lemaitre's return, been thrown by Lemaitre upon the same flames which burnt the coat and the photograph. For money the doomed and haunted man had had no longer any need.

Hawke was in quest of money. And he decided to get it from Captain Arthur Musgrave.

He had seen in an English paper that Arthur was severely wounded at the battle of Kassassin, and now lay in hospital at Ismailia. How much, Mr. Hawke wondered, would Arthur be willing to pay for Edith? Mr. Hawke knew where Edith was; Arthur did not; Hawke knew the secret which had banished her from her friends, and could now reveal it; Arthur did not.

"He's gone through a lot for that there girl," pondered Mr. Hawke; "he ought to be willing to put down something very handsome for her. If he is, I undertake to bring 'em together!"

But first he went to make sure of Edith herself, and open her eyes to the fact that he was not her father—and Edith was gone.

But whither? Neither Cécile nor Hawke had any idea where to turn next.

Cécile, however, was not anxious: she now knew the precise reason of Edith's flight from home; and that it was a reason not based upon facts. All she had to do was to put a message in the Courier du Soir which Edith appeared to read, saying that her father was, in actual fact, Ernest Wentworth: and at once Edith would cease to have reason to keep away from home.

Cécile at once telegraphed to the Courier du Soir the words which she wished inserted, and set out westward again with Jack. She reached Marseilles that night. Up to then she had no notion that such a battle as Kassassin had been fought. But during the evening a letter from Lady Hilton to the poste restante gave her the news of Arthur's wounding.

"Then that is where Edith is gone to!" cried Cécile. "She has gone, or is going, to Egypt to nurse him! Quick, Jack! See when the next boat leaves Brindisi."

Jack went hunting among the tables of the hotel, and found that the next P. & O. boat, the Orient, left Brindisi on the evening of the fourth day.

"We will meet her there, then!" cried Cécile.

"But are you sure of your ground this time?" said Jack. "The movements of Miss Wentworth don't in general seem very calculable——"

"Can't you be silent, then? She is going to Egypt, I tell you! She is! I divine it. Quick! Send a telegram to Lady Hilton, saying that Edith will be at Brindisi in time for the Orient, and I, too, and you!"

"But—suppose it isn't true, darling?"

"You have not, then, learnt to trust me a little? She has seen the news in the papers about Arthur's wound. That is what has happened!"

"But won't she also see your message in to-morrow's paper?"

"No—probably not. She has no longer any interest in papers. All her thoughts now are centred upon Egypt, and upon escaping Dr. Danton in case he should discover her flight, and pursue her. She does not know, remember, that Danton is dead."

At this time Inspector Wheeler had just arrived at Lemaitre's château, in hot search for Hawke. Cécile, half in fun, had telegraphed him information where Hawke might be found. Hawke, however, was gone. Wheeler made inquiries which sent him upon another expedition of urgent haste to the Casa Calvo, and here again Hawke had vanished.

"I'll pat that man on the back yet, see if I don't!" said Wheeler to himself. He had the belief that half the sorrows in the world were due to Hawke.

At the railway station he received information which led him to believe that Hawke had travelled to Genoa, and to Genoa Mr. Wheeler accordingly directed his course.

Genoa, in fact, was where Mr. Hawke really was. Nearly his last shilling was spent; and on the night after his visit to the Casa Calvo, he stood in a cell of a Jew pawnbroker's shop with his heavy gold watch and chain in his hand.

As he leant forward to scoop his money in over the counter he saw in the next compartment—Edith!

Her head was turned away; she did not see Hawke. Nearly all the afternoon she had been going to and fro between her mean lodging and the pawnshop, pledging everything of any sort of value that remained to her. The paper which she had seen had reported Arthur as dying. She was going to him. It was impossible that his head should die on another breast.

Her difficulty was to find money to pay her train fare and steerage-passage.

When she went out of the pawnshop, Hawke followed her with perfect caution. Her scanty luggage was apparently already at the station; for she walked straight in that direction. Hawke heard her take ticket for Brindisi.

"Oh, so?" he said to himself, "that's it, is it? You've found out, then, without your father's assistance? But suppose I put a spoke in yer little wheel, my lady? What if I claim you now as a father, my hearty?"

But he had a better thought. If he could get to Egypt before her. He was afraid of attempting to detain her here; she might be rebellious, or fly. There might be a row: he had an instinct that Wheeler was after him again. But if he could get to Egypt before her? If he could see Arthur, and bring Arthur away in the hope of seeing her, from the place where she expected to see him? Each would then be hopelessly lost to the other; and Mr. Hawke's idea for making them happy by bringing them together was something like ten thousand pounds.

"I think Musgrave could go that," pondered Mr. Hawke.

But to get to Egypt before her? He consulted time tables, and saw that she would probably leave Brindisi in the afternoon of the third day. If he could get the right craft he could do it. He, too, immediately took train for the south.

Brindisi at its best is a wretched town. In spite of the constant stream of people passing through it, the unenterprising inhabitants have hardly erected a building since the time it was a fishing village.

There is, therefore, not a very great choice of hostelries at the place. Edith had selected the cheapest at the end of the town. In the afternoon of her second day there, the door of her room opened without warning, and Cécile Delisle rushed into her arms with a wild and happy cry.

Lady Hilton, pensively smiling, stood in the doorway, and Jack Heathcote, and behind them Professor Queech, with Mrs. Queech, once Miss Newton. These last, travelling to Palestine in quest of data for the Professor's theories, had met the Hilton party en route, and had come on thus far with them.

"Edith, dear, I am very pleased—very pleased, my child—to see your face again!" said Lady Hilton, "and you went from us wholly for nothing, as we now know. How could you? Edith, Edith!"

Edith, trembling in every limb, seemed to herself as if just risen from the grave. Somehow, without understanding, she gathered that life, happiness, was to be hers again. She saw a film like tears in Lady Hilton's eyes, and wiped it gently away.

"I am yours now for 'ever!" she whispered; "but once more—only once—I must go from you."

"But why, dear?"

"I am going to Arthur! You will let me?"

"We are all going, dear, all of us here; even Professor Queech, whom you may remember, and Miss Newton, now his wife."

Lady Hilton retired to the outer room, and Cécile and Edith entered upon a debauch of caresses.

"But let one look at one's own soul! Why, you are no longer a girl—you are a woman! Edith, have you changed to me? Am I not still your chief?"

"I am a woman, you say. One cannot cease to love one's soul; but a woman's chief love must be a man, Cécile!"

She laughed gaily, for the first time for many months.

When the steamer arrived they discovered that one of the saloon cabins had been reserved for two Indian merchants, who were to join the ship at Suez; and that, to that point, this was at the service of the ladies. Jack and the Professor would be accommodated by the steward somewhere.

They took their seats as the sun set beneath the deck-awning on the afternoon of departure, gazing out over the water at the lessening shores of Italy.

Mr. Hawke, meanwhile, had made terms with the padrone of a fair-sized Maltese speronare, whom he met at Brindisi, and, with three days' start, was now well on towards the coast of North-Eastern Africa.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

WHEELER v. HAWKE.

EDITH had seen in the Courier du Soir that Arthur was grievously wounded, and likely to die. This, however, was not the case. Immediately after the battle of Kassassin, he was missed by Pendragon. On his return to Mahsameh, Pendragon, almost weeping, organised a search-party of tired troopers, and returned to the scene of action. They found Arthur lying insensible over Tom Wilson's body.

But the next day the regimental surgeon at Mahsameh said to him:

"Your breast-wound is not dangerous; I have got the bullet out. But I see that your ankle is much swollen. You will only bother us here. What I shall do will be to put you in one of the men-of-war launches, and send you to Ismailia, where you will be much better looked after than at the front. You will, moreover, be far cooler there, if you get a decent tent."

And to Ismailia Arthur accordingly went, and contrived to obtain very suitable quarters. He got the use of a house close to the canal, and had a large square tent pitched in the inclosed garden, overlooking the canal, where it was both cool and retired. After a couple of days' pertect rest, he felt much recovered.

He was sitting at his tent door on a balmy, sultry afternoon, his white head uncovered, his ankle on a canvas chair, and a look of gentle sorrow in his clear eyes, when from the direction of the canal, a stout short man approached; and Mr. Hawke, in his open frock-coat, but without the heavy gold chain of other days, stood before him.

"I know your face; who are you?" said Arthur.

He had seen Mr. Hawke on that awful day, when he slept the Sleep of the Angels, at No. 11, Rue Taitbout.

"My name is—hem!—Hawke, sir."

"Where have I seen you before?"

"Oh, well, that's neither here nor there. I was a good deal mixed up with Dr. Danton, you know. Danton's dead."

"Ah!—and what is it you want now, Mr. Hawke?"

"I'm come about Miss Wentworth. Are you in a fit state to travel at once?"

"I think so. Tell me: Miss Wentworth, you say?"

"That fetches him," thought Hawke. He added aloud: "I know where Miss Wentworth is. If you can arrange to leave here within the next half hour, I can take you to her."

"Where is she?"

"She's in Europe. But, of course, I am a poor man. I don't want to make b'lieve that I'm altogether what you'd call a philanthropist. If I take you to her, the figure would be five thousand as soon as we reach Italy, and five thousand when I bring you face to face."

"I see. You are a good disciple of Dr. Danton. Well, suppose I say yes: what guarantee have I, first, that you will keep your word, and, second, that Miss Wentworth desires to see me?"

"Well, don't you see, I'll keep my word for my own interest; and I can tell you for a fact that Miss W—— does want to see you. You see, the reason she ran away from home was a little fib which Danton—you know Danton's little ways—which Danton told her about her parents. Once she knows that that warn't true, she'll receive you with open arms, and everything will be first rate."

"Was this the object with which you came to Egypt?" asked Arthur.

"That wur just it."

"What did you come in?"

"A sailing boat from Malta."

"And you have her ready for the voyage back?"

"Yes—everything's ready, only waiting for you."

"All right, Mr. Hawke. I'll go with you. But remember, if there is any trick in this, you shall have a lesson which you won't forget."

"Oh, well, I don't say, mind you, that as soon as ever we get to Italy I shall take you straight away to Miss W——. I don't say that, you know. But I know where she is—and sooner or later——"

"All right, I'll go. You speak fairly enough. Just lend me a hand—my ankle is rather bad——"

But Hawke never lent him a hand. At that moment the garden gate opened, and a big, well-fed man, with fresh-coloured face, walked briskly up the path; before Hawke could look round, he felt a clap on his shoulder, and heard the words:

"Got you, Hawke!"

Every drop of blood left Mr. Hawke's face. He knew that voice.

But there was a ripple of laughter in the air—the sweet voices of women—petticoats fluttering at a run up the garden walk; and Edith was on the breast of Arthur; and Cécile's jubilee of mirth was ringing in the air; and tears were rolling down Lady Hilton's cheeks; and Professor Queech was saying to his bride, the Miss Newton of old:

"A most extraordinary thing, now; with reference to that, I can tell you, my dear, a fact not, I believe, generally known——"

And Cécile in her mad gaiety was crying:

"Oh, Inspector Wheeler, I do so congratulate you!—you have got him at last! you have got Mr. Hawke!"

And Mr. Hawke was saying:

"Well, he has; you have, Wheeler. Fair's fair. But I always did say I could outwit you, Wheeler. You haven't got the shadow of a charge to bring against me. You will have to pay my passage to England, which just now is a very fortunate thing for me——"

And suddenly Cécile was dragging Edith from Arthur, in order to ask him:

"But Tom Wilson! where is he?"

And there was Arthur's blank, and sad, and guilty face, with its white crown of hair, unable to utter to her the words she guessed.

And there was Jack Heathcote with his arm round her neck, trying to draw away her hands from before her weeping eyes; and she, with face hidden against the canvas of the tent, was crying and mourning, as mourners mourn and skirl over the beloved dead:

"Oh, Tom, my boy! Oh, Tom, my child, my child!"

The End.

Answers to Correspondents.

On page 571 will be found the last batch of sketches in the Picture Puzzle Competition. When you have solved all the sketches you can, put them in an envelope and send them along, to reach this office by first post Monday, May 3rd. You will notice the remarks about a small subscription to the Fresh Air Fund. I am sure that you will inclose as large an amount as you can possibly afford.

Young Shaver.—If you wish to have a fine, smooth beard and moustache when you are older, you certainly should not shave as much as you say you do, for this treatment tends to make the hair rough and coarse.

H. H. G.—In both Japan and Russia tea is provided gratuitously to their passengers by the railway companies. You should never send your manuscript rolled.

G. N.—The chances are less than you think. Only one couple in a thousand live to celebrate their golden wedding. However, I hope you will be spared to see September 27th.

Puzzled.—A "first foot" in the North of England is the person who first crosses the threshold of a house after the advent of the New Year. In Yorkshire a fair man, or a woman, be she dark or fair, is not allowed to be the "first foot," as the superstition runs that such an event would bring ill-luck upon the house throughout the year. If, however, a dark man is the first to enter the house, good fortune will follow the family.

D. C. B.—There are only two species of birds found only in the British Isles. These are the red grouse and the coal tit.

T. B. C.—As regards private fortune, our own Queen is the richest monarch in the world.

G. C. M.—Yes, the same kind of wire may be used for both telegraphic and telephonic purposes.

E. K. J.—The idea that it is lucky to find a horseshoe arises from an old superstition that a horseshoe was a protection against witches.

Tommy Atkins.—The bed of the French soldier is undoubtedly the most comfortable of all soldiers' beds. It consists of a wooden or iron bedstead, a straw bed, a wool mattress, sheets, a brown woollen coverlet, and an extra quilt for cold weather.

A. W.—A simple method of distinguishing between a genuine and paste diamond is to touch them with the tongue. The diamond will be much colder than the glass, as it is a much better conductor of heat.

H. H.—Salisbury Cathedral has a window for every day in the year. Wollaton Hall, in Nottinghamshire, and a house in the Isle of Wight, possess the same peculiar feature.

T. B. D.—The navy is a much older institution than the army. From the very earliest times England has possessed a navy, but the army as it is now was only established in the reign of Charles II.

G. H.—Pestalozzi was the original founder of the "kindergarten" system of training young children, although his pupil, Froebel, who carried on his work after his death, generally gets the credit.

J. W. B.—Go to a school of art, Government, if possible, learn drawing generally, and join the black and white class. When you feel competent do some original drawings and send them to suitable papers for approval.

H. T.—There is no truth whatever in the belief that a shark swallows its young in time of danger and disgorges it again when the danger is past.

Homo.—Your friend is right. It is no uncommon thing for people to wait in London for four or five hours in order to secure a good seat in a theatre; and on special occasions they will sometimes hang about the doors of a theatre from eight in the morning until half-past seven in the evening.

D. B. C.—Certainly, the force of gunpowder is much greater than that of steam.

W. E. W.—The ostrich is the largest bird in existence.

Margaret.—The period of English history known as the "golden age" was during the reign of Queen Elizabeth. The time of Queen Anne was known as the "silver age," and the present is designated the "iron age" of England, owing to the hard, matter-of-fact commercial spirit which now prevails in this country.

S. S. B.—A "paraph" is the term applied to the flourish with which the majority of people embellish their signatures, in order to make forgery less easy.

S. G. D.—No, there are no snakes indigenous to Ireland.

F. W.—The use of the "side-saddle" for ladies was introduced into England by Anne of Bohemia, wife of Richard II. Previous to that time women rode in the same way as men.

W. D. F.—Chinese is, undoubtedly, the most difficult language to learn.

R. H. B.—There is no hard and fast rule as to the class of people entitled to put the black Hanoverian cockade on their servants' hats. At first it was purely a military distinction, but now any justice of the peace, officer of the militia, yeomanry, or volunteers, etc., can adopt it.

G. B. D.—Certainly birds teach one another to sing. In fact you cannot get a young bird to sing correctly unless it has had tuition from an older bird.

G. H. G.—Table-turning is due neither to a supernatural agency nor to electricity. It is merely the result of unconscious pressure on the part of the operators.

A. N. M.—Englishmen of the professional classes are the tallest men in Europe.

T. W.—Yes, rain does sometimes fall from a cloudless sky. Although this phenomenon is seldom seen in England, it is not uncommon in various other parts of the universe.

J. W. W.—Penny postage stamps cost the Post Office authorities about eightpence per thousand.

P. K.—The magnificent colours seen in soap bubbles are due entirely to the reflection of the light.

R. C.—You are quite right. The air is lighter during rainfall than it is in fine weather.

Mr. W. A. Shaw is the inventor of a new game. It is no common game. The apparatus required is similar in appearance to a tennis racket without the mesh, and with the top shaved off. There is a cup attached to each of the ends of the prongs, and one on a spring in the centre. A ball is propelled by the centre spring against a wall, and when it falls the object is to catch it in one of the other cups. The address of the inventor is 1, Houndsgate, Nottingham.

The coming celebrations in honour of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee will be a rare harvest time for purveyors of lamps. In all directions they are up to their ears busily inventing new designs of every description. Among the most charming are those of Messrs. Hearn, Wright and Co., of Chatsworth Road, Lower Clapton, London, E. They are willing to supply as many thousand lamps as you might like to have in the shape of the Queen's head. There is many a worse way of showing your loyalty than by scattering Queens' heads with candles inside them promiscuously all over your back garden on the auspicious night.

A VERY DIFFERENT THING.

When a man has an attack of toothache, or sprains his ankle, or gashes his finger with a knife, he understands what ails him as well as the most eminent medical authority in the country would understand it. He may not be able to treat his trouble, but he knows what it is; and consequently suffers no mental anxiety arising from doubt and mystery.

But when he is overtaken by an illness which it is difficult or impossible to locate, which seems to affect half-a-dozen different parts of his body at once, so that he cannot say, "It is here," or "It is there," he is justified in apprehending something profound and serious. No wonder that under these circumstances Mr. Boorman could not tell what had come over him.

"In March, 1891," so runs his short account of it, "my health began to fail. I felt low, weak, and had no strength or energy. What had come over me I could not tell.

"I had a foul, horrid taste in my mouth, and no appetite. As soon as I had eaten, the food lay on my chest like lead. I was constantly spitting up a gaseous, sour fluid, and something would rise into my throat enough to choke me.

"I was much troubled with palpitation; my heart would thump and throb until I could scarcely bear it, and I had often to sit up in bed to ease the pain. I gradually got worse and worse until I was in a shocking state of weakness."

[If a person under such circumstances were to make up his mind he had what is called "heart disease," who could point the finger of ridicule at him for thinking so? If he were worried with apprehensions of sudden death from that cause, are you the man to say he was afraid of nothing? Not you, nor anybody else. And yet—— But let's have the rest of the letter.]

"I could hardly drag one leg before the other," continues Mr. Boorman, "and was so nervous that the least thing would startle me.

"I consulted a doctor, but his medicines did me no good, and in October (1891) I went to Bartholomew's Hospital, but was no better for their treatment. I afterwards went to the Bethnal Green Hospital, but with the same result. I had now got so low and weak that I despaired of ever getting better, and thought I was in a consumption.

"In January, 1892, I read of cases like mine having been cured by Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. I got a bottle of this medicine from Mr. Lucas, chemist, Talbot Road, and after taking it I found relief. I continued taking it, and in a month felt quite a different man.

"I could eat and the food gave me no pain; and slowly I gained strength. By-and-bye I was well and strong as ever, and have since kept in good health. Mother Seigel's Syrup has saved my life, and I wish others to know of it. You can publish this statement and refer anyone to me. (Signed) William Boorman, 61, Perry Street, Northampton, October 23rd, 1895."

What, then, was it that came over Mr. Boorman? In the light of the result, and the manner of the cure, I answer without hesitation —It was the dark foreshadow of the most common and the most dangerous disease known —indigestion, dyspepsia; the collapse of the body's power to keep itself up; the slipping from under him of the very foundation stones of his vitality. That was what had come over him.

Then why didn't he recognise it? Why didn't the doctors seem to recognise it? Why couldn't they "tell" what it was? Because it is the Prince of Deception, the counterfeit of all diseases outwardly, and the reality of all diseases inwardly. Because, having one nature, it has a hundred shifting symptoms. Its roots are in the stomach, and its branches run from head to heel.

When you feel the vague trouble that came over Mr. Boorman, recall these words and take Mother Seigel's Syrup, without waiting to wonder what ails you.

SHORT STORIES

No. 436.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending May 8th, 1897.

MY FRIEND MRS. MAWL.

Now this story has really nothing to do with me, but as I was mixed up in it a good deal, I think I might as well tell it. Nobody else is ever likely to, so here it starts:

You know the firm of Mawl, Butler and Co., don't you? Well, Mawl and I were great friends, we were educated together, and both fell in love with the same girl. Maizie Williams was her name, and very fond of her I was, but Mawl had a flourishing business, with offices in London and Paris, and was a tall, handsome fellow to boot—and she became Mrs. Mawl.

I don't blame her. She was passionately fond of gaiety, and my means would not have sufficed.

Mawl was one of those careless, good-natured, easy-going men who made friends everywhere, the very opposite to his partner Butler, who, with his green shifty eyes and red shaggy hair, somehow always reminded me of a fox. But he lived abroad, and rarely came to London, and so I saw little of him.

Mawl and his wife were a most devoted couple, despite the fact of her being a Catholic and he a Protestant. No matter how tired he was when he came home from business, he was always ready to take her to some theatre or gardens, and it was a wonder to me often how she could ceaselessly go the round of gaieties and never tire.

One evening I called at their house and found Mawl by himself. "Where is your wife?" I inquired.

"Don't you know that every so many months she goes into a convent and does penance for her sins?" he answered.

"I never knew that; since when has she done so?"

"Ever since we have been married. She asked me if she might, you know, when we were engaged, because her religion is rather against these dances and things that she goes to, and I couldn't very well refuse, although it is lonely here without her."

I thought the arrangement an odd one, and said:

"How long does she go for, and what does she do?"

"Goodness knows what she does. I never go with her. It is part of her penance to go by herself, and she visits the sick, or nurses in hospitals, or some such idea. It takes her about a month or six weeks sometimes to get through with it all."

"If I were you, Mawl, I'd get your wife to break out of that habit of going into hospitals. She might catch some illness, you know."

"I know, my dear chap, and I will try when she comes home. I expect her home to-morrow. She's at the 'Holy Sisters of the Sacred Heart,' in Paris, now, and I haven't heard from her for over a week, and then she always comes home."

"All right. I'll come in in a day or two, and see her when she has come back. Good-night!" and lighting my pipe, I strolled homeward to my lodgings.

It must have been a week afterwards that I suddenly ran into Mawl as I was going along the Strand. He looked intensely anxious and miserable, and passed by without noticing me; so I laid my hand on his arm and said: "Hullo! old chap, how are you?" He started as if I had been a ghost, then stared at me for a moment, and finally said:

"Have you anything to do?"

"Anything to do?" I repeated, surprised. "What do you mean?"

"I mean have you anything to do before Saturday?"

"Well, on Saturday, you know, I start for New York to see my sister married, but I have nothing to do until then. What's up?"

"Come in here," he said, drawing me into a café close by, "and I'll tell you."

We seated ourselves in a dark corner, and I ordered something. While I was speaking to the waiter I noticed Mawl's eyes were fixed upon me all the time in a speculative sort of way. He seemed as if he was trying to test me in some fashion.

"Now then!" I said presently.

"Well, it's like this," replied Mawl, lowering his voice. "My wife's gone!"

I stared at him in utter amazement.

"Yes—I believe I'm right—I got suspicious the night you left me—she had been away a much longer time than usual, and I wired the morning after to the convent to ask if she were still there. I got the answer that she had left more than a month, but sometimes called for letters. Now those were my letters. That was on Friday last. Well, late on Saturday I received a post-card, written in a disguised hand, which said: 'Your wife has been seen here, fetch her home at once—she is in great danger.' Now, I have been nearly mad since Saturday. I can't go myself, business is so bad that it would mean ruin if I left it for an hour. I have wired to Butler, but the fool is away as usual—he always is when I want him—and I know nobody I could trust with such a mission except you. Will you go to Paris to-night and find her?"

How could I refuse? I was singularly against acting the amateur private detective against my friend's wife, above all people; despite the fact that I knew his fears were groundless. It was only some religious freak that had caused Maizie to bury herself and her whereabouts in the great city of Paris.

"Why not tell the police?" I hazarded.

He shuddered. "No, I could not. The disgrace of such a thing would kill me. No; you go, for goodness' sake, and find her quietly, but whatever you do, don't send for the police unless it is absolutely necessary. I am so afraid she has been stolen or something, perhaps even worse. She is so innocent, and so lonely, that—oh, don't talk of it! I shall go mad if I don't find her!"

After this I decided to go, much as I disliked the undertaking, and next day found me in the gay city, wandering somewhat aimlessly about in search of the Convent of the Holy Sisters.

Down a dirty little back street and surrounded by high, grey stone walls, at last I found it. The Lady Superior knew Maizie well, she said; she frequently came and stayed there; "but never for more than a night or two," she added.

"And how long is it since you have seen her?" I asked.

The Lady Superior raised her hands. "Oh, a long time now," she said, "nearly a month. She left here to go and stay with her friends at Asnières, where she always goes."

I asked for the friends' name and address, but the good lady could tell me neither. She did not think she had ever heard the name.

I wired to Mawl for the information required, and his answer was to the effect that they had no friends living there, and he had no idea what I meant. So that clue was lost.

Next day I called upon Mr. Butler, the partner. He was still away, but expected back next day. I could do nothing, as Mawl had forbidden my going to the police, so I idly wandered about and wished myself well out of the whole business. It was a beautiful day, and having nothing better to do, I wandered into the Tuileries Gardens. The birds were singing and the flowers and trees in full leaf and blossom. In one corner I noticed a crowd of people, so strolling up, I wedged myself between to see what it was. It turned out to be a photographer taking pictures of the people, to be made into slides for the cinematographe. I stood and watched him, and when he had finished, he packed up his apparatus, and said to me: "You've come out well, sir—you were right in the middle all the time."

Next day I called on Butler again. He was very pleased to see me, and insisted on my having a whisky and soda and one of his famous cigars before he would hear a word about my errand. When, however, I told him what I was there for, his face fell.

He had seen nothing of her for nearly a month. She called on him one morning for some money, as she had done before, and gave him to understand that she was going to stay with some friends who lived out at Asnières, but who the friends were, or what was their address, he was unable to tell me.

I left him disheartened. Here was Friday morning, and no news of the missing woman.

I wired to Mawl, although I was sorry to have to do so. Some three hours afterwards I received his reply:

Wife returns home to-night: just had a wire.

I spent the rest of that day as I had done the previous ones—doing nothing, but I was heartily glad Mawl had got his wife back again, as I was myself beginning to be afraid that perhaps some terrible death had overtaken her in some unknown part of Paris, where she was in the habit of going on her errands of charity. Saturday morning I rose early. As I was at breakfast a telegram was handed to me; it ran thus:

Wife returned safely; many thanks and a pleasant voyage.—Mawl.

That was all. No explanation, no anything. Truly the ways of some men and women are difficult to understand.

* * * * *

It must have been nearly a year after these events, when I was seated in my hotel at Chicago, that I received two newspapers, one dated some two months previous, and one about a fortnight.

The old one contained the following announcement:

Mawl.—On the 26th inst., at Heather Villa, Hampstead, the wife of W. Mawl, of a son.

The second paper read thus:

Mawl.—On the 14th inst., at Hastings, of pneumonia, the belored wife of W. Mawl, of Hampstead, aged 26.

I felt the tears rise to my eyes. My poor little sweetheart to die such a cruel death and so young, too! and then the thought of the bereaved husband came to me, and I sat down and wrote to him a few poor, ill-expressed words, which but inadequately conveyed to him what I really felt.

* * * * *

I jumped into a cab at Charing Cross and told the man to drive me to my chambers in St. James' Street. Crossing Piccadilly we nearly ran over a man. It was Mawl! but, oh, how changed. His tall figure was wasted and bent, and his black hair plentifully streaked with grey. He looked an old man, though scarcely more than thirty-five. He seemed pleased to see me in a quiet, absent sort of way, and seemed surprised when I told him it was eighteen months since I had been in London. He told me also that he was bankrupt, which fact astonished me, until I learnt that Butler, his partner, had absconded and left enormous debts in Paris which were charged to the firm.

Thinking to draw him out of himself I took him to dine with me, and afterwards we went to the new music hall that had lately been opened in Leicester Square.

The programme was of the usual order of music halls, and nobody took any interest until the theatre was darkened for a display of the cinématographe.

I settled myself in my stall and vaguely wondered what views I should see.

Sure enough—the Tuileries Gardens and myself as the centre figure!

A laugh burst from me at sight of myself with my habitual vacant stare on my face. But the laugh was frozen at its birth, for just behind me, arm in arm and evidently in low converse, walked a man and a woman side by side right across the picture.

They were Mrs. Mawl and Butler the partner!

I heard a gasp beside me, and became conscious that Mawl had staggered to his feet and was blindly making his way out of the theatre. I was obliged to follow him although it was difficult work, as the place was in darkness. Silently we got into a cab, and he told the man to drive to his house.

"I want you to see the boy," he said briefly, when I looked at him in some surprise.

Silently he opened the house door, and lighting a small lamp led the way upstairs.

In a cot in the nursery lay all that belonged to him of his erring but dead wife.

He was a chubby, fat boy, slumbering happily, with the finest head of red hair I have ever seen on any child.

"Poor little brat," I heard Mawl say. "There is no one to look after you—except you," turning to me. "You will look after him, won't you?"

I silently clasped his hand, and we then went out.

That night he shot himself.

Two Soldiers' Wives

A Stirring Story of the "Terrible Year."

This extraordinary episode took place shortly after Bourbaki's defeat in the Eastern provinces. His decimated and exhausted army had, after a terrible campaign, taken refuge in Switzerland, the brevity of the struggle alone saving some hundred thousand men from certain death. Hunger, the fearfully cold weather, and the forced marches through the snow-covered mountain paths, had more particularly affected the francs-tireurs, thrown out as forlorn hopes, without tents or provisions, with the vanguard when it was advancing towards Belfort, or with the rear when it retreated in the direction of the Jura Mountains.

Our little troop—which, on the 1st of January, numbered twelve hundred men—had dwindled down to two-and-twenty emaciated, tattered scarecrows by the time we reached the Swiss territory. Here, at last, were rest and peace, and, greeted by the inhabitants with kindly sympathy, we received every care and attention.

Life seemed to spring afresh in us, and even those who before the war had been rich and happy, declared that creature comforts never seemed so precious till then. Just fancy, we ate every day and slept every night!

War, however, was still raging in the eastern district of France, which by some oversight had not been included in the armistice. Besançon continued to present a bold front to the enemy, who retaliated by devastating the Franche-Comté. Sometimes, indeed, we would hear that the Germans were close to the frontier, and we saw the Swiss troops hurriedly start off to keep a watchful cordon between them and us.

At last we grew weary at heart; and, as our health and strength returned, we longed to renew the struggle. It gave us a feeling of shame and irritation to know that yonder, not more than nine miles from us, our unhappy country was overrun by the Prussians, who roamed about as insolent conquerors, while we were, at the same time, protected and rendered helpless by our captivity.

One day, our captain called five or six of us aside, and spoke long and angrily about it. He was a fine fellow, formerly a non-commissioned officer in the Zouaves; he was a tall, wiry kind of man, hard as nails, and during the whole of the campaign had cut out plenty of work for the Germans.

He was eating his heart out at this inactivity, and could not resign himself to the idea that he was a prisoner, and unable to do anything more.

"Good Heavens!" he said to us, "can you remain quiet when you hear that the Uhlans are only two hours' march from here? Does not your blood boil at the thought of those wretches stalking about like masters in our mountains, when five thoroughly determined men could easily kill off a file every day? As for me, I cannot rest—I must go there."

"But, Captain, how can we get there?" we said.

"How?" he replied. "Oh, that's easy enough. We have often got out of the woods more closely guarded than these Swiss forests. The day you choose to go into France I'll manage to get you there—never fear."

"Of course," we rejoined, "we might pass; but what could we do in France without arms?"

"Without arms!" he retorted; "we shall find plenty over there."

"You forget the treaty," objected another. "We should run the risk of bringing trouble on the Swiss if Manteuffel hears they have let prisoners recross the frontier."

"Come, come," said the Captain, "all these are poor reasons. I want to go and kill some Prussians, that's all I know. You do not want to; very well—only say so at once. I can go alone; I don't need anybody."

We protested; but as it was impossible to make the Captain change his mind, it ended by our promising to accompany him. We were too much attached to him to abandon him, for he never failed us in our need; so the expedition was decided upon.

The Captain had a plan that he had been cogitating for some time past. He got a friendly farmer to lend him a cart and five peasants' costumes. Two of us were then stowed away in a couple of chests in the vehicle, straw was thrown over us, and the whole laden with Gruyère cheeses which were supposed to go to be sold in France. The Captain, dressed up as a carter, told the sentinels that he was taking a couple of friends with him to protect his goods in case of robbers, and there seemed nothing out of the way in this precaution.

A Swiss officer appeared to cast a knowing look at the cart, but that was merely to impress his men. In reality, neither the officer nor the soldiers had any suspicion of the truth.

"Gee-up," cried the Captain, cracking his whip, and our three men calmly smoked their pipes and chatted together in the country dialect. Meanwhile I was half smothered in my box.

Digitized by Google

"Gee-up," again cried the Captain, as the cheese-cart entered French territory.

The Prussians' lines were very badly kept, the enemy relying on the watchfulness of the Swiss. The Prussian sergeant spoke Northern German, our Captain the German dialect of the Swiss cantons, so they did not understand each other. The sergeant, however, pretended to understand, and allowed us to pass on. At last, as night fell, after seven hours of this strange journeying, we reached a small, half-ruined village in the Jura.

What was going to become of us? The Captain's whip was our only weapon, our clothes the peasants' smocks, and our sole food Gruyère cheese. We were rich in ammunition, for we had concealed some packets of cartridges in the middle of the big cheese, and had about a thousand, that is, two hundred shots apiece. But we required guns.

Luckily the Captain was both ingenious and daring, and his plans were well laid. While three of our party remained hidden in a cellar of the village, he and the other man went on in the direction of Besançon. The town, it was true, was invested; but it is an easy matter to enter a city situated in a mountainous country, by following the plateaux till within about fifteen miles of the walls, and then going on foot through the paths and ravines.

At Ormans, in the midst of the Prussian lines, they abandoned the cart, and in the night gained the heights above the river Doubs. The next morning they reached Besançon. There they found plenty of arms, and the commanding officer, General Roland, highly approving the Captain's daring adventure, gave him six rifles and uniforms and wished him good luck.

The Captain also found there his wife, for she had made the previous campaign with us, and had only been prevented following Bourbaki's retreat by an acute attack of illness. Now she had completely recovered her strength, and, notwithstanding the wretchedly cold weather and the numberless privations that were to be expected, she insisted on leaving the town with her husband. He was obliged to consent, and, accompanied by his wife and our comrade, started off at once. The return journey was most hazardous; they had to travel by night, in order to avoid meeting anyone, for the possession of six rifles would have aroused suspicion. After an absence of eight days the Captain and his two companions rejoined us, and our campaign began in earnest.

The very first night of his return, the Captain began proceedings. Under pretence of reconnoitring the country, he went down to the high road. I must mention that the village, which served as our fortress, consisted of a small cluster of poor, ill-built houses that had long been abandoned. They were situated on the summit of a deep plateau, surrounded by thick woods; the inhabitants were in the habit of cutting the wood and sliding it in large blocks down the abrupt slopes, called coulées, that run down to the plain, where it was placed in heaps, and twice a year sold to the contractors. Two huts, or, rather, small inns on the highway, marked the spot where the sales took place, and it was to this place that the Captain had gone down by one of the coulées.

We were on the look-out at the top of the ravine, and he had been absent about half an-hour, when we were startled by the report of a gun. The Captain had left strict orders that we were not to move unless we heard his bugle, so, notwithstanding our cruel state of anxiety, we felt obliged to wait motionless, with our rifles ready. A mortal hour passed, but not another sound reached us, not even a rustle in the copse. The Captain's wife grew terribly impatient; what could he be doing? Why did he not summon us? Was that an enemy's shot? Had it wounded or killed our chief, her husband?

These and many other were the questions we exchanged. We did not know what to think. As for me, I thought that either he must be dead, or his expedition prospering. I was only curious and anxious to know what he had done. Suddenly, a sharp, ringing blast resounded; but, to our intense surprise, instead of rising from below, it came from the village behind us. What could this mean? We all had the same idea. Evidently the Captain had been killed, and the Prussians were sounding his bugle to draw us into a trap. We, therefore, cautiously wended our way towards the houses, step by step, finger on trigger, hiding in the brushwood as we advanced.

The Captain's wife, however, in spite of our entreaties, dashed forward into the open, fixing the bayonet on her gun, for she fancied she would have to revenge her husband's death. We lost sight of her at the very moment when a second blast burst forth, and a few minutes later we heard her call out:

"Come on, come on; he is alive—it is he!"

We hurried forward, and at the entry of the village were met by the Captain, smoking his pipe: but, strange to say, he was now on horseback.

"Well," he said, "you see something can be done here. I am mounted now; I shot a Uhlan and took possession of his horse. There was a small troop of them at the inn, probably guarding the high road, but they were feasting and drinking freely. The sound of their voices guided me; the sentry at the door had not even time to see me before I made daylight through him, and, jumping on his horse, I dashed off, followed by eight or ten in hot pursuit. However, I took some cross-paths, and here I am, you see, only a bit scratched and torn. Now, lads, we must look out; those fellows won't rest till they find us, and we must greet them with bullets; each man to his post."

One man was placed as an advanced sentinel at some distance from the village, I was put at the entry of the street, the two others and the Captain and his wife occupying the centre of the village, near the church, the little belfry serving as watch-tower and fortress.

We had not long taken up our positions when we heard a shot, followed by another, then two, then three reports. The first was evidently from a chassepot; it could easily be recognised by the sharp crack, like that of a whip. The three others proceeded from the cavalry rifles used by the Uhlans.

The Captain was furious; he had given strict orders to the advance-post to allow the enemy to pass, and only to follow them if they came on in the direction of the village, and to rejoin me when the little troop should be closed in between the houses. Then we should have got them between two fires, and not one would have escaped.

"The devil take Piédelot," said the Captain; "the idiot has put them on the alert, and they won't dare to come on. Besides, I am sure he has managed to get hit, for we don't hear him call, nor return their shots. He has only got his deserts; he ought to have obeyed orders." Then, after a moment's pause, he muttered in his beard. "Poor fellow, he is so plucky, and shoots so well."

The Captain's conjecture proved true. We waited till evening, but no Uhlans put in an appearance. They had evidently withdrawn after the first attack.

Digitized by Google

Unfortunately, we did not see anything of Piédelot—was he a prisoner, or dead? When it was dark, the Captain proposed to go and reconnoitre, and three of us started. At the place where the sentry had been posted we found blood, a broken gun, and the ground very trampled, showing that there had been a desperate struggle; but, although we searched the brushwood around, we could find neither wounded nor dead. We returned at midnight, without any news of the unhappy comrade.

"It is very strange," growled the Captain. "They must have killed him and hid him in the underbrush. It is impossible that he should have escaped. He would have called for help. I cannot make it out."

As he was speaking, a great red glare rose up in the direction of the inn on the high-road, and lit up the sky.

"Blackguardly cowards!" he screamed; "I'll wager that to revenge themselves they have set fire to the sale-houses. And then they will sneak off; one man killed and two houses burnt satisfies them. But we won't let them off so cheap. Come, my men, we will force them to leave their bonfire, and fight."

"If only we could rescue Piédelot at the same time, what luck it would be," said one of the men.

We started off, all five of us, full of anger and hope. In twenty minutes we had slidden down the coulée, and were within a hundred yards of the inn. The fire was at the back of the house, and the lurid glare over the roof was alone visible. We were advancing slowly, fearful lest we should fall into a trap, when we heard Piédelot's well-known voice. It sounded strange, hoarse, and loud, stifled and, at the same time sharp, as if he were screaming with all his might, while his mouth was stuffed full of rags! He seemed to be groaning and wheezing out the words, "Help! help!"

We cast prudence to the winds, and in two bounds were behind the inn. An appaling sight met our gaze.

Piédelot was being roasted alive! Fastened to the centre of one of the piles of wood, collected there by the foresters, he writhed in agony, while the flames licked him with their sharp tongues. To knock down the pile, scatter the firebrands, and cut his bonds, was but the work of a moment.

Poor fellow, what a condition he was in! His left arm had been broken, and he looked as if he had been beaten and thrashed all over. his whole body was so swollen, so black, so covered with blood.

Poor, poor Piédelot! How we longed to avenge him. How we thirsted for the blood of those villainous Prussians. But they had disappeared, leaving only their crime behind them. Meanwhile, the Captain's wife did her best to dress his wounds. After a few minutes he recovered consciousness.

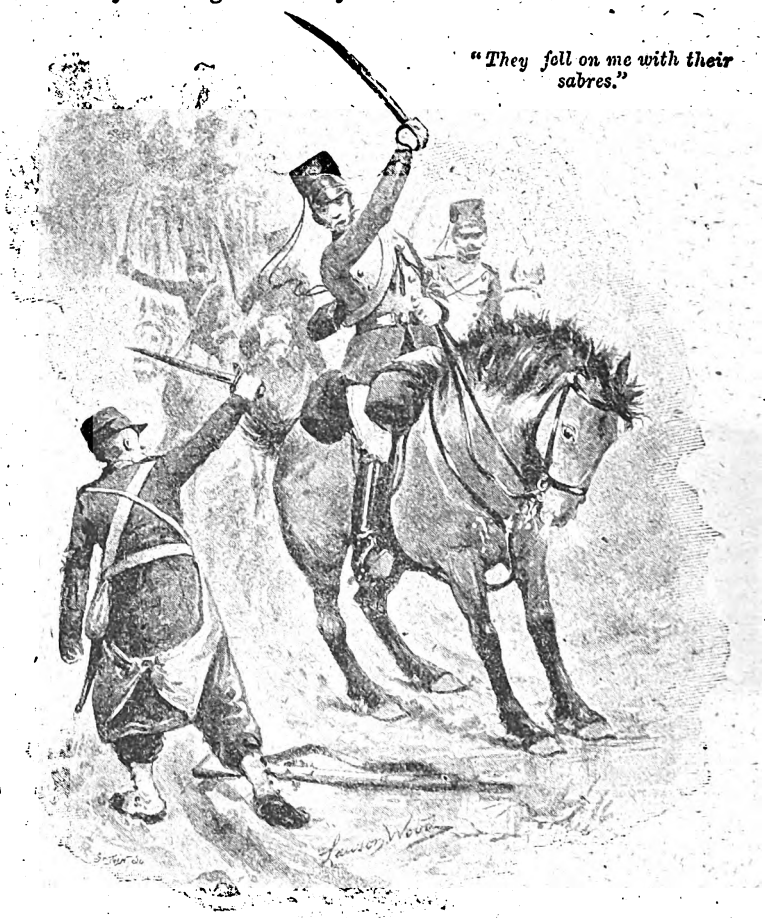
"Ah, Captain, is it you?" he murmured, and then he burst out: "Ah, the blackguards, the wretches. Twenty of them came to surprise us!"

"Twenty?" said the Captain.

"Yes; a whole gang of them! That is why I disobeyed orders, Captain, and fired on them. They would have killed you all, so I preferred stopping them. That frightened them, and they did not dare advance any further, they are such cowards. Four of them fired at me twenty yards, as if at a target; then they fell on me with their sabres. My arm was broken, and I could only use my bayonet with one hand."

"But why did you not call for help?"

"I took care not to. You would have come, and would not have been able to defend me nor yourselves—five against twenty."



"They fell on me with their sabres."

"You know very well," replied the Captain, "we should not have allowed you to be taken prisoner."

"I preferred that only one should be killed. I did not want to draw you there; it would have been madness."

"Well, well, we won't talk of that any more. Do you feel any easier, now?"

"No," said poor Piédelot, "I am choking. I know I can't live. The wretches tied me to a tree, and beat me, and wrung my broken arm till I fainted. But I did not scream; I would have bitten off my tongue sooner than cry out before them. Now, with you round me, I can say how I suffer; I can cry, and it does me good. Thank you, my dear friends, thank you."

"Poor Piédelot, we will avenge you."

"Oh, yes, I am quite willing you should do that. There is a woman among them—the wife of the fellow the Captain killed yesterday. She is dressed like an Uhlan, and she is the most cruel of them all. It was she who proposed roasting me, and she herself set fire to the wood. Oh, the brute—what pain—oh, my back, my arm!"

He fell down, gasping and writhing in a terrible agony. The Captain's wife wiped the perspiration from his brow; we cried like children with rage and despair.

I cannot relate the end. He died in about half-an-hour. But before he expired, he told us in which direction the Prussians had gone. We hurriedly buried him, and dashed away in furious pursuit of them.

"We will throw ourselves into the middle of the Prussian army, if it is necessary," said the Captain, "but we will avenge Piédelot. Let us swear to die sooner than let those fellows escape. If I am killed these are my orders—all prisoners taken, not excepting the woman, are to be shot on the spot."

"Not the woman," said the Captain's wife; "if you survive you will never shoot a woman, I know. But if you die in this attempt I will fight her single-handed, and kill her myself. If she kills me you may do what you like with her."

"We will roast her—tear her to pieces!" the others exclaimed. "Piédelot shall be avenged! Eye for eye, tooth for tooth!"

And with this we set off.

The next morning we fell unawares on an outpost of Uhlans, some twelve miles distant. Surprised by our sudden attack, they were unable to get to their horses or even to defend themselves, and, in a few minutes, we made all five prisoners The Captain examined them. From their answers we felt sure these were our fellows, and when we discovered one of them was a woman—the female torturer who martyred our comrade—we were savagely delighted. The four men were at once dispatched.

Then we discussed what should be the woman's fate. I must confess that we all wanted to shoot her, for hatred and thirst for revenge had deadened all pity in our hearts. We forgot we were going to kill a woman. It was a woman—the Captain's wife—who recalled us to our senses, and, by her advice, it was decided to keep the Uhlan's wife a prisoner.

Poor woman, she little guessed how cruelly she was to be punished for her pity.

The following day we learnt that the armistice was extended to the eastern district, and that we were therefore obliged to put an end to our little campaign. Two of our men, who belonged to that part of the country, went back to their homes, and only four remained, the the Captain, his wife, and two men. We came from Besançon, which, notwithstanding the armistice, was still beseiged.

"Let us remain here," said the Captain; "I cannot believe that the war will end like this. There are still brave men in France, thank Heaven, and it will soon be spring. The armistice is but a trap laid for the Prussians; in the meantime, another army will be got together, and some fine day we shall fall on the enemy. Then we shall be ready, and we have hostages; let us remain here." So we took up our winter quarters. The weather was terribly cold, and we hardly went out of doors.

Someone was always obliged to mount guard over the Uhlan's wife. She was very gloomy, and hardly spoke, except to lament her husband, whom our Captain had killed. She always cast angry glances at him, and we saw the thirst for vengeance that tortured her. It seemed to us a just punishment for the hideous tortures she had inflicted on Piédelot. Impotent revenge is a terrible grief.

Alas! we, who had known how to avenge our comrade, ought to have realised that this woman would know how to avenge her husband, and we ought to have been on our guard. It is true that at night one of us watched her, and at first the prisoner was bound by a long cord to an old oak bench fastened into the wall. But, little by little, notwithstanding her silent hatred, as she had never tried to escape, our vigilance relaxed, and she was allowed to lie down without being tied. There was nothing to fear, she was at the further end of the room, a man mounted guard at the door, and between her and the sentry the Captain's wife and the two other men slept. Besides she was unarmed and alone against four, it really seemed as if there could be no danger.

One night, while we slept, the Captain being on guard and the woman quietly crouched in her corner, seeming calmer than usual—indeed, she had that day smiled for the first time since her captivity—we were suddenly awakened by a terrific scream.

We jumped up, and, groping about, stumbled over a couple of bodies that were rolling and struggling desperately on the ground. It was the Captain and the Uhlan's wife. We threw ourselves on them, and the succeeded in parting them. The woman was laughing horribly, while the Captain seemed to be gasping. All this took place in the dark. Two of us held the prisoner down. At last we got a light, and then we saw, to our horror, the Captain lying in a pool of blood, with an enormous gash in his throat. His sword-bayonet had been plucked from his gun and stuck in the throat. A few minutes later, without having been able to utter a word, he died.

His wife did not shed a tear; she seemed choked, and, looking at the woman with a calm ferocity that was appalling, she stammered out:

"This woman belongs to me. You swore a week ago to let me kill her in my own way if she killed my husband; you must keep your word. Fasten her firmly in the fireplace, and stand her up at the back of the hearth, then you may go where you like, far away. I will take my own revenge. Leave the Captain's body. We will stay here, we three—he, she, and I."

We silently obeyed her and went away. She promised to write to us at Geneva, whither we were going.

Two days later I received the following letter, dated the day after our departure, and written from the old inn on the high road:

My Dear Friend,—I write to you, according to my promise. I am at the present moment at the inn, where I have just handed over my prisoner to a Prussian officer.

I must tell that the poor woman has left two little children behind her in Germany. She, too, had followed her husband, to whom she was deeply attached, unwilling to let him expose himself alone to the chances of war. She had left the children with their grandfather.

I have known this since yesterday, and this knowledge has changed my thoughts of vengeance to more humane ones. While I was insulting this woman, foretelling her the torments I was about to inflict on her, recalling to her poor Piédelot's fate, and preparing the same torturing death for her, she gazed coldly at me, and said:

"What have you to reproach me with, Frenchwoman? You think you are doing right in avenging your husband, do you not?"

"Certainly," I replied.

"Well, in killing him, I did what you are going to do in burning me. I avenged my husband, whom your husband killed."

"Then," I retorted, "as you approve of vengeance, prepare to submit to it."

"I do not fear it," she answered.

And, in truth she did not seem to lose courage. Her countenance was serene, and she watched without a tremour while I piled up the wood and dry leaves, and feverishly poured powder from the cartridges to hasten the fire. For one moment I hesitated. But the Captain lay there, ghastly and bloody, looking at me with wide open, glassy eyes. I kissed his pale lips and returned to my work.

Raising my head unexpectedly, I saw that the woman was weeping. I was astonished.

"Oh, you are frightened," I said.

"No," she answered; "but when I saw you kiss your husband, I thought of mine, and all those I love."

She sobbed aloud; then she stopped abruptly, and said, in a faltering, almost inaudible voice:

"Have you any children?"

I quivered all over, for I well understood by her question that this poor woman was a mother. She asked me to look in a pocket-book that was in her breast-pocket. There were two photographs of little children, a boy and a girl, with the good, gentle little chubby faces of German children. There were, also, two fair curls and a letter written in big, awkward letters, beginning with the German word Mütterchen.

I could not restrain my tears. I unfastened her bonds, and, without daring to cast a look at my poor dead husband left there unavenged, I came down with her to this inn. She is free. I have just parted from her, and she cried as she bade me good-bye. I am now returning to my poor husband, to my dead love. Come as soon as possible, and fetch our two bodies. . . .

I started off in all haste. When I reached the village, I found a Prussian patrol guarding the little house. I inquired what had taken place, and was told that a captain of francs-tireurs and his wife lay dead there. I gave their names, proved that I knew them, and asked to be allowed to bury them.

I inquired what had taken place.

"Some one has already undertaken their burial," was the reply; "but you may go in if you choose, as you knew them. You can settle with their friend about the funeral."

I went in. The Captain and his wife lay on a bed side by side, covered with a sheet. I raised it gently, and saw that the wife had inflicted on herself the same wound that had killed her husband.

By the bedside, watching and weeping, was the person who had been mentioned to me as their friend.

It was the Uhlan's wife. H. P. B.

SKIPPER SIM.

Simson was only a middle-aged City clerk, of no particular attractions or accomplishments. He had passed his entire life amid the most humdrum surroundings, but the man's soul rose above them, and he lived a second life in the sphere of his own imagination.

This imagination of Simson's was only equalled by his ardent patriotism. He simply revelled in day-dreams, and was for ever picturing himself in all sorts of heroic attitudes and situations, invariably resulting in the advantage of his country.

He did not look the part of an ideal hero. In person he was short and thick, not to say stumpy; but under his eminently respectable waistcoat beat a heart of no ordinary dimensions, and his round face, fringed with its mutton-chop whiskers, though hardly of heroic mould, was of unusual kindliness.

Simson's life had been singularly uneventful, and the opportunity to distinguish himself, to make his name a synonym for conspicuous bravery, had never arrived. He had attempted to stop a runaway horse, be it admitted at peril of his life, but the playful animal swerved and butted Sim into a miniature lake of rich mud which the road-sweepers had considerately left. The only result was that Sim was severely reprimanded for his late arrival at the office.

On another occasion he beheld a stalwart specimen of the British working man belabouring his better-half at the road side. Simson's blood boiled; he dashed to the rescue, but while pluckily tackling the man, he felt himself assailed in the rear, and as he scorned to hit a woman, received a number of unmerited wounds at the hands of the very lady he had attempted to assist, and who thus indignantly repudiated his interference with "'er old man."

Sim bore the marks of the fray for weeks, but preserved a troubled silence when chaffed on the subject, for, alas, his wounds were not in front.

Fate, and the conversation of young Travers, who passed most of his spare time in a small boat, sailing over the broad reaches of the lower Thames, at length proved too much for Sim.

His long-looked-for opportunity would not come, so he decided to make one, and, with the determination which marks the great man, uprooted himself from the "digs" which he had occupied for fifteen years, and, in tow of young Travers, set out for a semi-marine watering-place within an hour's rail of the office.

As he himself said: "Was not the sea an Englishman's birthright? Was not every Briton a sailor born? And, if young Travers could sail a boat, why not he—Simson?"

Our hero, it must be admitted, did not make a very promising début as a British seafaring man. On the first Saturday afternoon he went afloat there was a brisk breeze blowing. Sim was adjured by his companions to "get out of the light before he hurt himself."

Sim attempted to expostulate, but his voice quavered, and he finally subsided into the scuppers, where he came to the conclusion that life was not worth living even for a Briton. Towards evening the breeze died away, and the little craft stole peacefully over the water, unconscious of her former vagaries.

Simson's spirits returned, and he even informed his companions in stirring song that "many a stormy wind should blow 'ere Jack came home again!" Sim's christian-name was Joshua, but that is a digression.

The rest of the boat's crew, of whom Travers was one, welcomed the change in their companion. They cheered him on by voice and gesture, and even pressed stimulant on him, as they said, to avoid the consequences of his former indisposition. Simson graciously accepted their offer, and his mood passed from the despairing to the hilarious.

On returning to the club-house he was hailed as the hero of the evening; his health was frequently drunk, and he returned thanks as often with increasing cordiality, till at length a certain sense of weakness in the knees precluded his rising any more. It was then determined to escort him to his new diggings, and accordingly, throned in a club arm-chair and draped in a billiard table-cover, he was borne forth, informing the world at large that "he was a pirate king, ha! ha!"

From time to time after this the faint echo of his exploits reached the office. Occasionally he himself turned up on the Monday, his honest face bronzed with the wind and sun of his Sunday cruise, bearing a little memento in the shape of a battered hand or a crushed finger-nail; for if ever a man had the faculty of damaging himself without provocation, that man was Sim. If the wind rose in the night, and the morning discovered some unfortunate craft parted from her moorings, and stranded high and dry, Sim had moored her. If the club were cruising, and a black squall swept down and left some vessel capsized or dismasted, the portly form of Sim might be descried struggling furiously to remedy the mishap. The times the man went overboard were without number, and regularly every Sunday the club front was thronged with loungers waiting to see him take his weekly header.

He would go on board in a semi-piratical garb, his good-natured face struggling between a desire to grin, and a determination not to appear ridiculous for once, and the effect was heightened by a red cotton nightcap which crowned his bald head.

His craft was a half-decked boat of about two tons, named the Briton's Pride, and climbing into her with a fearful loss of dignity, he would proceed clumsily and laboriously to overhaul his gear before setting sail.

Then come several loud words of command, and the mainsail of the Briton's Pride soars majestically aloft, but not for long. A smart crack, a laugh this time from the loungers, and the folds of the fallen mainsail are violently agitated over the struggling skipper, who invariably managed to be under anything that fell.

Presently a prolonged shout of laughter from club-house and pier tells that Sim, with his habitual ill-luck, has missed his footing and toppled overboard, and the grinning lad, who acts as first-mate, is seen making prods with a boat-hook at his commander, who flounders helplessly alongside.

But in spite of duckings and bruised fingers, Sim was never known to turn back, but always managed to get afloat, and stay there in weather which drove many of the younger men to the comforts of the billiard-room. As the summer wore on, his cruising mania became more pronounced, and in proportion to his progress, he became more ambitious. Great was the astonishment at the club one Saturday evening when the squat form of the Briton's Pride was no longer to be seen at her moorings.

For twenty-four hours she was absent, and the club-men were seriously thinking of chartering a tug for a Simson's relief expedition when the familiar craft was discerned returning in the shade of night. Nothing could equal the pride of her owner who had managed to cram enough adventure into his cruise to furnish several Arctic expeditions.

From that day he hesitated no longer, and many a perilous voyage did he make to far-distant Whitstable with its leagues of mud; Herne Bay knew him, and the watches of the Foreland had seen his sail in the darkness of the night; and, oh! the pride of the man! The tales he told, and the vivid anecdotes that went the round of the office, when a solid ink-bottle stood for the Nore light, and the day-book represented the Swatch Channel, mistrusted of mariners.

Daily Sim grew more marine in flavour, persisted in wearing salt-stained serge in the City, and asked the young lady behind the bar for salt junk in his mid-day sandwich; well did his subordinates know that bellow of "All hands on deck!" for it meant that their leisure was finished and their skipper had his weather eye lifting.

Yet the cup of his happiness was not full. The elderly mariner with whom Sim lodged had spent many years in the sea-borne coal-trade, and many adventures had befallen him, so many that Sim never came to the end of them or heard the same story twice.

Did he attempt to tell of that nasty sea he encountered off the Chapman Head, straightway the ancient would plunge into a tale of some terrible hurricane which had burst on him in Yarmouth Roads "seven year ago come Christmas," and Sim could not choose but hear the yarn; but these periods of enforced attention only strengthened Sim's determination to do and dare himself, and this grew to a conviction which nothing could shake.

So the summer wore on, the autumn waned, and the butterfly yachts were dismantled one by one, and laid on the mud or towed to some quiet creek for the winter. But Simson could not tear himself from his favourite pursuit, and, in spite of warnings, continued his week-end cruises in fair weather or foul.

One Sunday morning he and young Travers put to sea in the Briton's Pride, taking with them an ample lunch, fishing-tackle, and Sim's lifebuoy.

The weather was fair at starting, but at mid-day a black east wind sprung up, clouding the sky with heavy mirk, and in half-an-hour the whole face of nature was changed, and the white horses were being driven sullenly against the strong tide, while along the shore the sea-birds croaked their dismal note of warning.

The dusk shut down, the Nore light threw its lurid gleam ever and anon across the troubled water, but there were no signs of Skipper Sim or the Briton's Pride. As yet, the club-men felt no particular anxiety at his prolonged absence, as there were many creeks and inlets along the coast where a small craft could find shelter if caught in a sudden gale, but a spirit of restlessness was abroad in the club, which prompted the most composed of members to tap at the barometer, and wander aimlessly to and from the windows overlooking the sea.

One sallow youth commenced a joke at the expense of the absent skipper, and was completely crushed by the fierceness with which his attempt was repressed. Old Scales started on one of his long-winded yarns of the days when he was "first luff" of H.M.S. Rocket, and at the end of a few minutes was astonished to find himself absolutely without an audience.

A door banged angrily, and a gust of damp wind swept through the smoke-laden room, a heavy footstep fell on the stair, and every member started to his feet expecting and fearing he knew not what. Into the room there lurched a smacksman in streaming oilskins, half supporting, half carrying a young man in the last stage of exhaustion, and this was the spruce and self-possessed Travers—this pale and bedraggled object, open-eyed with horror and gasping for breath.

A dozen hands helped him into a chair, and he sat helpless, the salt water streaming from his shivering limbs and forming a pool on the oilcloth. The men crowded round, anxiously questioning, but the lad could not answer till they forced brandy between his chattering teeth. "What had happened?"—"Where was old Sim?"

Travers groaned, and hid his face in his hands. "Oh, Heavens!" he sobbed, "I don't know; I'm afraid he's gone—he saved me!" and subsided into feeble crying.

There was an instant hush, an incredulous, nervous glance from one to another, then the questions broke out afresh, and the smacksman, who stood stolidly by, was the recipient of many—"Where had he found this gentleman?"—"What did he know of this?" There was a babel of voices, and each keen with anxiety; then the sonorous tones of Scales demanding silence.

The smacksman, sou'-wester in hand, passed a blackened, sinewy hand across his bushy beard, still glistening with the drops of spray, and in a gruff voice told what he knew.

"I was a-lyin' off the bank, waitin' for the tide. It had come over very dirty, and a strong squall was just a-passin', when I heerd a voice somewheres not fifty yards away. I sings out and heerd him again. 'Help!' he says; 'there's a yacht sunk and a man drownin'. Send a boat!' 'All right,' I says; 'whereaway?' But I couldn't rightly catch what he said; his voice was feeble and chokin'. Me and my mate launches the boat and tumbles in. Just then we hears the chap sing out again: 'Help! There's a man drownin' astern of you!'

"We made for him first, but when we got to where we judged the voice came from, we couldn't see nowt—he'd gone sure! so after a bit we pulls astern of the smack and finds this young chap in a life-belt, he axed us to fetch him here." With a shuffle of heavy boots and a sad shake of the head the fisherman finished. "Good Heavens! it can't be!" broke from the crowd. "Let's go and look for him!" But Travers looked up. "It's no use, you fellows," he said, shaking his head wearily: "we searched well before we came ashore. The poor chap had on sea-boots and oilskins, and made me take the life-belt while he swam for help, it was the only chance for me!"

They fetched dry clothes and blankets, and propped the lad up before the fire. He went on to tell in choking tones what every man dreaded to hear; how they had been caught in the gale off the Mouse Light.

For hours they had tried to beat back, with the boat half full of ice-cold water, and their blood nearly frozen in their veins. Simson had steered, while Travers handled the jib-sheets and tried to bale the water out, but the lad got paralysed with the cold, and his pluck failed him.

Again and again he gave up with the icy clutch of death on his heart, but each time the elder man cheered him up with voice and example. So they sailed on in the gathering darkness, old Sim doing the work of six men with a smile on his face, while Travers only begged that they might give up and get it over, and he did not spare himself in his recital.

"The cold got to my very bones, and how Sim suffered I can't tell you, for he forced on me every drop of the whisky, said he did not feel the cold, and, greedy brute that I was, I took it. At last we shipped a green sea, then another before we could bale, and the boat sank without rising to a third. I went down with her, and oh! the cold of that water. I didn't feel like struggling much, but Sim got me by the collar and put the life-belt over my head. He said he could see lots of smacks' lights, and they'd be sure to pick us up; but we were drifting further out to sea, out to certain death, when we passed a smack near—it was the last one.

"Sim told me to stick to the life-belt and keep up a good heart, while he started to fetch help. He gripped my hand, poor old boy, before he left me, for we both knew it was touch-and-go! I heard him hail the smack twice, his voice was feeble and the tide terribly strong, but they heard and answered him. Again I heard him clearly: 'It's all right, Travers!' then 'Good-bye!'"

J. R. Bagshawe.

Mrs. Smith's Jewels.

I was seated in my rooms one day in mid June, when Sergeant Drew, of the Scotland Yard Police, entered. I was not at all surprised, as we were on very friendly terms, and scarcely a week passed without my seeing him. On that particular day he seemed so full of importance that he almost forgot to shake hands.

"What's up?" I said, when the usual formula concerning the weather had been gone through, with little interest on either side, it must be confessed.

"Oh, a very interesting case has come under my notice, that is all," he explained, with dignified and pompous condescension.

I knew that he expected me to ask him about it, and I performed this duty with a langour fully justified by the heat. It needed no more to set him off, and he related his tale at an unmerciful length. After the first few sentences, I found it sufficiently interesting to keep me awake, which is saying a good deal.

"This morning," he began, "at about ten minutes to ten, a man came into the office in great terror. He said that he wanted police protection. I examined him carefully—you must allow that I am no bad judge of character—and I must confess that he impressed me favourably. He was between thirty-five and forty years old, and in build was slight. His complexion was freckled, and his straw-coloured hair hung limply about a face pale with terror. From his dress I judged him to be American, and it proved that I was right, as usual.

"'Against whom do you desire protection?' I queried.

"'Against—against my widow,' he stammered, 'and—and her husband.'

"'My good sir,' I said, 'I am afraid you are mentally deranged. Pray compose yourself.'

"'If you will allow me,' he said, 'I'll explain what I mean, but you must promise me not to use what I may tell you now as evidence against me at any future time.'

"I gave the promise, being very curious.

"'You see, it was in this way,' began the man, 'ten years ago I was married in the States to a Miss Groatson, and we lived together for more than five years. But we were gradually getting deeper and deeper into debt, and at last I made up my mind to leave her, and do the best I could for myself. I was dead sick of it all. I left a note telling her that I was about to commit suicide; I made off with all the ready money I could raise. Well, she believed me readily enough, and in less than two months she married again.

"'This time it was a Mr. Smith. They lived together for two or three years, unaware of my existence.'

"I here thought it my duty to put in a word of reproof.

"'You acted most reprehensibly,' I said, 'in allowing them to marry when you were alive.'

"'Well, you see, I didn't know they were married until they had been living together for above two years. I learnt it afterwards. I adopted an alias, and lived quietly enough in Philadelphia, having got a situation as stage manager at a pretty good theatre.

"'Well, it happened one day that I had to go on to the boards before a crowded house to announce the delay of some star or other. In the very front row I saw my wife and her second husband. I judged from their dress that they were very well-to-do, and I determined I would have something out of them before long. They did not recognise me in the glare of the footlights. I sent a boy to follow them home, and he brought me word that they were staying at the Adelphi. The next day I went to see Smith, and told him I'd go to Europe and keep the fact of my existence a secret if he would give me £100,000.

"'He said:

"'"Look here, there is to be no blackmailing this time. Either you'll take your passage money and go, you scoundrel, or we'll fight."

"'He touched his pistol significantly, and, being a bit timid myself, I'd really no choice but to accede to his first proposal. He handed me over enough for a second class passage—the shabby dog—and I left.

"'I determined I would be revenged, so I thought out a scheme. I waited until the day before that on which my steamship was to sail, and then I went to the hotel and watched Smith and my wife out. Then I went in, and boldly asked for Mrs. Smith.

"'"She's gone out," said the waiter; "will you wait?"

"'I said that I would, and the man showed me into a well-furnished room.

"'"Look here," I said, slipping half-a-dollar into his hand, "I've particular reasons for not wishing Mr. Smith to see me. Can you put me anywhere where you are sure that he won't come?"

"'"Only in the lady's bedroom, sir."

"'"That will do as well as anywhere else," I said. "I'll answer for it that she won't be offended."

"'"This way, then," he said, and led me to it.

"'When he had left me I looked around, and saw, as I had hoped, a small morocco-covered box on the dressing-table. I saw it was a jewel-case, so I slipped it as it was into the pocket of the overcoat I wore, and after waiting for a few minutes, I went quietly off, and the next day sailed for Europe. I trusted that the fear of a scandal would prevent Smith from making any attempt to recover the jewels. I opened the box in the cabin the day after we had sailed, and found, as I had supposed, that it contained gems to all appearances very valuable.

"'I had nowhere to keep it except in a locked cash-box on my dressing table, so you will believe that I was very anxious. All went well, however, and we arrived at Liverpool in safety. I determined to go straight on to London, so that very night I left Liverpool. I dared not trust the jewels in my trunk, but carried them in my portmanteau into the railway carriage—a second-class.

"'To my surprise one of my fellow passengers from America got into the same compartment. He was my only companion. We talked together for a few minutes, and then I fell into a doze. When I awoke, my companion and the portmanteau were both gone!

"'I was wild, you may imagine, but I dared not apply to the police. The thing that made me come to you happened after I had got to London. I was looking at the shops in the Strand one day when a boy gave me this and ran away.'

"He gave it to me," said Sergeant Drew, and this was it:

If you do not send the jewels to me at the Metropolitan Hotel, Piccadilly, before to-morrow night, you will discover that the pistol is as powerful a weapon in London as it is in Philadelphia.

H. Smith.

"The man continued," went on the Sergeant, "to say that two days had passed since he had received the note, and he could bear his fears no longer; he could not sleep for fear of attack, and as for going out at night, he should as soon think of flying. He appealed to me for protection, and I felt that he had come to the right man. I sent him home under the surveillance of a policeman, and then came to you for advice. He wants me to go to the Metropolitan, and explain matters to Mr. Smith. He thinks, that I, being an officer of the law, should be believed."

"Do you think that the man is speaking truth when he says that the jewels were stolen from him?"

"I am sure that he is. I am of the opinion that he bears the trade-mark of contrition on his face. Besides, do you think he would have appealed to the law for protection if he had stolen goods in his possession?"

Sergeant Drew looked at me patronisingly.

"In that case," I said, "I'd do just as he asked me."

"Well, will you come with me to the Hotel?" said the Sergeant uneasily; "I'd like to have company."

"All right," I said, rising lazily, and stretching myself. "We will go at once."

It took us about twenty minutes to reach the Metropolitan. I took the lead, and asked for Mr. Smith.

"Which Mr. Smith?" asked the waiter promptly. "There are four staying here."

This caused us some embarrassment, but at last we found the man we wanted, and we were shown up into his sitting-room, Mrs. Smith being out. I felt some curiosity as we entered the room. We saw a big-bearded, vulgar man, with the stamp of the West upon him. He was sitting by the fireplace, his feet elevated far above his head, the empty grate on his left acting as a spittoon, when we entered.

I introduced myself and the Sergeant to him, and explained the whole business to him as I had heard it. He rolled the quid in his mouth, and looked at us half suspiciously, but after we had given him several references, he was forced to believe us.

"Then," he said, when we had finished, "if that's so, I suppose I must let the little wretch go. The sooner we leave England the better."

We parted on very good terms, and Drew went back to his office, proud of the way in which he had conducted the business, and promising to let me know if anything further occurred.

It was about a fortnight after this—three days after Smith and his wife had left England, that Drew came into my room. Some of the importance seemed to have been knocked out of him, and as he threw himself into the easiest chair in the room, he uttered these three words in a desponding tone:

"We've been sold!"

"Why, what's happened?" said I.

He pulled something from his pocket, carefully wrapped up in brown paper. He slowly undid it, and disclosed to view a small red morocco box. Opening it, he took from it a letter, written in a small, neat, almost womanish hand. I seized it from him, and read it eagerly. This was what it said:

Sergeant, you've been regularly sold for once. I could not resist letting you know how I had done you. I shall be safe away from England before you get this. I've disposed of my wife's jewels all right, and I am sending the box to repay you in some slight degree for your trouble. If you see Smith tell him he is welcome to Mrs. N. for me. Horatio Needham.

Drew and I let the matter drop, and nothing more was heard of Mrs. Smith's jewels. W

SUMMARY.

The story opens with an introduction to the inmates of two farmhouses in an English village named Thorneydene. Honeypots Farm has recently been taken by a young stranger, John Gillway, about whom there seems to be a mystery.

His neighbour, Farmer Strange, is a widower with twin daughters, Diana and Kitty, who have been brought up for the most part by a wealthy aunt, Mrs. Caffyn, who is about to take them on the Continent.

Gillway has already fallen in love with Kitty, who was at first pleased by his attentions. She soon wearied of them, but being half afraid of him, makes many promises of fidelity before going abroad with her sister and aunt, which she never intends to keep.

CHAPTER III.

The Nabob.

The girls went to London the following morning and were met by Mrs. Caffyn, resplendent in black silk and sable. She was a good-hearted little woman, and unaffectedly fond of her nieces. Her greatest ambition was to secure rich husbands for them. She regarded it as her duty.

She was so overjoyed to get her children back again that she forbore laughing at their great string-tied hamper of eggs and chickens and butter and hams, and the enormous bunch of gaudy-coloured dahlias that Farmer Strange had sent her. She really pitied Strange, believing honestly that upon their twenty-first birthday both girls would elect to live permanently with her.

"London is simply vile just now," she told them as they rattled home in her luxurious brougham. "We must get out of it as soon as we can. The streets look quite depressing. I've been thinking, dears, that we might go to Naples and then out to Capri. I have just heard from—a friend that Capri is the most exquisite place in the whole wide world."

"Oh, aunt, how lovely!" cried Kitty, clasping her hands.

Quiet Di, leaning back in her corner with her heart full of her lonely old father, tried to smile and to appear delighted. It mattered very little to Di where her aunt took her; but she felt that she would be lacking in gratitude if she remained silent and unresponsive to so much kindness.

"Capri!" she exclaimed. "Isn't that where Tiberius had a palace, auntie?"

"Goodness knows, my dear," answered Mrs. Caffyn. "I only know that Pajano has a hotel there: a place that seems to be an elysium, where you can do as you like, and meet people in every position, from Germans who eat soft-boiled eggs with their knives to Italian countesses and French duchesses who wear their diamonds all day long. And I am told that the place swarms with artists and literary people and delightful Americans, and that after dinner there are dances in the hall, and primitive kinds of games for the young people. And the price is nothing at all. And you can gather oranges and lemons from the trees in the hotel gardens!"

"All this for nothing at all?" asked Di with a smile.

Di had various recollections of accompanying her aunt and Kitty to several hotels that had been described by Mrs. Caffyn in glowing terms, and that had turned out to be utter failures. Mrs. Caffyn was always enthusiastic about places and people at first.

"Who has been telling you all this?" Kitty asked.

Mrs. Caffyn seemed to hesitate, looking away from the girls and flushing to her eyes. Di watched her in growing perplexity. Her aunt's embarrassment was very evident, and it was such an unusual occurrence for Mrs. Caffyn to betray emotion of that kind.

"Oh, I met somebody the other afternoon at Mrs. Selwyn's," she answered at length, speaking hurriedly. "I forget now who it was. One so often remembers the conversation and forgets the speaker. It's like eating jam and forgetting the maker's name, you know."

"I hope that person won't turn out to be like one of those badly informed guide-books that are always leading you wrong, and cause such cruel disappointments, and make you feel that you would like to be present at the writer's execution," said Di. "It's a long way to go, auntie——"

"Oh, there is no danger of our being disappointed, Di," said Mrs. Caffyn positively. "My informant has lived at Pajano's, and spoke from real genuine experience. We must begin shopping to-morrow. We shall want a lot of things."

They began their shopping expedition the next day, and Di was surprised to find that Mrs. Caffyn was far more concerned about her own wardrobe than she had hitherto been when shopping for her nieces. She bought herself so many juvenile-looking articles of clothing that Kitty was amazed, and a little inclined to resent the new order of affairs. Mrs. Caffyn was continually appealing to the girls for advice. Did this suit her, and did she look nice in something else?

"Aunt must have got a new admirer. I think it must be serious this time," Kitty whispered to Di while Mrs. Caffyn was trying on an elaborate tea-gown in a show-room, "and she crimps her hair to make it look like yours. Have you noticed?"

Kitty had always considered that Di's only beauty laid in her thick masses of chestnut-brown hair. It was full of natural waves, and little fluffy pieces were always straying about over her temples, and breaking loose at the nape of her white slender neck. Di was dark, with a grave expression in her pale face; she carried her head well, with the manner of a girl who had never committed one action of which she was ashamed.

Di looked again at Mrs. Caffyn and saw that the strange new something that had perplexed her when she had seen her aunt for the first time upon the previous day was due to a fresh arrangement of Mrs. Caffyn's hair. It did not look so grey as Di remembered it; indeed it scarcely looked grey at all. At the back, Mrs. Caffyn, with her small tight waist, and crimped brown hair, passed very easily for a woman of thirty instead of fifty. Mrs. Caffyn was rarely without an admirer. Being a woman of means, well-connected, and still attractive in appearance, bright and youthful in her manner, it was no unusual experience for her to receive an offer of marriage. Hitherto she had treated the idea of her re-marrying as a joke, and a most unlikely occurrence. Di wondered if Kitty's surmise were right, and admitted to herself that it was not improbable.

Mrs. Caffyn seemed eager to leave London. She hurried forward their preparations for departure, greatly to Kitty's relief, who dreaded the arrival of John Gillway. She had already received a passionate letter from him, in which he spoke of his loneliness and his craving to see her again. Kitty dreaded the knowledge of her flirtation with him reaching Mrs. Caffyn. She felt heartily ashamed of having at one time believed herself to be in love with Gillway. For him she had no feeling of pity, but rather an angry resentment, because he was so much more strong than she.

Di knew nothing of those stolen interviews in the farm meadows and woods. She had seen that Gillway admired Kitty, but then who did not admire her?

They were settled at Capri before the end of January, and then the girls discovered the reason of Mrs. Caffyn's anxiety to visit Pajano's hotel.

As they entered the hall a young man ran quickly from a lounge-chair, and came forward with outstretched hands to greet Mrs. Caffyn. He had a very youthful face, and bright blue-grey eyes, and he was certainly handsome and distinguished in appearance. Mrs. Caffyn blushed like a young girl as they shook hands.

They began their shopping expedition.

"I thought you were never coming," Di heard him say in a low, reproachful tone. "The time has seemed endless."

Mrs. Caffyn smiled as she looked at the girls.

"Let me introduce you to the real causes of my delay," said she genially. "My dears, Mr. Bernard Eliot, my nieces and adopted daughters, the Misses Strange."

Di looked at Mr. Bernard Eliot straight in the eyes as she bowed. When Di liked people at first sight she had a charming habit of offering them her hand. She did so with Eliot. His candid regard and a certain inexplainable winning charm in his face had won her liking.

"I hope you will like the place," said he, looking not at pretty pouting Kitty nor flushed, happy-eyed Mrs. Caffyn, but at quiet Di, whose eyes had wandered from him to the picture-painted walls. "I have wandered nearly all over the world, and I have never met with but one Pajano. Let me show you the dining-room. It is as original as the rest of the house."

He spoke to Di, and she started and cast a glance at Mrs. Caffyn. Di had not had very many admirers. People had found her cold and constrained, and did not always get on well with her. She was too reserved and quite unlike Kitty, who was continually making new friends.

"Oh, do let us see it!" cried Kitty eagerly.

She and Mrs. Caffyn went into raptures over the long room with its painted walls, and their delight was even greater when they found that their friend had procured rooms for them in one of the many white-washed cottages that laid at the back of the house and belonged to the hotel.

They went out into the garden and through a tangle of palms and roses and golden fruit-laden trees, up and down rough uneven steps, and into a plain three-roomed cottage with white-washed walls and red-tiled floor, and simply furnished.

"When it rains it's rare fun rushing to the hotel for one's dinner under an umbrella in the dark," said Eliot to Di.

She smiled responsively. He wondered if she was never going to speak. She must have a pretty voice, he thought.

"But, surely, it never can rain here!" said Kitty, glancing at the dazzlingly blue sky and the sun-filled garden with its fruit and flowers.

"Oh, doesn't it! We get grand seas here! I've never seen finer. There's a fancy dress ball to-night," said Eliot, "and everyone has to appear masked. The idea is that we shall get into each other's seats and puzzle everybody as to our identity, you know. The masks are not to be taken off until dinner is over. It's only a couple of francs. I do hope you'll all come."

"Indeed we will," Mrs. Caffyn declared, "only—we've no fancy dresses."

"Some of them—the other ladies, I mean—are using up sheets and towels. There's the jolliest American girl where I'm quartered. She only came here yesterday. She's coming out in a grand costume, she says, and it's all made up of sheets and white things, you know."

"But we can't all wear the same dress," objected Kitty. "Isn't there a draper's here?"

"There's a little bit of a shop where you can get red stuff and silk and Neapolitan caps and things like that," said Eliot in an anxious tone. "Shall I take you there? I speak Italian like a native with all his teeth out, and a hot baked apple in his throat; but I generally manage to make 'em understand. The great thing, you know, is pantomime. Point to things and then count on your fingers. See? And if they want you to pay more than you feel like giving, say Mai, that means never, and then make an ugly grimace at 'em. I got on splendidly that way. Shall I go with you to buy the things?"

Again he spoke to Di. Her beautiful lips parted in a smile as she answered: "No, thank you. I should like to try my own way of getting on with them. And besides," as he looked disappointed, "if you are with us, you will see what we buy and that will help you to recognise us easily."

"May I take you to a tea-shop?" he asked. "I know such a nice one where you get good tea and little cakes and sweets——"

Mrs. Caffyn had been watching and listening with a smile upon her face. She interrupted Eliot to cry: "Indeed you may. We shall be ready at four o'clock. You will find us here."

"Auntie, who is he, and how did you get to know him?" Kitty asked when they were alone.

"Mrs. Selwyn introduced him to me. He came over from India in the same ship with her husband and children."

"He is very handsome," said Kitty. "Is — he rich?"

"Immensely rich. Somebody has given him the nickname of the 'Young Nabob.' He was born in India. Nobody knows anything more than that about him. I don't quite know what his people were. It doesn't matter, as they are all dead," answered Mrs. Caffyn as she took off her little bonnet and smoothed her hair before the mirror. "I wish there was a wardrobe in the room," she added, with a discontented glance at a row of pegs. "Martin is quite capable of giving me warning. She will never reconcile herself to hanging my best gowns on the wall."

Di had walked out upon the little terrace where a Gloire de Dijon was opening its pale scented petals to the sun, and doing its best to cover and conceal the plain white wall. The air was redolent of the scent of flowers. A great box of wallflowers in a corner made a gay patch of colour, and seemed to look down with good-natured tolerance upon a humble but none the less pretty blue periwinkle growing beneath.

Before Di stretched the queer-shaped garden with its palms and roses, its orange and lemon trees and the almonds and peaches as yet not in flower. Between the trees at the side of the hotel she caught a glimpse of the sea, dotted here and there with latteen sails. Overhead the sky was as blue as a sparrow's egg and almost unflecked with clouds. It was an ideal afternoon, and the flowers and sunshine made it hard to realise that the month was December, and that in England the day might be cold and snowy and depressing.

A great feeling of exhilaration and happiness stole over Di. Leaning her arms upon the rail, she began to think of her father and tried to picture him tramping over the frozen fields beneath a grey, overhanging sky, maybe thinking of her and wondering what she was doing.

Mrs. Caffyn coming out upon the terrace five minutes later found her in the same pensive attitude. The elder woman sighed as she watched her niece.

"Dreaming of the Nabob, Di?" she asked, trying to speak lightly but with a strange new inflection in her tones that made Di turn and stare at her in surprise. Mrs. Caffyn was smiling, but Di thought that her lips were drawn as though she was in pain.

"The Nabob? Oh, no. I was thinking of dad. Isn't it difficult to tear one's eyes away from the sunshine and to make oneself see black clouds and white snow and frost-covered window-panes. Betty will soon be lighting the lamp at home."

"It's awful to think of. Kitty and I have been speculating about our costumes for to-night. She is going as a nun, and I thought that I might go as a waiting-maid. What should you think, Di?"

Di nodded, though it seemed to her that it would have been more appropriate if Kitty and Mrs. Caffyn had reversed their rôles.

"I can borrow a cap and apron from Martin. Those little white caps are so fetching. And a black velvet mask ought to look striking. What are you going to wear?"

Di glanced down at her dark blue travelling dress, and thought for a moment with a grave little pucker between her black brows.

"I'll dress as a fish-wife," said she at length. "I can tuck in my bodice at the neck and twist a red scarf round it. A red sash and a red cap will be all that I need buy."

"You will look nice in red," murmured Mrs. Caffyn almost regretfully. "I wish I had thought of that costume for myself."

"Oh, I don't mind exchanging. A waiting-maid's dress will please me just as well, auntie."

Mrs. Caffyn bent and kissed Di.

"You are a dear good girl," she said. "If you are quite sure——"

Di was quite sure. They strolled down the hill to the shop where red twill and Neapolitan caps were to be bought, and made their purchases. As they passed a confectioner's Eliot came out to them.

"I've got the nicest little table in a corner where we can see everybody," said he. "The room is always crowded at this time."

He was very attentive to Mrs. Caffyn during the bright little meal, and yet Kitty thought that he was smitten with her own pretty self. The Nabob could not do the smallest thing without investing it with a charm. There was tender chivalry in the way he poured cream into the tea-cups, and he handed pound cake with such a winning smile that the cake seemed to gain in flavour. He looked a great deal at Mrs. Caffyn and a great deal at Di and Kitty. He seemed to admire all three ladies as one might admire a cluster of beautiful flowers. It was evident that his sweet and amiable disposition made him anxious to please everybody. He had to shake hands with half of the occupants in the room and exchange bows with the other half when he and his little party were leaving the shop. Mrs. Caffyn watched him with a look in her eyes that is only to be seen in the eyes of a mother or a proud wife whose heart has never been tortured with jealousy. Once she whispered to Di: "Isn't he popular here? It is just the same in London."

He seemed to admire all three ladies.

Di smiled back at her aunt and wondered if Mrs. Caffyn had fallen in love with the Nabob.

"I hope not, oh, I do hope not!" she thought to herself as she followed Mrs. Caffyn and Kitty into the street. "He is so young."

The Nabob walked by Di's side back to the palm-shaded hotel. He was eager to know if they were comfortable and if there was anything whatever that he could do to add to their comfort. He seemed quite distressed at hearing that they had everything necessary to their welfare.

"I suppose I mustn't ask you to give me a tiny hint as to the kind of dress you will wear to-night?" he asked Di in a low voice.

She shook her head, looking at him frankly.

"I am sure that I shall recognise you. I've never seen another woman——" he paused and bit his lip, looking away from her face to the sunny wall, where boxes of little pink oxalis were blossoming. "You don't care to make me a bet that I shan't pick you out, and get a seat by your side?" he added in quite a different tone, and loud enough for Kitty and Mrs. Caffyn to hear.

"I don't bet," Di answered a little stiffly.

She was growing angry with herself because already she found herself liking the Nabob. And Di so rarely took to strangers with facility that there seemed to her to be something abnormal in the Nabob to have this strange power of extorting affection from people who were barely acquainted with him. She looked at him impatiently as he walked by her side with the glow of the afternoon sun upon his face.

It could not be his good looks that unlocked the door to people's hearts in this extraordinary way, handsome as the Nabob was with his clear-cut features and beautiful mouth. "It must be the sweetness of his expression," thought Di in sudden remorse for her irritable sensation towards him. "He looks so kind and candid and amiable."

He turned at that moment and met her puzzled scrutiny with such honesty in his smiling eyes that an odd impulse seized her to take his arm. She put both hands upon her parasol and began to talk hurriedly to Kitty.

"I wonder if aunt and Kitty feel as drawn towards him as I do?" she asked herself with a hot blush. Then she smiled. "Anyone would really think that the Nabob mesmerised people!"

CHAPTER IV.

"Home-keeping Hearts are Happiest."

Di sat alone by the sea and tried to think it all out. She felt very happy, but with the happiness a feeling of uneasiness had mingled. She looked away at Vesuvius with its thin umbrella-shaped cloud of smoke, and then her eyes fell upon the blue sea and the boats and the picturesque fishermen. The men were all loafing and lounging about, watching their wives and daughters carrying stones from the shore to a cargo-boat. From time to time a brown-skinned dark-eyed fellow shouted out a few words of direction to his women-folk as they hurried past, bending wearily beneath their burdens. The lap-lap of the waves was pleasant and soothing. Its song and the sunshine together made one feel how good it would be to lie and dream until the sun went down and the stars peeped out to look down upon the quiet world.

Di clasped her hands in her lap, forcing herself to think over the events of the past three months. Did Bernard Eliot love her, and did Mrs. Caffyn really believe that she herself was the object of the young man's affections? And Kitty? What of her? The uneasy load upon Di's heart deepened. It was not the Nabob's fault that everyone fell in love with him. Di felt sure of that. She had watched his manner towards Mrs. Caffyn and Kitty, and it had never varied. He had always been the same gay, kind, chivalrous gentleman, anxious to please, unselfish in his regard for others, and very thoughtful for everyone's welfare. No. The Nabob was clearly not to blame. Mrs. Caffyn and Kitty were foolish in wilfully misconstruing kind actions into expressions of some deeper sentiment.

Suddenly Di started. What if she was doing the same? The colour died away in her cheeks, and painstakingly she went back in her memory to the night of the fancy ball when the Nabob had sat by her side during dinner and, in the disguise of a white monk, had whispered such pretty things to her. He had seen her portrait in Mrs. Selwyn's drawing-room and he had fallen in love with it. To meet her he had induced Mrs. Caffyn to visit Capri. He had told her that she was ten times more charming than her photograph had represented her—but—did not men often make those kind of speeches and not really mean them? Something rose up in Di's heart and retorted that some men might be weak or base enough to trifle with a girl's love, but the Nabob did not belong to that class of men. He was loyal and true. Oh, why were Mrs. Caffyn and Kitty so blind and foolish?

The breeze suddenly brought her a strong whiff of scented heather. Di turned, and her pulses beat quicker. The Nabob was standing behind her smiling, and he carried a great bouquet of wild flowers in his hands. He looked so young, so handsome and so strong, standing there in the clear afternoon light, with the sun shining upon his fair moustache and hair, and his white teeth gleaming between his parted lips as he smiled upon her.

"I thought that I should have found you in our favourite walk," he said reproachfully. "I've waited there quite an hour. Did I make a mistake in hoping to find you there—or did you forget?"

Di looked at him very fearlessly.

"I did not forget," she answered in a low voice. "I knew that you would go there. I came here by preference. I wanted to think."

"Of me?"

He had taken a seat at her side, and as he spoke he laid the flowers in her lap. The scent of the heath and the white narcissi made Di feel giddy.

"Yes," she said. "I wanted to think of you—and of my father."

She paused a moment and very gently put the flowers upon the rock.

"Aunt has told you that in a fortnight's time Kitty and I shall be twenty-one?"

"Yes—and that you are returning to London to-morrow. I am glad, for I am obliged to leave Capri this week."

He laid the flowers in her lap.

"You know," said Di steadily, "that my father is only a poor farmer. He is not very well educated, my poor old dad; but he is the kindest, dearest, noblest father in the world. Aunt always speaks of his being a 'land-owner.' So he is, but he does not own much land. Our farm is only a hundred acres."

Eliot nodded, smiling as he listened. It was as though he knew all that Di was nerving herself to tell him—knew it, and admired her for her courage and honesty.

"When we are twenty-one, Kitty and I, we are to decide whether we shall live always with dad or with aunt. I have always decided in my mind that I shall live with dad. I am going to him on the very day that I attain my majority. My father is very dear to me."

"Di," said Eliot, calling her for the first time by her Christian name, "this decision of yours makes me—reverence and admire you more than ever. You are not angry?"

He had kissed her hand. Di flushed as she drew it away.

"Your sister is not going with you, of course?"

"No, she will remain with aunt."

"She does not love your father so much as you do," said he in disapproval. "She is quite another creature."

"Kitty doesn't care for the country," Di said apologetically. "She wearies of green fields and grass. I love it. The smell of the upturned earth, the rustle of the dead leaves, the trees with their beautiful covering in summer, and their gaunt nakedness in winter, the very sound of the spades going through the earth delights me. And the birds and flowers! The dear little red fungi that one finds in winter, the last bits of clinging wild geraniums, the scattered tufts of yellow ragwort. Oh, I can't tell you how dearly I love them all!"

Her cheeks were flushed. She looked at Vesuvius as though her imagination had carried her far away from sunny Capri to Thorneydene.

"It is a very beautiful place where your father lives," said Eliot, after watching her in admiring silence for a few moments, "but lonely, I suppose? No houses—big country seats—near?"

"Oh, ever so many. There is Lady Foley's place, and Baron Schroiner's, and the Hon. Mrs. Jamieson's—and several others."

"I had no idea that Thorneydene could boast of such aristocratic inhabitants. I imagined it to be a tiny, out-of-the-way village."

"So it is. Of course, these residences are not all in Thorneydene itself, only near it."

"I suppose the owners of these country seats are poor people who reside in the country for the sake of economy?" said Eliot, looking a little bored.

"No; they are all rich people. Lady Foley is tremendously wealthy, and there is the American widow—I'd forgotten her—Mrs. Raffin—she has a new house. She is very, very rich!"

Eliot stretched out his hand for the flowers, and carefully arranged the border of ferns.

"Do you remember when we found the first lilac crocus in our favourite walk?" he asked. "And the big violets, and the narcissi in the wood? What a happy time we've had. It doesn't seem possible that we can have passed three months here! A quarter of a year of happiness is a lot to get out of the twelve months. Di, tell me, have you been happy, too?"

She would not look at him as she murmured:

"Yes."

"Shall I see you in London—shall you stay there?"

"No. Only a week or so. I shall be home upon the day of my birthday—the twenty-ninth of April."

"I wonder what you will do when you are at home?"

"I am going to make butter and cheese, and perhaps learn to milk cows. I am not quite sure about learning the last accomplishment, but I shall try. And I shall keep fancy poultry," said Di, trying hard to control her voice. She was angry with herself because of that foolish quiver that would creep into her throat. Why was it that she felt no pleasure in thinking of these simple home duties? Hitherto she had always looked forward to fulfilling them, and had thought of them with keen delight. To-day her heart ached, and there was a sordid ring in the enumeration of butter and cheese making, and milking cows, and keeping poultry that she had never before noticed. Was Thorneydene really attractive after all?

"I can't fancy this pretty white hand turning a churn," said Eliot, looking at the hand in her lap.

Di laughed, and rose from her seat. She felt angry now, though even to herself she dare not admit that she had a reason for this feeling of disappointment that had stolen over her.

"It will not be very white when I have been a dairymaid for a few months," said she in a harsh voice. "I—I think I must be returning to the hotel. There's such a lot of packing to do."

Eliot sprang to his feet. His face was pale, and his eyes were strangely tender as they rested upon the girl's white, drawn face. Without a word, he drew her to him, and kissed her. She felt his kisses upon her cheek, and tried to draw herself away.

"Oh, Di!" she heard him whisper. "How I admire you! How brave, and sweet, and good you are, my darling!"

She tore herself away, trampling in her agitation over the fallen flowers. Her cheeks were scarlet, when she looked at herself in the mirror in her bedroom.

"He admires me!" she cried to herself with a little hysterical laugh. "He admires me! Would a man who loved say what he said? If he loves me—why didn't he tell me so?"

The partition walls were very thin in the white-washed cottage. Kitty's sweet, happy voice, speaking in the adjoining room, fell upon Di's ears.

"The Nabob has received a host of invitations, Aunt Lu-lu, from people in the hotel. He is going to stay with the Malets in Yorkshire next week."

"Nasty, vulgar parvenus!" retorted Mrs. Caffyn. "Maud Malet makes no secret of her infatuation for the Nabob. She is always looking at him as though she feared that the earth would suddenly open and swallow him up. She looks positively idiotic when he is near her! If I were her mother, I'd send her back to the schoolroom. As if she can ever hope to marry a man so rich and handsome and popular as the Nabob! It is quite too mad an idea." Di gasped and put one cold hand to her throat.

"He will marry some handsome, accomplished girl of good family when he does take a wife," went on Mrs. Caffyn, and Di detected the false ring in her aunt's voice, and knew that Mrs. Caffyn's words did not come from her heart. "He is rich enough to marry anybody; but he will never marry a fool, nor yet a girl who comes of such a stock as Miss Malet has the misfortune to own for her relations. I know the Nabob's ideas about marriage, Kitty."

Di removed the neck-ribbon, folded it mechanically, and placed it upon her dressing-table. Once her lips quivered, but it was only when she murmured: "Oh, Daddy, Daddy! How could I ever want not to go back to you, dear?"

ALBUERA is the fiercest, bloodiest, and most amazing fight in the mighty drama of the Peninsular War.

On May 11th, 1811, the English guns were thundering sullenly over Badajos. Wellington was beyond the Guadiana, pressing Marmont; and Beresford, with much pluck, but little skill, was besieging the great frontier fortress. Soult, however, a master of war, was swooping down from Seville to raise the siege. On the 14th, he reached Villa Franca, only thirty miles distant, and fired salvos from his heaviest guns all through the night to warn the garrison of approaching succour. Beresford could not both maintain the siege and fight Soult; and on the night of the 13th he abandoned his trenches, burnt his gabions and fascines, and marched to meet Soult at Albuera, a low ridge, with a shallow river in front, which barred the road to Badajos. As the morning of May 16th, 1811, broke, heavy with clouds, and wild with gusty rainstorms, the two armies grimly gazed at each other in stern pause, ere they joined in the wrestle of actual battle.

All the advantages, save one, were on the side of the French. Soult was the ablest of the French marshals. If he had not Ney's élan in attack, or Massena's stubborn resource in retreat, yet he had a military genius, since Lannes was dead, second only to that of Napoleon himself. He had under his command 20,000 war-hardened infantry, forty guns, and 4,000 magnificent cavalry, commanded by Latour Maubourg, one of the most brilliant of French cavalry generals.

Beresford, the British commander, had the dogged fighting courage, half Dutch and half English, of his name and blood; but as a commander he was scarcely third-rate. Of his army of 30,000, 15,000 were Spanish, half-drilled, and more than half starved—they had lived for days on horse-flesh—under Blake, a general who had lost all the good qualities of Irish character, and acquired all the bad ones peculiar to Spanish temper. Of Beresford's remaining troop, 8,000 were Portuguese. He had only 7,000 British soldiers.

Beresford ought not to have fought. He had abandoned the siege of Badajos, and no reason for giving battle remained. The condition of Blake's men, no doubt, made retreat difficult. They had reached the point at which they must either halt, or lie down and die.

The real force driving Beresford to battle, however, was the fighting effervescence in his own blood, and the warlike impatience of his British troops. They had taken no part in the late great battles under Wellington. Busaco had been fought, and Fuentes Onoro gained without them, and they were in the mood —both officers and men—of fierce determination to fight somebody!

This was intimated somewhat roughly to Beresford, and he had not that iron ascendency over his troops Wellington possessed. As a matter of fact, he was himself as stubbornly eager to fight as any private in the ranks.

The superiority of Soult's warlike genius was shown before a shot was fired. Beresford regarded the bridge that crossed the Albuera, and the village that clustered at the bridge head, as the key of his position.

He occupied the village with Alten's German brigade, covered the bridge with the fire of powerful batteries, and held in reserve above it his best British brigade, the Fusiliers under Cole, the very regiments who, four hours later, on the extreme right of Beresford's position, were to actually win the battle.

Soult's sure vision, however, as he surveyed his enemies on the evening of the 15th, saw that Beresford's right was his weak point. It was a rough, broken table-land, curving till it looked into the rear of Beresford's line. It was weakly held by Blake and his Spaniards; immediately in its front was a low wooded hill, behind which, as a screen, an attacking force could be gathered.

In the night Soult placed behind this hill the fifth corps under Girard, the whole of his heavy cavalry under Latour Maubourg, and the strength of his artillery. When the morning broke Soult had 15,000 men and 30 guns within ten minutes' march of Beresford's right wing, and nobody suspected it.

No gleam of colour, no murmur of packed battalions, no ring of steel, no sound of marching feet warned the deluded English general of the battle storm about to break on his right wing. A commander with such an unexpected tempest ready to burst on the weakest point of his line was by all the rules of war predoomed.

At nine o'clock Soult launched an attack at the bridge, the point where Beresford expected him; but it was only a feint. Beresford, however, with all his faults, had the soldierly brain to which the actual thunder of the cannon gave clearness. He noticed that the French battalions supporting the attack on the bridge did not press on closely; as a matter of fact as soon as the smoke of artillery from the battle raging at the bridge swept over the field they swung smartly to the left, and at the double hastened to add themselves to the thunderbolt which Soult was launching at Beresford's right.

But Beresford, meanwhile, had guessed Soult's secret, and he sent officer after officer ordering and intreating Blake to change front, so as to meet Soult's attack on his flank, and he finally rode thither himself to inforce his commands.

Blake, however, was immovable through pride, and his men through sheer physical weakness. They could die, but they could not march or deploy. Blake at last tried to change front, but as he did so the French attack smote him. Pressing up the gentle rise, Gerard's men scourged poor Blake's flank with their fire; the French artillery, coming swiftly on, halted every fifty yards to thunder on the unhappy Spaniards; while Latour Maubourg's lancers and hussars, galloping in a wider sweep, gathered momentum for a wild ride on Blake's actual rear.

Beresford tried to persuade the Spaniards to charge as the French were thus circling round them. Shouts and gesticulations were all in vain. He was a man of giant height and strength, and he actually seized a Spanish ensign in his iron grip, and carried him bodily, flag and all, at a run for fifty yards towards the moving French lines, and planted him there.

When released, however, the bewildered Spaniard simply took to his heels, and ran back to his friends, as a terrified sheep might run back to the flock!

In half-an-hour Beresford's battle had grown desperate. Two-thirds of the French, in compact order of battle, were perpendicular to his right; the Spaniards were falling into disorder; Soult saw the victory in his grasp, and eagerly pushed forward his reserves. Over the whole hill, mingled with furious blasts of rain, rolled the tumult of a disorderly and broken fight. Ten minutes more would have enabled Soult to fling Beresford's right, a shattered and routed mass, on the only possible line of retreat, and with the French superiority in cavalry his army would have been blotted out.

The share of the British in the fight consisted of three great attacks delivered by way of counter-stroke to Soult's overwhelming rush on the hill held by Blake. The first attack was delivered by the second division under Colborne, led by General Stewart in person.

Stewart was a sort of British version of Ney, a man of vehement spirit, with a daring that grew even more flame-like in the eddying tumult and tempest of actual battle. He saw Soult's attack crumbling up Blake's helpless battalions, while the flash of the French artillery every moment grew closer. It was the crisis of the fight, and Stewart brought on Colborne's men at a run. Colborne himself, a fine soldier with cool judgment, wished to halt and form his men in order of battle before plunging into the confused vortex of the fight above; but Stewart, full of breathless ardour, hurried the brigade up the hill in column of companies, reached the Spanish right, and began to form line by succession of battalions as they arrived.

At this moment a wild tempest of rain was sweeping over the British, as, at the double, they came up the hill; the eddying fog, thick with the smoke of powder, hid everything twenty yards from the panting soldiers. Suddenly the wall of changing fog to their right sparkled into swiftly-moving spots of red; it shone the next instant with the gleam of a thousand steel points; above the thunder of the cannon, the shouts of contending men, rose the awful sound of a tempest of galloping hoofs.

The French lancers and hussars caught the British in open order, and in five fierce and bloody minutes, almost trampled them out of existence!

Two-thirds of the brigade went down.

The 31st Regiment flung itself promptly into square and stood fast—a tiny island, edged with steel and flame, amid the mad tumult; but the French lancers, drunk with excitement, mad with battle-fury, swept over the whole slope of the hill. They captured six guns, and might have done yet more fatal mischief but that they occupied themselves in galloping to and fro across the line of their original charge, spearing the wounded.

One lancer charged Beresford as he sat, solitary and huge, on his horse amid the broken English regiments. But Beresford was at least a magnificent trooper. He put the lance aside with one hand, and catching the Frenchman by the throat, lifted him clean from the saddle, and dashed him senseless on the ground!

The ensign who carried the colours of the 3rd Buffs covered them with his body till he was slain by a dozen lance-thrusts. The ensign who carried the other colours of the same regiment tore the flag from its staff and thrust it into his breast, where it was found, stiff with his blood, after the fight.

The Spaniards, meanwhile, were firing incessantly, but on general principles merely, and into space, or into the ranks of their own allies as might happen, and the 29th, advancing to the help of Colborne's broken men, finding the Spaniards in their path, and firing into their lines, broke sternly into volleys on them in turn. Seldom has a battlefield witnessed a tumult so distracted and wild.

The first English counter-stroke had failed, but the second followed swiftly. The furious rain and fog, which had proved so fatal to Colborne's men, for a moment was in favour of Beresford. Soult, though eagerly watching the conflict, could not see the ruin into which the British had fallen, and hesitated to launch his reserves into the fight. The 31st still sternly held its own against the French cavalry, and this gave time for Stewart to bring up Houghton's brigade.

But this time Stewart, though he brought up his men with as much vehemence as before, brought them up in order of battle. The 29th, the 48th, and the 57th swept up the hill in line, led by Houghton, hat in hand. He fell, pierced by three bullets, but over his dead body, eager to close, the British line still swept. They reached the crest. A deep and narrow ravine arrested their bayonet charge, but with stubborn valour they held the ground they had gained, scourged with musketry fire at pistol-shot distance, and by artillery at fifty yards range, while a French column smote them with its musketry on their flank.

The men fell fast, but fought as they fell. Stewart was twice wounded, Colonel Dutworth, of the 48th, slain. Of the 57th, out of 570 men, 430, with their colonel, Inglis, fell. The men, after the battle, were found lying dead in ranks exactly as they fought.

"Die hard! my men, die hard!" said Inglis when the bullet struck him, and the 57th have borne the name of "Die hards!" ever since. At Inkerman, indeed, more than fifty years afterwards, the "Die hard!" of Inglis served to harden the valour of the 57th in a fight as stern as Albuera itself.

But ammunition began to fail. Houghton's men would not yield, but it was plain that in a few more minutes there would be none of them left, save the dead and the wounded. And at this dreadful moment, Beresford, distracted with the tumult and horror of the fight, wavered.

He called up Alten's men from the bridge to cover his retreat, and prepared to yield the fatal hill. At this juncture, however, a mind more masterful and daring than his own launched a third British attack against the victorious French, and won the dreadful day.

Colonel Hardinge, afterwards famous in Indian battles, acted as quarter-general of the Portuguese army. On his own responsibility he organised the third English attack. Cole had just come up the road from Badajos with two brigades, and Hardinge urged him to lead his men straight up the hill. Then, riding to Abercrombie's brigade, he ordered him to sweep round the flank of the hill.

Beresford, on learning of this movement, accepted it, and sent back Alten's men to retake the bridge which they had abandoned. Abercrombie's men swept to the left of the hill, and Cole, a gallant and able soldier, using the Portuguese regiments in his brigade as a guard against a flank attack of the French cavalry, led his two fusilier regiments, the 7th and 23rd, straight to the crest.

The French lancers and hussars caught the British infantry in open order.

At this moment the French reserves were coming on, the fragments of Houghton's brigade were falling back, the field was heaped with carcases, the lancers were riding furiously about the captured artillery, and with a storm of exultant shouts the French were sweeping on to assured victory. It was the dramatic moment of the fight.

Suddenly through the fog, coming rapidly on with stern faces and flashing volleys, appeared the long line of Cole's fusiliers on the right of Houghton's staggering groups, while at the same exact moment Abercrombie's line broke through the mist on their left. As these grim and threatening lines became visible the French shouts suddenly died down.

It was the old contest of the British line—the "thin red line"—against the favourite French attack in column, and the story can only be told in Napier's resonant prose. The passage which describes the attack of the fusiliers is one of the classic passages of English battle literature, and in its syllables can still be heard the tread of marching feet, the shrill clangour of smitten steel, and the thunder of the musketry volleys.

"Such a gallant line," says Napier, "arising from amid the smoke, and rapidly separating itself from the confused and broken multitude, startled the enemy's masses, which were increasing and pressing forward as to assured victory; they wavered, hesitated, and then, vomiting forth a storm of fire, hastily endeavoured to enlarge their front, while the fearful discharge of grape from all their artillery whistled through the British ranks. Myert was killed, Cole and the three colonels—Ellis, Blackeney, and Hawkshawe—fell wounded; and the fusilier battalions, struck by the iron tempest, reeled and staggered like sinking ships.

"Suddenly and sternly recovering, they closed on their terrible enemies, and then was seen with what a strength and majesty the British soldier fights. In vain did Soult, by voice and gesture, animate his Frenchmen; in vain did the hardiest veterans break from the crowded columns and sacrifice their lives to gain time for the mass to open on such a fair field; in vain did the mass itself bear up, and, fiercely striving, fire indiscriminately on friends and foes, while the horsemen, hovering on the flanks, threatened to charge the advancing line.

"Nothing could stop that astonishing infantry. No sudden burst of undisciplined valour, no nervous enthusiasm weakened the stability of their order; their measured tread shook the ground, their dreadful volleys swept away the head of every formation, their deafening shouts overpowered the dissonant cries that broke from all parts of the tumultuous crowds as, slowly, and with a horrid carnage, it was driven by the incessant vigour of the attack to the farthest edge of the hill.

"In vain did the French reserves mix with the struggling multitude to sustain the fight. Their efforts only increased the irremediable confusion, and the mighty mass, breaking off like a loosened cliff, went headlong down the ascent. The rain flowed after in streams discoloured with blood, and eighteen hundred unwounded men, the remnant of six thousand unconquerable British soldiers, stood triumphant on the fatal hill."

The Battle of Albuera lasted four hours; its slaughter was dreadful. Within the space of a few hundred feet square were strewn some seven thousand bodies, and over this Aceldama the artillery had galloped, the cavalry had charged! The 3rd Buffs went into the fight with twenty-four officers and 750 rank and file; at the roll-call next morning there were only five officers and thirty-five men. One company of the Royal Fusiliers came out of the fight commanded by a corporal; every officer and sergeant had been killed!

Albuera is essentially a soldier's fight. The bayonet of the private, not the brain of the general, won it; and never was the fighting quality of our race more brilliantly shown. Soult summed up the battle in words that deserve to be memorable.

"There is no beating those troops," he wrote, "in spite of their generals! I always thought them bad soldiers," he added, with a Frenchman's love of paradox; "now I am sure of it. For I turned their right, pierced their centre, they were everywhere broken, the day was mine, and yet they did not know it, and would not run."

ON THURSDAY, MAY 6th,

GIRLS,

Our New Paper for Girls of all ages, from Six to Sixty, will make its bow to the Public.

GIRLS will, I am sure, meet with a warm welcome, not only from schoolgirls and home-girls, and young ladies of all sorts and descriptions, but from mothers and teachers as well.

As Girls will cater for the young in a way in which they have never been catered for before, the paper will be decidedly a novelty, and I venture to think a particularly attractive novelty. Girls, until now, have had to be content either with the "grown-up" literature provided for their elders, or with the namby-pamby stuff—mostly of the feeble love-story order—which is usually considered sufficient for them to feed their minds on.

Now, in the new paper, a step forward has been taken. In the first place there will be no love at all, or if any, of such a transient sort as practically not to count. In the second place, special prominence will be given to all sports and pastimes, and the healthy out-of-doors pursuits in which girls now so freely join.

A kindly, wholesome tone will pervade the pages of Girls, and the object of both Editor and Proprietors will be to establish a bond of mutual understanding between this office and girls throughout the world.

In the first number of Girls an amusing and brightly-written serial, by Miss Winifred Graham, begins, entitled: "THE GREAT HOUSE OF CASTLETON." In this the droll scrapes and absurd adventures of a party of young people, who are sent into the country in the charge only of an elderly housekeeper, will be found really excellent reading.

Short and pithy articles, touching on all subjects of interest to girls, will abound. A short, smartly-written, complete story, will appear in every number, and in No. 1 various interesting series commence. Amongst these I may draw your attention to the opening instalment of "HOW TWO GIRLS FIRST SAW LONDON," a deliciously humourous account of the impressions of a couple of up-to-date young people, whose parents have come to town for the season, bringing their daughters with them. In "COLLEGE SPORTS AND PASTIMES," a bright and adequate idea is given of the outdoor recreations of girls who are not blue-stockings; and, in fact, Girls will be found replete with good things.

As Girls is only one penny, and will appear weekly, I advise you to lodge orders with your newsagent at once, not only for the weekly edition, but also for the monthly parts, price sixpence, ready the first of each month.

TOLD BY THE DOCTOR.

II.—The Secret of an Old Garden. (Concluded from last week.)

CHAPTER II. (continued).

OUR search for Mr. Gavin Temple was not of long duration. We came upon him just as he was about to enter the green door of the old garden in Pulteney Street. He simply nodded to Ogilvie as we approached, and pushed open the door for us. Frank faced up belligerently.

"I want a word with you, Mr. Temple," he said. "I insist upon knowing what you have done with the body of Miss Yseult Dunbar."

Mr. Gavin stared at him with a surprise which was certainly very well acted, if it was not genuine. He was a tall, sallow, thin old man, with an aquiline nose and little black eyes like his daughter's, but more restless and furtive than hers. His manner was nervous and uneasy, and when he spoke it was with a stutter.

"I do not understand!" he said, looking from one to the other of us in his restless, furtive way.

"I will speak plainly, then," said Ogilvie with suppressed passion. "This morning you smuggled the body of my fiancée, coffinless, out of the house—whether living or not, nobody knows—and have buried it, Heaven knows where, for fear we should find out that my darling was not dead."

His voice broke as he ended, and he advanced to the man at the door of the garden with such mad passion in his face that I felt bound to step between. Gavin Temple edged away into the garden.

"He is mad!" he said to me. "The body has not been moved at all." And I made haste to answer:

"You are mistaken, Mr. Temple. Whether you know it or not I cannot tell, but the body of Miss Dunbar has disappeared from the house."

"Disappeared!" he repeated. "It is impossible."

And again his acting, if acting it was, merited all admiration.

"If you go into the house you will find the fact apparent," I said, taking the conduct of the case into my own hands, since my companion had become silent, evidently attempting to master his emotion. "We will wait for you in the garden, to talk over with you the course to be pursued."

Gavin Temple seemed to me to cast a quick, frightened look round the place.

"Come into the house," he said; and I noted his anxiety down in my memory as a fact which might help us in our investigations.

In spite of his evident eagerness for us to enter the house, we insisted on remaining in the garden, and he rejoined us there in a remarkably short space of time, after finding out for himself—or pretending to do—the fact of his ward's disappearance. He had evidently made up his mind to maintain his air of ignorance concerning the affair, and assured us, as volubly as his stutter would allow, that he was as surprised as ourselves.

"I suppose you will inform the police of the affair, Mr. Temple?" I said, wondering how he would take the suggestion.

He showed some hesitation.

"I have fought all along against my poor ward's death being turned into a scandal for the benefit of the halfpenny papers," he said at last. "Mr. Ogilvie has been angry with me for not allowing it, I know. I suppose this disappearance is a new move of his to bring publicity into the case."

This was turning the tables with a vengeance; and I saw poor Frank's pale cheeks redden with indignation.

"You are a clever man, Mr. Temple," he said with a calmness which surprised me; "however, this case shall be hushed up no longer. Talk as you like, the affair shall be handed over to the proper authorities at once, to be sifted, and whatever villainy has had a place in it will be discovered."

I felt bound to step between.

"Whatever villainy there may be is yours," stuttered the tall old man. "If you care to make a nine days' wonder for the riff-raff out of your fiancée's death, it is your own matter."

There seemed some likelihood of a quarrel, so I tried to cause a diversion by asking Yseult's guardian whether he had found anything among her papers, or those of her dead grandfather, which could throw any light upon the disappearance. Was there any person who could reap advantage by allowing the slight doubt to remain whether the young lady was actually dead or not?

Digitized by Google

The topic turned out to be an unfortunate one, for it reminded Ogilvie of the iron box which we had seen on Gavin Temple's study-table. He accused the old man fiercely of having opened it while the question of Yseult's death was still in doubt.

"My dear young man, how can you be so absurd?" said Gavin, stuttering more than ever. "I can sympathise with your grief at my ward's untimely death, and understand your inclination prompting you to believe that there was some hope; but after Dr. Mitcheller's emphatic decision, it is simply insane to harbour any longer a doubt of your sweetheart's death."

Ogilvie shrugged his shoulders and made no reply.

"Well, as you have opened the box, we may as well see the contents," he said, waving the question, and he took a step in the direction of the house.

The effect of his words on Gavin Temple surprised me. He was all in a nervous tremour at once, and refused under any circumstances to disclose what the box contained.

"The papers which are there," he said, "are not for the public gaze. It is my right, as executor under Lord Englon's will, to read them."

I thought for a moment that my companion would fight for the right to do so; but he turned on his heel.

"All right, Mr. Temple," he said over his shoulder. "I am going now to place the matter in the hands of the police! We shall see whether they do not insist on seeing the contents of the iron box."

And we left the gaunt old man turning white and red in turns and struggling to speak.

"I wonder what the box contains?" said Ogilvie, as we went out into Pulteney Street. "I have a good mind to go back and break it open."

"It can hardly concern the work we have in hand," I said. "To that we must give all our energies, and never rest until we have discovered what has become of the body of Miss Yseult Dunbar. Let us now see if we can trace Gavin Temple's doings throughout to-day. His daughter told me, while you were searching the house, that he had been to an eye specialist in Wigmore Street about his sight. The doctor is a friend of mine. We will go and inquire, in the first place, whether he visited him."

CHAPTER III.

The Burial in the Garden.

Early the next day I went alone to the house in Pulteney Street, determined to see Miss Madge, and try if there was any value in old Mrs. Ogilvie's address.

Our inquiries into Gavin Temple's doings on the previous day had been easy enough, but produced nothing. He had really visited my friend in Wigmore Street, and had stayed some time with him. The rest was accounted for easily, and gave us no clue to follow.

In spite of Frank Ogilvie's threat to the old man, we had not yet called in the aid of the police. The young fellow was, naturally, unwilling to give the case publicity, and I managed to persuade him that, between us, we should do more towards unravelling the mystery than any number of ordinary Scotland Yard men.

I have no great opinion myself of the English detectives. I hoped to extract information from Miss Madge much more cleverly than the most astute of them could do. The difficulty, however, was to see her. I trusted that since my name had not transpired on the previous day, I might obtain admittance by simply sending in my card. When, however, the servant reappeared with the information that Miss Temple was engaged, and could not possibly see me, I began to suspect that my identity was known to either father or daughter better than I thought; and I walked backward and forward along the blank street, trying to invent some other plan of seeing the lady I wished to interview. It was possible that if I waited she might come over herself and give me the chance I wanted, or her father might leave the house and give me a better opportunity of winning an entry into the house.

It was pretty early in the morning, and I had started out without having seen Ogilvie, or having told him what I meant to do, hoping to surprise him with the information I should have gained after the interview was over.

Judge of my surprise, then, as I paced slowly up and down past the green door in Pulteney Street, to see emerging from it Frank Ogilvie himself.

"You here already?" I said. "I was wondering how I could get to see Madge Temple."

"Yes," said the young man, whose face was full of sad seriousness, "your card came in while I was there, but Madge would not see you. She has just been making some revelations to me."

"Revelations that will help us?" I asked excitedly.

"I believe so. I wanted to ask you what I had better do."

"Certainly," I said. "Shall we walk towards the Park while you tell me?"

"I do not think I ought to lose sight of this garden."

"The garden? Why?"

"Because the body of Yseult is buried in it."

I stood still and stared at him in surprise. Then the remembrance of Gavin Temple's evident uneasiness while we were in the garden, and a half-suspicion which had flashed into my mind at the time, came back to me, and I asked:

"Buried by Mr. Temple?"

My companion nodded.

"But when did he do it?" I inquired. "In broad daylight, yesterday, for you saw the corpse in the coffin in the morning?"

Ogilvie shook his head.

"No; last night."

"After we had searched the house?"

"Certainly."

"Then where had he managed to conceal the body during the day?"

"That is a mystery which remains to be solved. The question is, what ought we to do now? We do not know where the spot is. I was wondering whether I ought to try and extract the information from Gavin Temple, now we know so much, or whether we ought to call the police in to assist us. Time is of so much importance."

"Why?"

The poor fellow hardly liked to confess that he had still some slight hope of finding his fiancée alive. I dispelled it at once.

"If she had been buried, there can be no doubt of her death," I said. "Even if she were alive before, the exclusion of air would prove fatal. There is no need for haste, unfortunately."

It was difficult to persuade him of the truth of my assertion. He had read in fiction, at least, of people living after burial.

"Fiction, indeed!" I said, "except in cases where the coffin has been inclosed in a vault only."

Digitized by Google

Even then he insisted on taking me back into the old garden, with the idea of starting digging operations.

"But where are you going to dig?" I asked, and the poor fellow had to admit that he could not tell.

"I know that it is at the end of the garden farthest from the house, and out of view of the windows," he said, as he walked along in the direction he mentioned. "But that is all."

"And from whom did you gain your information?" I asked. "Miss Madge?"

"Yes; I will tell you all about it after we have discovered the spot."

The spot was more difficult to discover, however, than the young man seemed to imagine. The only ground which had been disturbed was a great bare bed lying under the southern wall about sixty feet by ten, and the whole of the surface of this had been recently turned over, so that it was impossible to mark any difference in one part from another.

"It is useless for us to begin to work on this great plot," I said.

"Tell me all you know, and I will tell you then a plan I have thought out for finding out what we want."

We walked slowly backwards and forwards along the path by the side of the garden bed, while Frank Ogilvie told me what he had discovered. All the while he did so he was looking at the newly-turned earth, looking in vain for some indication which would lead him to the unconsecrated grave of the woman he loved.

"My mother it was who advised me to question Madge," he began. "She—my mother—has an intuition which seems almost miraculous. She was right in this instance. She said that Madge had a hand in causing Yseult's death."

"And she was right?"

"Yes. Madge seems to have been alone responsible for it. I will tell you all about it. After the wrong she has done me, I cannot stay to consider whether I am right or not in doing so. I called early at the house in order to see Miss Temple before her father would be up—he is a late riser—to forbid my entrance to the house, as he might do, or interfere with my cross-examination of his daughter. I found her in a very nervous and highly-wrought state, which turned out to be fortunate for my plans. It required very little on my part to gain from the ill-balanced woman a full confession. Of the beginning of our interview I ought, perhaps, not to speak. I must only say, for the sake of explaining the rest, that Miss Temple was so affected by the sight of my own grief, that she surprised me by a passionate avowal of her love for me. Then she hurried on to her confession. She had been madly jealous of Yseult, and had formed a plan of changing my fiancée's feelings with regard to me——"

"And winning you for herself?" I asked, as Ogilvie had naturally some delicacy in expressing the state of affairs.

"Yes," he said gravely. "With this view the wicked woman forged a letter in my handwriting, and showed it to Yseult. In it I was supposed to say that I regretted my engagement, since it prevented my marrying the woman I really loved."

"Good Heavens!" I exclaimed. "What villainy!"

"Yes," said my companion. "The letter must have been cleverly fabricated, for it seems to have appeared genuine to Yseult. That letter was the cause of her seizure, which I am now more than ever convinced was only a trance, and not death."

"If so," I said, "Gavin Temple is a murderer! But go on with your story. How about the burial in the garden?"

"With that the woman had nothing to do. She professes to have been conscience-stricken at the effect of her deed and the sight of my grief, and only hoped that my supposition would prove correct, and that Yseult would recover and marry me, although that would mean the destruction of all her hopes and plans."

"Her repentance was probably quite genuine," I said. "Women are strange creatures. But go on. The burial was a step of Gavin Temple's, I suppose, as you thought all along, to make certain his inheritance of the property?"

"Yes, I suppose so. How he managed to conceal the body, after taking precautions as we were at finding the coffin empty. Like me, she suspected her father. When he called in an extra gardener yesterday to help turn over this plot her suspicions were aroused, and she kept some watch on his movements. After the household had retired last night she heard her father leave his room, go quietly downstairs, and let himself out of the house. She returned to her bedroom window, to see him cross the lawn in the direction of the tool-house. He emerged with a spade, and walked over the centre grass-plot towards this end of the garden. Here the trees hid him from the window, and his daughter could only wait and imagine what he was doing. After what seemed to her a very long time, her father emerged into the light of the open lawn with the spade still in his hand. He returned it to the tool-house, and re-entered the house, stepping so softly that it was only by the closing of his bedroom door that Madge knew he had come upstairs."

Walked along in the direction he mentioned.

"That is all?" I asked, as Ogilvie paused in his account.

"Yes; but it is sufficient."

"I suppose he actually remained in the garden all the time that he was out of his daughter's sight?"

"It is almost certain. Even if he took such a round-about course to get to the gate, it is strange that he should have returned in the same manner, coming on the lawn through this opening between the trees."

"Yes, it seems pretty certain," I said, "that whatever he did, took place in the garden. You think—from the lady's account, I suppose—that he had the body hidden already somewhere in the garden when we made our search?"

"Yes; hurriedly buried, perhaps. I think he must have gone out to bury it deeper."

"And you think Miss Temple has been telling you the truth?"

"I am certain of it. I shall put it in the hands of the police—have the whole place dug up; and see that Gavin Temple is charged with murder."

"I have a plan," I said, "by which we can save ourselves the trouble of so much digging, and, at the same time, get a clearer case against the miscreant."

Ogilvie was all impatience to hear it.

"Tell Temple, this evening," I said briefly, "that you have obtained a clue, and intend having the whole south bed dug up in the morning—that you have a magistrate's order; if you do not mind the untruth. In the night we will keep watch on the garden, and, ten to one, our man will try to undo his work. We can pounce upon him in the act. Do you agree?"

Ogilvie's only objection was the delay, and I managed to persuade him that my plan would probably take up less time than the digging up of six hundred square feet of earth, to a depth of, at least, a yard.

With that settled, we took our way to Queen Anne's Gate, to recite the success of our morning's work to Mrs. Ogilvie. Frank was surprised, however, to find that his mother was not at home. She had started for St. Pancras, early in the morning, leaving only a brief message for Frank, to say that she had been summoned to her only sister's at Derby.

CHAPTER IV.

The Mystery is Cleared.

We had agreed that it would be best to give Gavin Temple the fright, by which we hoped to make him incriminate himself pretty late in the evening, in order to shorten the time during which it would be necessary for us to keep him under observation. If we told him early in the day that the garden-plot was to be searched, although it was not probable that he would attempt to remove the body before night, still the place was so secluded that there was a possibility of his making the attempt, against which we should have had to prepare. To make the warning late would, therefore, save us some hours of probably useless watching. Eight o'clock was the hour we had agreed upon, and Ogilvie was to make the announcement while I waited in the street.

The conversation lasted longer than I had expected, and it was almost nine when the young man opened the green door and beckoned me into the garden, already darkening fast with the shades of night. Our plans had all been arranged beforehand, and we crept along in silence to the southern end of the garden, taking care that we should not be observed from the house. At the south corner of the great lawn stands a little summer-house, which has a window at the back looking on the piece of ground which we were to watch.

Nothing could have suited our purpose better; and here we had agreed to remain all through the night, on the chance of Gavin Temple's coming out to undo his work of the night before.

We scarcely spoke, and only in the lowest of whispers. I was dying to smoke, but feared to do so for fear of betraying our presence before the time. I believe Ogilvie could think of nothing but the discovery which he expected to make before the night was out. He sat back on the opposite side of the open doorway, silent and motionless. The doorway opened upon the dusky lawn, and we were obliged to sit close to the wall on either side of it, for fear of being seen by anybody crossing the garden. For my own part, I found the position a most irksome and fatiguing one. I envied the composure with which poor Ogilvie remained motionless, but could not imitate it. The place seemed to swarm with creeping things.

I welcomed the coming darkness, which would render less the chances of our being observed, so that I might move a little. I was surprised at the lightness of the August night. Even at eleven the lawn, except under the yew trees, seemed almost as visible as in daylight. The hours chimed from the Westminster tower, or I should have been expecting dawn before midnight, the time seemed so long.

"Twelve o'clock," I said needlessly, as Big Ben tolled out the hour; but the slightest perceptible hiss from Ogilvie stopped me. From the house came the sound of a door opening.

After that I held my breath, listening. It seemed hours, though, before I heard another sound. It was a footstep on the gravel-path at the other side of the lawn. Then the tall, lean figure of a man came into view, crossing the grass with a spade on his shoulder. My plan had succeeded.

When we could see him no longer through the arbour doorway, we both rose, and stood watching through the little window at the back, our heads close together. Neither of us spoke a word, but I could hear Ogilvie's breath coming in drawn gasps as we saw Gavin Temple cross the garden-bed to the wall. He seemed to be measuring some length along the wall with a rod. Then there was more measuring across the bed, and then the old man began to dig.

"Shall we make our sally now? We have found the spot," said Ogilvie at last, in a whisper; but I held his arm.

"Wait!" I said, and we resumed our watching. Gavin Temple was working hard. Spadeful after spadeful of earth was thrown on the growing mound at his side. Now he had stepped into the hole which he was making, and his bent figure, still actively working, gradually sank lower and lower, showing us the depth to which he had dug. He did not stop till more than half his body was hidden; then the spadefuls of earth ceased to fly upwards, and we could see him bending down in the grave he had dug till he disappeared almost entirely. Then we saw that he was raising something with great exertion—a long oblong box, evidently.

We waited till he had lifted it to the surface, and then with one accord rushed upon him from our hiding-place.

I shall never forget the cry he gave when he caught sight of us. Down went the spade into the hole by which he was standing, and the next moment he was running towards the lawn.

My first thought was to pursue. But at the first step I stumbled on the uneven earth and fell forward.

Ogilvie helped me to rise.

"We will waste no time on him," he said. "Let us open the box."

"Here?"

"No, let us carry it home, if you are not hurt."

I assured him that my fall had done me no harm, and agreed with him that our best plan would be to carry the box to his house before attempting to open it.

The long case seemed to be of oak, and was very heavy.

"I wonder how Temple managed to carry it alone?" I said, as we lifted it with difficulty.

"Let us hope that nobody will meet us."

"No, or we shall assuredly be arrested on suspicion of having committed a burglary."

I said it quite seriously. Of course I should not have dreamt of joking, under the circumstances. But the danger seemed to me a real one, and there was the probability of a more serious charge being preferred against us if the box were opened.

However, the distance between the two houses was so small, and the hour was so late, that, after carrying our heavy burden through the green door in the wall, we met not a single soul. Gavin Temple, as we learnt later, was so startled and terror-stricken by our sudden appearance, that he had only strength left to creep into his bed, from which he did not rise again for seven weeks.

On arriving at the house in Queen Anne's Gate, Ogilvie opened the door with his latchkey, and we carried our load into the library, where he had left a light ready.

I was thoroughly worn out with the exertion of helping to carry the oaken box even such a little distance, but my companion seemed full of energy. He hurried away to find tools for breaking the box open, while I sank into an easy chair and sat regarding it.

"Gavin Temple must have had this chest specially made for the purpose," I said, when Frank came back with screwdriver, chisel, and hammer. "I think he must have had it hidden under the earth in the garden for some days—see how the earth clings to it. My idea is that yesterday, when the body disappeared, he carried it out quickly to this chest, which was already in the earth, and covered it up temporarily. Then at night he returned, screwed on the lid carefully, as we see, and buried the box deeper."

But Ogilvie was not listening. With a strange, concentrated look on his stricken face, he had been turning up the lamp and moving the furniture of the room, so that the light should fall more clearly on his work. Then he cleared the earth from one of the screws with which the solid lid was secured. I could see that all his fingers were trembling as he did so.

Before the earth was even cleared away, however, an unexpected sound made him pause. A vehicle of some sort was stopping in front of the house.

It seemed so strange at that hour of the night, that we both listened.

"Lock the door," said Ogilvie quickly, as a latchkey was heard in the hall door. "It is my mother returning. I cannot see her now. Lock the door!"

I did as he commanded and stood there listening.

Rushed upon him from our hiding-place.

Yes, it was certainly Mrs. Ogilvie's voice, speaking to someone in the hall. I suppose she had noticed the light from our window, for immediately a tap came at the locked door.

"Frank, are you there?"

The young man still knelt over the long box, the sweat standing in beads on his white face, his fingers twitching with nervous and agonised impatience to get through his task.

"For Heaven's sake, mother, leave me a little! I cannot see you just yet," he said, with a voice full of anguish. And I thought that to a woman of Mrs. Ogilvie's sympathetic nature the plea would have been sufficient; but to my surprise I heard the knob turn.

"Open the door, Frank, dear, it is more important than you think."

The thoughts flashed into my mind that she must be fearing lest her son should do himself some injury, and I hastened to make known the fact that I was in the room.

"Oh, Dr. Favel, please open the door," she said. "There is someone here who has come especially to see Frank."

Her eagerness impressed me.

"You will have to see your mother," I said, "unless I tell her."

He made no answer, so I took it into my hands to open the door and step out into the dim hall, closing the door carefully behind me. Two ladies stood there—Mrs. Ogilvie and her friend—and as I approached them, the former surprised me by hastening past me to the door, without even waiting to give me any greeting, and, turning the knob, she almost thrust her companion into the room where I had left poor Ogilvie, kneeling by the side of the box which we had brought from Pulteney Street. The old lady shut the door behind her, and turned to me.

"Excuse my rudeness, Dr. Favel," she said. "I am so excited, that I fear I hardly know what I am doing. Shall we go into the drawing room? These young people are best left alone for a little."

"But, my dear madam," I began.

The old lady interrupted me with an almost hysterical laugh.

"You are wondering who the lady can be?"

"Yes, madam."

"Can you not guess?"

I dared not make the wild guess which occurred to my mind.

The old lady laughed again.

"Yes; it is Yseult, of course. Come into the drawing-room, and I will tell you all about it."

She led the way into a handsomely furnished room, and turned up the light as she was speaking: and I, uneasy no longer, of course, about the interruption to Frank's task, prepared myself with all eagerness to hear the particulars of this remarkable and inexplicable turn of events.

Almost thrust her companion into the room.

The dear old lady was too excited to seat herself, and began at once.

"You did not think that I was joining in the search as well as you!" she said vivaciously. "And you little expected that I should be the successful one! However, I have little cause to thank my own ingenuity. Everything was done for me.

"This morning I received a letter from my sister in Derby. She had heard of Yseult's supposed death, and had previously, of course, seen her photograph.

"Well, at Derby there happened to be an old lady who had been a nurse to Yseult years ago. My sister knew her, and had, after the engagement, heard a good deal about Yseult. Well, yesterday Marian happened to be passing the nurse's house, and saw on the step a lady wonderfully like Yseult's photograph. Of course, if it had been anywhere else, she would not have thought so much of the likeness, but the coincidence struck her, and she luckily sent and told me all about it. I did not like to mention the matter to Frank, fearing to raise any false hopes in his heart; but considering that Yseult had disappeared, I thought I must go over and inquire into the matter. The consequence is that here I am, back with Yseult."

"But, my dear madam," I exclaimed, "what on earth was Miss Dunbar doing at Derby?"

"Ah! that I had to discover when I found her. I expected that there would be some little misunderstanding for me to clear up. It was a very trifling affair, after all. Mischief that Miss Madge had concocted."

"I have heard of that wicked woman's letter," I said. "Did poor Yseult believe her story?"

"Yes, silly girl! And when she recovered from her trance, she thought her best plan would be to disappear, and leave Frank free to marry Madge. She did not wish him to know, if he did not love her, that she was not dead. So she did not put on her own dress, but took from an old chest in the room a gown which she had worn in some private theatricals as a servant girl, and which she thought would prevent her being traced. She had some money in her desk which had not been touched, and with its help travelled to Derby, to the only friend whom, she thought, she had left—her old nurse. I found her there, and soon put matters straight."

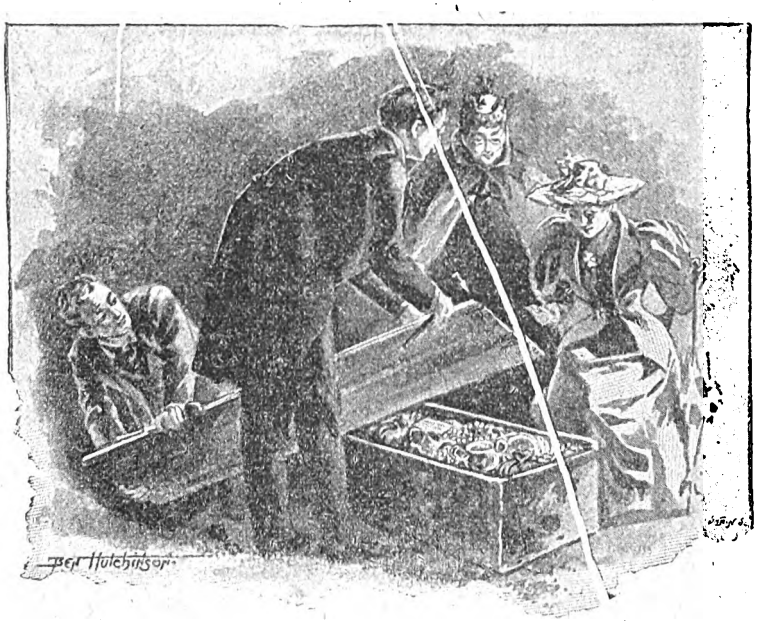
"But this is the inexplicable part," I said; and told the whole story of our doings and the finding of the box. "If it does not contain Miss Yseult's corpse, what on earth can it contain?" I wound up; and Mrs. Ogilvie laughed again. She was in the wildest of spirits at the happy ending to her son's trouble.

"Suppose we go down and see?" she suggested. "Those young people must have said all they can have to say to each other by now."

Frank and Yseult were sitting in the easy chair in the library, in a very lover-like attitude, looking as perfectly happy as two human beings very well can.

They rose as we entered, and Frank came forward to embrace and thank his mother for her part in the affair.

"We are dying to know what is in the box," said she, when she escaped from his embrace; and the young man laughed.



"It is the missing treasure!" cried Yseult.

"I had forgotten all about the coffin," he said. "Let us open it."

It was easier said than done. The screws we found were so rusted that they could not be turned, and finally we had to break it open with the chisel and hammer. Then a surprise met our eyes, a goodly collection of jewels and gold and silver ornaments.

"Why, it is the missing treasure," cried Yseult, "which could not be found when grandpapa died!"

The missing treasure it was indeed, and lying in the midst of it a letter, which told us the story of its presence in the garden. The letter was in an envelope addressed to Yseult, with, beneath the name, the inscription:

"To dear Yseult, on her wedding-day."

Luckily for our curiosity, Frank Ogilvie was too excited to pay any attention to the endorsement, but tore the envelope open, and handed the sheet which it contained to his sweetheart. Yseult read it in silence.

"It is from poor dear grandpapa!" she explained when she had finished it, seeing that we were all three devoured with curiosity. "He was always romantic. This is a plan to reward me for keeping the old garden intact. It was the last request he made to me. If I had neglected it I should have possibly lost all the family jewels and a sum of thirty thousand pounds, which he says is hidden beneath."

"Yes, here are bags of money," interjected Frank, who was leaning over the treasure-trove with the lamp in his hand.

"I suppose Gavin Temple heard all about the box from the papers in the iron box," I said, "and meant securing it?"

"No," said Yseult. "It was not to be his, the letter says if I am dead when the treasure is found, it is to go to a fund or something—which I do not quite understand."

"Which doubly explains Gavin's eagerness and secrecy," laughed Frank meaningly. "I suppose he must have either dug in the wrong place the first night, or tired himself so much that he had to give it up."

We heard later that he had dug in the wrong place from some vagueness in the old lord's directions for finding the spot—the paper speaking of the "right end" of the wall without saying from which outlook.

However, poor old Gavin's thankless labour hardly concerns us. The perfect happiness of the reunited lovers is a more pleasant consideration.

Yseult seemed damped a little when she caught sight of the envelope which had contained her letter from the dead.

"What have we done!" she exclaimed, in genuine distress. "Poor grandpapa said I was not to see this till my wedding-day, and we have read it now."

Frank Ogilvie looked at the clock on the mantelpiece, which had ticked its way merrily to the hour of three.

"The day is still young, darling," he said wickedly. "I think if we bustle round a little, we can make this the wedding-day, after all, since our banns are published already. Now I have got you back almost from the grave, I cannot bear to let you out of my sight again for a moment."

And the ardent young man's proposition was actually carried into effect.

LONGEVITY AND CORPULENCY.

We have received a copy of the just-issued eighteenth edition of Mr. F. Cecil Russell's "Corpulency and the Cure" (Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.). This issue is in itself indicative of the widespread influence which the author now exercises as a successful expert in the treatment of obesity, while the additions to the evidence which, as a statistician, he is in the habit of collecting on the subject, are suggestive of some curious reflections. It is evident that Mr. Russell is annually treating thousands of cases of excessive fat with a success which, in the rapidity and the permanency of its manifestation, is truly marvellous. That the enormous popularity of his system is likely to increase in the future is most probable, because it is free from all the drawbacks which have rendered the Banting and other methods of reducing corpulence unacceptable to the majority of the sufferers, who have regarded these cures as rather worse than the complaint. By attacking the causes rather than the symptoms of obesity, he strengthens the digestive organs, thus actually increasing instead of decreasing the appetite; while the surplus weight is being reduced at a wonderfully rapid rate, amounting to pounds per week, and often stones per month. Add to this that there is no mystery about the nature of the absolutely innocuous preparation, the recipe for which Mr. Russell supplies in his capital little volume (256 pages), which may be obtained, post free, by sending two penny stamps to the author's offices, at the address given above. It seems certain, therefore, that, as a result of the happy revolution which the patient research of this specialist, with the aid of a distinguished physician as a collaborateur, has affected, the average of longevity will, before long, be appreciably raised. Obesity is, indeed, one of the few antagonistic influences remaining which, especially among the more prosperous classes, prevent the great majority of people of both sections becoming centenarians. With advanced ideas in regard to wholesome food, clothing, and sanitary arrangements, it only remains to get rid of clogging fat to live an ideally hygienic, and therefore, a very prolonged life.—Belfast Evening Telegraph.

DRINK AND CORPULENCY.

Dr. Lorenzen, the Earlangen physician, has been writing on the subject of the influence of liquors on corpulency. He made an experiment upon himself. For a space of four years he drank over two gallons daily, and for a further five years the quantity ranged from about half. In this way he succeeded in increasing his weight by five and a half stones, and he became corpulent. On discontinuing the liquids, he lost one stone in a week, and the difficulties attending respiration ceased. He endeavours to explain on the hypothesis that the cells whose province it is to decompose albumen, when a large quantity of fluid is taken, extend part of their energy in the combustion of fat. The fat they consume is replaced by fat from the tissues. All this seemed to be superfluous if intended to be of use to those who are suffering from obesity, for it simply proves that if one gives up their drink there is hope for them, but not otherwise. This is rather behind the times, for the English specialist, Mr. Russell, permits his followers to drink as much as they choose, and yet reduces them in weight as fast as the figures given by Dr. Lorenzen, which is all important. Is life worth living if one's supply of liquor is to be suddenly cut off? Mr. Russell's reduction is achieved by a clever concoction of mallows and other field herbs of the simplest nature, which has to be taken three times a day for a certain period. It is said to be extremely pleasant to the palate, tasting like a sort of lemonade, and upon the prescribed quantity as much as 4lb. in severe cases has been reduced in twenty-four hours. We have not more space to follow this interesting subject, but readers should send two stamps to Mr. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, London, W.C., who publishes a book called "Corpulency and the Cure," which contains a pithy, sensible treatise on corpulency which should certainly be read by all who are victims to obesity.—Kentish Gazette, January 16th, 1897.

THE MISERY OF CORPULENCY.

A copy has come to hand of the just-issued eighteenth edition of Mr. F. Cecil Russell's "Corpulency, and the Cure" (256 pages), the clever little volume which, more than anything else, has brought about a revolution in the treatment of obesity. That the still larger circulation implied by the issue of the new edition of this popular work is necessary is proved by such a paragraph as the following. It appears among the answers to correspondents in the "Dress and Fashion" column of a Sunday newspaper, with a large circulation: "Miserable.—A young girl of eighteen ought not to be so stout that no dress looks well. Perhaps you require exercise and dieting." The helpless vagueness of this reply to a young girl who is naturally "miserable" on account of her unseemly obesity is a sufficient evidence that Mr. Russell does well in seeking to make known even more widely than they are at present, the simplicity, the efficiency, the rapidity, and the delightful surroundings of his treatment for the reduction of superabundant fat. The young girl in question, who might exercise and diet herself for months without any appreciable improvement, may easily learn to imitate the example of thousands of ladies of all ages who, by the use of Mr. Russell's pure vegetable preparation, have reduced their weight at the rate of pounds per week, and sometimes (but only when necessary, for the working of the cure is virtually automatic, stopping its effects when the normal limit is reached) stones per month. She may acquire this open secret—for the author makes no mystery about the recipe—by sending 2d. in stamps to Mr. Russell's offices, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., when a copy of the book will be sent post free. If she follows his instruction, "Miserable," without any fasting regimen, and without excessive exercise, will find herself being quickly reduced to shapely proportions, with an improved appetite, and full liberty to gratify it. Teignmouth Post, January 8th, 1897.

Answers to Correspondents.

On page 599 will be found the first batch of sketches in a new series of Picture Puzzles. Everybody has an opportunity of obtaining a list of the names of British and Irish Peers. The best thing for you to do, is to get your children to compete. It cannot be but beneficial for them to become familiar with the names of Peers of the Realm, and you, yourself, will find the task both profitable and interesting.

H. H. B.—In proportion to their income, British people spend more upon their food than any other European nation.

G. B.—Certainly, the elephant has a nose, although it is not his trunk as you suppose. In fact, it is not easily seen, consisting of a single nostril, which extends from the air passages in the head, and has its opening in the roof of the mouth, near to the front.

D. D. B.—The largest square in London is Eaton Square. It measures 607,327 square feet. Your story is quite a good one.

P. C. P.—Rainbows are most frequently seen in the afternoon, when the sun is in the west, and the raineloud come from the west, clearing up as they go towards the east.

T. L. H.—Dartmoor is the largest tract of uncultivated land in England.

W. A. T.—The heart of the average woman beats faster than that of the average man.

A. N. W. has often been puzzled by the mysterious words "Ancient Lights" which he has often seen on old buildings.————When the windows of a house have been allowed to remain unobstructed from the light for the term of twenty years, the proprietor erects a sign of this sort, and the owner of the adjoining land then loses all legal right to build a wall, or erect a screen of any kind which would prevent the light of day from being freely transmitted through those windows.

A. L. B.—In proportion to its population, the United States of America has more theatres than any other country.

D. D.—Yes, gold has occasionally been found in Great Britain in small quantities.

R. S. T.—Although it is possible to tame a tiger if it is taken when very young, I should not advise you to try it. It is a dangerous experiment, and might cost you dear, for their temper is not to be relied upon.

H. H.—Your doctor is quite right. It is seldom that over-work kills a man, but the worry and mental strain which so often accompanies it, that proves fatal to him.

B. R. D.—You need have no fear of the population of the world becoming extinct. Even though the birth-rate is decreasing in several countries, the population generally is on the increase. Although families may be smaller now than they were of old, the members are stronger and hardier on the whole than they were.

C. A. W.—Thanks for your letter. Yes, dyspepsia is a dreadful thing. Try sipping a cup of hot water slowly, half-an-hour before each meal.

D. B. W.—No, the natives of India are not great lovers of cleanliness. The consumption of soap in India only reaches the modest amount of one ounce per head annually.

Hostess.—A room certainly does get oppressively hot during a long dinner, unless it is very well ventilated. A block of ice placed on a tray, or in a china basin, and covered with green leaves, ferns, and vines, has a charming effect, and will cool the atmosphere considerably.

Hippomenes.—To make invisible ink which is colourless, but turns yellow on being heated, dissolve sulphate of copper and sal ammoniac in equal parts of water. Cork tightly and use carefully.

G. J.—Probably the oldest wooden building in the world is a church at Borgund in Norway. It was built in the eleventh century, and has been protected by frequent coatings of pitch. It is made of pine wood.

A. B. B.—The salmon is undoubtedly the swiftest of fish. When it is necessary it can travel under the water at the rate of from twenty to twenty-five miles an hour.

A. C. B.—No, it is not true that pennies coined in the year 1864 are worth any more than a penny. The report that a bar of gold or silver had accidentally been melted with the copper in that year was entirely false, and the bronze coinage of that year has not been called in.

B. D.—I shouldn't think that you would make much profit out of silkworms, for it takes 2,800 insects to raise one pound of silk.

D. S. D. wishes to know how it is that if one has sufficient faith to grasp a nettle firmly, it does not sting. ————The stem of the nettle is covered with little hairs, each of which is terminated with a little cap containing an acrid fluid. When touched gently, the point of the hair enters the skin and injects the fluid, causing a stinging sensation. If grasped firmly, the cap is broken off lower down, and thus can do no injury.

C. C.—Far from being injurious, it is extremely beneficial to have plants in a living room, so long as they are not strong-scented.

Ivy.—The custom of calling real silver spoons, forks, etc., "plate" came from the Spanish word plata, meaning "silver."

R. C. M.—Perhaps the reason your beard grows so much stronger on one side than the other, is because you are in the habit of always sleeping on one side, the pressure of the pillow hindering the growth. This frequently does happen.

B. T. T.—The reason the lectern of a church is generally made in the form of an eagle is because the eagle is the natural enemy of the serpent, and as the serpent is symbolic of the enemy of the church, I think you will agree with me that the idea is most appropriate.

G. S.—Taken on the whole, Europeans have stronger, clearer, and altogether better voices, than the inhabitants of other countries. I should certainly advise you to take lessons in singing, if your voice is at all promising.

S. R.—A simple method of softening water is to expose it in the open air. The action of the atmosphere will soften it considerably.

M. B.—A pound troy of gold with alloy is divisible into a little over forty-five sovereigns. A pound troy of silver will produce sixty-six shillings.

A really interesting little medical work dealing with the digestive organs has been issued by Guy's Tonic Company. Technical language has been avoided as far as possible, and it is replete with information regarding every sort of diet. It is sent free of charge from the company in question, whose address is 12, Buckingham Palace Road, S.W.

An excellent assortment of medals in commemoration of Her Majesty's Diamond Jubilee has been sent me by Messrs. Spink and Son, of 17, Piccadilly. They are very charming to look at, and the workmanship is distinctly good.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87, Alexandra Road, Norwich.

"GENTLEMEN,—I have had some boxes of your Tablets for my wife, and she has derived great benefit from them.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Illustrated Family Novelist, November 30th, 1895, says: "A great many women who are plump by nature worry about their stoutness. However, there are some perfectly safe remedies for embonpoint, among them being the Trilene Tablets, which are not only safe, but absolutely beneficial to the general health, and speedily produce the desired effect."

MR. TAYLOR, Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "I have lost quite 2 stone since taking your Tablets."

"6, Brighton Terrace, Hull.

"MRS. JOHNSON has much pleasure in saying she has derived great benefit from your Tablets."

"3, Castle Road, Deal.

"MRS. J. PEARSON is glad to say she is much thinner."

Convalescent Home, New Brighton, Cheshire.

MISS S. J. PRITCHARD says: "They have done me good. I am 21lb. lighter already."

"Bretton West, near Wakefield.

"MISS L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of Tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

MRS. HUTCHINSON, 46, Irwell Street, Widnes, Lancashire, writes: "I have taken three boxes and am reduced a stone."

A. D. BILLINGS, Bell Inn, Aldershot, writes: "Have derived great benefit already. Less in size and weight, and breathing greatly improved."

25, Windsor Terrace, Penarth, Cardiff.

MISS M. FLAVELL says: "I have lost 2 stone, and am much better in health."

Extract from Bury and Suffolk Times, June 15th, 1894: "Miss Atherton sings and dances as piquantly as ever, and is a marvel of agility, considering how much flesh she has put on of late. Her friends should induce her to take a course of Trilene Tablets, about which I hear wonderful things. One portly acquaintance of my own by merely a few weeks' use of these little Tablets, has reduced his bulk perceptibly. I am assured the Tablets are harmless and tasteless, and that the Trilene Company in Finsbury Pavement, London, are doing an enormous and ever-increasing trade."

MR. GILLESPIE, 50, Chancer Road, Forest Gate, Essex, says: "I have lost just 3 stone."

2, Chariot Street, Hull.

MR. JUBB, Chemist, says: "My customers speak highly of your Tablets."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.

MR. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17½ stone, and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

MR. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17 stone, was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15 stone."

Aspern, 29, King's Hall Road, Beckenham.

MISS S. WOODHOUSE writes: "I have much pleasure in stating that your Tablets are really a safe cure for stoutness; they have cured me, and I am a perfect figure now."

MRS. GIBBON, of Radford Cottage, Bitterne, says: "I have derived great benefit from your Tablets, especially abdominal."

The Lady, October 8th, 1896 (giving advice to a reader who complained of stoutness), says: "The Trilene Tablets help to reduce stoutness, if taken daily; they are made of purely vegetable ingredients, and are quite harmless."

No. 437.] For the Week ending May 15th, 1897. [ONE PENNY.

DEEDS THAT WON THE EMPIRE.

XI.—THE SHANNON AND THE CHESAPEAKE.

ON the early morning of June 1st, 1813, a solitary British frigate, H.M.S. Shannon, was cruising within sight of Boston lighthouse. She was a ship of about 1,000 tons, and bore every mark of long and hard service. No gleam of colour sparkled about her. Her sides were rusty, her sails weather-stained; a solitary flag flew from her mizzen-peak, and even its blue had been bleached by sun and rain and wind to a dingy grey. A less romantic and more severely practical ship did not float, and her captain was of the same type as the ship.

Captain Philip Bowes Vere Broke was an Englishman to the core, and of a type happily not uncommon. His fame will live as long as the British flag flies, yet a more sober and prosaic figure can hardly be imagined. He was not, like Nelson, a quarter-deck Napoleon; he had no gleam of Dundonald's matchless brilliancy. He was as deeply religious as Havelock, or one of Cromwell's major-generals; he had the frugality of a Scotsman, and the heavy-footed common-sense of a Hollander.

He was as nautical as a web-footed bird, and had no more "nerves" than a fish—a domestic Englishman, whose heart was always with the little girls at Brokehall, in Suffolk, but for whom the service of his country was a piety.

A sober-suited, half-melancholy common-sense was Broke's characteristic, and he had applied it to the working of his ship, till he had made the vessel, perhaps, the most formidable fighting machine of her size afloat. He drilled his gunners until, from the swaying platform of their decks, they shot with a deadly coolness and accuracy nothing floating could resist.

Broke, as a matter of fact, owed his famous victory over the Chesapeake to one of his matter-of-fact precautions. The first broadside fired by the Chesapeake sent a 32-pound shot through one of the gun-room cabins into the magazine passage of the Shannon, where it might easily have ignited some grains of loose powder and blown the ship up, if Broke had not taken the precaution of elaborately damping that passage before the action began. The prosaic side of Broke's character is very amusing. In his diary he records his world-famous victory thus:

"June 1st. Off Boston. Moderate."

"N.W.—W(rote) Laurence."

"P.M.—Took Chesapeake."

Was ever a shining victory packed into fewer or duller words? Broke's scorn of the histrionic is shown by his reply to one of his own men who, when the Chesapeake, one blaze of fluttering colours, was bearing down upon her drab-coloured opponent, said to his commander, eyeing the bleached and solitary flag at the Shannon's peak:

"Mayn't we have three ensigns, sir, like she has?"

"No," said Broke, "we have always been an unassuming ship!"

EDITED BY C. A. PEARSON OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY

Digitized by Google

And yet this unromantic English sailor had a gleam of Don Quixote in him. On this pleasant summer morning he was waiting alone, under easy sail, outside a hostile port, strongly fortified and full of armed vessels, waiting for an enemy's ship bigger than himself to come and fight him!

He had sent in the previous day, by way of challenge, a letter that recalls the days of chivalry.

"As the Chesapeake," he wrote to Laurence, its captain, "appears now ready for sea, I request that you will do me the favour to meet the Shannon with her, ship to ship." He proceeded to explain the exact armament of the Shannon, the number of her crew, the interesting circumstance that he was short of provisions and water, and that he had sent away his consort so that the terms of the duel might be fair.

"If you will favour me," he says, "with any plan of signals or telegraph, I will warn you should any of my friends be too nigh, while you are in sight, until I can detach them out of the way. Or," he suggests, coaxingly, "I would sail under a flag of truce to any place you think safest from our cruisers, hauling it down when fair to begin hostilities. Choose your terms," he concludes, "but let us meet."

Having sent this amazing letter, this middle-aged, unromantic, but hard-fighting captain climbed at daybreak to his own maintop, and sat there till half-past eleven, watching the challenged ship, to see if her foretopsail were unloosed and she were coming out to fight.

It is easy to understand the causes which kindled a British sailor of even Broke's unimaginative temperament into flame. On June 18th, 1812, the United States, with magnificent audacity, declared war against Great Britain, which, at that particular time, had 621 efficient cruisers at sea, 102 being line-of-battle ships. The American navy consisted of eight frigates and twelve corvettes. It is true that Britain was at war at the same moment with half the civilised world; but what reasonable chance had the tiny naval power of the United States against the mighty fleets of Britain, commanded by men trained in the school of Nelson, and rich with the traditions of the Nile and Trafalgar?

As a matter of fact, in the war which followed, the commerce of the United States was swept out of existence. But the Americans were of the same fighting stock as the English; to the Viking blood, indeed, they added Yankee ingenuity and resource, making a very formidable combination; and up to the June morning, when the Shannon was waiting outside Boston Harbour for the Chesapeake, the naval honours of the war belonged to the Americans.

The Americans had no fleet, and the campaign was one of single ship against single ship, but in these combats the Americans had scored more successes in twelve months than French seamen had gained in twelve years. The Guerriere, the Java, and the Macedonian had each been captured in single combat, and every British post-captain betwixt Portsmouth and Halifax was swearing with mere fury.

The Americans were shrewd enough to invent a new type of frigate which, in strength of frame, weight of metal, and general fighting power, was to a British frigate of the same class almost what an ironclad would be to a wooden ship. The Constitution, for example, was in size to the average British frigate as 15·3 to 10·9; in weight of metal as 76 to 51; and in crew as 46 to 25. Broke, however, had a well-founded belief in his ship and his men, and he proposed, in his sober fashion, to restore the tarnished honour of his flag by capturing single-handed the best American frigate afloat.

The Chesapeake was a fine ship, perfectly equipped, under a daring and popular commander. Laurence was a man of brilliant ingenuity and courage, and had won fame four months before by capturing in the Hornet, after a hard fight, the British brig-of-war Peacock. For this feat he had been promoted to the Chesapeake, and in his brief speech from the quarter-deck, just before the fight with the Shannon began, he called up the memory of the fight which made him a popular hero by exhorting his crew to "Peacock her, my lads! Peacock her!"

The Chesapeake was larger than the Shannon, its crew was nearly a hundred men stronger, its weight of fire 598lb., as against the Shannon's 538lb. Her guns fired double-headed shot, and bars of wrought iron, connected by links and loosely tied by a few rope yarns, which when discharged from the gun spread out and formed a flying iron chain six feet long. Its canister shot contained jagged pieces of iron, broken bolts, and nails.

As the British had a reputation for boarding, a large barrel of unslacked lime was provided to fling in the faces of the boarders. An early shot from the Shannon, by the way, struck this cask of lime and scattered its contents in the faces of the Americans themselves! Part of the equipment of the Chesapeake consisted of several hundred pairs of handcuffs, intended for the wrists of English prisoners; Boston citizens prepared a banquet in honour of the victors for the same evening; and a small fleet of pleasure-boats followed the Chesapeake as she came gallantly out to the fight.

Never was a braver, shorter, or more murderous fight. Laurence, the most gallant of men, bore steadily down, without firing a shot, to the starboard quarter of the Shannon. When within fifty yards he luffed; his men sprang into the shrouds and gave three cheers. Broke fought with characteristic silence and composure. He forbade his men to cheer, enforced the sternest silence along his deck, and ordered the captain of each gun to fire as his piece bore on the enemy.

"Fire into her quarters," he said, "main-deck into main-deck, quarter-deck into quarter-deck. Kill the men, and the ship is yours!"

The sails of the Chesapeake swept betwixt the saluting rays of the evening sun and the Shannon, the drifting shadow darkened the English main-deck ports, the rush of the enemy's cut-water could be heard through the grim silence of the Shannon's decks.

Suddenly there broke out the first gun from the Shannon; then her whole side leapt into flame. Never was a more fatal broadside discharged! A tempest of shot, splinter, torn hammocks, cut rigging, and wreck of every kind was hurled like a cloud across the deck of the Chesapeake, and of 150 men at station there, more than a hundred were killed or wounded. A more fatal loss to the Americans instantly followed, as Captain Laurence, the fiery soul of his ship, was shot through the abdomen by a British marine, and fell mortally wounded.

The answering thunder of the Chesapeake's guns, of course, rolled out, and then, following quick, the overwhelming blast of the Shannon's broadside once more. Each ship, indeed, fired two full broadsides, and as the guns fell quickly out of range, part of another broadside. The firing of the Chesapeake was furious and deadly enough to have disabled an ordinary ship.

It is computed that forty effective shots would be enough to disable a frigate; the Shannon during the six minutes of the firing was struck by no fewer than 158 shots, a fact which proves the steadiness and power of the American fire. But the fire of the Shannon was overwhelming. In those same six fatal minutes she smote the Chesapeake with no fewer than 362 shots, an average of sixty shots of all sizes every minute, against the Chesapeake's twenty-eight shots. The Chesapeake was fir-built, and the British shot riddled her.

One Shannon broadside party raked the Chesapeake and literally smashed the stern cabins and battery to mere splinters, as completely as though a procession of aerolites had torn through it.

The swift, deadly, concentrated fire of the British in two quick-following broadsides practically decided the combat. The partially disabled vessels drifted together, and the Chesapeake fell on board the Shannon, her quarter striking the starboard main chains. Broke, as the ships ground together, looked over the blood-splashed decks of the American and saw the men deserting the quarter-deck guns, under the terror of another broadside at so short a distance.

"Follow me who can!" he shouted, and with characteristic coolness "stepped"—in his own phrase—across the Chesapeake's bulwark. He was followed by some thirty-two seamen and eighteen marines — fifty British boarders leaping upon a ship with a crew of 400 men, a force which, even after the dreadful broadside of the Shannon, still numbered 270 unwounded men in its ranks.

It is absurd to deny to the Americans courage of the very finest quality, but the amazing and unexpected severity of the Shannon's fire had destroyed for the moment their morale, and the British were in a mood of victory. The boatswain of the Shannon, an old Rodney man, lashed the two ships together, and in the act had his left arm literally hacked off by repeated strokes of a cutlass and was killed.

One British midshipman, followed by five topmen, crept along the Shannon's foreyard and stormed the Chesapeake's foretop, killing the men stationed there, and then swarmed down by a back stay to join the fighting upon the deck.

Another middy tried to attack the Chesapeake's mizzen-top from the starboard mainyard arm, but being hindered by the foot of the topsail, stretched himself out on the mainyard arm, and from that post shot three of the enemy in succession.

Meanwhile the fight on the deck had been short and sharp; some of the Americans leapt overboard and others rushed below: and Laurence, lying wounded in his steerage, saw the wild reflux of his own men down the after-ladders. On asking what it meant, he was told the ship was boarded, and those were the Chesapeake's men driven from the upper decks by the English. This so exasperated the dying man that he called out repeatedly:

"Then blow her up; blow her up!"

The fight lasted exactly thirteen minutes: the broadside occupied six minutes, the boarding seven, and in thirteen minutes after the first shot the British flag was flying over the American ship; the Shannon and Chesapeake were bearing up, side by side, for Halifax! The spectators in the pleasure boats were left ruefully staring at the spectacle; those American handcuffs, so thoughtfully provided, were on American wrists; and the Boston citizens had to consume, with what appetite they might, their own banquet.

The carnage on the two ships was dreadful. In thirteen minutes 252 men were either killed or wounded, an average of nearly twenty men for every minute the fight lasted. In the combat betwixt these two frigates, in fact, nearly as many men were struck down as in the whole battle of Navarino! The Shannon itself lost as many men as any seventy-four gun ship ever lost in battle.

Judge Haliburton, famous as "Sam Slick," when a youth of seventeen boarded the Chesapeake, as the two battered ships sailed into Halifax.

"The deck," he wrote "had not been cleaned, and the coils and folds of rope were steeped in gore as if in a slaughter-house. Pieces of skin, with pendant hair, were adhering to the sides of the ship; and in one place I noticed portion of fingers protruding, as if thrust through the outer walls of the frigate!"

Watts, the first lieutenant of the Shannon, was killed by the fire of his own ship in a very remarkable manner. He boarded, with his captain, with his hands pulled down the Chesapeake's flag, and hastily bent on halliards the British ensign, as he thought, above the stars and stripes, and then re-hoisted it. In the hurry he had bent the British flag under the stars and stripes, instead of above it, and the gunners of the Shannon, seeing the American stripes going up first, opened fire instantly on the group at the foot of the mizzen-mast, blew the top of their own unfortunate lieutenant's head off with a grape shot, and killed three or four of their own men!

Captain Broke was desperately wounded in a curious fashion. A group of Americans, who had laid down their arms, saw the British captain standing for a moment alone on the break of the forecastle. It seemed a golden chance! They snatched up their weapons lying on the deck, and leapt upon him.

Warned by the shout of the sentry, Broke turned round to find three of the enemy with uplifted weapons rushing on him. He parried the middle fellow's pike, and wounded him in the face, but was instantly struck down with a blow from the butt end of a musket, which laid bare his skull. He also received a slash from the cutlass of the third man, which clove a portion of the skull completely away and left the brain bare.

He fell, and was grappled on the deck by the man he had first wounded, a powerful fellow, who got the uppermost and raised a bayonet to thrust through Broke. At this moment a British marine came running up, and concluding that the man underneath must be an American, also raised his bayonet to give coup de grace.

"Pooh, pooh, you fool," said Broke in the most matter-of-fact fashion, "Don't you know your captain?" whereupon the marine changed the direction of his thrust and killed the American.

The news reached London on July 7th, and was carried straight to the House of Commons, where Lord Cochrane was just concluding a fierce denunciation of the Admiralty on the ground of disasters suffered from the Americans, and Croker, the secretary to the Admiralty, was able to tell the story of the fight off Boston to the wildly cheering House as a complete defence of his department. Broke was at once created a baronet and a Knight of the Bath.

In America, on the other hand, the story of the fight was received with mingled wrath and incredulity. "I remember," says Rush, afterwards U.S. Minister at the Court of St. James, "at the first rumour of it, the universal incredulity. I remember how the post-offices were thronged for successive days with anxious thousands, how collections of citizens rode out for miles on the highway to get the earliest news the mail brought. At last, when the certainty was known, I remember the public gloom, the universal badges of mourning. 'Don't give up the ship,' the dying words of Laurence were on every tongue."

It was a great fight, the most memorable and dramatic sea-duel in naval history. The combatants were men of the same stock, and fought with equal bravery. Both nations, in fact, may be proud of a fight so frank, so fair, so gallant. The world, we may hope, will never witness another Shannon engaged in the fierce wrestle of battle with another Chesapeake, for the Union Jack and the Stars and Stripes are knitted together by a bond woven of common blood and speech, and political ideals that grow stronger every year.

For years the Shannon and the Chesapeake lay peacefully side by side in the Medway, and the two famous ships might well have been preserved as trophies. The Chesapeake was bought by the Admiralty after the fight for exactly £21,314 11s. 11½d., and six years afterwards she was sold as mere old timber for £500, was broken up, and to-day stands as a Hampshire flour mill, peacefully grinding English corn. But still on the mill timbers can be seen the marks of the grape and round shot of the Shannon.

A MURDER IN VAIN.

The frail figure propped up with pillows, the hectic spot of colour on her sunken cheeks, the bright eyes and hacking cough, told their tale only too well. Perhaps it was Fate that when the public had just recognised the strange genius of her books, Isobel Sutton should be dying.

Outside, a bleak December day was drawing to its close. A sharp, biting wind and leaden sky foretold a heavy fall of snow in the night. A bright fire burning in the grate helped to make the room look less cheerless, but it was poorly furnished, containing little else besides bare necessaries.

Crouched by the hearth was a man—almost a stranger to the invalid. It was more than nine years since Michael Sutton had deserted his wife and child, but he had turned up to-night—perhaps Fate again had willed it—to see her die.

With an effort the sick woman raised herself on her elbow and peered at her husband. There was sufficient glow from the fire to light up the man's shrunken figure. It was the same face she had known long ago, but how altered! The bloated, disfigured features spoke for themselves. It was the face of a drunkard. She shuddered and fell back.

"It is getting dark—light the candle and put it by my bed, and then——" she hesitated, but only for a moment, "then tell me what you have come for."

With an unsteady hand he did as she bid him. And the matches fell out of the box on to a roll of manuscript. He bent forward and scanned it eagerly.

"What's that?"

"Mine," and Isobel Sutton covered the MS. with her hand as though to protect it from his greedy gaze, "a novel—the last I shall ever write."

"A novel—yours—is it sold?" he asked breathlessly.

"Not yet."

"Finished?"

"Yes."

"Then it's worth a lot of money?"

"Yes, a lot of money," she repeated.

He sank on the bed and sat there rubbing his hands together gleefully.

Michael Sutton dreaded work—his whole life had been one long scheme to avoid it, but lately he had come to the end of everything, and nothing seemed to face him but the workhouse.

Now all was changed, for he was sufficiently sober to realize a small fortune lay within his grasp. Money meant drink, and drink to him was all life was worth living for.

With his eyes still fixed on his newly-found treasure, he took a flask from his pocket and commenced to drink its fiery contents.

Weak as she was, Isobel Sutton turned from him with loathing. She guessed his thoughts, but a will made and given to a neighbour would spoil his plans.

Rousing herself with a great effort she began to speak.

"I have known for some time I am dying, and I have had a hard struggle to finish this book. It will be worth more when I am dead. But it is all for Edith, she will need every farthing of it, poor child, when I am gone."

She was about to say more, but a fit of coughing seized her, leaving her almost prostrate.

Michael Sutton made no reply, but sat clasping the flask in his hand, with a vacant smile of semi-intoxication on his face.

His one idea was to get possession of the precious manuscript, but his brain was so addled with drink that he could think of nothing but that he dare not touch it now, and to-morrow would be too late.

He glanced towards the bed. The fit of coughing had brought on a sort of stupor.

Should he seize the roll of paper and escape with it?

Beads of perspiration rolled down his forehead as he gasped:

"Let's open the window—it's devilish hot."

She was so exhausted as to be hardly aware of his presence, but his voice seemed to recall her partly to her senses.

"Don't—don't," she whispered, "unless you want to see me die. The doctor said in my state it would kill me."

He stood staring at her with drunken solemnity. Then all at once an idea penetrated his muddled brain.

With unsteady footsteps he crossed the room, his dull, sodden face lit up with satisfaction. Slowly, deliberately, he threw up the window. Immediately a wave of cold air rushed into the room, driving with it little crisp flakes of snow.

The piercing cold of the night air seemed to partly restore the drunkard to his senses, as he stood there, shivering and helpless, a vague look of horror on his face.

Isobel Sutton lay stretched on the bed perished with cold. She was too weak to utter a sound, but gasped for breath. And so the long hours of the night passed slowly by.

At the first approach of dawn, the dying woman flung out her arms in the last struggle for life, and overturned the candle.

The guilty wretch cowering in the dark, fancied he could see a blue light flickering by the bedside, and buried his face in his hands to shut out the ghastly sight. Presently the light went out, and a strong smell of burning filled the room.

With a howl of rage, Sutton realised what had happened, and sprang forward to rescue the burning MS. But he was too late. The candle had completed its work, and all that remained of the dead woman's book was a smouldering heap of charred paper.

Bella was looking uncommonly vicious that morning as she swung the General's high dog-cart round to the door, with two grooms dragging at her head and a third hastily taking in a hole of the kicking-strap.

Clinda and I stood in the porch and glanced over her critically. I own to you I did not like the look of her at all.

Clinda is the thorough-bred daughter of the old General—I must drop this horsey style of talking, but three years in Mexico does not polish one's conversation particularly—and knew no fear for anything in the way of horseflesh. And that made me the more nervous, for if anything should happen to her——

I dropped the thought, and looked at Bella again. Her little ears were laid flat back on her arched head, her eyes looked white and vicious, her polished hoofs scattered the pebbles of the gravel as she pawed impatiently at the drive.

"Well," said I, "who's to take the lines?"

I lit a cigarette, as is my invariable method when nervous. It gives one the appearance of being very calm.

Clinda was already in the box seat, whip and reins in hand.

"Come," she cried gaily, "don't keep Bella waiting for you."

I sprang up hastily after her.

"Let her go," cried Clinda. "Steady, girl, steady," and the grooms dropped away, and the mare jerked angrily forward, and swung down the drive with long, ground-covering strides.

I leant back in my seat and glanced up at the pretty profile beside me. But the pace was too fast for love dreams, and I found myself watching the mare's ears, and noticing how she tucked her tail in underneath her. For these signs have meanings to Mexicans.

"Steady, girl, steady," said Clinda, as the pace increased, and the gates at the end of the drive came in view. Now, the General's gates are not as the gates of a respectable house should be, but set close together, and the drive turns sharp round, with no sweep to speak of, into the main road.

Clinda leant forward, and I threw away my cigarette, and held fast to the sides of the cart, while the gates came nearer and nearer, and the pace became faster; and then they were on us.

There was a click, a second's pause, the gate-posts shook, a splinter flew from the wheel, and then Bella's head went down, and her hoofs rattled against the splash-board, and a moment later she was rushing madly away up the road, while Clinda's tiny hands tugged furiously at the reins, as though she had strength to stop the runaway brute.

"Let me have her, Clinda," I cried—I remember distinctly that I said "Clinda"—"give me the reins, dear," and I leant forward, and she gave them to me quietly, and sat still on the box seat, like a sensible girl, for she realised our danger.

I twisted one rein round each hand, Mexican fashion, and, leaning back, worked at the bit with all my strength. But I was on the wrong seat, and felt below my work, while the strain and pain of my muscles told me that they had lost some of their power since last I pulled in a runaway horse.

The road that she swept behind was sandy soil, and ran for a mile from the General's gates up a gentle slope. On either side were steep green banks covered with fir trees. The road was so narrow that there was scarce room for two carts to pass. The mare's head was low down out of view, her flying feet fell regularly with giant strides on the sand, the cart rolled with a gentle swaying motion, a cool breeze blew on our faces. And the bit was fastened in Bella's teeth as a rock in the earth, and no human power could shake it.

As yet I had no fear but that I should have her in hand before we reached the hill-top. A mile's sharp gallop, with two people in a high cart behind, is as much as the ordinary horse would care for. I worked furiously at the reins, and threw myself back with Herculean force, and employed every cunning art that I knew.

But the trees swept passed us, and the wheels rolled swiftly on.

Then gradually Bella slackened her pace, and the proud head, bit by bit, came higher. I felt that I almost had her in hand. I threw a glance over my shoulder and I saw something that made me, I am ashamed to say, swear fiercely.

Following us up the hill, the sun glistening on the spokes of the wheels, his head bent low over the handle-bars, rode—a fiend on a bicycle.

I say a fiend, for no human being would have ridden up the hill on that blazing July day at the pace that it was riding. We were galloping madly up the road as fast as horse could lay hoof to the ground, but that fiend rode faster. Clinda, hearing my fierce words, turned her head, and then shrieked, and taking the whip in both hands, fell to furiously flogging Bella.

"Why?" I stammered.

"It's our only chance," said Bella. "We must tire her out before the top, or—the down hill—we shall be killed. Hurry, hurry!"

Digitized by Google

I knew that she spoke truly, and that galloping Bella down the hill meant death. Our only chance lay in having her firmly in hand before the brow of the hill was reached. We knew full well that at sight of the bicycle, Bella, in her excited state, would run mad. The General had warned me of this peculiarity of the mare's before we had started. She hated a bicycle with all the proud blood in her veins as a woman hates a rival.

"Your only chance," the General said, "if you see a bicycle coming, is to jump out and hold her head until it has passed."

Therefore, I hurried Bella on up the hill with whip and voice, with the hopes of tiring her out, and then being able to spring to her bridle, and wait until the bicycle fiend had passed, and so avert catastrophe. Gradually I felt her pace slacken, her stride shorten, and saw her head come higher. There was no doubt that her bolt was over. I breathed again.

"Be careful; the bicycle is just behind." Bella's voice rang in my ears. I threw myself back on the reins, and cried out to the man to stop until I could reach the horse's head. It was too late.

Ting! Ting!

The metallic sound of a bicycle bell rang out on the air. A second later the fiend on the bicycle, unheeding my cries, shot by us, and Bella leapt in the air. The man leered up at me as he passed.

* * * * *

When it was all over I followed Clinda on to the General's lawn, where tea was being served under the shade of the trees, and where the hot sun found it impossible to penetrate. A tea-party seemed to be going on. I saw the General, and the Generaless, and the Eldest Son, and a score of others ranged round them. No doubt all were eager to hear our adventures.

The Eldest Son came forward with tea and cakes in either hand, and asked how we had enjoyed ourselves. I refused the tea and sank with a groan into a chair. Grim irony indeed to offer tea and cakes to a man who has narrowly escaped taking an innocent life within the space of an hour!

The Eldest Son found a chair for Clinda.

"Well," said he cheerily, "and did you have a pleasant drive?"

Then Clinda went off with her story at a pace, as I tell her now, that the galloping mare's could not compare with.

"Such adventures!" she cried. "Bella bolted before we had reached the road, and went galloping down the drive, and ran into the gate, and nearly upset us."

"What," roared the General—the General was as careful of the appearance of his gates as of the condition of his horses and cigars—"ran into the gate-posts, did you? Who was driving?"

"I was," I muttered; "it was all my fault—everything was my fault. Go on, please"—I waved my hand to Clinda—"let the tale be told."

"Inexcusable," growled the General. Everyone looked at me with scorn and pity. "What did you do next, pray?"

"Then," went on Clinda, "Bella put her head down and bolted up the road. We lost all power over her. Oh, she flew like an express train! It was terrible. First we nearly ran over a workman, and then a dog broke his heart in trying to chase us, and then we nearly charged into a group of nursery-maids and babies—and then—and then the most wonderful thing in all the world happened. Give me some more tea, and I will tell you all about it."

They waited in breathless silence whilst Clinda's cup was being refilled. The General took the opportunity to rebuke me for allowing Bella to bolt. I tried to prove that it was no ordinary case. I showed him a new pair of gloves I had put on when we started. They were worn to threads.

"He's trying to excuse himself now," muttered an old lady in a corner.

I felt that my reputation had gone for ever. In future, everyone would scorn me. If I could light a cigarette I felt that I might appear less nervous. I could not do so. My nerve had deserted me.

"I have never seen anything more wonderful in my life," cried Clinda, when she had sipped her tea, and had kept her audience waiting sufficiently long to hear her tale. "We had just reached the top of the hill when I looked round to see if any of the babies were alive, and what do you think I saw coming up after us, gaining hand over hand?"

"What?" Everyone waited breathlessly.

"A man on a bicycle," said Clinda. "A handsome man, with fair hair, and a long, curly moustache."

"A bicycle face," I put in. "Nasty, strained expression."

The Eldest Son laughed. Everyone looked at me as though I were spoiling the story.

"He came quite close to us," went on Clinda, "and then he rang his bell and shot past, and before I knew what had happened he had saved our lives. It was wonderful! He suddenly took his feet off the pedals and leapt on to the saddle, balanced himself a moment, and then sprang off, regardless of the danger. He caught at the bridle as he came down, and stopped Bella before she had gone ten yards. It was the cleverest thing I have ever seen. I felt that I could have kissed him!"

The Eldest Son was digging me in the ribs.

"I think," I said to the General, "I will go in for a little, if you will excuse me."

The Eldest Son and I strolled away, while the others crowded round Clinda to hear her adventures all over again.

"What on earth happened to you?" said the Eldest Son. "You seem to have been having a lively time."

"It was nothing extraordinary. Bella merely bolted, and just when I was getting her in hand again, a fiend on a bicycle came scorching past us, sprang off as I pulled the mare in, and jumped at her head, and then stood smiling and bowing to us, as though he had saved our lives. I'll teach him manners if I see him again. I'll break every bone in his——"

Ting! ting!

I started as though shot. My nerve was completely gone. The bicycling fiend was pedalling towards us up the General's drive. The eldest son took my arm.

"Restrain yourself, my dear fellow," he said, laughing immoderately.

"Good-afternoon." The fiend skipped from his machine, and bowed before us. I went forward with a frown. "Do you want to see me?" I said.

"No," said the fiend. "I called in to see the General, and to pay my respects to his most charming daughter."

"Well, you can't do it. The General's not at home to-day; he's out. Besides, he doesn't live here."

The Eldest Son and the bicycle fiend began laughing.

"Oh, come," said the Eldest Son, "that's a queer statement!" He took the other's arm. "I'll introduce you to the governor; he'll be delighted to see you."

They strolled away together towards the tea-party, and I could see the Eldest Son introducing the bicycle fiend all round.

I dug my heel into the grass and muttered things beneath my breath. This portion of the story is too painful to dwell long upon. Suffice it to say that the miserable day ended by the bicycling fiend becoming the darling of the ladies, and by the General slapping him on the back and declaring that he was a hearty good fellow, and inviting him to stay at the house as long as he wished.

He came, and he stayed. He and Clinda spent whole days together. They rode, they drove, they bicycled—the man could do anything on a bicycle—they played tennis, they went on the river together, and seemed to find each other immensely entertaining. Clinda seemed to forget my existence. Life at the General's became unbearable, and I decided to go away. When I had arrived at this conclusion, however, I heard that the bicycle fiend could not stay more than a couple of days, on account of his engagements in town. I determined to wait.

* * * * *

"Train just gone out. No train for two hours. By your leave."

The porter brushed past, and left us staring blankly into each other's faces. There was the General, the Generaless, the Eldest Son, and Clinda and myself. We had run up to town for an afternoon in Regent Street, and now we had missed the down train, and had two hours to wait.

"Oh, dear," cried the Generaless, "whatever shall we do?"

"We had better have something to eat," said the General.

"And then we will go to a theatre," cried Clinda.

"Or a circus," said the eldest son. "I haven't been to a circus for years. It's immense fun. There isn't a theatre within a mile, and there is a circus next door. Come along."

So it was settled. After dinner we dropped into the circus. We found it very amusing. I sat by Clinda, and pointed out the difference between a Mexican wild horse and a wild horse on an English stage. She seemed quite interested, and I felt that I was rapidly regaining the ground that I had lost through the visit of the bicycle fiend.

After an hour at the circus we thought it was time to be moving. The Generaless was becoming nervous lest we should miss the last train. We were about to go when the eldest son discovered that it was time for the best turn on the programme.

"The Most Marvellous Bicycling Feat in the World," ran the bills. "The Clown will stand on the saddle of the bicycle, and make a marvellous leap through a fire-encircled hoop on to a galloping horse's back. The Wonder of the World."

My programme fluttered down on to the benches below. Clinda's face, I fancied, turned a trifle pale.

At that moment a clown on a bicycle came careering into the ring.

We knew the face of that clown!

The people were roaring at his antics. He threw himself into all sorts of grotesque positions, making jokes as he travelled round the ring. Suddenly he drew his feet up on to the saddle, and leaning forward on to the handle-bars, came unsteadily down the centre of the ring directly towards the spot where we were seated. A horse was waiting in the ring for the clown's leap. The clown looked up for a moment, and his glance fell full upon us. His face was horror-stricken. He lost his balance, and bicycle and bicycle fiend fell over with a clatter.

We had seen the man before—on another occasion. We knew how it was that he could bicycle so well, and how he made his money to support himself in the best society.

He had deliberately duped us, and he realised that we were in his secret.

The people roared at the clown's fall. Clinda pressed my arm, and implored me to take her out.

We took our departure from the circus. At the door I turned for a moment, and I saw the bicycle fiend standing by his machine, a half-piteous, half-humourous expression on his face. The people were cheering him now, and perhaps he found consolation in the fact.

The General and the Generaless went on in front together towards the station. The Eldest Son and Clinda and I followed behind, and we were very quiet. The Eldest Son dropped into a tobacconist's shop for a cigar.

I took Clinda's hand, and she looked up at me imploringly. And then it all came right.

TOLD BY THE DOCTOR.

III.—THE MESMERIST'S DAUGHTER.

CHAPTER I.

When Lord Aldwyn called upon me at my house in Cheyne Walk, I knew at once that it was not the first time I had seen his face. I could not bring to mind, however, the occasion of our meeting, although I was sure that it was quite recent, and my visitor did not appear to recognise me. He informed me that, on the advice of Dr. Canise, of Wigmore Street, he had decided to consult me on a private matter which concerned him deeply. Canise had recommended me because he knew that I had given a good deal of attention to the subject of mesmerism, he informed me.

"Struck a match with the most innocent intentions in the world."

The mention of mesmerism interested me at once, and the fact that the case came to me from Dr. Canise, the well-known mental specialist, prepared me a little for the nature of the question which Lord Aldwyn wished to submit to me. When he said that it would be necessary to tell me some details of his history during the last few weeks, as a preliminary, I pushed my cigar-box towards him, and prepared to listen with interest.

My companion selected a cheroot, and, as he struck a match to light it, I recollected quite suddenly where I had met him. It was dusk in my dining-room, and the flare of the vesta thrown on the Marquis's face was all I needed to recall our meeting.

"I thought your face very familiar," I said. "Did you not attend a spiritualist séance of Professor Vaudary's in Paris?"

The Marquis laughed slightly.

"Were you there?" he asked, "that night when I spoilt the séance? I do not remember seeing you."

I felt it necessary to apologise for my presence there.

"I happened to be in Paris, and was introduced to the Professor as a most successful mesmerist," I said. "I did not expect to find the séance consisting of the old Maskelyne and Cook business. You went, I presume, to amuse yourself by making a revelation of the Professor's trickery?"

Lord Aldwyn smiled his peculiarly restrained smile again, and said quietly.

"Indeed I did not. Like you, I went expecting something out of the common. When we had sat half the night with nothing more amusing going on than table-rapping and the distinctly unpleasant perambulations of a washing-glove giving one's face occasional touches, I felt driven to smoke by sheer ennui, and struck a match with the most innocent intentions in the world."

I laughed at the remembrance.

"The revelation of your wax-light was certainly amusing," I said, recalling the strange picture. The patient and serious-faced visitors joining fingers round the centre table making a ring of hands broken only at the gap where Lord Aldwyn had just raised his; the venerable white-bearded Professor, still bound securely in his chair in the centre of the table, where we had tied him up, but with an ordinary handbell between his teeth, which he was vigorously shaking. Above all, the new figure in the scene—a handsome girl, who stood outside the ring of devotees, manipulating the spirit hand to which we owed so many ghostly and awe-inspiring touches, in the shape of a stuffed and phosphorised glove tied on a stick.

"She had not been present at the commencement of the séance, so I suppose she must have let herself in by unlocking the door, or through a secret entrance prepared for the purpose. I believe we all saw her while the Marquis's match burnt, and when it went out, the devotee who had seemed to me the most deeply impressed of the lot, struck another, and insisted on lighting the lamp. Professor Vaudary calmly attempted to explain away the position, and was for passing off the lady as a spirit. She did not look unlike it in her plain, loose gown of black cashmere, with her dreamy white face.

"But his daughter, as she appeared to be, was not inclined to second his efforts. She appeared to me insufferably sick of the whole business, and spoilt the poor Professor's slender chances by throwing down her spirit-hand and walking to the door to unlock it and slam it behind her, in a most human manner. Upon which poor Vaudary begged us to unbind him, and dismissed us.

"I was sorry for the poor girl," I said to my visitor. "She seemed to me an unwilling assistant to her father's trickery."

"She was," said my companion emphatically.

"And she was really beautiful!" I went on.

The Marquis smiled and bowed.

"Thank you, Dr. Favel," he said gravely; and, when I opened my eyes a little wider in questioning surprise, he added: "I have the honour of being the accepted suitor of Miss Vaudary's hand."

I concealed my surprise sufficiently to make a suitable reply, and regarded my visitor with a keener interest than before. A sensible, undeniably English-looking man of thirty or so, Lord Aldwyn seemed the last person in the world to be dragged into a mésalliance by any youthful or foolish infatuation.

Perhaps he read some of my thoughts in my face, for he said:

"Possibly you think, with so many people, that I have no right to please myself whom I shall marry. I have very strong views on the point."

"It is a point on which I should not think of arguing with you, my lord," I said. "Does the question on which you wish to consult me relate to Miss Vaudary?"

"Yes. How did you guess it?"

"Because her father is a mesmerist. Possibly he has brought his daughter too much under his influence in that direction, and you wish me to prescribe a cure?"

"I want your opinion, rather," said the Marquis. "Shall I proceed with my story, which I am saved the trouble of commencing by the curious coincidence of your presence when I first saw my fiancée?"

I bowed, and Lord Aldwyn gave his strange story between the puffs of his cheroot.

"In the little while that you saw Miss Vaudary," he began, "you were struck by her beauty. For my part I had decided in that little while that she was certainly the most beautiful woman I had ever seen. There was something in her face which attracted me strongly; and, a month later, when I returned to town and found that the Professor had left Paris on account of the exposure, and had taken up his abode in Oxford Street, I called upon him and begged to be allowed to visit the house in the character of a friend. I explained frankly that I had been much struck by his daughter's beauty, and assured him of the honesty of my motives; and the Professor, who seemed pleased by my request, gave me an invitation to dinner for that same evening, which, needless to say, I accepted.

"Miss Vaudary, in evening dress, seemed to me more beautiful than at the séance. Her voice charmed me. Her carriage and manner were the most graceful I had ever seen. In a word, I loved her. She treated me, however, with depressing coldness. It was apparent to me from the first that the scene of the previous night, at which you were present, had raised an insurmountable barrier between us. It seemed impossible for the lady to forget that she had been rendered contemptible in my presence. I thought even that she had hated me for being the means of revealing her deceit! I was certain that she had hated me for being a witness of the revelation. We were a party of three only, and the Professor (who is altogether unworthy of respect) left us alone together most of the evening; but it was hopeless for me to try and win her favour in any way. The evening made me decide that I would willingly make her my wife; it also showed me that on account of her hostility the thing was impossible.

"I informed Vaudary of this when I left. 'It is useless my calling again,' I said, 'although I must admit that I love your daughter.' I had determined to master my passion at once since it was hopeless.

"It was plain to see that the Professor was disappointed. He evidently approved of me as a son-in-law; and he made a hundred excuses for his daughter's coldness."

"And persuaded you to call once more?" I suggested.

"Yes, he assured me that Violet—that is the name of my wife-elect—was full of caprices: that a second visit would find her more inclined to like me. He asked me whether I had happened to give my name, or allude to my title in his daughter's presence. This is a point, I believe, which affects the question I have come to ask you."

The Marquis paused and took a longer puff than usual at his cheroot, while I stared at him, and wondered how the mention of his title could affect any question he could possibly put to me. I begged him to proceed.

"As it happened," he went on, "I had not spoken much about myself, although I distinctly understood that Vaudary had explained to his daughter who I was before my visit. From his next suggestion, however, it would appear that he had not even told her my name.

"'My daughter is an ardent democrat,' he said to me confidentially, 'if she hears your title I am afraid it may lessen your chances of winning her hand. I meant to warn you before, and it is lucky, therefore, that you have not revealed your identity. I shall take the liberty of giving you a nommé-d'amour when you make a second visit, and of introducing you as plain Monsieur Paul Terry.'

"'Why Paul Terry?' I asked him; and the Professor answered lightly, that it was the first name which occurred to him. 'Once gain her love, and you can easily confess to the little deception,' he went on. 'But till the first step is gained, everything depends upon not arousing her prejudices.'

"The plan seemed to me superlatively precautionary, and I should have raised objections had not Vaudary gone on to speak of other subjects. As it was, I determined, after leaving him, to insist on using, at least, my own family name—and intended to inform Vaudary of my determination on my next visit before seeing his daughter. I had succumbed to his argument, you see, and to my admiration for Miss Vaudary, and accepted another invitation to the house. The Professor fixed both day and hour—this may be an important point—a week after our interview in the evening, at the same hour as before.

"This time I did not see Vaudary at all. His daughter received me in the room where the previous meeting had been held, but which was furnished differently—in a luxurious semi-oriental manner. It was too late to raise objection to the name which the Professor had given me; for his daughter greeted me by it when I entered.

"'Good-evening, Monsieur Terry.'

"I thought it best to accept the name, and, up to the present, Miss Vaudary has known me by no other."

"Although you are engaged to marry her?" I said, as the Marquis paused.

He hastened to defend himself from what he thought was condemnation in my question.

"Our engagement dates from Thursday evening," he said—it was a Saturday when he consulted me—"On that evening I did not reveal my identity because we had so many other things to talk about. I have seen my fiancée only once since, under circumstances which did not allow of any confidential conversation. That meeting is the one which led me to consult Dr. Canise."

"And which brought you to me?"

"Certainly. I will describe it as fully as possible, in the hope that you can answer definitely what Canise suggested. But first I must say a few words about our meetings previous to the engagements.

"On that first evening I noticed a complete change in Miss Vaudary's manner. Where she had been cold to me, now she was friendly and even affectionate. The brilliance of her conversation and manner, with which she had charmed me before, was toned down by a luxurious dreaminess which seemed to pervade her whole demeanour, and to render her a thousand times more captivating. We got along together capitally. At our next meeting, which the Professor again arranged, it was the same. And the next.

"Our next meeting was on Thursday, when, as I said, I begged Miss Vaudary to be my wife, and received a favourable reply. Up to this point you must observe I had never seen my wife-elect except at her father's house, and at appointed meetings arranged by him. I called once without an appointment, and was told that Miss Vaudary was not at home. Yesterday, however, came the chance meeting which brings me to you.

"On the Thursday, remember, I received from Miss Vaudary every evidence of a sincere affection for me. I think there can be no doubt that when Miss Vaudary promised to be my wife, she was really and truly attached to me.

"Yesterday morning as I was crossing from the Green Park, I was delighted to see her unexpectedly. She was playing with a child, a niece of hers, I believe, whose photograph I had seen at the house. The pleasure was all the greater, because I understood that she was out of town for a few days with her father. I vaulted over the fence, at once, and of course hurried towards her. To my unutterable astonishment and dismay she received me as an almost complete stranger. She appeared genuinely indignant at the affectionate manner in which I greeted her.

"At first I thought it was some jest of hers; but it quickly dawned upon me that, unless she was the most accomplished actress in the world, her mind was a perfect blank with regard to our mutual affection and engagement.

"'But you do not mean to tell me,' I said to her hotly, in the midst of our talking, 'that I am a perfect stranger to you?' And she answered quietly, but with a perfectly well-bred show of displeasure, that she had certainly met me at her father's house, but that the fact did not justify me in addressing her with such impudent familiarity.

"To say that I was surprised and startled but weakly expresses the effect of this unexpected and startling change. I used every effort of which I was capable to bring back to her mind the remembrance of our love, but in vain. I left her in despair at last, wondering whether I was going mad. Madness was the only terrible explanation I could give to myself for the action of the woman I loved—I see by your expression that you have another to offer."

The Marquis paused, looking earnestly into my face, and I felt quite uncomfortable to think how much he was counting upon my opinion. I nodded my head slightly.

"Pray go on," I said. "Have you seen the lady's father since?"

Lord Aldwyn shook his head.

"No; I went to the house immediately, to express my opinion of the deception he had practised upon me, in concealing the fact of his daughter's madness. I found, however, that he had quitted London for a few days, without leaving an address to find him, or the exact date of his return. I was burning with impatience to learn the worst, and have the mystery of my fiancée's conduct solved. So I called upon Dr. Canise, to inquire whether the hypothesis of madness was sufficient to account for it; and he, as I said, sent me on to you.

"After hearing the whole of the details which I have repeated to you, he seemed inclined to think that, although Miss Vaudary's conduct could certainly be explained on the supposition that her mind was unhinged—a supposition which is not rendered untenable by the fact of her perfect sanity of manner at our previous meetings—still, considering the reputation of her father as a mesmerist, it was quite as likely that at each of our interviews in the Oxford Street house Miss Vaudary has been acting under the influence of her father, in some mysterious manner, without being conscious of her own actions."

"So that, in her proper self she would be totally unaware of your friendship and engagement?" I asked.

"Yes; that was what Canise threw out as a suggestion. He expressed himself, however, too ignorant of the subject to give a definite opinion as to the possibility of his hypothesis. He said that you would tell me whether it was possible that, by mesmerising his daughter before each of my visits, the Professor could make her believe that I was some totally different person, for whom she had already conceived some affection. Madness or mesmerism? that is the question I am trying to have definitely answered, though Heaven knows there is little enough hope of happiness for me in either case!"

There was a little break in the young man's voice as he said it, and I felt thoroughly sorry for him. I had been so interested in the story, as a mere problem, that I had barely considered its terrible importance to my visitor. There could be no doubt that he was thoroughly in love with the girl, and it must have been a terrible blow to him, after feeling sure of her answering love, to find that it was not a reality but an illusion.

I thought the matter over quietly, while the Marquis leant back in his chair, with closed eyes, waiting for me to give an opinion.

"There were four visits altogether," I said, "at which Miss Vaudary seemed well disposed towards you?"

The Marquis opened his eyes and nodded.

"In each case Professor Vaudary was in the house?"

"I believe so."

"At each, owing to the Professor's adroit explanation, you allowed the lady to call you by a name which is not your own?"

"Yes."

I went on to ask a few technical questions about the appearance of the lady at the four interviews—the state of the pupil of her eye, and so on—to which the Marquis answered promptly. Then when I had concluded my little cross-examination, I gave my decision in favour of mesmerism.

"I think you may take it for a certainty, my lord," I said, "that to prevent such an eligible son-in-law as yourself from eluding his grasp, Professor Vaudary has used this mesmeric influence he evidently exercises over his daughter to assist your love-making. The thing is quite possible. It is simply a clever variation of an old mesmeric performance. You have seen, no doubt, the disgusting exhibition which professional mesmerists give—a man eating the most noxious things under the impression that they are the most pleasing?"

"Yes," said Aldwyn grimly; "I once saw a man devour a tallow candle greedily thinking it sugar-candy. In the present case, I suppose I am the candle?"

"Exactly."

"And the sugar-candy which mademoiselle imagines herself to be enjoying is some gentleman called Paul Terry? I presume that such a person must necessarily exist?"

"I believe so."

The young man's mouth was tightly compressed, as if he had difficulty in hiding his feelings. He took up his hat to go.

"I shall take your opinion as decisive," he said.

But I was by no means inclined to let slip a case which interested me so much as this did until I had thoroughly mastered it.

"I hope you do not object to my communicating with Professor Vaudary," I said, "with respect to this remarkable example of his mesmeric influence? I shall not feel quite satisfied about it until I have had an interview with him."

"Nor I," said the Marquis. "If it would not interfere with your inquiries, I should very much like to see Vaudary in your company. You will get out of him all the vital points of the business."

"There is nothing which would please me better," I said. "Your presence will give me all the authority I need to probe the affair to the bottom."

It was arranged, therefore, before we parted, that on a certain day in the week following our interview, we should meet at Lord Aldwyn's place in Grosvenor Square, and proceed together to Vaudary's house in the hope of finding him returned from his journey.

At Professor Vaudary's house we were luckier than we expected. The old man opened the door for us himself, and ushered us into his study to hear what we had come about. I put it to him plainly that he was mesmerising his daughter!

At first he was inclined to express great surprise at the suggestion, but Aldwyn cut him short.

"Your manner proves well enough," he said quietly, "if any proof were needed, that Dr. Favel has stated the case correctly. You may spare yourself, therefore, the trouble of trying to hide the true facts of the case. I have only a few questions to ask before I decide what course I shall take in the matter. In the first place, who is Paul Terry?"

The Professor asseverated warmly that no such person existed. He had suggested the name simply as the first which occurred to him. It was a name only, and had no connection with any actual person. He grew quite hot in his denials, and used every emphatic gesture, I believe, of which he was capable, in his efforts to convince my companion of the truth of his assertions.

Meanwhile, I was turning over the bits of pasteboard in the Professor's card-basket, which stood on a little table at my side, hardly expecting to meet any reward for my trouble, but finding nothing better to do, since Lord Aldwyn had taken the conduct of the case into his own hands, and the Professor had ceased to notice my presence.

"Flicked across to him the result of my search in the card-basket."

The latter was becoming more and more emphatic in his denial of Paul Terry's existence. When I looked up it struck me that Lord Aldwyn was becoming impressed by his vehemence.

"Look here, my man," he said, "let us drop this strong language; will you give me your word of honour that no such person as Paul Terry exists?"

The Professor was quite ready to do so. He opened his mouth with the evident intention of forswearing himself. But I stopped him.

"One moment, Professor, before you perjure yourself," I said, and flicked across to him the result of my search in the card-basket—a card with the name of "Paul Terry" engraved upon it, and an address in Paris.

Of course, denial was futile after that. The poor Professor gave in ignominiously; and, after trying to persuade us that he had forgotten that Terry was an actual person he expressed his willingness to tell us the real facts of the case without reserve. He seemed almost sincere at last; and, after warning him of the futility of making any more mis-statements, the Marquis showed some eagerness to hear what he had to say.

It seemed that Paul Terry was a certain young artist in Paris, who had called upon the Professor to make some inquiries after a séance he had attended. During the absence of Vaudary, his daughter had entertained the visitor, and the young people appeared to have become very interested in each other in the course of an hour or so's conversation.

"It was a case of love at first sight," said the Professor "and after making some inquiries with regard to the young artist's character and position, I decided to invite him to the house. Judge of my grief and disappointment then, when my note of invitation was returned by the concierge of the house where Terry lived, with the information that the poor young fellow had died suddenly of heart-disease on the day after his visit to my house."

Lord Aldwyn started.

"He is dead?" he asked earnestly; but the Professor seemed not to notice the slight interruption, and proceeded:

"I hesitated to tell the news to poor Violet, knowing that she had been deeply struck by the excellent fellow's manner, even in their one interview. Then came your very flattering declaration, my lord, with regard to your admiration of my poor little girl, which I will confess filled my heart with the most ambitious of hopes.

"At your first interview with Violet, however, I perceived that the memory of the young painter prevented her giving any attention to your advances. Under the circumstances, therefore, I am sure you will pardon the deception which a father's love and care for his beloved daughter's happiness suggested. If Paul Terry had been alive I should not have hesitated to inform you of the hopelessness of your suit. But knowing that he was dead, it seemed to me a duty to prevent my poor girl wasting all her chances of happiness in thinking of him. I absolutely could not see her throw away the brilliant prospect offered by your regard. Before me shone the affectionate hope of gradually transferring to yourself the preference she had given to another. I assure you, gentlemen, that my motives were entirely unselfish. I hoped to benefit all parties; to save my girl from a hopeless passion, and to satisfy your own wishes, my lord."

The wicked old man looked quite holy as he placed one hand on his heart and looked upwards. My companion recalled him to sublunary things with a quick, eager question.

"You speak of transferring to me your daughter's affection. Is that possible by any manner of mesmerism?"

"I believe so, my lord. At any rate, I thought the experiment worth making."

"And did not care a farthing whether it succeeded, so long as I married—or kept—your daughter," put in Aldwyn quickly.

"What is your opinion about the transfer of affection?" he asked, turning to me.

The idea was so novel that I did not venture to express an opinion; but the Professor was anxious to persuade us of its possibility.

"Look at the theory of hypnotic cure," he said, speaking as if he were at a lecture. "It depends upon throwing both patient and medium into a mesmeric trance, and transferring the affection from one to the other. In time the change becomes permanent, as far as the patient is concerned."

Aldwyn cut him short again.

"You can swear that Paul Terry is really dead?" he said sternly. "You are not lying?"

The Professor was indignant at this suggestion.

"It does not matter," said Aldwyn, "we have his address on this card. Now, one more question: suppose I refuse to accept your very kind services on my behalf, what course do you intend to pursue?"

The old man rubbed his patriarchal beard and glanced furtively at the questioner. Then, with some knowledge of human nature, he replied candidly:

"I have others to take your place, my lord."

My companion looked for a moment as if he meditated an attack on the holy-looking man of science. He contented himself with a strong curse, however, and then returned to his quiet, questioning manner.

"Excuse me asking the question," he said, "but is it possible that you thought you could marry me to your daughter without her knowledge?"

"I could engage to do so," said the Professor with a superior smile. "There would have been a difficulty about the name, of course, if I attempted to carry it through without your knowing the true state of affairs. But with your connivance in that small matter, I have not the slightest doubt that my mesmeric influence over my daughter is such that I could make her marry any man I pleased, under the impression that she was marrying the man of her choice. Will you allow me to prove my words, my lord, or shall I find another bridegroom?"

I noticed that his manner had entirely changed since he had seen how Aldwyn took the threat of marrying his daughter to somebody else. However, I was surprised at the Marquis's next words.

"After the marriage, I presume, your daughter would wake up entirely unconscious of the ceremony she had gone through?"

"Yes, my lord."

"Then you may continue to use your influence over your daughter, you confounded scamp! and to count upon me as a son-in-law."

I felt bound to expostulate a little; but the self-willed young aristocrat stopped me almost as he had stopped the Professor—only with more show of politeness.

"Thanks to your valuable assistance, Dr. Favel," he said, with perfect courtesy of manner, "I think I can now see through the case quite clearly. I hope I may consult you again, if anything turns up which I am unable to understand. For the present I know all I need to go on with the affair."

I did not attempt expostulation after that; and, as I was evidently more of a hindrance than a help to the negotiations between the two men, I ventured to take my leave, wondering how on earth this strange business would turn out.

* * * * *

I was afraid, when I received an unexpectedly large cheque from Lord Aldwyn, on the day after our visit to Oxford Street, that all my connection with his extraordinary love-story had ceased. I was very sorry, because I was deeply interested in it, and should have liked to see its full development; but I felt that I should scarcely be justified in inquiring for news on the point from either Professor Vaudary or the Marquis. I felt very inclined, however, as time went on, and I heard nothing, to call upon the Professor on some pretext or other, and learn whether Aldwyn had actually married his daughter, as he had seemed determined to do.

Possibly I should have called eventually, had I not seen in a spiritualist organ a notice of the Professor's death, which occurred a few months after our visit to him.

The short article, unfortunately, did not allude to the Professor's family at all, so I could gain from it no news of Miss Violet.

It seemed to me that I had lost my only chance of gaining any. Evidently the Marquis was a man who did not care to bother other people very much about his private affairs. Only an impatient eagerness to get at the truth had driven him to make his first confidences to me, and, after he had remunerated me for my opinion, which certainly was not worth the remuneration, I did not expect to have any more revelations from his lips.

Of course, I made a few indirect inquiries from people who were likely to have some acquaintance with the Marquis's movements, and with a view to ascertaining whether anything was known of his marriage; but all I could learn about him was that he had disappeared from England, and was supposed to be living abroad—nobody knew exactly where.

As it happened, I was the first person to learn where that foreign retreat of Lord Aldwyn's was—Dildac—a quaint little country place in the heart of the Champagne country; and I learnt it from Aldwyn himself.

Just as I had given up all hope of hearing anything about him, I was delightedly surprised to get a note from him asking me to come down to Dildac for a little while, to look after the health of his mother, which seemed to him very unsatisfactory. He expressed the hope that I should be able to get away from London, said that I should find the Champagne village a delightful change if I was at all fond of the country, and mentioned that he had taken an old château there, and could give me any amount of room for myself during my professional attendance on his mother. Not a word was said about my former services, nor was there the remotest mention in his letter of Professor Vaudary's daughter. However, it was not likely that I could meet the Marquis again without learning something about her; so you may guess that I accepted Aldwyn's offer with all speed, and began to make preparations at once for my journey to the other side of France.

Dildac was a charming little place, truly—a nest of white cottages among miles of vineyards, with the green hills of Aspequille behind.

There was nobody to meet me when the lazy train loitered into the little wooden station. It was hardly worth while sending to meet me, when my arrival was so uncertain and the château was so near. I could see its stone turrets rising behind the poplars when I stepped out on to the platform of the little wooden station. The fact tempted me, after leaving my luggage to the tender mercies of the station-master, to try and find my way to my destination without making inquiries.

I wandered along the white road between the vineyards wondering whether I should learn anything about Miss Vaudary, or find her settled as mistress of the château when I arrived there. To do the latter turned out a more difficult task than I imagined. As soon as I descended from the station to the road the view of the turrets was lost; and, although I had started in the direction in which I had thought the château would lie, still every turn in the road seemed to take me away from that direction.

I began to wish that I had asked my way at the station, especially as I met nobody of whom I could inquire. It was questionable, too, even if I did meet anybody whether I could make myself understood. My French serves me badly in Paris! I seriously doubted its success in the provinces. I stepped briskly along the road, getting more certain at every turn that I was going wrong.

The château, as far as I remembered, lay to the left, the road turned determinately to the right. At last, however, I came to a footpath leading away leftwards, and ornamented with a decrepid and undecipherable finger-post, the dumb leading of which I followed without hesitation. Still, I was not so certain of my way that I could afford to despise guidance; so when I saw a woman walking slowly along the path in front of me, I prepared a sentence in my best French, to inquire whether I was really on my way to the château of Dildac. I was pleased to notice, on getting nearer, that the person's dress and gait betokened her a lady, since, as I said, I doubt the efficacy of my accent among the country people in making my meaning understood. It occurred to my mind, of course, that I might be near the discovery of another chapter in Lord Aldwyn's love-story, and that this might be his wife.

The lady must have been deep in thought, whoever she was, for she did not notice my step even when I was close upon her.

"Pardonnez-moi, madame," I began, raising my hat; but no further strain on my knowledge of the vernacular was necessary, for, as I spoke the three words, the lady turned her face with a slight start, and I saw, as I was more or less prepared to do, that it was a face I knew—that of Professor Vaudary's daughter. There was no mistaking that beautiful oval, with its large, lustrous eyes, and frame of black hair, although the cheeks which had been so white at the séance had a touch of colour in them under their healthy, country-made brown.

I inquired, in English, if I were on the way to the château, and the lady held out her hand.

(To be concluded.)

"Father!—Father!"

The clear but breathless voice of a woman rose above the howling of the wind and the roaring of the waves.

Then, after other cries, which the storm carried away from them and which they could not distinguish, a scrap of a sentence reached them through the tumult of the air, imperative and intreating: "Ship—in peril—at Penn Leach ven——"

The news fell like a thunderbolt on the fishermen.

Standing in disheartened groups along the shore near Keravesan, the north side of the port of Pontusval, they watched with passive and resigned looks the storm from the N.E., which had come so suddenly in the morning, continued all day, and now towards night showed every sign of increasing still more.

"A ship in peril."

They showed their terror at these words in different ways. While the young men seemed to defy the fury of the waves by appealing to courage and duty, their chests heaving under the bravery of their hearts, from the dried and rugged lips of some of the old men the same words were strangled by the dread roar of the rollers on the beach and the knowledge of the awful danger they were in.

With her cap half blown off and her arm tragically pointing to the north, a young girl, whose fair golden hair formed a bright halo round her head, ran towards them, throwing herself into the arms of one of the fishermen as into a haven of refuge—a man with massive shoulders and grey hair under his cap of coarse wool.

"What is the matter? Where have you come from?" he asked tenderly.

"From the lighthouse at Pontusval, father, where I went to see my friend, the signalman's daughter. And then—then——"

Her emotion overcame her, and her words were drowned by her sobs.

"Father—oh, it is horrible. Over there, I saw this poor ship in distress—on the rocks of Penn Leach ven. And at this hour. God grant there may yet be time. All must hurry to the rescue!"

"On the rocks? Then there's a poor chance for her!" declared one of the fishermen.

Another, shaking his head and crossing his arms, as if to assert the uselessness of any effort on their part, muttered:

"Yes, yes, that is true. Our rocks there take only a few minutes to break up any ship, however big. It has happened many a time."

Then above the tumult of the sea, a phrase in the old dialect of Leon, in the famous "Land of Pagans," as this part of Finistère is often called, sounded mournfully:

"Wreckage on the coast!"

These words caused a great hubbub. There were rounds of cursing, of approval and of anger, a rapid exchange of arguments for and against, in the midst of which, arm-in-arm, walked the fisherman and his daughter.

But now that the others had picked up this ominous rallying cry of former times, the souls of the wreckers were swelling with recollections of pillage and with a hope of a return to the atrocities of the past, and they muttered in pleased accents:

"Wreckage on the coast!"

Then William Madec, disengaging himself from Jeanne-Marie, and trembling with indignation, threw his cap behind him, showing his massive head, his honest and frank eyes, the face of a sturdy fisherman, and in answer to the cry of the wreckers he gave the cry of the godly:

"To the lifeboat!"

Leading the way impatiently, with rapid strides, to the small red-roofed house a little distance off, he added:

"We will see which of us is right this time."

Carried away by his example, those behind followed him, repeating with enthusiasm, as if in defiance to the sea, and to those who had dared to invoke the barbarous customs of their ancestors:

"The lifeboat! The lifeboat!"

Young, old, women, children, all had rushed in great haste to the little lifeboat house; with the assistance of ropes and the combined help of a heavy waggon, the lifeboat was quickly brought out and taken towards the sea.

"Oh, hisse! Ah! Oh! Ah! Holla! Oh, hisse! Ah! Oh! Ah! Holla!" they sang as they pulled in unison. And everyone joined in, from the treble voices of the children, to the bass notes of the men.

A little way off the other group of older men had gathered, drawn together by a common understanding and a common purpose. Very different scenes came to their minds. Instead of a lifeboat as the centre of all, they saw the people armed with boat-hooks, hatchets, fish-spears, and ropes, all the tools for plunder and murder.

They looked on with disappointment at the preparations to spoil them of their prey.

From this group a grumble of revolt arose, growing louder as the lifeboat neared the water, and when the crew, clad in tarpaulins and sou'-westers, appeared with William Madec at their head, a cry burst forth:

"To the wreck!"

It was the same harsh and piercing voice, so loud that it was distinctly heard above the howling of the tempest, and the "Oh, hisss! Ah! Oh!" of the workers.

He stood up, this defender of heathenish rites, continuing:

"It is our bread that they want to take from us. The sea destroys for us. No one can take from us what it brings. It is for us the Penn Leach works, and all the rocks and islands, too!"

In front of the others, well in view, the strange old man who had uttered these words stood defiant.

Though almost a centenarian, he was always to the fore in a storm. He always came, robust and straight, his white hair falling over his shoulders, with his black eyes which age had not dulled, his nose like the beak of a bird of prey.

"Oh, Heaven! Hervé Raguénes! It is always him. May the Lord protect the poor sailors!" cried Jeanne-Marie Madec in terror.

And while the young people, continuing their preparations for rescue, did not deign to respond, the old men threw evil glances at them, brandishing their boat-hooks menacingly. However, the boat was just being launched, when one of the men cried: "Captain William, there is a man short on the larboard."

As no one volunteered to take the place, a young man, of a tall and athletic figure, breathless with his long run to the scene of action, caught hold of the planking, drew himself up by the strength of his wrists, and jumped on board, saying:

"There. You can go ahead, the crew is complete."

Stupefied, William Madec looked at him, demanding:

"You, Alain? But you do not join our party, I think?"

"You won't have me?" said the new-comer in a pleading tone.

Jeanne-Marie, her face lit up with joy, murmured:

"Father, I beg you."

His eyes fixed themselves with candid admiration on the young man, who, without waiting for the captain's answer, had seized a life-belt and put it on. William, with a smile on his lips, held out his hand to the new arrival, when the rough voice of the old man shouted furiously:

"Where are you going, you, now? Who gave you leave?"

The young man suddenly became pale on hearing this brutal question, and, turning, stammered:

"Grandfather! Like the others, to the rescue. The others!"

A horrible laugh came from the withered lips of Raguénes.

"The others!—ha! ha! ha! There are no more of our blood, the old blood of the Pagans. As for you, you are a Raguénes, the last living Raguénes with me, a Pagan like me. It is not to the rescue you must go, but to the wreck."

"But, grandfather—the poor people who are in danger. I pray you."

"It is God who has sent them to us; we mustn't interfere with His will."

All the fatalism of his race flamed in this savage speech.

The captain leant towards his daughter, exchanging some words with her, then, lifting up his head, addressed the terrible old man:

"Hervé Raguénes, the ship in danger is English again."

The old man, recoiling a step, did not wait for the attack, but with an instinctive movement of revolt added:

"A heretic."

Madec said slowly:

"Do you remember the Drummer?"

"Ann Taboulinn."

The name trembled on the lips of Raguénes, and half stifled with rage he made a threatening gesture in the direction of Alain.

Into the troubled waters the boat went on its way to save those in peril on Penn Leach ven.

* * * * *

A slab of stone served as the door, and it needed a great exercise of muscle to open it. It was opened and shut again, and by the light of an enormous ship's lantern the weird face of Hervé Raguénes could be seen.

He sat down amidst strange surroundings, broken open cases, staved casks, fragments of wood, of iron, of steel, fishing utensils, arms, provisions, lovely pieces of china, massive pieces of timber, spoil from many a wreck. By the remains of letters visible on certain boards one could almost make a list of the wrecks which for sixty-five years there had been on this coast.

This was the house of Raguénes, this cave which had been dug in the rock by prehistoric man, and had served as a burial place for the ancient inhabitants of the country to judge by the litter of bones about.

He had found this retreat by chance, and now in his old age he had left the house of his only living relation Alain, to live away from everyone in this cave.

In old times he had been able to stow here many of his treasures, and could accumulate what he would without fear of the police. Anger burnt in his heart, for now they saved the ships in peril.

He sat by his wood fire brooding, listening instinctively to the howling of the wind as it swept along the coast with the fury of a wild beast, and the roaring of the waves as they dashed against the rocks.

And thus it was that, in the faithful mirror of his brain, he saw reflected many such nights and days of storm from which he had reaped such a rich harvest.

Oh, this lifeboat of to-day! How the times had changed! How the race had degenerated! His grandson, blood of his blood, was on the sea, not to enrich himself with spoil, but to save unknown beings, strangers, Englishmen.

To save Englishmen, a Raguénes, a Pagan! If he could do as in former times!

"Do you remember the Drummer?"

It was William Madec, one of the rescuers, who had said these words.

He remembered well, and the whole scene passed before him.

It was a long time ago. He tried to count on his fingers twenty, thirty, at least forty years. There, quite close, in the middle of the crypt, he could see the débris of the frigate, an English frigate, did they say? Well, they had nothing to prove its nationality.

It was a night like this, a storm from the north-east with thunder and lightning.

He, Hervé Raguénes, with some of his boon companions, had started off to Brignaugan, when there sounded across the waves the boom of a cannon.

At the same time someone from the beach had distinguished a ship, still free, and, perhaps, thanks to the lightning, able to keep out of the breakers and regain the high sea.

Then Hervé ran to his house and returned dragging the finest bull in his drove: his companions clustered around, applauding and helping him to drive the frightened animal towards the shore.

When they reached the beach, Hervé lighted a big ship's lantern, which he had fastened to the animal's head, between the horns, with a rope, one end of which was tied to one of its front legs, long enough to allow the beast to walk, but sufficiently short to oblige it to lower its head at each step.

And then he guided the animal along the shore: at each step the head of the bull went down and up again, making the lantern oscillate to imitate the light of a pitching ship.

Almost at once the sound of the cannon came nearer, showing that the ship, instead of continuing on her course out to sea, was approaching the shore under the belief that safety lay in that direction.

By the flashes of lightning which became more frequent as the storm increased, they could distinguish a frigate, sailing under its lower sails, one mast broken and its head fully on Penn Leach ven.

Doubtless at the same moment the sailors also saw the danger into which they were running, for a horrified cry came over the intervening space. To this death cry a roar of joy answered from the beach, and all raised their hooks and their hatchets, while Raguénes put out the lantern, freed the animal's leg, and waited while the sea did its work of destruction.

A last flash showed them the ship breaking amongst the rocks, and calling all the plunderers to their prey, the cry resounded:

"Wreckage on the coast!"

It was a famous windfall, some ship from the colonies laden with spices, precious clothes, and with chests of silver.

And of all that were washed ashore that night, there was not one living soul.

In the morning, further along the coast, close to a big rock, which stood alone in the middle of the beach, they found a huge corpse, half-clad in the remnants of a uniform that it was impossible to recognise.

But what aroused their curiosity most was that the giant carried at his side a drum fastened by a strong belt. Evidently this acted as a buoy and prevented him from totally disappearing like his comrades.

The first of them who had noticed him, and who had knelt down to strip him, stood up suddenly with a cry of astonishment, holding up a child, a little girl of a year or more, fastened to the drum, and still living.

He was going to throw her back into the sea, or kill her with a blow on the head with his hook, when one of his neighbours, seizing his hands, declared:

"I will take it. It shall be my care."

A man unlike the others, this Yves Madec, the father of William Madec, and one who was always reproached for his tender-heartedness.

"Can't you leave her to return to where she came from, the little heretic?' Hervé Raguénes had called to him mockingly.

"I will make her a Christian for her good, and ours," replied Yves Madec, adding in a low voice, "for the redemption of our sins."

He went away carrying the little heretic, the little English woman, "Saoz bihan" as the other Pagans around him said, with the horror which they professed, and which some of them had, for the English, personified in their eyes.

As for the man with the drum, instead of carrying him to consecrated ground, they buried him where he was found, at the foot of the gigantic rock, which has since been known as "the Drummer's Rock."

The incident seemed to have ended here, and little by little was being completely forgotten, when a disquieting rumour, which began among the fishermen went round, affirming that on certain stormy days, when the sky was over-cast, on the deserted beach there could be heard the roll of the drum. The ghost of the drummer arose and beat on the instrument which had been buried with him.

From one to another the story was repeated, and soon, especially in the evenings, no one dared pass the rock without hastening their steps and crossing themselves with fear. Perhaps they had done wrong to bury him there without the sacrament, and it was these prayers he came to claim with the roll of the drum.

When this rumour reached the ears of Hervé Raguénes, he refused to believe it. He sneered:

"Their drummer, ha, ha! It is alcohol or cider which disturbs their senses, and makes them think thunder is the beat of a drum. Ah, well." And he listened with a shrug of his shoulders.

Outside, the storm continued to increase as the night came on. Hearing the significant roaring, the old man rubbed his hands with a pleased gesture, while a smile of satisfaction spread over his face, as he muttered:

"In a little while there will be more than a drummer on the beach. Ah! Ah! Spoil! Spoil! The sea, the rocks, the anger of God, all is for us!"

Then as he went to extinguish the lantern preparatory to lying down on a mass of seaweed, which served as his bed, he heard the sound of steps approaching, and seizing his boat-hook he stood in the entrance of the grotto, demanding:

"Who is there?—Who dares——?"

The profile of a young man was discernible by the pale light of the dawn: a head appeared, with eyes shining with joy.

"Is it you, Alain?"

He dared ask no more, divining at once the cause of his joy.

The other exclaimed in a glad voice:

"Grandfather! All saved!"

Raguénes groaned:

"Saved! The English heretics!"

"Shipwrecked, poor exhausted sailors, frozen with cold, creatures of God like us," corrected the young man. "If you had seen them, you would have pitied them."

He had come inside the grotto, and stood nervously twisting his cap.

"I want to ask you something—that is, I have had a confession to make to you, for—for a long time. But I have not had the promise until to-day; then I am old enough to settle down. I——"

The old man looked at him savagely, and asked harshly:

"You aren't content as you are? That is your fault, what then?"

The grandson hesitated, then he said:

"I love a young girl, and I wish to marry her."

Hervé suggested sweetly:

"You have made your choice alone; doubtless it is good, as you haven't consulted me. Perhaps, then, it is the daughter of Lanlo, who is one of the old school, like me. If it is she, my son——"

Alain interrupted coldly:

"No, it isn't Yvonne Lanlo, it is Jeanne-Marie Madec."

The old man glared at his grandson in a fury.

"She? 'Saoz bihan,' the little English heretic!"

"The little English girl," Alain stammered. "But she is Breton, the daughter of William——"

"Ah! Ah! I don't doubt it. And it was for that William Madec took you in his crew. And you want my consent? Never. Never while I live shall a Raguénes marry a heretic. Do you hear? I would rather see you dead," he added, "than married to her. Go and ask her hand from the drummer."

* * * * *

"I love you with all my heart, more than life, and I beg that if you love me in the same way, you will be my wife. You still wish it, Jeanne-Marie, in spite of the name I bear, in spite of all I have told you, in spite of my grandfather?"

Alain was tenderly holding her trembling fingers in his hands as he was pleading. It was some days after the wreck, as evening was approaching. They had met near the Drummer's Rock with a touching superstition, as if they wished him to be a witness of their love, and of their engagement, as she was the daughter of the little stray, rescued by Yves Madec, forty years ago.

Alain remembered the jeering phrase of his grandfather:

"Go and ask her hand from the drummer."

Slowly night enveloped all in a veil of mystery.

Jeanne-Marie, yielding to the dictates of her heart, and the persuasions of her companion, confessed:

"I love you, Alain, and I will be your wife, I promise you."

A burst of savage laughter sounded so suddenly behind them that they turned simultaneously: and there, shaking his hook, with which he was always armed, at the terrified young people, stood Hervé Raguénes.

"And I," he said, "I swear that a grandson of mine shall never marry you."

With a spring, Alain threw himself instinctively between the old man and the young girl, guarding the latter with his arms, saying:

"Grandfather! Take care."

In his tone, at first supplicating and then commanding, you could recognise his ancestry.

The old man advanced threateningly.

"I will send her whence she came, this heretic. I will——"

Step by step he approached, his eyes aflame with the light of murder, the fixed idea of his hard cruel heart showed in his stony face. Without arms to defend her, hesitating to strike his own grandfather, Alain stood before him. Flight was impossible, they were between Hervé Raguénes and the sea, between him and the Drummer's Rock, towards which they recoiled.

Possessed by this bloodthirsty folly, a homicidal laugh on his lips, the old man came on.

Suddenly a long rumbling sounded, as if the anger of Heaven was let loose.

The grandfather gave a chuckle.

"It thunders now, as in the days of wrecks. Wreckage on the coast. God is for us."

But now the rumbling came nearer and more regular, as if by some mystery an invisible drum was being beaten.

Hervé stopped:

"It sounds odd this evening, all the same. Perhaps a fresh scheme of the good God. It doesn't matter——"

The noise seemed to approach them and envelop them in its sonorous waves, as in the winding sheet of death.

All three looked at each other, the blood left their faces, their bodies became rigid, and they heard the old man stammer:

"The Drummer's Rock!"

Still the beating continued.

The lips of the old man muttered:

"Do you not hear the Drummer?"

And as they looked the Drummer's Rock seemed to move and advance towards them.

Terrified, haggard, Hervé Raguénes saw the giant rise before him, his drum at his side, monstrous, living, terrible, as high as the rock itself, always sounding his drum like the rumbling of thunder.

While Jeanne-Marie and Alain, mute with terror, tried to distinguish what was happening under the moving pall of darkness, the old man, his hook fallen on the ground, his two arms stretched out towards the rock, his heart full of remorse, exclaimed:

"The Drummer himself! It is he! He comes! I will——"

His legs gave way beneath him and he fell to his knees on the sand, vanquished, supplicating:

"Mercy! Pardon! I consent!"

As the words passed his lips, the rumblings diminished, receding, dying away with a final roar in the unfathomable depth of the night.

It was Alain and Jeanne-Marie who brought back the redoubtable Pagan. He had become as feeble as a little child.

While they helped him to walk, he called to memory again and again what he had heard and seen, he, who had never believed the stories of the fishermen.

"It is true, this drum. I have heard it. I have seen."

These incoherent phrases escaped him from time to time.

"It is necessary—prayers—repose of his soul—a cross."

* * * * *

A month later the marriage between Alain Raguénes and Jeanne-Marie Madec was celebrated.

For the occasion, old Hervé Ruguénes, whose brain never recovered its balance, but whose figure was as upright and imposing as ever, put on the ancient holiday costume of the Pagans.

After the Mass, all the congregation with the clergy repaired to the beach to witness the ceremony of placing a cross in front of the Drummer's Rock, which can be seen to this day. Since then, no one has heard the beating of the drum, as if the sanctification of his grave and the marriage of Alain and Jeanne-Marie had given eternal rest to the unknown buried under the rock.

A Wedding Tombstone.

"So you never heard of Mary Barbour's weddin' tombstone?" said grandma in a tone of surprise. "I thought everybody knew about that."

I confessed the most abject ignorance, and immediately drew up to the fire. This was partly to gain information and partly because, although the fireplace was wide and deep-throated, and big logs were blazing in it, there were biting draughts of stinging November air coming in at the loosely-fitting door. For grandmother would not be persuaded to leave the home that had been hers for fifty years, and which now showed some signs of decay.

She sat knitting by the firelight, for, although she had all the modern conveniences of heating and lighting, her big fireplace cast its ruddy glow out into the room through all the long winter evenings. I was an angular schoolgirl of fifteen then, with a great love for the romantic, and was on a four weeks' visit at the old homestead. After knitting a few minutes in silence, she began:

"You've seen the old stone house down on the bank of the river, all shut in with pines and evergreens? It's nigh a hundred years old. When I was born it had been built ten years. When I was a young married woman the Barbours came to live there, and they was proud, 'aughty people that nobody could get acquainted with. That's what made 'em take it so dretful hard when—but here I am, ahead of my story. You see, Mr. Barbour embezzled or did something of that kind, and went to prison. After he had been there a year he up and hung himself, and that is the last of him so far as my story goes.

"Then his wife and little boy shut themselves up in the stone house and never went outside the gate hardly. She'd had a good deal of schooling, his mother had, and she taught him herself as long as she could, and then he bought books and studied by himself. He tried going to school when he was a small boy, but one of the scholars threw it at him about his father, and Mortimer nearly killed him, and after that his mother kep' him home.

And she was such a proud woman, was Mrs. Barbour, and lofty and severe in her ways. She wouldn't let nobody sympathise with her, which everybody wanted to, as there's so little going on in a place like this.

"Mrs. Barbour was real selfish with her grief, so she got herself disliked, besides folks bein' suspicious after the way her husband turned out. What did they live on?

"Oh, the boy farmed it, and later they do say he wrote books on what they called natural history, though to my mind it was the most natural stuff I ever heard tell of—all about beetles and flies with three hundred muscles in their heads, and as could carry twelve hundred times their own weight on their own backs, which everybody knows he must have got up as he went along.

"They were dretfully taken up with each other, he and his mother, and she believed everything he said was so, even about the flies and beetles. But she was his own mother, and that explains it.

"When she died Mortimer went well-nigh crazy. He planted her grave with vi'lets and pansies, and at the head was a white marble monument he had gone to the city for—nothing nearer would suit him. But he didn't display no taste. Nothing on it, my dear, but the old lady's name and the date she died—not an angel, nor a cherub, or a lamb, or a broken rose-bud, nor a bit of verse. And yet he always seemed to set store by her.

"Then Mortimer, he just stuck to the old house, same as ever, though now he was alone. I used to wonder how it seemed to him late at night hearin' the swash of the river and the sighin' of them pine trees. He wore his hair long, as was the custom in them days, and it was curly up at the ends, like the picture of John Wesley. But he had eyes that went right through you and came out the back of your head. And he never set foot into the meeting-house nohow.

"Now, he was the last man in the village I'd ever said would got married. But as sure as you set there, when the little milliner, Mary McAllister, came into the place he was struck. That wasn't nothing strange—all the young fellows was—but, mind you, she was struck, too. No, you wouldn't 'a' thought it.

"Everybody warned her, and told her about his fathers' hangin' himself in prison, and how queer his mother was, and that Mortimer was as old as Dick's hatband and wouldn't come to no good. She listened, with her eyes big and cool and a little hot patch of red on her cheeks like a daub of paint, but she never said a word.

"That was Mary McAllister all over, never to say a blessed word, but go and do just as she saw fit. First we knew they was engaged, and it was given out in meeting. Next day her aunt she lived with came in to see me, and wrung her hands, sayin' she wouldn't be surprised if Mary was murdered before the year was out. What can you think of a man who lives like a hermit, and had a crooked father and a peculiar mother?

"But we wasn't prepared for the worst. A day or two before the wedding, in comes old Mrs. Johnson, and says:

"'Shut up the doors tight,' says she, 'and the winders. I've got something to tell you that'll make your hair rise up,' she says, whisperin' like.

"So I shut the door, she a-workin' her hands together like one possessed.

"'It's about Mary,' she went on.

"'He's been and got a tombstone for her.'

"'Who?' asked I, as if I didn't know, but my knees knocked together and I felt a bit sick.

"'Mortimer Barbour,' says she. 'My grandson, Johnnie, was after a bird's nest in a tree over in his yard. The limb broke, and down he went right on to the roof of the old outhouse, that hasn't been used for years. It went in under him like tinder, and as soon as he could pick himself up and found no bones broke, what should he see but a new white gravestone, a-settin' up in a corner against some rubbish. He went up to it, and he says as true as the Bible he saw "Mary Barbour," cut on it, and the date she is a-goin' to die.'

"'I don't believe it,' says I, but I was all a-faint, and had to go and make us each a cup of tea so we could bear up under it.

"As soon as I said I didn't believe it, Mrs. Johnson said we'd go ourselves and see. And we did go, Mortimer bein' away in the fields, and got into the outhouse. It was towards dark, and we shook with the cold, though it was a warm day in June. We'd brought a bit of candle with us, and Mrs. Johnson lit it, and then we saw —good gracious, child, how scairt you look; don't get so near the fire, you'll be all ablaze. Where was I? Oh, we saw the stone just as Johnnie said, a real gravestone of white marble, and on it the name 'Mary Barbour,' with the date 'Sept 5, 18—,' below it. But the rest we couldn't make out.

"'He's going to let her live three months, may Heaven forgive him,' says old Mrs. Johnson, meanin' different from what she said.

"The next day I went to Mary, and told her the whole truth! And would you believe it, she said she thought Mrs. Johnson and I had no business prying about other people's affairs? 'If he had bought me a thousand gravestones I'd have him just the same,' says she. So they was married the next day, but Mary was white as a ghost, and she trembled so she could hardly walk.

"They went right away, and we threw some old shoes after 'em, but all the wishin' of joy was make believe, and I never saw a bride with such a white set face, never looking at her husband, nor yet at us.

"They was away nearly three months; they came back to the old house. But folks said they wasn't happy, that she was as cold as a stone, and he was always at his books and old insects. One day I got a letter askin' me to come and see her. She was lyin' down on a lounge when I got there, white and so thin, with big eyes, with a sorry, hungry look in 'em. But she had on a smart dress, and was as pretty as a pictur'.

"As soon as we'd shaken hands and I'd taken off my bonnet and shawl, she says:

"'Do you know what day to-morrow is?'

"Then I thought it up, and said it was the 5th of September. 'The day I am to die,' she says in a soft, quiet way. Then I up and asked her if Mortimer had been ill-treatin' her, but she put her finger and said:

"'Not a word to my husband; he doesn't know I know it.'

"Then she said he was awful good to her, but she couldn't get that gravestone out of her head day or night. All at once it came to me how matters was; she'd been too proud to give him up, besides her likin' him, too; and she'd been too proud to tell him about it; and so betwixt the two the poor child was almost beat out. She asked if I would go out to the outhouse with her to see the stone. She wanted to see it, and was afraid to go alone.

"Then a queer thing happened. Mortimer had come into the next room while she'd been talkin', and heard every word. I never saw anybody so stirred up as he was when he came in.

"'Is that tombstone what has stood between us?' he said, and went on to explain that it had been ordered for his mother. He was such a bad writer that the stone-cutter mistook the name Marie for Mary, and after the stone was half done it was found out, and they made him pay for it. So, as it was his, they brought it to him, and, not knowin' what to do with it, he'd just set it up in the outhouse and forgot all about it. Mary, she began to cry, and then they fell to huggin' and kissin' each other, as if they hadn't met for years. I tried to put in a word to ca'm 'em, but they saw me without seeing me, and heard me without hearing me, so I put on my bonnet and shawl and came away and left 'em.

"After that? Dear me, they was the happiest couple you ever saw. They used the gravestone for a front doorstep, wrong side up, and it was really pretty. Mary was dretful proud of him, and believed every word he wrote about them flies and beetles, just as his mother did, which only goes to show that the old sayin' is true, that love is blind." A CASE THAT MADE A NAME.

"What was the most interesting case in your long experience, doctor?"

It was a little entertainment given in honour of Dr. Tournequet's retirement from practice—an event we young aspirants felt inclined to celebrate with no small satisfaction—that the foregoing question was put to the guest of the evening.

"I think," said the old gentleman, after a moment's reflection, and casting a fatherly look upon us through his gold-rimmed spectacles, "about the most interesting case I ever had was my first."

"Would you mind relating it?"

"Not at all. Whatever secret there once was about it, all reason for keeping it has long since ceased.

"It is now nearly fifty years," he continued, "since I presumed to settle down here and enter into competition with Old Carver, whose dazzling gilt sign, emblazoned with his name and professional designation of 'Physician and Chirurgeon'—Curmudgeon would have hit the mark more nearly—had hitherto enjoyed a monopoly of 'lighting fools the way to dusky death.'

"He never passed me without a scowl, and never spoke to me but with contempt. His evident purpose was to nip my pretensions in the bud. I should never have a case if he could help it.

"I came very near having one, in spite of him, before long. A poor wretch had cut his throat, just missing the carotid artery, and severing a number of important veins.

"A messenger dispatched for Old Carver not finding him in, had left word for him to come immediately, and then, as a makeshift, hurried on for me. I accompanied him at once, and found the wounded man so utterly prostrate from the loss of blood that but the faintest signs of life remained. A few drops of an invigorating cordial, which I forced him to swallow, partially revived him; and I was preparing to sew up and dress the wound when Old Carver came bustling in and pushed me aside rudely. Of course, the case was his by right of being first summoned, and I could not oppose his taking charge of it.

"'Humph,' he grunted, clapping his fingers on the patient's pulse, which had somewhat risen from the effect of the cordial, 'what have you been doing here?'

"'I gave him a restorative,' I answered.

"'And threw him into a fever,' interrupted Old Carver, without waiting to hear further.

"Then whipping out his lancet, he proceeded to deplete the sufferer of what little blood he had remaining.

"'I trust you are satisfied with your work,' he growled as the man gave a gasp and sank back dead.

"I was about to repel indignantly the insinuation that it was at my door the man's death lay; but the looks and mutterings of the crowd admonished me that my word would weigh but little against that of the venerable quack, and that if I would get off with a whole skin, I had better go at once.

"I lost no opportunity, whenever I could get a hearing, of relating the true state of the case and vindicating my conduct. The restorative, I insisted, had been absolutely necessary to stimulate the flagging vital current, and demonstrated the stupid folly of bleeding a man almost at death's door. But the listeners would only shake their heads and say: 'Doctor Carver was a very good judge of physic, and they thought I couldn't do better'n larn a wrinkle or two from him.'

"My prospects, which had never risen much above zero, now sank considerably lower. I began to lose heart at last, and was seriously considering the advisableness of giving up the struggle, and leaving the headstrong population to Old Carver and their fate, when one night I received a hurried call to attend a gentleman who had just had his leg broken.

"Mr. Soammi Furneval, the individual referred to, was a respectable middle-aged bachelor, for some time back thought to be particularly attentive to Miss Bernice Potts, a maiden lady of fortune, and nearly his own age.

"In attempting to board a moving train he had missed his footing, and fallen so that one of his legs was run over and completely crushed, almost to the knee.

"They carried him home on a stretcher, and, as usual in such cases, messengers ran for all the doctors in the place—that is to say, in the present instance, for Old Carver and myself.

"We arrived simultaneously.

"'It's a compound comminuted fracture of the tibia and the fibula,' said Old Carver, pushing forward to take possession by first getting his ugly paw on the injured limb, which he fumbled roughly through the clothing. 'It's a case for immediate amputation,' he added, opening his case of instruments.

"'I shall not require your services,' spoke up Mr. Furneval, with considerable energy for one in his condition; 'I prefer placing myself in the hands of Dr. Tournequet.'

"Everybody looked astonished, and Old Carver's face grew blacker than a thundercloud.

"'Your blood be on your own head!' he croaked ominously, and, bundling up his instruments, he banged the door behind him.

"'I wish to be left alone with the doctor,' said Mr. Furneval, when Old Carver had gone; 'if assistance be needed it can be called.'

"Everybody withdrew but the patient and myself; and there, alone and single-handed, I did everything the case required."

"You don't mean to say you amputated the limb without assistance?" said a fidgety little M.D. across the table.

"No; you see Mr. F., as I have said, was keeping company with Miss Potts, and thinking he might be better able to walk than to hobble into her affections, we decided against amputation, and proceeded accordingly.

"Next morning I met Old Carver in the street. He was in the habit of passing me with a frown without speaking, but this time he stopped.

"'How's your patient?' he inquired with a sneer.

"'Doing finely,' I replied.

"'Your first amputation, I suppose?'

"'Neither first or last,' I said. 'I didn't amputate at all.'

"'I suppose you know the leg's smashed to flinders?'

"'I do.'

"'And you haven't amputated?'

"'No.'

"'And don't intend to?'

"'No.'

"'Better go by the undertaker's and order a coffin, then!'

"'He's busy on one of your last victims, I believe,' said I, hurrying along without further parley.

"For nearly a week my patient saw no one but myself and the servant who carried up his meals.

"Then a few friends were admitted to cheer his confinement, which he bore with admirable patience. In six weeks I removed the splints, and the next day Mr. Furneval was walking out as well as ever. My fame was in everybody's mouth. Even Old Carver could find nothing to carp at, for he had everywhere circulated the terrible nature of the injury, and predicted the patient's speedy death. My practice soon exceeded my most sanguine hopes, and Old Carver's whilom patrons flocked to me in such numbers that he shut up shop and retired in disgust."

"Was the limb really as badly fractured as at first supposed?" inquired the fidgety little doctor opposite.

"Quite—ground almost to powder, you might say."

"And gave no signs of lameness afterwards?"

"No more than before; there had previously been a slight hitch in that leg, but I think there was less afterwards."

"Wonderful!" exclaimed the little doctor.

"Not at all. You see, and there lay the secret, the injured leg was of wood, and we replaced it with a better one."

SUMMARY.

THE story opens with an introduction to the inmates of two farmhouses in an English village named Thorneydene. Honeypots Farm has recently been taken by a young stranger, John Gillway, about whom there seems to be a mystery.

His neighbour, Farmer Strange, is a widower with twin daughters, Diana and Kitty, who have been brought up for the most part by a wealthy aunt, Mrs. Caffyn, who is about to take them on the Continent.

Gillway has already fallen in love with Kitty, who was at first pleased by his attentions. She soon wearied of them, but being half afraid of him, makes many promises of fidelity before going abroad with her sister and aunt, which she never intends to keep.

At Capri they meet with Bernard Eliot, nicknamed "the Nabob" on account of his wealth. He speedily wins the affections of all three ladies, but seems to prefer Di's society.

At the end of three months they return to London, and as the two girls have now attained their majority they are given the option of remaining with their aunt or returning to their father for good. Kitty chooses the former and Di the latter.

CHAPTER V.

THE GATHERING OF A CLOUD.

"WELL, there," said Aunt Shales in her sweetest tone of voice. "As I says, an' shall keep on a-sayin' to my dyin' day even if I lives to be a hundred—not as that's likely, seein' as I've gone through more trouble an' had more to put up with than anybody'll ever know in this blessed world—you, knows what trouble is, Jane, an' I should like to meet with the woman as don't know what it is—that I should—as I was a-sayin' when our Poll sat in the very chair you're settin' in—I'd put on a clean chintzy cover that very day—oh, I can't abide dirt, I can't—an' up and told me as you should call her a born liar, I never did feel so took to. As I says, 'tain't like Jane to go a-callin' her relatives names. Oh, I knows what you be, Jane. Course, I didn't make any remark to Poll. She makes enough worrits in the fam'ly, don't she now? But I did say jest to myself like, as 'twas too bad of Poll, seein' how good you'd bin to her."

Miss Jane Shales gave a little snort of righteous indignation and carefully spread out the shining folds of her best black visiting alpaca. She was a thin, highly respectable, if a soured looking woman of five-and-fifty, with well-oiled grey hair, a fine set of white teeth, and a very high colour, that increased at Aunt Shales' words.

"I nursed Poll's children through the whooping cough an' the measles," said she austerely, "an' I am sorry for it. Their mother is the most ungrateful critter."

"So she be, Jane. Oh, she didn't say nothin' to me about that, though I did hear as she told Bob's Mary that you mussed up all the med'cines, and gave po'r little Jenny three or four doses of linseed oil an' vinegar what Poll had mixed ready for polishin' the furniture——"

Miss Shales sprang from her seat with an angry exclamation. "I do such a thing!" she cried. "Poll must be mad to think it! If ever anybody looked well after children an' saw as they had ther doses right to the very minute by the clock hands, I did.

"Poll's out of her mind to say such a thing about me. I on'y wish she'd come in at that door this moment. I'd make her own up to the truth. Linseed oil an' vinegar, indeed; ugh!"

"Oh, she admitted as you didn't go to do it intentional," said Aunt Shales soothingly. "Though, as she said, it might have pisoned the child, an' made her feel a bit anxious, seein' as there was rat pison an' chilblain mixture all on the same shelf. But as our Bob's Mary said to her, 'twas all her fault, considerin' as you can't read an' don't know nothin' about letters and——"

"I mayn't have been born in these days of board schools and sich like," retorted Miss Shales, growing a fine deep purple, "but I've got my share of common-sense, an' I know rat pison an' chilblain stuff from good wholesome physic, no matter how nasty it may taste. I'm not quite a fool, Ann."

"Lawks, you ain't got no need to tell me that," cried Aunt Shales. "Sit you down agin, now do, Jane. The cuttin's 'ull be done to a turn in a minute. You likes 'em brown, don't you? Pork wants to be well fried, or else you may as well put my ole boots on the tea-table for toughness. I tole that Em'ly to bring us in a plate of buttered toast; but I really do believe as that gal's headpiece is as full of holes for lettin' things slip out as a cullender."

Miss Shales gave another snort and looked at the polished range where Aunt Shales was cooking the meat for tea. The sound of the meat hissing and spluttering in the bright pan, the appetising odour that issued from it, and the cheerfully arranged tea-table with its snowy cloth, and shining brown loaf, and yellow pat of butter, induced her to take her hostess's advice. She resumed her seat, and slowly drew off a pair of well-worn black silk gloves.

"Poll's got a bad heart," she observed. "An' she've got on'y herself an' her tongue to blame for losin' me for a friend. I did think of givin' little Lottie them pink corals of mine; but I shan't do no sich thing now!"

"Oh, I said as you wouldn't!" declared Aunt Shales as she dexterously turned the pork cuttings from the pan to a hot white and blue dish, drawing back to avoid the spluttering bubbles of boiling fat. "As I up an' said to her; how could she expect as you would after all as she'd said? Oh, I can't abide them folks as is allays a-sayin' as they didn't say this, an' they didn't say the other. Now, Poll's she's one of that sort, she is. What was it she told me about your offerin' to knock her down, Jane? Don't upset your tea. It's jest by your elbow," as her visitor started in surprise.

"Me offer to knock our Poll down?" repeated Miss Shales, brandishing her gloves in the air as though they were war-clubs. "Well—I never did!"

"I thought it odd at the time," remarked Aunt Shales, tenderly loading her guest's plate with fried meat. "Take some mustard, Jane, an' eat it up while it's nice and hot. Ah, here's Em'ly with the toast, an' dried up to a cinder, I'll be bound. I never did know your double for doin' things as contrairy as one cross road is to the other. There, don't stand gapin' at me, don't. Put the plate down, an' get on with that bed-tick. You can sit in the gun-room, an' then there'll be no fear of the fire a-goin' out before Mr. John gets back. Is your tea to your likin', Jane?" she asked in tones of deepest solicitude. "Do you take rum in it? A drop from time to time is good for the wind, ain't it? I generally keeps the bottle locked up, for you can't trust that Em'ly not a bit further than you can see her. You got to keep your eyes a-purlin' all the time to be up to 'em, an' then they've got ways of doin' you!"

"I should like to know what our Poll meant by sayin' sich a wicked falsehood," interrupted Miss Shales excitedly. "Me offer to knock her down! Me as can't live as quiet an' peaceable as I should like, an' ain't never raised my hand, except in kindness, against any livin' critter, me——"

"There, I wouldn't upset myself, if I was you," said Aunt Shales, producing the rum-bottle, and eyeing its contents with a suspicious look in her round, rosy face. "You'll only make yourself ill, po'r dear. I wouldn't think no more about it. Help yourself, do, Jane." She watched Miss Shales pour the rum into her tea-cup with a shaking hand, and as she possessed herself again of the bottle, she added with a gloomy shake of her head: "Ah, 'twould be a good thing for our fam'ly if Poll could take jest a little less of this."

She tapped the bottle with her short, thick fingers.

"I seed how things was goin' when she was takin' tea here in this very room with me before Christmas. She takes too much, between you an' me, Jane. 'Course, I didn't say nothin'. You knows what I am for keepin' things to myself like. You're different, bein' po'r Shales' own sister, an' like my own sister, as I may say. I measured the rum in the bottle, afore I gave it to her, with my very eyes, an' I should like you to have seed it after she'd helped herself. I never did like her a-dealin' at them stores where they sells all kinds of bottled stuffs and encourages people in deceitfulness. How's anybody to know what everybody else buys when it all comes home in the grocery basket, and you can't even tell a bottle of vinegar from a bottle of spirits, so artful as they are in wrappin' of 'em up alike. Them stores will be the ruin of Poll. Lawks, Jane, do eat a bit. Feel bad, don't you? ah, I knows what it is to be slandered an' backbit up hill an' down dale, as you may say; but lawks, I ain't dead yet, an' 'twon't kill you neither. Well, here's luck!" she added, raising her tea-cup.

"What should I want to knock our Poll down for, that's what gets over me," said Miss Shales plaintively. "The mussin' up of medicines ain't nothin' to bein' accused of wantin' to fight."

"Oh, I knows what it was for, cause she tole me her own self. 'Twas about that pig affair—she called on you, an' you called her a liar for a-sayin' as you hadn't paid Farmer Strange for your pig, an' you offered to knock her down. So she says; but lawks, Jane, I wouldn't demean myself by lettin' sich things worrit me. People as takes a drop too much don't know what they says half their times, that they don't."

"It's very hard on them as have got to suffer by it. I couldn't find my receipt from Farmer Strange for the pig, so I went up yesterday an' asked him to give me another. I've been huntin' and huntin' for that paper for the past three or four months, an' I can't find it nowheres. But I've got one now, an' I mean to go to our Poll and show it to her to-morrow. I shall go after tea, now, an' jest give her a bit of my mind, the spiteful varmint!" declared Miss Shales, growing more embittered against her niece as she thought of her sister-in-law's confidences.

"Help' yourself, do, Jane."

"That I would," said Aunt Shales heartily. "An' jest tell her at the same time as I tole you as she should up an' say as she never said nothin' about the pig. I said I'd tell you, an' I have." She looked at her visitor's almost untouched plate, and bending forward, she touched the spinster's thin arm with coaxing persuasion. "Lawks, Jane, you'll never make ole bones and grin through life if you don't eat enough to keep a flea alive an' kickin'. As I says, let's be happy while we can, seein' as the longest-lived ain't here for ever, an' old as Methusaley was he had to go like the rest of us. So you've been to Greyhouse, have you? Miss Di looks a bit peckish, don't she? She didn't have over much colour when I seed her go by t'other day; but she's a nice gal, oh, she is, an' not a bit uppish like Miss Kitty, who wouldn't so much as pass the time o' day with you. I heard as Miss Kitty ain't comin' here no more. Hard on her po'r father, ain't it?"

"I heard as your master was sweet on her like the rest of the young men about here," said Miss Shales, evidently determined to forget her troubles and interest herself in the inmates of Greyhouse Farm.

"Ah, I've heard the same thing, too, an' I shouldn't be surprised if it was true; for a more melancholy man I've never met in a day's march. He ought to have been a mute at a funeral, that he did. An' never tells me a word about hisself—oh, not a whisper about nothin', an' thinks no more of goin' away for a week at a stretch, an' never lettin' me know where's to, nor when he's a-comin' home, but just walks in like a ghost at all times of the night and day, an' expects to find everythink ready an' to be made jest as comfortable as if he was a Christian. Oh, he's a tryin' customer is Mr. John." She lowered her voice and asked mysteriously:

"Did our Poll tell you about the fight he had with some man what came to see him just afore Christmas? They had a set to with whips. Ah, there's more than we know a-goin' on in this world, Jane. Some people's got secrets what 'ud bring 'em to the gallows, if everythink was laid as open as my hand!"

She drew her chair nearer to Miss Shales. The two grey heads bent over the tea-tray, and Em'ly, listening at the keyhole, failed to catch the whispered conversation that followed.

Di had returned to Thorneydene with the fixed resolve to forget the Nabob, and to live only for her father. Mrs. Caffyn had raised a few feeble objections against Di's carrying out her resolve; but they had been spoken in such a half-hearted manner that Di had not experienced any difficulty in having her own way. Kitty had cried a little and protested a great deal. She had never been separated from Di, and even to one with her light disposition and fickle character, it was a wrench, this entire separation of their lives.

"I think you ought to know, Di," said Mrs. Caffyn, "that in leaving me you leave the little fortune behind for Kitty, that I always intended to divide between you upon your marriage. Instead of having only fifteen thousand pounds, Kitty will now have thirty."

"I am very glad that Kitty will be so rich," Di answered. "I am grateful for all your kindness to me, auntie. You have always been so good to me, dear, and I am sorry to go away; but I have always thought that it would be cruel to leave dad all alone in his old age."

"Do you intend to become an old maid?" asked Mrs. Caffyn with a laugh. "You are a silly girl, Di. Some day you will be sure to leave your father. You do not belong to that class of women who find happiness in leading lonely, secluded lives. One day, sooner or later, you will repent this quixotic action."

Di was thinking of this conversation as she trudged through the fields two or three days after her return to Thorneydene. The May day was fair and mild, and the buds of the trees were swelling, ready to burst into tender green at the first few days of warm rain.

"I won't repent it," said Di to herself. "Dad is happy at having me, and surely one must find happiness in giving pleasure to others."

But as Aunt Shales had stated, Di was pale, and just a little sad and weary looking. It was not quite so easy to forget as she had imagined. Those kisses of the Nabob seemed to have shadowed her life. She flushed as she thought of them.

"He had no right to kiss me if—if he did not love me," she murmured angrily. "A good man, a really good man, would not have done that! He must have seen that I cared for him—perhaps he pitied me—oh, it is humiliating to think of!"

She paused at a stile leading into a meadow. A yellow bank of pale primroses met her eyes, and a faint smile of pleasure parted her lips as she saw the flowers. With so many beautiful objects around her, surely she must find an interest in this new life that she had chosen of her own unbiassed will. When one did one's best to forget, it would, indeed, be strange if forgetfulness did not come. Di climbed the stile, and gathered a large bunch of blossoms.

As she stood near the stile arranging them, John Gillway came striding towards her from his own fields. He looked much older, and the bitter moroseness of his expression had deepened. The deeply engraved lines around his stern mouth looked as though they had been cut into the flesh with a chisel. There was something so stern, and with the sternness such deep unhappiness—such keen anxiety—in his dark, melancholy face that Di felt a vague, uncomfortable sensation torment her, such as one experiences when reading sorrow and suffering in the eyes of animals, and with pity for their pain and the dumbness that locks their tongues, comes that miserable feeling of impotence to help them or to make them understand that one sympathises with them, and would do anything to help and console them.

He came straight towards her, walking with the air of a man who had an object in view.

"Miss Strange," he said abruptly when he had joined her, and with no other preface than the simple lifting of his cloth cap, "why hasn't your sister returned with you?"

He spoke in a commanding, brusque tone, as though he felt that he had a right to ask the question, and to demand an answer to it. Di started in surprise, and the colour grew in her thin cheeks. But she answered him without hesitation. "She has chosen to remain with our aunt, Mrs. Caffyn."

"But she will return to Thorneydene later on?"

"No; unless it is to visit dad and myself."

Gillway drew in a long, deep breath, and his hand sought his collar. Di remembered the day at Capri when her neck-ribbon had seemed to be too tight, and seeing the man's involuntary action she understood and was sorry for him.

"Not coming back!" he repeated. "Are you sure?"

"Quite sure."

"But she is not yet her own mistress," said Gillway, betraying how deeply he had been taken into Kitty's confidence.

"She was twenty-one a few days ago—upon the twenty-ninth of April."

Gillway bent and looked searchingly into Di's face. The sweet honesty of her lips and eyes did not escape him. But Kitty also had seemed so loyal, and Kitty had deceived him with a cruel deliberation that was wantonness itself.

"Then am I to understand that your sister has chosen to live entirely with Mrs. Caffyn?" he asked quietly, but with a sudden clenching of one strong, brown hand upon the stick he carried.

"Yes."

"Heavens!" muttered Gillway. "What a blind fool I have been!" he turned his head away and stared with unseeing eyes at the green meadow, the young foliage of the trees, and a flock of chattering jackdaws perched in the elms close by. The birds seemed to be mocking him. There was a worldly-wise, sarcastic sound in their muttered confidences to each other, as though they understood that Kitty had lied to him, and mocked his anguish. He looked at Di, and saw the deep pity—the shame—that lay in her eyes, and he laughed savagely.

"I suppose you know the pretty little story," he cried harshly. "Kitty has told you how completely she has succeeded in duping me! Have you ever laughed together at the thought of how I was patiently waiting for her, hungering for a letter that never came, working honestly to make a comfortable home for her—a home that we were to share together—it must have amused you to think of all this! Fools were made to tickle people who've a sense of the ludicrous."

"We never laughed at you. I knew nothing about this," said Di very softly, because of the agony in the man's wild face. "And I am sorry—indeed I am."

The wolfish expression in Gillway's eyes thrilled Di with fear for Kitty. She felt that his love had turned to hatred, and that this hatred was a thing to dread.

"It's not the loss of her love so much," said Gillway. "It's the feeling that I've been worshipping a little paltry soul, and mistook it for my ideal of all that is good and noble in a woman. It hurts to find that one's golden treasure is only gilded tin—and gilded tin of the commonest and cheapest kind. It lowers one's self-respect. You can never feel quite sure about your judgment after such an experience. Is Kitty still in London?" he asked, turning his blood-shot eyes upon Di's pale face.

She hesitated, but her regard did not shrink beneath his stern scrutiny. He saw her reluctance to answer, and laughed bitterly. "Don't feel afraid of telling me, Miss Strange. It is not Kitty who will be harmed by me. At first I felt that it would be pleasant to yield to my savage instinct of revenge; to track her down and do something to her pretty face that would effectually prevent any other man from following in my footsteps. Very brutal, isn't it?"

Di shuddered. What a cruel face Gillway had! How bitter the thoughts must have been that had cut those deep furrows in his cheeks!

"Yes," she answered, "it would be mean and degrading to yield to such feelings. Kitty has wronged you. That is no reason why you should injure her; and if you think her—her—so contemptible, it would be lowering yourself to her standard to try to injure her. I can't express myself very clearly, but I am sure that I am right. It must be more noble to bear pain in silence than to seek revenge upon the person who has hurt you."

"Your theory's all right," said Gillway, "but a man finds more satisfaction in giving his enemy a good kick than he would ever get out of simply offering his hand, and whining that he was going to be noble and forgive, and all the rest of it. If anyone has struck me, I have always struck back—harder, if I could. It's the first time that I've been floored by a woman, and it makes me despise myself."

"It is your own fault," cried Di, with a flash in her eyes. "How could you expect Kitty to honour you when you taught her to meet her clandestinely, unknown to dad and to me?"

Gillway opened his lips to cry some harsh invective against Kitty, but the light in Di's eyes checked the words. He pulled his moustache and stared.

"If you loved her you should have gone straight to dad and told him. Nothing good ever comes from deceit. You say and think bad things about Kitty because she has flirted with you and forgotten you. She is only a girl. You are a man, and older than she, and you should have known better."

"Look here, Miss Strange," said Gillway, passing one hand over his haggard face. "I wasn't going to clear myself; it's a mean trick to throw all the blame upon the woman, and a dirty one, too. But Kitty's conduct is not more free from blame than mine. I wanted her to let me speak to her father. She wouldn't. She was afraid, she said——"

"Kitty's conduct doesn't clear yours," Di retorted with a proud movement of her head. "You are old enough to know right from wrong, and if you deliberately commit a wrong action, you've no right to cry out when you suffer the consequences."

A few drops of rain fell as she spoke. She gathered her skirts around her and bade Gillway a curt good-afternoon. Her heart had quaked with fear; but she exulted as she hurried back home. She had not given him Kitty's address, and to-morrow Kitty and Mrs. Caffyn would be in Yorkshire. They had accepted an invitation to spend a week with the Malets. Gillway looked after the tall, erect figure with an unfriendly light in his gloomy eyes.

"I'll see her again," he muttered, "and if she tells me that Kitty has accepted any other man"—he paused, and added, with a hiss of the words between his teeth—"that man shall pay dearly for robbing me of—my little gilded tin god!"

Di seemed to grow paler in the days that followed, though she won old Betty's praises by her unflagging zeal and industry, and seemed so happy that her father never dreamt of the sleepless nights she passed fighting with her fears for Kitty's safety and her own sorrow. She, too, had loved only to meet with pain and disappointment; but it had not been the Nabob's fault—Di felt sure of that. Only he ought not to have kissed her. Things would have been so much easier to bear had it not been for the recollection of those farewell kisses. She tried to forget them, and was angry because she could not.

Then, as she grew thoroughly interested in her simple duties, her reward came. The image of the Nabob grew fainter and fainter in her memory. The colour returned to her cheeks; she sang as she went about the house. After some time she was able to look back and laugh at her foolishness in believing that she had given her heart to a man who did not desire it.

Kitty's letters were so full of happiness that Di decided to cast no shadow upon her sister's high spirits by mentioning her interview in the fields with Gillway. Di knew that Kitty would be alarmed. Once, in one of those brightly-written letters from Yorkshire, Kitty had asked if Di had encountered the mysterious tenant of Honeypots

Farm. It was the only reference that she had ever made to him, and Di had passed it by in silence.

Once or twice a week Gillway came to Greyhouse to talk over farming affairs with Farmer Strange, the prices of corn and hay, and the unsatisfactory or satisfactory working of new machinery that the younger man had bought. Di generally contrived to absent herself upon those occasions. When she could not avoid being present she knew that Gillway had a habit of pulling his moustache and looking at her. She manœuvred to give him no opportunity of having a private conversation with her, fearing that he would speak of Kitty.

Farmer Strange did not care for Gillway. The young man's ideas were too modern for him to assimilate. He was so utterly unlike any other man known to the rough farmers, with his interesting descriptions of foreign countries that he had visited and the customs of their inhabitants, that it often seemed to Strange that the young man was a gentleman playing at being a hard-working man, just as Di appeared to him to be a lady masquerading as a dairymaid in her simple cotton dress, and with her shapely white hands that looked too dainty and delicate for the work she imposed upon them.

"I don't want you to do work that a lady wouldn't do," said he for the hundredth time to Di since her return to the farm. "Butter and cheese making ain't in your style, my girl."

"Oh, daddy, how nasty of you to say that!" cried Di, casting a reproachful glance at his thin furrowed face. "Just when Betty has been telling me that I am getting on so well, too."

They were standing in the garden where the flowers were beginning to open to the June sunshine. Di had stripped up the sleeves of her print gown high above her dimpled elbows.

Her father was looking at her pretty, fair arms in disapproval, with a wrinkle between his bushy grey eyebrows.

"It doesn't seem right somehow, Di," said he, rubbing his hollow cheeks in perplexity. "You've been brought up to be a lady, and——"

"I can be a dairymaid and a lady at the same time," said Di, lifting her little dark head proudly. "If I went to a ball I should have my sleeves ever so much shorter—more in this style, dear."

"I can be a dairymaid and a lady at the same time."

With a rapid gesture she rolled her sleeves still higher, and then, turning to her father with a smile, she linked her arm in his, and softly rubbed her cheek against his arm.

"Oh, daddy," she said in a low voice; "you don't know how happy I am to be at home——" she broke off in surprise. A hired fly had stopped at the garden gate, and a gentleman was aiding a little lady in a fawn dress to alight. Di stared at the lady for a second, and then began to pull her father towards the gate.

"It is, Kitty!" she cried. "Kitty and"—she paused, the colour rushed into her cheeks—"and the Nabob!"

Farmer Strange knitted his shaggy eyebrows, and his face assumed its most severe expression. He had never heard of the Nabob. The name was Greek to him. He saw a young, handsome man, with a golden-brown moustache, and particularly smiling, happy eyes that met his own very frankly as he advanced leading Kitty. She was rosy, embarrassed, and more pretty than ever in her light, lace-trimmed gown and large white hat with its soft white plumes.

"Oh, dad! Oh, Di!" she began, and threw herself into Di's arms. "We were married this morning, and, oh, I do hope that John Gillway won't do anything foolish!" she whispered in her sister's ear, while the Nabob was shaking hands and explaining matters to Farmer Strange.

"I feel ashamed of robbing you of Kitty in this underhanded fashion," said he, holding the farmer's rough brown hand and looking him frankly in the eyes. "I wanted to ask you to the wedding, but Kitty was so dreadfully afraid of some ruffian of a farmer coming up to London and making a jealous scene, that I listened to her entreaties to keep our engagement a secret from you. But I made up my mind to see you as soon as the ceremony was over. I felt that I must apologise and make things square, you know. 'Pon my word, I feel quite uncomfortable about it. Didn't seem like treating you with proper respect, sir."

Farmer Strange looked hard at the Nabob, and then at Kitty, whose eyes drooped beneath his regard.

"Kitty is her own mistress," said he; "I hope she's chosen well." He shuffled his feet uneasily, and hid a nervous cough behind one big palm, intimidated by this fine gentleman, with his well-gloved hands and diamond breast-pin.

John Gillway fell into utter insignificance compared with the Nabob.

"When were you married?" he asked awkwardly.

"I've just told Di that we were married this morning," cried Kitty. She kissed her father heartily. "Why, you haven't spoken to Di! She looks dumb with surprise," she added, giving her husband a little playful push.

Di tried to command her voice, as she laid her hand in the Nabob's. There was simple brotherly affection in his eyes.

"I am surprised," she admitted. "I—I—hope you will be happy."

"Thank you, Di," the Nabob said heartily, as he wrung her hand; "I knew we should have your good wishes. What a jolly old place! Can you put us up for a week or two?" he asked Farmer Strange. "I should be so glad if you would. I don't want you to think that I'm going to deprive you of my little wife. If it would be agreeable to you, we should like to spend our honeymoon in Kitty's old home."

Farmer Strange looked steadily at his son-in-law, measured him from head to foot, coughed and rubbed his ill-shaven chin. That Kitty had married a gentleman did not astonish him. Had she married a Prince of the royal blood it would not have seemed odd to him. But that this fine gentleman should be anxious to make the acquaintance of Kitty's father, and should propose staying beneath the humble farm-roof did amaze Farmer Strange. He admired his son-in-law for his lack of pride, but he did not feel comfortable as visions arose before him of the necessity of removing his hob-nailed boots before venturing into the "parlours," where naturally Kitty and her husband would live. The Windsor arm-chair in the kitchen was more to his taste than the finer chairs in the "parlours." And from the kitchen window he could see the men passing by in the big yard, while the windows of the other rooms looked into the garden.

"We are not going to change your daily routine," said the Nabob reading the hesitation and doubt in the farmer's face. "If you have bread and cheese for dinner, we shall eat the same fare, and enjoy it, too, I'll be bound!"

"Bread and cheese! How foolish you are, Bernie!" cried Kitty, hanging upon her husband's arm, and smiling into his sunny face. "Whatever made you think that they ate bread and cheese at home?"

"Well, I hoped they did," answered the Nabob. "I like bread and cheese, with one of those big, sweet, juicy lettuces, fresh from the garden, don't you know. One gets so jolly tired of dinners of ten courses! What do you call those big lettuces—Roman's or Coss?"

"We calls 'em Coss lettuces," replied Farmer Strange, giving another perplexed glance at his son-in-law. "In summer time," he added, "we lives in the kitchen. There's three parlours in the house, but I never did take kindly to a parlour. Don't feel at home in one. Still, I've no doubt you do, and Kitty. I know she does, so if you like to use 'em——"

"Of course we shall!" Kitty interrupted. Her face had grown scarlet, and her imploring eyes said to Di: "Oh, do stop him, do, please stop him!"

She threw a furtive look at her husband, afraid of seeing shame and amusement in his expression. She felt so very ashamed of her poor old father with his blunders, and his want of tact, and his shabby, ill-fitting clothes. She had tried playfully to depict him to her husband when she had discovered how utterly impossible were all her efforts to dissuade him from visiting Greyhouse Farm, and she was immensely relieved to see that he was watching her father with kindly sympathy and good humour.

"We shan't put you to any inconvenience, Di?" asked the Nabob. "I'm afraid I must seem pretty cool to marry Kitty in this sly way, and then to spring a surprise upon you, and to come begging for a fortnight's hospitality. But if we shall put you out——" he paused, and smiled affectionately at Di. She was a little pale, but she had entirely recovered her self-possession.

"Do pull your sleeves down! You look like a housemaid!" whispered Kitty.

Di pulled mechanically at her sleeves. A look of relief came into her father's face. He had never thought it possible that anyone could feel ashamed of himself; but he had felt ashamed of Di being caught by Kitty and her husband in a common cotton gown and with naked arms.

"Put us out!" he cried in his content at seeing Di's pretty arms hidden respectably from sight. "Not a bit of it! Come 'long in! We'll drink a bottle of good wine to your very good healths, an' many of 'em."

Kitty and her husband entered the house, and Di, feeling like a person walking in her sleep, went into the kitchen to consult old Betty about providing accommodation for their guests. She thought of Mrs. Caffyn, and with her wonderment pity mingled itself.

Answers to Correspondents.

H. G.—Taking Europe as a whole, there are many more people engaged in the pursuit of agriculture than in manufacture. Always inclose a stamped envelope with your letter if you want an immediate reply.

Well-wisher writes to point out with reference to a paragraph that appeared in a recent number of Short Stories that not only is it possible to coin silver and bronze at the Mint simultaneously, but, taking the year throughout, there is seldom a time when either gold or silver, or silver and bronze are not being coined at the same moment.

G. B. B.—That your idea is a good one is assured by the fact that we were already busy developing the identical scheme when your letter arrived. Thanks for writing, all the same.

Miss S. T. — Gloves, I should say. Nearly thirty-seven million pairs are used in this country every year, which is about equal to one pair for every person.

H. K.—Winchester College is the oldest public school in this country; it was founded in 1393.

A. N. W.—Very few English churches have a surpliced choir of women choristers.

A Constant Reader. — The Royal Standard is divided into four quarterings, two being assigned to England, one to Scotland, and the other to Ireland. The latter consists of an azure ground, bearing on it a harp or stringed argent.

C. C. H.—Stockings made from human hair are supposed to be the best preventative for wet feet. They are used by fishermen on certain parts of the French coast. I should not like to vouch for their comfort, however.

L. M.—It was unfortunate for you that your attempt was posted without an address. But you may comfort yourself with the knowledge that about 26,000 other letters are posted in England every year without addresses.

Wax.—There is no doubt but that more wooden matches are made in Sweden than in any other country.

R. B. — The largest congregation of ancient people seems to exist at a little village in France, named Aumona. There are only forty inhabitants, twenty-three of whom are eighty years of age, and one is over a hundred. This rather puts your village into the shade, doesn't it?

T. C. D.—There is twenty times the amount of unmined coal in China than there is in all Europe. Your baby is certainly intelligent. It is not the only one to appreciate Short Stories.

V. B.—Yes, the effects of frost differ widely. Under its influence, eggs will burst, apples contract, and potatoes turn black.

D. C.—Chinese women are not allowed to act upon the stage.

H. M.—The average length of a man's stride is thirty and a half inches. When he gets a prize in Short Stories it is forty-five.

W. B.—A penny changes hands about 125,000 times in the course of its life. The publications issued from this office are directly responsible for over 50,000,000 single pennies changing hands in a year.

B. S.—You will find the cod to be about the most digestible of fish—and also about the most tasteless.

G. F.—Our foot gear is certainly by no means a small item in our yearly expenditure. More than half a million is expended in this country every year on boot blacking.

H. S.—The harp is the Queen's favourite instrument, and I agree with you that it is a pity it is not more popular. Probably this is due to the expense of the instrument, and the difficulty of attaining proficiency. If you think of studying the harp you must be prepared for sore finger-tips, but it is well worth the trouble.

W. W.—There is no rhyme to virtue. About 5,000 other words in the English language have no rhyme to them. Glad to hear you like the Athletic Record. Persevere in the theatre ticket competition. The seats are quite worth trying for.

H. G. H.—No, butter was not always a recognised article of food. It was used by the ancients as an ointment, in the same way in which we should use cold cream or vaseline, and the idea of eating it never occurred to them.

Jack Tar.—The custom amongst sailors of piercing the ears probably arose from a superstition that wearing earrings is beneficial to weak eyes.

T. H.—The climate of Britain is so very changeable that it would be difficult to say which is the wettest month, for the driest month in one year is quite as likely to be the wettest in the next. On the average, however, the greatest depth of rain falls in October and the least in February.

D. S. C.—No, our voices do not sound the same to us as they do to other people. This has been proved by means of the phonograph.

Suspicious.—There are plenty of ways of testing whether milk is pure or has been watered. Try this one: dip a knitting needle vertically into the fluid, and if after carefully withdrawing it you find a drop remains at the end of the needle the milk is pure. If, on the other hand, there is no drop, you may rest assured the milk has been adulterated.

B. C.—Women are less prone to insanity than men. No, we do not accept verses for S.S.

P. O. B.—Hibernia was an ancient name for Ireland.

Rollo.—The difference between "hard" and "soft" water lies in the fact that hard water contains a certain amount of earthy salts, whilst soft water is free from them, and in a greater state of purity generally.

Mannikin.—No, a fog does not impede sound as well as light.

W. S.—It is difficult to say whether animals dream or not. We do not understand their language, and so cannot ascertain by personal inquiry. Judging from the way in which some horses neigh, and dogs bark and growl in their sleep, I should say that they most probably do.

G. L. M.—The birds of the New World certainly possess most brilliant plumage, but their powers of song for the most part are a long way inferior to the less assuming British birds.

G. R.—A really good glass eye is an expensive article. The actual manufacture costs something like £10. But it will last a lifetime—barring accidents.

E. R.—I never give medical advice. You had better consult your doctor on the matter.

Stylites.—St. Bartholomew's is the oldest hospital in London. It was founded in the year 1123. The other matter you mention was referred to in this column a few weeks ago.

C. H.—The House of Commons has met on Sunday several times when urgency has demanded it.

F. A. T.—(1) "The American Emperor" will run in Pearson's Weekly until Whitsuntide. (2) Yes, we shall probably publish the other story to which you refer. (3) The other paper was first published in June, 1888; Pearson's Weekly in July, 1890.

E. C.—There are already several chainless bicycles on the market. The best known, perhaps, is the "Acatene." Messrs. Spink, of Piccadilly, are reliable numismatists.

Notice to Competitors.

In all Prize Competitions the Editor's decision is final. No correspondence will be entertained when once a competition is finished and the result published.

THE BURGLAR NEXT DOOR.

I DO not love my neighbour as myself. Although in the habit, as a rule, of conducting my life according to Christian precept, I find this command impossible to carry out—except in theory.

My neighbour is a wrong-headed and prejudiced person, whose ideas on politics and other matters differ entirely from my own. Furthermore, he is constantly making himself disagreeable about small things, for instance, the fence between our gardens, which he declares I cause to be repaired with unnecessary frequency.

Again, in spite of my known dislike of noise, he insists on encouraging the organ-grinder to play for hours at a time before his dwelling. Besides all this, he overlooks my house to such an extent that I am obliged to keep the blinds of my staircase window constantly closed. This very materially interferes with my comfort, as it excludes a large quantity of light and air, which, by rights, should be mine.

In spite of all these just causes of complaint, however, I would not allow any harm to come to my neighbour that I could prevent. At least, I felt so until a short time ago. I think differently now. I have had a lesson I shall never forget, and if ever I put myself to any trouble again to save him from disaster, I am not the highly intelligent man I know myself to be. It came about in this way.

Once every year my neighbour takes his entire family away for a holiday. His house remains untenanted for a month—a blessed month for me. I spend it revelling in an extra quantity of air and light and a blissful cessation of grind-organ thrills and chords. It is not surprising, therefore, that I long for this happy period to arrive as ardently as do my neighbour's children, who are apt to discuss the event for days beforehand in shrill voices most trying to the cultivated ear.

Judge of my delight, therefore, when early the other morning, having been attracted to the window by the noise of wheels, I beheld an omnibus draw up before my neighbour's house. The annual departure was about to take place. Into this vehicle I saw my neighbour, with the patient and resigned air of a family man, hand his wife, three excited children, one bawling baby, six bandboxes, an Irish nurse, and a puppy. He then entered himself, and the whole party drove off.

They say to watch people out of sight brings them bad luck. I had not time, in any case, to do this. Hastily waving my hand in the direction of the omnibus as it rolled away, I rushed to the staircase window, threw open the blinds with a vehemence that upset a pet geranium of Emilia's that stood upon the window-seat, and admitted a flood of glorious sunshine into my dwelling.

I had another exquisite pleasure a little later in the day, when the piano organ man took up his usual station beneath my neighbour's windows. I allowed him to play for about an hour, then sent out my servant to say the gentleman who lived in No. 57 was out of town, and that if he, the organ-grinder, showed himself in the neighbourhood again for upwards of a month, I would send for the police and have him arrested as a public nuisance. I knew I would have no right to do anything of the kind, but counted on the man's not knowing enough to be aware of this. It proved to be the case. He moved off with astonishing celerity. Ignorance—in other persons—is, indeed, frequently productive of bliss.

It happened that three days after this, Fate, which is for ever meddling in our affairs (domestic or otherwise), ordained that I should have a little disagreement with Emilia, which materially assisted in bringing about the unpleasant events which followed. Emilia is my wife. She has a pretty face, and a mind of average calibre, which has become greatly strengthened since our marriage by constant intercourse with a superior one.

Emilia, who allows herself to be very behind-hand in keeping up with the literature of the day, had been reading Mr. Bodkin's account of the adventures of Alfred Juggins in Pearson's Weekly for the first time.

She was quite charmed with them, and began talking with a great deal of enthusiasm about the detective and his marvellous powers. I, who make it a rule to keep up with the times in the literary world as well as in everything else, had, of course, read the stories.

I had been much interested in Alfred Juggins myself at the time, but when Emilia went wild about him in this extravagant way, I discovered I did not think so much of his powers after all. Emilia is frequently of assistance to me in this manner in the forming of my opinions.

I now pointed out to her that Mr. Alfred Juggins's doings were really not at all out of the ordinary. He did no more than any man of intelligence could have done equally well. Given the same premises, any person of even an ordinary amount of mind could have reached the same conclusions.

"I don't know about that," said Emilia.

"I assure you it is a fact," replied I.

"I'd like to have you prove it to me," said she.

"I have no doubt I could easily do so," I responded.

"Well then," said Emilia pugnaciously, "if you think yourself equal to Alfred Juggins, look at me and tell me what I've been doing all the morning? That would have been a trifle to him."

"Nonsense!" said I, "that's no way to argue. Like all women, you are totally unable to stick to the point."

"You can't do it," remarked Emilia triumphantly. "You are as incapable of observation as he was the reverse. Now, look at me well. My hair is ruffled, there are scraps of lace and silk adhering to my dress, and even an atom of straw, and my face wore a pleasant expression until you made me cross. Why, Alfred Juggins would have known in a minute that I'd been trimming a bonnet."

"Confound Alfred Juggins!" said I, abruptly terminating the conversation, which bored me.

It was the night after this that, with the intention of retiring to bed, I put out the light in the hall below and started up the staircase. I generally sit up late, and it was after one o'clock. Emilia had bidden me good-night some hours before, and the house was quiet from top to bottom. Halfway up the steps I paused, attracted by the brilliancy of the moon, which shone directly through the staircase window, the blinds of which I had so triumphantly fastened open on the day of my neighbour's departure. It gave me pleasure to recall the delights of that moment, and I leant out and gazed upon my neighbour's belongings with keen satisfaction.

All was still.

The old servant, who had been left in charge of the house, slept in the detached kitchen building at the rear—a half-deaf old creature whom I knew well by sight, as he frequently causes me intense annoyance by beguiling my coachman into gossiping with him over the garden wall, and thus wasting his time—which belongs to me.

I remained at the window for some time, for I became interested in observing the state of my neighbour's premises. The moon shone so brightly that I could see with great clearness the badly kept state of his back-yard and garden. Weeds running riot over everything, the garden gate off its hinges, the bricks, which should have marked the sides of the path, uprooted and scattered. Altogether, a most disgraceful condition of things.

I mentally compared it with my own well-kept grounds, and thought how true it was that the superiority of a highly intelligent man shows itself in all his belongings.

I had seated myself on the window-sill and was beginning to feel sure I was right in thinking I saw a broken pane of glass in one of the attic windows, when my attention was attracted by a slight noise in the direction of the street. It sounded like a person gently fumbling with a bunch of keys, or jingling instruments of some kind. All grew quiet again, and then, to my amazement, I saw a head slowly rising above the wall which separates my neighbour's front garden from the street.

Then a leg was put slowly and cautiously over, and in a moment the owner of these two articles stood safely on the ground. I leant forward, keeping carefully in the shadow, and watched for further proceedings.

The man looked all about him, then walked softly towards the house, and appeared to be measuring with his eye the height of the balcony. Apparently he was satisfied with his observations, for, mounting upon the lower railing, he embraced one of the posts and quickly clambered up to the second storey.

I considered what I should do. Here was clearly an individual who had nefarious designs upon my neighbour's property. It was my duty, as a man and a fellow citizen, to prevent the carrying out of his villainous schemes. My first impulse was to give the alarm and attract the attention of the police, and I was on the point of putting this idea into execution, when the memory of that little conversation with Emilia, which I have already repeated, flashed into my mind. Here was an excellent chance to confute her, utterly and entirely—a grand opportunity. I would secure this person myself without calling upon the aid of the law, and thus prove that I was as fully capable of tracking and skilfully overthrowing the designs of the wicked as any detective of them all, Alfred Juggins into the bargain. I therefore remained motionless, and observed with an eagle eye the movements of the burglar.

He walked slowly along the upper balcony until he reached a window opening into a back room. The sash of this he noiselessly threw up and then lightly vaulted into the room, and in the intense stillness of the night, I could hear him gently stepping across the floor.

I decided to allow him time to become a little confident before I acted, in hopes that I would be able to take him by surprise. I calculated that he must be aware of the empty condition of the house, and would, therefore, fancy himself secure and take his time in the selection of his spoils. I was strengthened in this belief by the fact of his lighting the gas in the room he had entered, turning it very low, and closing the shutters immediately after to prevent the light being seen from without.

I thought the time had now arrived for making my own preparations. I must first arm myself, and then get out of one of my own downstairs windows into my neighbour's garden. When there, my further proceedings must depend on circumstances. I should either follow him into the house or be ready to confront him on his exit with a loaded pistol. I preferred the latter plan, as I am not the sort of person to enjoy climbing up a balcony-post.

First and foremost, I must procure my pistol. I ascended the stairs on tiptoe, hoping not to arouse Emilia. She must know nothing till the feat was actually accomplished, and I could overwhelm her with the evidence of my coup d'état.

I was reflecting whether I should march my prisoner at the pistol's point into my own bathroom for the night or hand him over to the police immediately, when I discovered to my dismay, that Emilia was sitting up and reading a paper. I recognised it at once. It was Pearson's Weekly. She was again absorbed in the doings of Alfred Juggins. I hoped she was too interested to notice what I was after, but unfortunately she looked up as I was lifting down my pistol from the shelf where I kept it.

"What is the matter?" she cried in an alarmed tone.

"Nothing," I replied shortly. "Go on with your paper."

"What are you going to do with that?" she asked obstinately.

"My dear child, you are very curious," I replied warily, knowing Emilia's capabilities for making a scene. "However, if you must know, I am taking it to—to oil it."

I moved towards the door and had my hand on the latch, when Emilia called out timidly: "William."

"What?" said I sharply.

"You—you are not thinking of committing suicide, are you?"

This was too much. "Emilia," said I. "Your amount of childish folly really amazes me. Am I the sort of man to commit suicide?"

Emilia confessed that I was not.

"Then, for goodness' sake," said I, "leave me alone," and I left the room. As Emilia was quite capable of following me if the fancy seized her, and that would spoil all, I took the precaution of gently turning the key in the lock as I passed out.

I made my way softly downstairs again, and, with as little noise as possible, climbed through the pantry window into my neighbour's garden. The burglar was evidently hard at work, for I could hear muffled sounds from behind the closed blinds.

"Go ahead, my friend," I remarked satirically under my breath. "Enjoy yourself while you can. The day of reckoning is at hand."

Presently the noises ceased, and all grew still. I sat down beneath an unsteady arbour of honeysuckle vines which commanded the balcony and waited patiently. The fellow must be making up quite a goodly bundle, I thought, as two o'clock chimed from the clock in the church tower down the street. I waited fifteen minutes longer and began to grow impatient. I wondered if the burglar could possibly have seen me and made his escape from the other side of the house. The very idea made me angry, and I decided to lose no more time, but investigate the matter at once.

I therefore put my pistol in my breast-pocket and resolutely approached the balcony-railing, which I mounted. I chose the same post that the burglar had used, supposing he had probably made a good selection, and grasping it in my arms I began to climb. My principal feeling, as I made my way scrambling and slipping towards the upper railing, was extreme thankfulness that Emilia could not see me at the moment. A final effort and I thankfully felt solid planks beneath my feet once once.

Advancing to the window through which the burglar had made his entrance, I found that the shutters were unbolted and that I could open them with ease. I did so, and cautiously peered into the room beyond. It was in darkness, except for the moonlight, but by the help of this I could see tolerably distinctly. The room to all appearances was empty. The burglar, after completing his search here, must long ago have penetrated further into the house.

I carefully got in through the window and advanced into the room. I was about to leave it by the door into the hall, which was slightly ajar, when, happening to cast my eyes in the direction of the bed, I paused, scarcely able to suppress an ejaculation of surprise. Lying back amongst the pillows the outline of a man was distinctly visible in the moonlight, and even as I looked a slight snore broke the silence.

My blood boiled with indignation at the calm impertinence of the thing. The villain, after finishing his rascally work, must have been attracted by the comfortable appearance of the bed, and, with cool audacity, have decided to give himself a little rest after his labours.

"I have you now, my friend," I thought, and without pausing for further reflection I sprang upon the sleeper, and, in spite of his resistance, for he awoke immediately and began to struggle desperately, I gagged him with my pocket handerchief and got his hands and feet tied together with a skipping rope, which one of my small neighbours, under the direction of Providence, I supposed at the time, had left in a conspicuous position on the floor. Then, not waiting in my elation for a second glance at the creature, I flew through the window, skimmed rapidly and unpleasantly down the post, and precipitated myself through the pantry window into my own dwelling.

Triumphantly I rushed upstairs, and noiselessly unlocking the door of the room where I had left Emilia, (I had never felt quite sure as to whether she was ever aware of her imprisonment on that occasion or not), I faced her with victorious mien. She dropped her book and gave a little scream as I appeared. It is a curious fact that reading about murders at midnight is sufficient to upset a woman's nerves.

"Emilia," said I, "I was obliged to deceive you a short time ago for your own good. I needed that pistol for a desperate purpose. Don't be alarmed. You see me safe before your eyes; but for the last two hours I have been on the trail of a bloodthirsty ruffian who entered the house next door, with, who knows, what horrible intentions. Thank goodness, alone and unaided I have succeeded in capturing the villain. I have now only to put him in the hands of the law, where he will meet with the fate that he so richly deserves."

I then proceeded to give her a clear account of the whole adventure, being particularly impressive on the subject of the dangers I had gone through and the sagacity I had displayed.

Emilia listened with visible interest from the first, but as I went on she displayed an attention which caused her to sit upright and immovable in her chair. When I had finished she remained in the same position for a moment, and then, sinking back against the cushions, she said slowly: "William, do you know what you have done? You have committed an assault upon—you have tied and gagged in his own house—your neighbour!"

"What?" cried I, scarcely taking in what she meant.

"You don't know what you are talking about. My neighbour went off to the country a week ago with his family."

"He came back without them this morning," said Emilia. "I saw him arrive."

The full horror of the situation began to force itself upon me.

"You saw him arrive?" I repeated helplessly.

Emilia nodded her head emphatically.

"And why didn't you mention the fact?" said I furiously.

"I never dreamt you'd take an interest in it," replied Emilia warmly. "You certainly couldn't expect me to imagine the possibility of any such utterly absurd occurrence as this. Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh! It's too ridiculous!—it's perfectly killing! Oh, dear! Oh, dear! You've broken into another man's house and gagged him and tied him up with, who knows, what horrible intentions. Oh! Oh! If I don't stop laughing, I shall die. Oh!"

Digitized by Google

Emilia buried her face in her hands and giggled and screamed with laughter in a most underbred manner. It was not nice of her, considering that she was the cause of the whole disgusting adventure. I told her so, but she only laughed the more, and I heard her murmuring something about bloodthirsty ruffian and the hands of the law. It irritated me.

"But, Emilia," said I, "if this is true, why should he have entered his house in such a very unusual manner? You must be mistaken." I grew bolder as I reflected on the highly suspicious entrance the gagged gentleman had made.

"Why, he must have lost his latch-key, of course," said Emilia, still laughing absurdly, "or left it in another pocket or put it on his other bunch. The poor thing's wife is away, you know. And if a man hasn't the right to enter his own house through the windows, if he wishes, this isn't the land of liberty it's supposed to be. Oh! if I had only seen you scrambling up that post. Oh, dear! Oh dear!"

"Emilia," said I, "please be serious. It is childish in the extreme to give way to laughter in that uncontrolled manner. You don't realize how desperate the case is. He'll work off that gag in a few minutes and begin calling for help. The neighbourhood will be alarmed, and the whole thing will get out. I shall be a laughing-stock for the entire population."

I had hardly done speaking when a most unearthly yell echoed through the air.

"You hear," said I, getting up and rushing wildly up and down the room. "It's only a question of time I tell you. It's only a question of time!"

The screams continued, each one more ear-piercing than the last.

"Had I better rush over and pretend to know nothing about it?" I asked in an agony.

"Oh, no, no!" said Emilia, with a giggle. "You ought to see your clothes. Post-climbing doesn't agree with them. They'd give you away utterly. Wait a moment, and see what happens."

I was forced to take her advice. For a few minutes the screaming was kept up, then came an interval of silence, and then we heard an angry voice vituperating in excessively strong language, and a thinner, weaker one in tones of surprise and interrogation. The old servant had apparently come to the rescue.

I had a moment of intense relief. The neighbourhood was quiet. No one gave signs of having been disturbed. Perhaps I should never be suspected. It was more than probable, that in that moment of wild struggling, my neighbour had not recognised me any more than I him. Oh, blessed thought! followed by fresh agony.

"Emilia," I cried, "my handkerchief! I used it for a gag. Oh! I am done for! I am lost! My name will be discovered, and everything will get out."

Emilia considered. "If it's one of your new ones," she said, "I forgot to have them marked."

I refrained from rebuking Emilia for having neglected a domestic duty.

I passed a miserable and unpleasant night. I could not sleep, for my mind kept constantly recurring to the angry tones of my neighbour's voice. My spirits sank as I thought of the footprints leading to my pantry window.

I felt thankful duelling had gone out of fashion. I would not like Emilia to be left a widow. I went down to breakfast in a most uncomfortable frame of mind. I could not give my attention to the morning paper, and the muffins seemed to have lost their flavour.

A door slamming made me jump, and the tinkle of the door bell caused me perfect agony. Emilia was calm, cool, and collected. I reflected on the cold-bloodedness of women where they themselves are not personally concerned.

As we were finishing breakfast (Emilia showed a remarkably good appetite and ate most heartily—and heartlessly), the dreaded moment came. The servant, after answering a loud peal at the bell, returned with a card, and remarked that the gentleman who lived next door would like to see me for a moment. I went through a second of agony, such as I hope never to experience again.

"Shall—shall I say I'm not at home?" I was foolish enough to ask Emilia.

She smiled provokingly. "Certainly not," she answered. "Show the gentleman in, Thomas, and bring in some hot muffins."

"One moment, Thomas," said I, "is—is the gentleman alone?"

"Quite soliterry, sir," answered Thomas reassuringly.

"Put a bold face on the matter," said Emilia, when Thomas had left the room. "Look as if you knew nothing about the matter, and be very much surprised at everything he says."

Her eyes twinkled, and even at that moment I could not refrain from reflecting on the natural hypocrisy of women. Thank goodness, deceit is not so easy to a man!

The door opened and the gentleman from next door entered the room. I realized that he was at least three inches taller than I had supposed him to be.

"This is, indeed, a pleasure," said Emilia, holding out her hand and smiling brightly. "Please sit down and let me give you a cup of tea. Thomas, the muffins!"

My neighbour shook hands with me, accepted a chair and smiled at my wife People are apt to smile at Emilia. I don't know why.

"I must apologise," said my neighbour, "for this early intrusion. I am aware that there is nothing that needs apology more than this untimely invasion of other people's houses."

He casually glanced at me; my sensations were unpleasant.

"But I have come to confer with you, Mr. Willoughby, on a most unpleasant topic, which, I may remark, concerns us both deeply."

Cold chills permeated my entire being, but I forced myself to appear polite.

"Sir!" continued my neighbour with vehemence. "Last night as I lay on my bed asleep, in an empty house, for my family are at present away from home, my dwelling was entered by a murderous rascal who half throttled me before I awoke. In spite of my desperate resistance, he gagged me and tied me hand and foot. I have no doubt he intended to despoil the entire house, but, fortunately for me, he must have heard some sound that frightened him, for he had no sooner taken his hands from me than he disappeared like a whirlwind through the window and escaped by the balcony posts."

"You don't say so!" cried Emilia sympathetically. "The action of a villain, indeed, was it not William?"

"The rascality of the deed amazes me!" I replied brokenly, feeling Emilia's eye upon me.

"You may truly say so," continued my neighbour. "It is a nice state of things, certainly, when a peaceful householder is liable to be attacked and murdered in his own bed. By Jove! if I could get the scoundrel by the neck, I'd soon show him which was the better man standing. The cowardly villain! to spring upon me in my sleep!"

"Cowardly, indeed!" said Emilia warmly. "What sort of looking man was he?"

"I haven't a very good idea," replied my neighbour. "I only know he was a tall man, say of about your husband's height," casting his eye critically at me as he spoke. "He had a most murderous and malicious appearance—as thorough-paced a rogue as I ever saw."

I heard a slight titter from Emilia.

"I should say, too, from his dexterity," continued my neighbour, "that he was very much in the habit of climbing about balconies. I came over to put you on your guard. The garden is trampled over with footsteps, and some of these lead directly to one of your windows." (I quaked.) "This has led me to imagine that he must have intended breaking into your house also, but finding the window too strongly bolted, abandoned the attempt."

Thrice blessed moment! I could scarcely keep my countenance from becoming wreathed in smiles on hearing this charming supposition. I was safe! I even waved my hand to Emilia when my neighbour was looking the other way.

"The question now is what steps we are to take in the matter?" observed my neighbour. "Had I better put the case in the hands of a detective?"

"Oh, no, indeed!" cried I. "You have no idea how very unpleasant it would be."

"I think so myself," replied my neighbour.

"Much better leave the matter alone," I continued urgently. "Nothing was stolen, and it really doesn't matter in the least who did it. It was only a trifle anyhow."

"Trifle? Do you call it a trifle?" cried my neighbour indignantly. "It's a pretty trifle, to be sure, when a man is half murdered in his sleep. Trifle? It's anything but a trifle, I assure you."

"Of course," said I hurriedly. "I wasn't thinking of what I said."

"However," said my neighbour, "I suppose there's no use taking any steps in the matter. There's really very little to go on. I don't suppose I'd ever find the man," he ended disappointedly.

"No, not the slightest chance," said I delightedly. "Let us consider the incident as ended. A fine day, isn't it?"

"Well, I'll say good-bye," said my neighbour dejectedly. "If you are really of that opinion I suppose you are right, but I should like another chance at the fellow."

My neighbour rose. So did my spirits.

"Wait a moment," said Emilia. "I have something to suggest. I think decidedly something ought to be done in the matter."

I looked at Emilia in surprise. She had the mischievous twinkle in her eye with which she so frequently exasperates me.

"I have been thinking about the matter," she said, "and I believe that if that burglar ever comes back at all, it will be to-night."

"To-night?" said my neighbour.

"Yes," said Emilia. "It is the most unlikely thing in the world that such an attempt should be repeated the very night after its failure. A burglar would run an awful risk, if he should try it. Therefore, you don't think it necessary to take any precautions, because you are perfectly sure he wouldn't dare to attempt it. Now the burglar knows all this perfectly well, therefore, this is exactly the night he is going to choose to try the thing again, because he knows the chances are you'll be taken unawares."

"There is certainly something in what you say, Mrs. Willoughby," said my neighbour. "Now I think of it, I see you are quite right."

"Now, what I should advise," continued Emilia, "is that you and Mr. Willoughby should sit up to-night over at your house and be ready for the man when he comes. Sitting in a dark room, you will find it easy to spring upon him as he enters and secure him."

"An excellent scheme, Mrs. Willoughby," said my neighbour, visibly brightening. "Allow me to congratulate you on your judgment."

"Oh! that is nothing. I have been reading some detective stories recently," said Emilia modestly.

I looked gloomily and disapprovingly at Emilia. She is entirely too fond of a joke. I have never been able to see any amusement in things of the sort.

"Then I may count on you for to-night, Mr. Willoughby?" said my neighbour.

"Of course," said Emilia quickly. "There is nothing Mr. Willoughby enjoys more than a midnight adventure—is there, William?"

I tried my best to get out of it, but Emilia, who was completely off her head, gave me no chance to say a word. She settled the whole matter, and before I knew where I was, I was engaged to sit up all night in the company of my detestable neighbour. That is Emilia's idea of a joke!

"Well, I'll expect you at eleven," said my neighbour, and he took his leave.

While I went with him to the door, Emilia took the opportunity of putting on her hat and leaving the house through the back gate. It was an intelligent thing to do.

Such an abominable night I hope never to pass again. I shall always remember it against Emilia. Seated in the dark and obliged to listen to my neighbour's prosy talk, not even able to fall asleep in my chair, because of his numerous questions; I very nearly acknowledged to myself that Emilia had got the best of it.

At twelve o'clock Emilia sent over a tray with some coffee; also a pistol, the carving knife, and a pair of razors, with a message that she could not bear to think of my meeting the desperado insufficiently armed.

"How charmingly thoughtful of Mrs. Willoughby!" observed my neighbour. I said nothing, but added this to several other little things I have against Emilia.

At daybreak, worn and weary, my neighbour, in much disappointment at the failure of his hopes, released me, and I left his premises by the front door, which seemed an unnecessary lengthy way compared with the pantry window.

"Emilia," said I sternly, on reaching home, "you have had a good deal of amusement out of this affair. But I want you to understand one thing. You know me, I believe, to be a man of my word?"

Emilia assented, if silence means consent.

"Then mark my words!" I continued solemnly, "if you ever mention one of the events of the last two nights to a single living soul, I pack my bag and depart for Terra del Fuego at once."

Emilia promised silence, and I believe up to the present time has kept her word.

I have ceased attempting to strengthen her mind, however. She has intelligence enough already—for a woman!

FATE was a cat and Leonard Herrick was a mouse. There had been some rare sport, but Herrick was of the opinion that it could not last much longer.

He had run this way and that way, and a thousand times he had fancied he was going to escape. But always the velvet paws, with the long, sharp claws springing out of them, had caught him just in time. So at last he lay still, panting, not knowing which way to turn.

He was in a big city all alone. The people who rushed by him were like the thoughts that whirled through his brain; they were shadows, and the everlasting train of them had no beginning or end.

He could not distinguish the real men and women whom he saw from those whom he merely remembered. Now and again there appeared in the throng the faces of the dead. He did not mind those, but there were others that he shrank from.

He stood with his back against the iron fence near St. Martin's Church. There was just light enough in the western sky to give the pile of stone a shadow, which fell upon hurrying thousands who did not notice it.

Herrick's hands were in his pockets. He jingled a few coins which meant that he could live several days longer if he cared to do so. As to a more extended future, he could not picture it. All the lines of his life seemed to end in a knot, which could by no means be untied, but must merely be dropped. He remembered that there were miracles, but he could not think of one to wish for.

He crossed Trafalgar Square and walked down Pall Mall, slowly and with hesitating steps, for he had no errand. A voice cried: "Cab, sir!" almost in his ear. He turned and looked up at the man on the box.

"Is it possible," he said to himself, "that I still look like a gentleman?"

He felt towards the cabman as towards one who had given him a helping hand. Why not pay the debt? To do so would cost him only a day of his life. He had about a sovereign in his pocket.

"Yes," he said as he got into the cab; "Frascati's."

It was the first place that had come into his mind.

The cushioned seat and the comfortable support for his head were very refreshing. A fancy came to him that he would dine decently and then go to a theatre. The extravagance would be trifling, for it was really of small importance whether he starved to death on Sunday or the following Wednesday. He was in a mood to make a jest of it.

A strong glare from an electric light flooded the cab and made visible to him a package in brown paper, that looked as if it might be a sandwich. The object protruded from under the seat. He thought it must be the cabman's supper, which had been hidden in some small locker and had fallen upon the floor. The idea that the food should be spoiled was disagreeable to Herrick, and so he picked up the little brown bundle.

It was smaller than he had supposed, and it did not feel like bread. But had it been food and he at the last pang of starvation, the touch of it would not have sent such a thrill through all his frame.

He knew that the contents of that packet was money. It felt like a mass of notes folded, awkwardly wrapped up, and fastened with elastic bands. Through the brown covering Herrick could feel the crispness of the government paper. The amount might be a poor man's hard-earned savings or a rich man's profit on a great transaction.

As to his own conduct in the matter, Herrick had no doubt whatever. Fate had thrown this money into his hands and Fate might take it away, but not if he could hold on tightly enough. His fingers trembled as he picked at the elastic bands. Suddenly, and without his knowing why, the rubber strings vanished with a loud snap that startled him, and the package sprang open on his knees.

He bent forward, eagerly scanning the notes in his hands, and counted them feverishly. There were forty of them, and each was £100.

Throughout the latter part of the young man's misfortunes he had had substantially but one wish—to rest. Rest has many forms, suited to a vast variety of individual tastes. To Herrick in his day dreams it had always taken the form of travel without care. All paths lie open to a man who has £4,000, and there is no reason why care should sit behind him as he rides.

Herrick had only the most shadowy thought for the person who had lost this money. He did not even speculate upon the manner of its loss. It had passed into the control of one who needed it, and that was enough.

He placed the notes in his pockets in the best interests of comfort and safety. Then he folded up the brown paper and pocketed that also, with a dim consciousness that if it were left in the cab it might get the driver into trouble.

The fellow was honest, no doubt, and Herrick did not wish that he should suffer a wrong. He preferred to keep the wrapper himself, and take the risk of it until he could find some means of disposing of it that would be safer than throwing it out of the cab window.

How to leave the cab was a question that concerned him greatly. He did not wish to confront the driver again, for there might be an investigation, and the question of identification might arise, in which case it would be well to have the man know as little as possible of Herrick's personal appearance. He reflected with satisfaction that the place in Pall Mall where he had entered the cab had been rather dark.

He decided not to complete his journey. Thrusting half-a-crown through the trap-door he sprang out and disappeared in the crowd.

He walked back to a small hotel in a street off Pall Mall, ordered a meal, and ate it with a relish. It was enchanted food. It was the fare of an Atlantic liner, the delicacies of European hotels, and the fruits of the tropics.

He cared little for his bed. It would be no more than a place to lie and think of the future. It was many a night since he had really slept. Certainly, with so much upon his mind, he could not sleep this night, even if he should try.

So, when he had been shown to his room in the hotel, he piled his pillows against the headboard of the bed, and reclined against them, fully dressed. He was very happy. No question of right or wrong in what he had done, or what he expected to do, came to torment him. For a long time he had borne his life like a tremendous burden. This had suddenly slipped from his shoulders, leaving his natural powers benumbed.

The next morning he found himself in a Metropolitan train going citywards.

His pockets were bulging with money, but there was something in one of them that he could not remember to have put there. He pulled it out, and found it to be the brown paper wrapper that had contained the money. As he held it in his hand it was concealed by his newspaper. No fellow-passengers could see it, and it was doubly fortunate, because, in plain sight upon the paper, were the name and address:

"Herbert Graham, 57, Broad Street, E.C."

The train was just stopping at Mark Lane. That was the station nearest the steamship office. Thrusting the brown paper wrapper back in his pocket, he left the carriage, and went with the throng up the street.

He was thinking about the accommodations he would choose on the steamer. He continued to think of that and kindred subjects, yet he walked back towards the Bank. Presently he found himself asking a lift boy in a big building if he knew where Mr. Graham's office was.

Mr. Graham happened to be in his outer office when Herrick entered. He was pouring out a story into a grey-haired Exchange man, and Herrick heard a few words of it—something about cabs, and cash, and carelessness.

"I have found the money that you lost," said Herrick. "Here it is."

The banker sprang to his feet, clutching the notes in his fingers. "My dear fellow, tell me all about it."

"There's nothing to tell," replied the young man. "I merely found it in the cab."

Mr. Graham eyed him a moment in surprise.

"You take it coolly," he said.

"I couldn't take it at all," responded Herrick, with a feeble smile. "I don't know why. It was instinct, I suppose. My ancestors must have been honest men."

"Upon my word, you must take one of these notes," said the banker. "I've offered it in an ad., and——"

"I can't do it," said Herrick. "I don't feel it to be right."

"But, my dear boy," exclaimed the old man kindly, "I must do something for you. I want to; believe me. At least come back and take lunch with me. Shall we say one o'clock?"

"It will give me great pleasure," said Herrick; and, bowing, he turned away and walked out of the office.

He didn't keep his appointment, however. He spent his last shilling in prussic acid. Fate decided it.

THE three great and memorable sieges of the Peninsular War are those of Ciudad Rodrigo, Badajos, and San Sebastian. The annals of battle record nowhere a more furious daring in assault or a more gallant courage in defence than that which raged in turn round each of these great fortresses. Of the three sieges, that of Badajos was the most picturesque and bloody; that of San Sebastian the most sullen and exasperated; that of Ciudad Rodrigo the swiftest and most brilliant.

A great siege tests the fighting quality of any army as nothing else can test it. In the night watches in the trenches, in the dogged toil of the batteries, and the crowded perils of the breach, all the frippery and much of the real discipline of an army dissolves. The soldiers fall back upon what may be called the primitive fighting qualities—the hardihood of the individual soldier, the daring with which the officers will lead, the dogged loyalty with which the men will follow.

As an illustration of the warlike qualities in our race by which empire has been achieved, nothing better can be desired than the story of how the breaches were won at Ciudad Rodrigo.

At the end of 1811, the British and the French were watching each other jealously across the Spanish border. The armies of Marmont and of Soult, 67,000 strong, lay within touch of each other, barring Wellington's entrance into Spain. Wellington, with 35,000 men, of whom not more than 10,000 were British, lay within sight of the Spanish frontier.

It was winter time; Wellington's army was wasted by sickness, his horses were dying of mere starvation, his men had received no pay for three months, and his muleteers none for eight months; he had no siege-trains, his regiments were ragged and hungry, and the French generals confidently put the British army as for the moment out of consideration.

And yet at that precise moment, Wellington, subtle and daring, was meditating a leap upon the great frontier fortress of Ciudad Rodrigo, in the Spanish province of Salamanca. Its capture would give him a safe base of operation against Spain; it was the great frontier base for the French; the whole siege equipage and stores of the army of Portugal were contained in it.

The problem of how, in the depth of winter, without materials for a siege, to snatch a place so strong from under the very eyes of two armies, each stronger than his own, was a problem which might have taxed the warlike genius of a Cæsar. But Wellington accomplished it with a combination of subtlety and audacity simply marvellous.

He kept the secret of his design so perfectly that his own engineers never suspected it, and his adjutant-general, Murray, went home on leave without dreaming anything was going to happen. Wellington collected artillery, ostensibly for the purpose of arming Almeida, but the guns were transhipped at sea and brought simply to the mouth of the Douro. No fewer than 800 mule carts were constructed without anybody guessing their purpose.

Wellington, while these preparations were on foot, was keenly watching Marmont and Soult till he saw that they were lulled into a state of mere yawning security; and then, in Napier's expressive phrase, he "instantly jumped with both feet upon Ciudad Rodrigo."

This famous fortress, in shape, roughly resembles a triangle with the angles truncated. The base looking to the south is covered by the Agueda, a river given to sudden inundations; the fortifications were strong and formidably armed, as outwards it had to the east the great fortified convent of San Francisco, to the west a similar building called Santa Cruz, whilst almost parallel with the northern face rose two rocky ridges called the Great and Small Teson, the nearest within 600 yards of the city ramparts, and crowned by a formidable redoubt called Francisco.

The siege began on January 8th. The soil was rocky and covered with snow; the nights were black, the weather bitter. The men lacked entrenching tools. They had to encamp on the side of the Agueda furthest from the city, and ford that river every time the trenches were relieved. The 1st, 3rd, and Light Divisions formed the attacking force; each division held the trenches in turn for twenty-four hours.

Let the reader imagine what degree of hardihood it took to wade in the grey and bitter winter dawn through a half-frozen river, without fire or warm food, and under a ceaseless rain of shells from the enemy's guns, to toil in the frozen trenches, or to keep watch—while the icicles hung from eyebrows and beard—over the edge of the battery for twenty-four hours in succession.

Nothing in this great siege is more wonderful than the fierce speed with which Wellington urged his operations. Massena, who had besieged and captured the city the year before in the height of summer, spent a month in bombarding it before he ventured to assault. Wellington broke ground on January 8th, under a tempest of mingled hail and rain; he stormed it on the night of the 19th.

He commenced operations by leaping on the strong work that crowned the Great Teson the very night the siege began. Two companies from each regiment of the Light Division were detailed by the officer of the day, Colonel Colborne, for the assault.

Colborne (afterwards Lord Seaton)—a cool and gallant soldier—called his officers together in a group, and explained with great minuteness how they were to attack. He then launched his men against the redoubt with a vehemence so swift that, to those who watched the scene under the light of a wintry moon, the column of British spanned the ditch, shot up the glacis, and broke through the parapet with a single movement.

The accidental explosion of a French shell burst the gate open, and the remainder of the attacking party instantly swept through it. There was fierce musketry fire and a tumult of shouting for a moment or two, but in twenty minutes from Colborne's launching his attack every Frenchman in the redoubt was killed, wounded, or a prisoner.

The fashion in which the gate was blown open was very curious. A French sergeant was in the act of throwing a live shell upon the storming party in the ditch, when he was struck by an English bullet. The lighted shell fell from his hands within the parapet, and was kicked by the nearest French away in mere self-preservation; it rolled towards the gate, exploded, burst it open, and instantly the British broke in!

For ten days a desperate artillery duel raged between the besiegers and the besieged. The parallels were resolutely pushed on in spite of rocky soil, broken tools, bitter weather, and the incessant pelting of the French guns.

The temper of the British troops is illustrated by an incident which George Napier—the youngest of the three Napiers—relates. The three brothers were gallant and remarkable soldiers. Charles Napier, in India and elsewhere, made history; William, in his wonderful tale of the Peninsular War, wrote history; and George, if he had not the literary genius of the one, nor the strategic skill of the other, was a most gallant soldier.

"I was a field officer of the trenches," he says, "when a 13in. shell from the town fell in the midst of us. I called to the men to lie down flat, and they instantly obeyed orders, except one of them, an Irishman and an old marine, but a most worthless, drunken dog, who trotted up to the shell, the fuse of which was still burning, and striking it with his spade, knocked the fuse out. Then, taking the immense shell in his hands, brought it to me, saying:

"'There she is for you, yer 'anner; I've knocked the life out of the crater!'"

The besieged brought fifty heavy guns to reply to the thirty light pieces by which they were assailed. Day and night the bellow of eighty pieces boomed sullenly over the doomed city and echoed faintly back from the nearer hills, while the walls crashed to the stroke of the bullet. The English fire made up by fierceness and accuracy for what it lacked in weight; but the sap made no progress, the guns showed signs of being worn out, and although two apparent breaches had been made, the counterscarp was not destroyed.

Yet Wellington determined to attack, and, in his characteristic fashion, to attack by night. The siege had lasted ten days, and Marmont, with an army stronger than the British, was laying within four marches. That he had not appeared already on the scene was wonderful.

In a general order issued on the evening of the 19th Wellington wrote: "Ciudad Rodrigo must be stormed this evening." The great breach was a sloping gap in the wall at its northern angle, about a hundred feet wide. The French had crowned it with two guns loaded with grape; the slope was strewn with bombs, hand-grenades and bags of powder; a great mine pierced it beneath; a deep ditch had been cut betwixt the breach and the adjoining ramparts; and these were crowded with riflemen. The Third Division, under General Mackinnon, was to attack the breach, its forlorn hope being led by Ensign Mackie, its storming party by General Mackinnon himself.

The lesser breach was a tiny gap, scarcely twenty feet wide, to the left of the great breach; this was to be attacked by the Light Division under Crauford, its forlorn hope of twenty-five men being led by Gurwood, and its storming party by George Napier.

General Pack, with a Portuguese brigade, was to make a sham attack on the eastern face, while a fourth attack was to be made on the southern front by a company of the 83rd and some Portuguese troops.

In the storming party of the 83rd were the Earl of March, afterwards Duke of Richmond, Lord Fitzroy Somerset, afterwards Lord Raglan, and the Prince of Orange—all volunteers without Wellington's knowledge.

At seven o'clock a curious silence fell suddenly on the battered city and engirdling trenches. Not a light gleamed from the frowning parapets, not a murmur arose from the blackened trenches. Suddenly a shout broke out on the right of the English attack; it ran, a wave of stormy sound, along the line of the trenches. The men who were to attack the great breach leapt into the open. In a moment the space betwixt the hostile lines was covered with the stormers, and the gloomy, half-seen face of the great fortress broke into a tempest of fire.

Nothing could be finer than the vehement courage of the assault, unless it were the cool and steady fortitude of the defence. Swift as was the upward rush of the stormers, the race of the 5th, 77th, and 94th regiments was almost swifter. Scorning to wait for the ladders, they leapt into the great ditch, outpaced even the forlorn hope, and pushed vehemently up the great breach, whilst their red ranks were torn by shell and shot. The fire, too, ran through the tangle of broken stones over which they climbed; the hand-grenades and powder-bags by which it was strewn exploded.

The men were walking on fire! Yet the attack could not be denied.

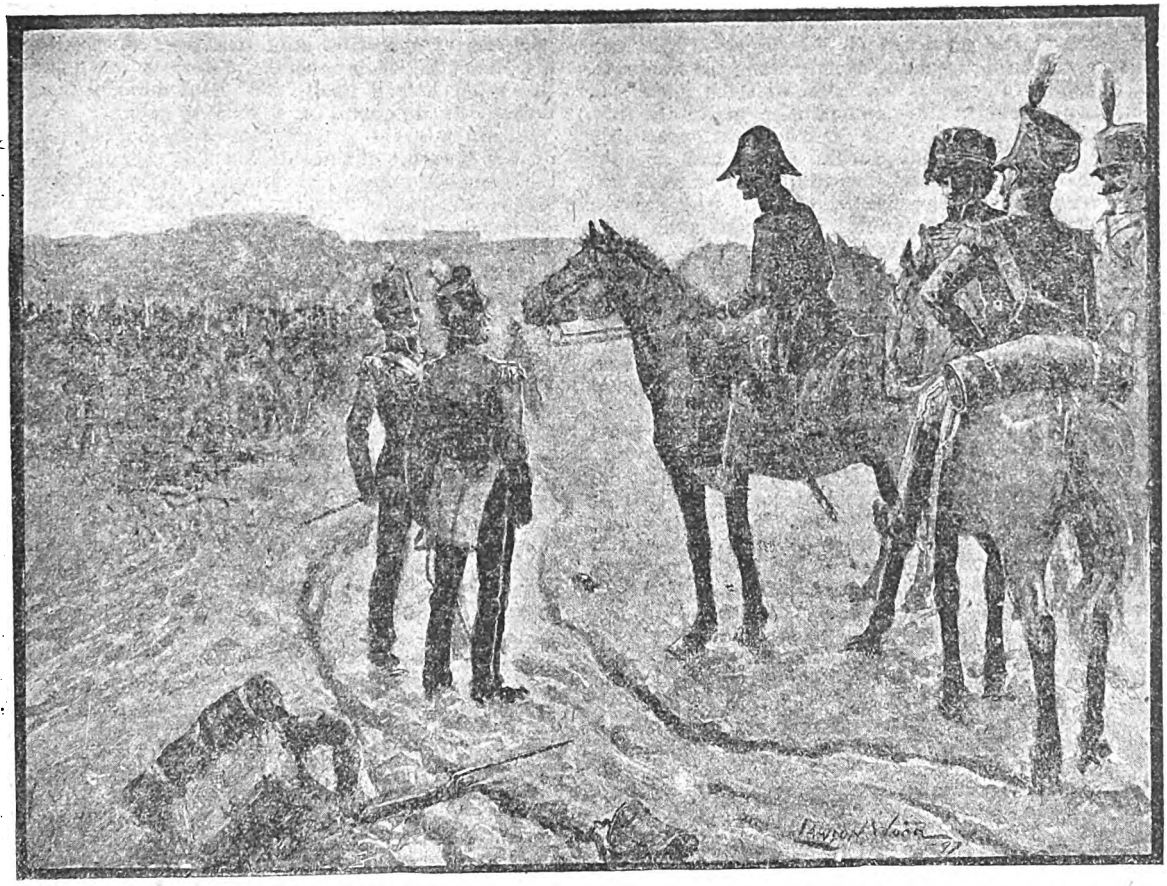
The Frenchmen—shooting, stabbing, yelling—were driven behind their retrenchments. There the fire of the houses commanding the breach came to their help, and they made a gallant stand.

"None would go back on either side, and yet the British could not get forward, and men and officers falling in heaps choked up the passage, which from minute to minute was raked with grape from the two guns flanking the top of the breach at the distance of a few yards. Thus striving and trampling alike upon the dead and the wounded, these brave men maintained the combat."

It was the attack on the smaller breach which really carried Ciudad Rodrigo; and George Napier, who led it, has left a graphic narrative of the exciting experiences of that dreadful night. The Light Division was to attack, and Crauford, with whom Napier was a favourite, gave him command of the storming party.

He was to ask for 100 volunteers from each of the three British regiments—the 43rd, 52nd, and the Rifle Corps—in the division. Napier halted these regiments just as they had forded the bitterly cold river on their way to the trenches.

Digitized by Google



"Let him alone," said Wellington. "Let him go his own way!"

"Soldiers," he said, "I want a hundred men from each regiment to form the storming party which is to lead the Light Division to-night. Those who will go with me come forward."

Instantly there was a rush forward of the whole division, and Napier had to take his 300 men out of a tumult of nearly 1,500 candidates. He formed them into three companies, under Captains Ferguson, Jones, and Mitchell; Gurwood, of the 52nd, led the forlorn hope, consisting of twenty-five men and two sergeants. Wellington himself came to the trench and showed Napier and Colborne, through the gloom of the early night, the exact position of the breach.

A staff officer looking on said:

"Your men are not loaded. Why don't you make them load?"

Napier replied:

"If we don't do the business with the bayonet we shall not do it at all. I shall not load."

"Let him alone," said Wellington. "Let him go his own way!"

Picton had adopted the same grim policy with the 3rd Division. As each regiment passed him, filing into the trenches, his injunction was:

"No powder! We'll do the thing with the cold iron."

A party of Portuguese carrying bags filled with grass were to run with the storming party and throw the bags into the ditch, as the leap was too deep for the men. But the Portuguese hesitated, the tumult of the attack on the great breach suddenly broke on the night, and the forlorn hope went running up, leapt into the ditch, a depth of eleven feet, and clambered up the steep slope beyond, while Napier with his stormers came with a run behind them.

In the dark for a moment the breach was lost, but found again, and up the steep quarry of broken stone the attack swept. About two-thirds of the way up Napier's arm was smashed by a grapeshot, and he fell. His men, checked for a moment, lifted their muskets to the gap above them, whence the French were firing vehemently, and, forgetting their pieces were unloaded, snapped them.

"Push on with the bayonet, men!" shouted Napier, as he lay bleeding. The officers leapt to the front, the men with a stern shout followed; they were crushed to a front of not more than three or four; they had to climb without firing a shot in reply up to the muzzles of the French muskets.

But nothing could stop the men of the Light Division.

A 24-pounder was placed across the narrow gap in the ramparts; the stormers leapt over it, and the 43rd and 52nd, coming up in sections abreast, followed; the 43rd wheeled to the right towards the great breach, the 52nd to the left, sweeping the ramparts as they went.

Meanwhile the two other attacks had broken into the town, but at the great breach the dreadful fight still raged, until the 43rd, coming swiftly along the ramparts, and brushing all opposition aside, took the defence in the rear. The British there had, as a matter of fact, at that exact moment pierced the French defence.

The two guns that scourged the breach had wrought deadly havoc amongst the stormers, and a sergeant and two privates of the 88th—Irishmen all, and whose names deserve to be preserved—Brazel, Kelley, and Swan—laid down their firelocks that they might climb more lightly, and, armed only with their bayonets, forced themselves through the embrasure amongst the French gunners.

They were furiously attacked, and Swan's arm was hewed off by a sabre stroke; but they stopped the service of the gun, killed six of the French gunners, and held the post until the men of the 5th, climbing behind them, broke into the battery.

So Ciudad Rodrigo was won, and its Governor surrendered his sword to the youthful lieutenant leading the forlorn hope of the Light Division, who, with smoke-blackened face, torn uniform, and staggering from a dreadful wound, still kept at the head of his men.

In the eleven days of the siege Wellington lost 1,300 men and officers, out of which 650 men and sixty officers were struck down on the slopes of the breaches. Two notable soldiers died in the attack—Crauford, the famous leader of the Light Division, as he brought his men up to the lesser breach, and Mackinnon, who commanded a brigade of the 3rd Division, at the great breach.

Mackinnon was a gallant Highlander, a soldier of great promise, beloved by his men. His "children," as he called them, followed him up the great breach till the bursting of a French mine destroyed all the leading files, including their general. Crauford was buried in the lesser breach itself, and Mackinnon in the great breach—fitting graves for soldiers so gallant.

Alison says that with the rush of the English stormers up the breaches of Ciudad Rodrigo "began the fall of the French Empire!" That siege, so fierce and brilliant, was, as a matter of fact, the first of that swift following succession of strokes which drove the French in ruin out of Spain; and it coincided in point of time with the turn of the tide against Napoleon in Russia. Apart from all political results, however, it was a splendid feat of arms. The French found themselves almost unable to believe the evidence of their senses.

"On the 16th," Marmont wrote to the Emperor, "the English batteries opened their fire at a great distance. On the 19th the place was taken by storm. There is something so incomprehensible in this that I allow myself no observations."

Napoleon, however, relieved his feelings with some very emphatic observations.

"The fall of Ciudad Rodrigo," he wrote to Marmont, "is an affront to you. Why had you not advices from it twice a week? What were you doing with the five divisions of Souham? It is a strange mode of carrying on war."

This is the end of this series. Next week we shall start a fresh series under the general heading:

CALIGULA AND TITO.

I.

It was the eve of the feast of St. Antonio, and Oreste Lavigni, the handsomest muleteer in Nervi, by Genoa, was busily grooming Caligula, more familiarly known as 'Gula, who was also the handsomest mule in Nervi. True, he had a somewhat dangerous rival in Tito, and thereby hangs the tale which follows.

Tito was the property of Beatrice Foscetta, who was not only the prettiest girl on the countryside but a proprietress to boot, since she was an orphan, and had inherited from her parents a snug little farm some distance up the valley and all the live-stock, the gem of these last being the rival of 'Gula. Oreste and Beatrice had been friends since the time when they had run barefooted and bare-legged on the sands at Nervi, chasing the waves back to the sea, and then fleeing in childish mock terror from them as they rolled back up the beach.

If Oreste had had his way they would now have been something much nearer and dearer than playmates, but Beatrice, although only twenty, was a young lady of a distinctly practical turn of mind, and although no other of her many suitors had ever been given the slightest reason to believe that she would choose anyone else, still, when Oreste himself pressed the question, she told him plainly that she had no intention of confiding herself and her property to a man who was too lazy to work at his father's trade, and preferred to dress himself up and trust to the effect of his smartness and good looks on the English and American ladies who hired Gula and himself for excursions into the mountains. There were ill-natured gossips who said her objection was not altogether founded on worldly prudence, but be that as it may, Beatrice had certainly spoken so plainly on the subject that in the end they were hardly on speaking terms.

Now, the great function of the feast of St. Antonio was the blessing of the animals by the priest in front of the little church up the valley. The good man's words and the dash of holy water that he sprinkled over them would protect them from sickness and accident for the whole year, and so, naturally, the occasion was worthy of the greatest pains on the part of their owners.

Of all the animals' trappings, the most essential was a little mirror fastened on the forehead. If the image of the priest were reflected in this as he gave his benediction it would have a double power for good, but, if not, it was a bad omen. Now Oreste, to make sure of this, put two mirrors on 'Gula, and very smart and handsome he looked, as he rode up the hill on his shapely and well-groomed beast.

Not very far behind him came Beatrice with Tito, and presently when the road began to get steep, she dismounted to save her favourite's legs, and as she went to walk by his head, she saw to her dismay that the mirror was gone, shaken off no doubt lower down the road, and by this time probably trodden to fragments.

What was to be done? To go on without the mirror was to seek only half a blessing, perhaps not even that, and yet to go back—no, that was not to be thought of, since everyone would say that she had feared to challenge comparison between Tito and 'Gula.

She was walking on with downcast eyes when, suddenly, as though put there by some miracle, she saw a little brass-framed mirror lying in the road right under Tito's nose. She sprang forward and picked it up, not thinking in her delight that it had most likely fallen from some other mule, and fastened it on Tito's forehead.

Oreste, who had arrived first before the chapel, was standing chatting with some friends as she came up. He looked round at her out of the corners of his eyes, and she saw him start and turn swiftly round towards where 'Gula was standing. One of his mirrors was gone, and there it was hanging between Tito's ears! With a loud cry he ran towards her, shouting:

"Where did you get that? You would not ask me for it. You didn't think I was worth that, I suppose, so you stole it. Are you not rich enough to buy one for yourself! Give it back to me."

Then, ignoring the look of amazement on her face, he snatched away the mirror and began to vent his rage upon the innocent Tito with his whip. Several of the by-standers, seeing this, ran up. One snatched the whip away from him, others tried to pull him away.

Then he drew his knife, and the matter might have been serious if just then the bell had not sounded for the animals to be brought up to receive the benediction.

The sound seemed to bring him to his senses, and he went away to 'Gula, considerably ashamed of himself, and after a time his turn came to lead 'Gula before the priest.

His anger had calmed down as quickly as it had risen, but the penalty for it was yet to come. As he advanced towards the church steps, the priest, to his dismay, waved him aside and lowered the brush with which he sprinkled the holy water. He had seen the fight, and therefore refused the blessing. There was no appeal. 'Gula could have no benedict on that year because his master had profaned the festival.

With tears of grief and anger in his eyes, Oreste slowly retraced his steps, his mind divided between fear for the future and rage against Beatrice, whom he regarded as the cause of his misfortune.

"It is all her fault," he said to himself, as he rode back down the hill; "she must have forgotten her mirror, and stolen mine when my back was turned. Now her Tito will be safe, and I have nothing!"

He sprang from his mule, threw his arms round its neck, and whispered:

"Keep well and strong, 'Gula; keep well, my beauty!" and he kissed its forehead with remorseful tenderness.

Beatrice returned from the fête in very bad spirits, too, for she could now see why Oreste had been so angry, and she wished from her heart that the mistake had not occurred. Once she thought of explaining the whole matter to him, but then her pride forbade that.

He had accused her of theft before all the people, had beaten her mule, and behaved like a madman. He did not deserve an explanation. What a good thing for her that she had refused to marry him, for with a temper like his no woman's life could be happy, or even safe. Still she was miserable, the unlucky incident weighed upon her mind and took all the zest out of her enjoyment.

II.

There are often strange coincidences in this life. For three years 'Gula had never ailed anything, but had eaten his food and done his work in the most satisfactory manner; however, about a week after the feast of St. Antonio he was off his feed, and stood in his stall with drooping ears and half-closed eyes. Oreste felt very anxious, and tried every remedy, but in vain—the third morning he found his friend and means of sustenance lying dead in his stable. His grief knew no bounds.

It was all his own fault, for the mule had died because he had not been blessed, and Oreste's violence had prevented it. He had since learnt the truth about the mirror, therefore he had no one but himself to blame.

His income was gone, and he was unable to earn money any other way, unless he went to the stone quarries, and that was hard work, badly paid. What was he to do? There was nothing but death for him, so he shut himself up in his room and refused to eat.

At last the authorities broke open his door and forced him to come out and take some food, for they could not let the foreigners know that anyone had died of starvation in Nervi.

A few days after this a rich American lady staying at the Hotel d'Inglese, sent to hire Oreste and his mule for a day's expedition, and as she was one of his best customers, he sadly sent back a message that his mule was dead, and he was too poor to buy another, so she must please to find someone else. She generally paid him twice as much as he asked, and gossip had been very free in discussing her great infatuation for the good-looking Italian.

He thought her old and ugly, but that had not prevented him from practising those arts upon her which vexed Beatrice so bitterly.

When Miss Grantley received this message she shut herself up in her room for an hour, at the end of which time she came out and held a conversation with the hotel gardener, during which she commissioned him to buy the best mule he could find, and convey it to Oreste without letting him know from whom it came.

The old man chuckled when he pocketed the money and thought of the handsome profit he could make out of the transaction. He had heard that Beatrice Foscetta had suddenly decided to leave Nervi, and was selling her live stock at very moderate prices.

He determined therefore to buy Tito and keep the balance for himself.

Since Oreste's trouble people had looked rather coldly on Beatrice, some had even told her that it was her pride which had helped to ruin her old playmate, and this growing unpopularity affected her pocket, as the neighbours were not so ready to buy her butter and milk, so she made up her mind to go and live with her aunt at Genoa.

She was very unhappy, and often said to herself:

"If only Oreste were not so idle! There is no one so clever or so handsome, and I shall never love anyone else! If he would only alter, how different it might all be!"

The old gardener came to her, and bought Tito without saying a word about Miss Grantley or what was to be done with the mule.

Meanwhile Oreste had been wandering about the neighbourhood in search of work, doing what he could to earn just enough to keep himself from starvation; he could not hope for more, as he was unskilled in any trade, and had not been accustomed to hard manual labour.

He had lost all pride in himself, and many a time he ran short of food. One morning he had slept late, for he had no work and little breakfast to look forward to, when he awoke with the familiar sound of a chain rattling in the adjoining shed. He thought he was dreaming, but got out of bed to assure himself. Upon opening the door he saw a fine mule in 'Gula's stall. He could scarcely believe his eyes. He seemed to know the animal; could it be Tito?

He called it by name, and the mule looked round at once.

"Ah! Tito, it is you!" he cried, falling on his knees beside it.

"She has sent you. Beatrice—Beatrice—she will not forsake me in my misfortune. She loves me in spite of all I have done! She is the best and dearest girl in the world. Now, Tito, all will go well."

Oreste dressed himself quickly, and hurried off to Nervi to see Beatrice. As he was going along the main street, he chanced to look at the chief wine merchant's restaurant and there he saw her in earnest conversation with the proprietor. Forgetting everything but his delight and gratitude, he rushed up to her and threw his arms round her, exclaiming:

"Thank you, dearest, a thousand times! You have saved me! You have a noble heart! If I had not loved you so much I should not have been so angry with you!"

For a moment Beatrice thought that trouble had unhinged his mind; she was in the act of withdrawing from his embrace and calling for help, when she saw his sorrowful, loving gaze, and knew he was no madman. Another look showed her the lines of care and suffering in his face, and pity mastered all other feelings. She did not know what had happened to him, but to avoid further publicity, she told him to go and wait at her house till she joined him.

Seeing the amusement his appearance had caused the bystanders, she treated the matter as a joke, and soon followed her lover, whom she found anxiously waiting for her in the garden. Before he could renew his endearments she quietly said:

"Now, Oreste, tell me what all this means, and what you are thanking me for?"

"What this means?" he stammered. "You ask me! Will you deny that you still love me, and have shown your forgiveness in the most generous manner?"

"That I like you is no secret, Oreste; but how have I shown it lately?" asked the girl in bewilderment.

"Did you not put Tito in my shed this morning?"

"I?" she asked in astonishment.

"It was not you? Oh! do not trifle with me; it is cruel! Who else could have done it?"

"I know nothing about Tito now, for I sold him a few days ago."

"You have sold him—to whom?"

"To the gardener at the Hotel d'Inglese."

"Gardener—Hotel d'Inglese!" he gasped. "Ah, maladetto! Then it is the sallow American who has given me the beast!"

Oreste turned pale with disappointment and vexation.

"Yes; now you know, and you had better go at once to thank the rich, ugly lady you have always been so attentive to, and arrange for more long rides together," said Beatrice bitterly.

"No!" he said firmly; "I will give it back to her."

"No? do you really mean to return it? You will not take it from her? Then we will go together and I will buy back Tito."

"We? Together?" he repeated joyfully.

"Yes," she said calmly. "I know you love me, and I love you, and if you had been willing for my sake to give up your lazy ways and love of attracting the foreigners, all this would never have happened."

"But, Beatrice, I am completely cured of that nonsense, and have suffered terribly for my sins."

"Yes, I believe you, dear, but you must swear to me by St. Antonio, who has brought us together at last, that you will start a work-shop and keep steadily to it."

"I swear it by St. Antonio!" he said earnestly, and sealed his oath with a kiss.

"Now we must take Tito back," said Beatrice laughing.

He readily agreed, and they started off, hand-in-hand, as was the custom of engaged couples, to fetch the mule from Bogliasco. But rumour had been before them. Oreste's loving greeting in the restaurant that morning had given rise to the report that they were engaged; moreover the truth had leaked out about Miss Grantley's having bought Tito to replace Oreste's lost mule.

When all this came to the lady's ears, she made one of her rapid decisions, packed up, paid her bill, and had taken her seat in the express for Rome a few minutes before Beatrice and Oreste reached the Hotel d'Inglese.

When they heard that she had gone away so suddenly, leaving no address behind her, they looked at each other and laughed knowingly. It was impossible to carry out their intention, so they decided that she could well afford to lose the money, therefore they would regard Tito as a wedding present from Oreste's eccentric friend.

SUMMARY.

The story opens with an introduction to the inmates of two farm-houses in an English village named Thorneydene. Honeypots Farm has recently been taken by a young stranger, John Gillway, about whom there seems to be a mystery.

His neighbour, Farmer Strange, is a widower with twin daughters, Diana and Kitty, who have been brought up for the most part by a wealthy aunt, Mrs. Caffyn, who is about to take them on the Continent.

Gillway has already fallen in love with Kitty, who was at first pleased by his attentions. She soon wearied of them, but being half afraid of him, makes many promises of fidelity before going abroad with her sister and aunt, which she never intends to keep.

At Capri they meet with Bernard Eliot, nicknamed "the Nabob" on account of his wealth. He speedily wins the affections of all three ladies, but seems to prefer Di's society.

At the end of three months they return to London, and as the two girls have now attained their majority they are given the option of remaining with their aunt or returning to their father for good. Kitty chooses the former and Di the latter.

Henceforth Diana devotes herself to the management of her father's house and dairy. She meets Gillway, and hears for the first time of the relations which had existed between him and Kitty. Soon after, the Stranges are surprised by the arrival of Kitty and the Nabob, who explain that they were married that morning, and have come to spend their honeymoon at Greyhouse Farm!

CHAPTER VI.

Kitty Makes a Confession.

"It was a very pretty wedding, only we kept it quiet because of that horrid John Gillway," said Kitty, as she arranged her hair in Di's room before going down to tea—the Nabob and Farmer Strange were in the farm-yard. "I had heaps of lovely presents. I was so afraid of it—the wedding—getting to John's—to Mr. Gillway's ears, you know, and if he had come up and made a scene—shot me, for instance, how awful it would have been! I am so sorry I flirted with him. Hasn't he really said anything about me, Di?"

"He, asked me if you were coming home, and he was angry when he heard that you had deceived him. He won't hurt you, Kitty. He said he should not."

"But he's so dangerous—and I'm afraid of him! I shall never dare to go out-doors while we're here. I begged Bernie not to bring me home. He only laughed. He has no idea what a revengeful man John—Mr. Gillway is. If you only knew the awful threats that he used once—when he forced me to promise to marry him! He said that there was no harm too deadly for him to do to the man who married me."

"Men often say foolish things in excitement."

"Ah, but he is different to any other man! I shall try hard to get Bernie away after a day or two. Di—were you greatly surprised to-day? At Capri auntie and I thought that Bernie was in love with you. He—told me at the Malets—when he proposed, you know—how greatly he admired you—but—but—of course, you knew all along that he didn't love you—didn't you, dear?"

"Yes," Di answered quietly.

Kitty patted a stray curl into its proper position as she said: "He's such a dear boy, Di! So kind, and as gentle as a woman! I'm a very lucky girl, don't you think so?"

"Yes," said Di again.

Kitty heaved a sigh, looked out of the window, and then coming to Di's chair, she said in a very low tone: "I'm so unhappy, Di! I've got to tell Bernie something, and I'm afraid. You know that I never could confess things like you. I'm too nervous. Oh, I've got such a wretched lump here—you can't think," she added, touching her breast—"it makes me miserable!" Kneeling by Di's side and clasping her hands in her sister's lap, she added: "It can't really matter to Bernie—because he's so awfully rich, isn't he, and I know that he loves me dearly, so that the loss of the money is really nothing. I should have told him at once—if he had been poor—as soon as ever auntie explained things to me. She didn't want me to marry Bernie so soon. I believe she thought he was going to marry her: she wore such stupid little bonnets and such tight corsets! She cried, too, when I told her that he wanted to marry me, and she made a lot of fuss, and said that I was too young, and she should withold my dowry until she saw how my marriage turned out, and she told me to tell Bernie that I was penniless. I didn't like to, Di! It did seem such a humiliating thing after Mrs. Malet had told him that I should have thirty thousand pounds!"

"Does he believe that aunt has given you the money?" asked Di quickly.

"He thinks it is settled upon me. He has never asked me a word about it. Mrs. Malet told him; you know what a chatterbox she is. The worst of it is," said Kitty, with a long sigh, "aunt asked me if Bernie knew that I had no money, and I said he did. It was wicked to tell such a falsehood, I know—but, oh, Di, you can't think how much I love Bernie! and I was so dreadfully afraid that aunt would do something to stop our wedding."

"Oh, Kitty!" Di exclaimed, rising from her chair, "you must tell the truth to your husband at once! You can never hope to be happy with a secret standing between you——"

"I shall tell him some day," Kitty interrupted, pouting her pretty, rosy lips. "Of course I shall! I always intended to. But not just yet, Di. It might spoil our honeymoon."

"It may spoil your whole life! Don't you understand that it will hurt your husband to discover your want of candour? And every day that passes will make it harder for you to tell him. Let him know everything to-day."

Kitty skipped back to the mirror, gave another pat to her curls, and drew aside the short curtains. She kissed her hand to someone in the garden below, nodding her head and smiling.

"They are coming in," said she. "Do I look nice?"

Di paid no attention to the question. The expression of pain deepened on her face.

"Kitty," she said, "promise me that you will tell everything to your husband now. It is so easy to forgive when one loves, and he loves you dearly. Tell him to-night."

"Oh, I couldn't! Indeed, I couldn't," cried Kitty. "It is very easy for you to talk like that. You always could tell dad or Aunt Lou-lou when you had done anything wrong. It makes me feel cold with fear even to think of confessing. I hate aunt! A nasty old thing to break her promise in this cruel way. It's all her fault that I've got this worry!"

"I wish you would tell your husband now," persisted Di, pushing one hand through her hair. "I feel sure that you would be happier afterwards!"

"So do I. Only I can't tell him. And it isn't as though I shouldn't have the money later on, you know. When aunt sees what an exemplary couple we are, she is sure to give me the money. Besides, Bernie didn't ask me if I had any fortune."

"I'm so unhappy, Di."

"Did he ask Mrs. Malet?"

"I don't know. She told me she had told him."

Di reflected with serious eyes and lips. To her, this secret that Kitty treated so lightly was a grave and terrible matter.

"Did your husband make any marriage settlement upon you, Kitty?"

Kitty nodded as she ran from the room.

"Fifty thousand pounds," she answered over her shoulder, and the next moment Diana heard her laughing in the passage with the Nabob.

She joined them, looking so pre-occupied and troubled that her father noticed the shadow upon her face.

"Butter not up to the mark?" he asked, looking lovingly at her as she sat behind the big tea-tray in the sitting-room, with the Nabob at her left hand and Kitty upon her right. "Di turns out rare butter," he added, speaking now to his son-in-law; "as firm and as sweet as a nut, sir."

"This is delicious butter," said the Nabob politely, while Kitty flushed scarlet and touched her father's foot beneath the table.

"Hey?" said Farmer Strange, turning to her. "What is it? You always was a first-rate hand at putting away lardy-roll. Take the plate, my girl, take the plate."

"I hate lardy-roll," exclaimed Kitty petulantly.

"You've changed then since you was home last," said her father. "If you don't want anything from my end of the table, what did you knock me for?"

"Oh, I didn't mean to touch you," Kitty cried, lowering her eyes.

Her father looked at the Nabob and chuckled. The young man had succeeded in winning the farmer's heart already by his discrimination in discerning good cattle from indifferent ones, and his interest in everything appertaining to the farm.

"Oh, I see," said he. "Well, I know what it is to be married myself. When I brought your dear mother home here, I let everything about the place go to rack and ruin for high on a month. I couldn't believe, somehow, that she really belonged to me—no, I couldn't, and I followed her about like a little lap-dog. Lord! what a time ago that seems!"

Di looked at the Nabob. He was watching Farmer Strange with a kind expression in his blue-grey eyes. His face was so candid and sympathetic that Di felt sure he would not be angry with Kitty if she confessed her deception that night. Di's greatest fear was that the Nabob would feel wounded at the lack of trust in his love that Kitty had betrayed. She thought of John Gillway's bitter words. Would Kitty's husband despise her if by this want of honesty she fell from the pedestal upon which every person in love stands the object of his or her affections? Kitty had made a wrong start in her new life; but it was not—it could not—be, too late to make a fresh beginning.

"She must tell him!" thought Di, growing more and more troubled.

"Butter's A1," said her father, again observing the worried look in her frank eyes. He stuck his knife into the heart of a golden pat, and dug out a lump, smelt it, and spread it upon a slice of bread, disdaining with a jerk of his elbow the plate of wafer-like bread-and-butter that Kitty offered him. "I never did care for those mouthfuls," said he, indicating the plate with a second jerk. "I like a good thick hunk that I can stick my teeth into."

The distress in Kitty's crimson face was so acute that Di felt sorry for her suffering. Farmer Strange had insensibly fallen into the manners of the rough farm-hands, in whose sole society so much of his lonely life had been passed. Sometimes Di winced when she saw him eat, and occasionally some of his rough and ready expressions jarred upon her. But one glance at her father's face acted like a panacea.

"It's very hot," said Kitty, "Let us go into the garden."

She pushed back her chair, cast a commanding, loving glance at her husband, and, going to the door, lingered there while he drank his tea and smiled at her.

"Hot!" exclaimed her father, pausing with his great slice of bread-and-butter in mid-air. "What a one you are for getting cranks in your head. It's as cool as a cucumber here."

"Well, I'm hot," said Kitty a little sharply.

The Nabob handed his tea-cup to Di, throwing a laughing glance at Kitty's pouting face.

"Half-a-minute, Kitty," said he. "I'm so jolly thirsty, and I've never tasted such exquisite tea as this in all my life. What do you put in it, Di? Is it the cream, or have you found out the secret of making nectar?"

"Bernie, are you coming?"

"Di always was a capital hand at making a good cup of tea," said her father fondly. "Lord, sir, you can't think what a difference it makes having her about the place! There ain't many gals as would have given up fifteen thousand pounds, and the chance of being a lady, to come here and make butt——"

"Bernie, are you coming?" called Kitty, with the sound of tears in her voice.

The Nabob rose at once, and, smiling at Di and her father, went from the parlour with his arm round Kitty's waist. Farmer Strange looked after him with approval.

"As nice a young man as ever stepped in shoe-leather," said he, nodding his head. "And that affable, and no more pride in him than you'd find in my old hat! Says I to him: 'You don't object to my smoking a clay-pipe?' 'Not I,' says he. 'There's nothing like 'em for sweetness and drawing,' and with that, out he pulls one from his pocket, and we lit up together in the yard yonder and had a whiff. Smart young chap, too! He's got a lot in him! Knows how many beans make five, and don't make any fuss about his knowledge. He gave me to understand—delicately—of course, that he didn't hold with separating children from their parents, and that when he bought an estate, the best room in the house 'ud be for me. He's my sort, Di. Kitty's a lucky girl as well as a pretty one."

Betty carried away the tea-things, Farmer Strange went out with his pipe to look after the men, and Di, tormented with anxiety, sat alone in the low parlour and stared in despair at the gay Japanese fans and Liberty hangings with which she and Kitty had adorned its walls. She was still sitting there when the Nabob came hastily into the room.

"I've come to take you out," said he in his bright, cheery voice. "Kitty's found a swing in the orchard——" He paused and added anxiously: "I say, you're not in trouble, Di?"

Di hesitated a moment, looking with shadowed eyes into the handsome, concerned face bending over her.

"I don't suppose I can help you," said the Nabob. "We men are such clums*y*, tactless fools; but if I could, Di, you ought to know how readily I would. You are my sister now, you know. Won't you try me? I could see at tea that you were worried. I knew the butter was not responsible for the anxiety in your eyes. Tell me what is the bother," he said in a gentle tone, and drawing a chair by her side.

"I don't quite know if I ought," Di said. "It is not my secret—it is Kitty's. It troubles me—because I know she is miserable. She can't summon the courage to tell you. Kitty never did have much pluck, as dad calls it. She can't help it, you know—and I am sure you will forgive her—when she tells you."

The Nabob had taken her hand, and now he looked into her eyes with smiling good-humour.

"A secret of Kitty's!" he repeated in amusement. "Oh, I know what's bothering your little head. It's that flirtation of hers with the ferocious farmer—I forget his name——"

"No, no, it isn't that. It's a much more serious matter. Something about—about—money."

"About money," said the Nabob in the same gay voice. "Money, now. Let me see if I can help you. What could Kitty have to conceal from me about money?"

Holding Di's hand in one of his, he passed the other reflectively over his face, hiding it from her anxious regard. The clock upon the high black mantel-board seemed to have ticked a very long while before he uncovered his features, and turned to Di with a smile.

"I think I know," said he, pressing Di's fingers so hard that she winced with pain. "Poor little Kitty! Mrs. Caffyn has altered her mind about giving Kitty some money that she intended to give her. That's it! Eh? I can see it is! Poor Kitty! What on earth made her worry about such a trifle? And you, too, Di? As if money matters, when I've such a pile!"

"Oh, I am so glad!" cried Di with a gasp of relief. "Kitty said you wouldn't mind. Only—I thought it so awful to begin your new life together with a secret between you—and it has made her so wretched."

"Has it, though? Poor little girl! I say, she didn't think that I was marrying her for her money, did she, Di? Hang it all, I shouldn't like my wife to let such an unworthy suspicion enter her head."

His eyes had grown very bright and hard. He dropped Di's hand, and putting his own in his pockets, he strode to the end of the room, rattling the coins in them.

"No, by George, I wouldn't! There's something so infernally mean in a fellow who could do a dirty trick like that! Excuse me, Di—women are different. No one thinks it shabby in a penniless woman to marry a man with a pock-marked face and a fat banking account. If Kitty thought that of me—I don't think I could forgive her—no—I——"

"Oh, she didn't; indeed, she didn't!" cried Di, starting from her chair. "Please don't think that. How could she entertain such an idea when you are so rich? If you had been a poor man the case might have been looked at in that light——"

She paused, and a deep red flush crept to the roots of her hair. Was Kitty's conduct excusable? Would her husband think that she had married him for the very motive he was so fearful Kitty had attributed to himself?

"She loves you so much," Di added, and her voice had a desperate ring in it that struck harshly upon her sensitive ears, "so very much!"

The Nabob smiled as he pulled his tawny moustache.

"Dear little woman!" said he in a soft, tender tone. "Love is everything in this life, isn't it, Di? If I lost every penny piece to-morrow, it would make no difference in Kitty's love for me. That's good to think of, though we should be a pair of penniless love-birds then—Kitty having no money—for, of course, Mrs. Caffyn didn't give her a red cent?"

He looked questioningly at Di, with the same bright light shining in his clear eyes.

"Not a farthing," said Di sorrowfully. "She is going to wait—to see how—your marriage turns out."

She was sorry the moment that she had said the words. The Nabob's face turned crimson with mortification, and—yes—Di felt sure that she was right in thinking that he was furiously angry.

"How kind of her!" said he. "How amiable and wise! Thank Heaven, we are not compelled to regulate our conduct in order to gratify her whims, and I'll answer for Kitty and myself, too. We shan't try to be good children just to please Mrs. Caffyn! Let her keep her money!"

He had returned to Di's side, but he was not looking at her. His regard was fixed upon the window where a fat bee was stupidly buzzing against the panes. From the garden Kitty's petulate voice called: "Ber—nie! Ber—nie!"

The Nabob turned and the shadows fled from his face. His habitual sunny expression settled once more in his eyes—the look of a man who feels that life is sweet and good, and that the world is full of pleasant paths that lead to happiness.

"I'll tease Kitty about this," he whispered. "The little puss! Come, Di, let's go out and swing. I feel since I've got into the country just as a school-boy feels when he goes home for the holidays; a kind of throwing up my cap in the air impulse, and I'm sure it would not take much to make me shout: 'Hip-hip-hurray!'"

Kitty . . . . watched Di flitting from room to room.

CHAPTER VII.

A NEW DEPARTURE.

LIFE flowed very smoothly at Greyhouse Farm during the first week of the Nabob's and Kitty's visit. Kitty was at all times intensely ashamed of her father, and it hurt her pride to see Diana going about the house in a servant's print gown and big white apron, and to know that Di made butter and packed it early every Thursday morning for a neighbouring market. But the Nabob was so delighted with the simple home-life, so keenly interested in learning every detail of farming, and so determined to close his eyes to the little rough places and to see only the bright sunshine about the farm, that Kitty could not help being influenced by his conduct. She grumbled when her husband left early in the morning to tramp over the corn-fields and meadows with her father, or when the two men rode away to attend the markets, and she was alone with Diana in the house sometimes all the day. She had not married to mope in that dull place, she told Di, and Bernie had promised to buy a country estate and to settle down in a home of their own.

She thought him selfish and unkind in staying on at Greyhouse Farm, where she had no amusements, and there was nobody to see her smart gowns and things.

"He wants to learn the management of a farm before he buys an estate," said Di, "and he gets on so splendidly with dad. Just think, Kitty, what a delightful companion dad finds him!"

"Oh, anybody is good enough to moon about stupid old turnip and rape fields with dad!" exclaimed Kitty peevishly. "And I don't believe Bernie likes it! He only does it just to please dad. I'm sure of it!"

"But he is so interested in everything," said Di in astonishment.

"How do you know? I don't believe he cares a pin about Shorthorns and Alderneys, white pigs, and black pigs, and all the rest of the horrid animals. It is his stupid good nature that makes him pretend he does. He's got the softest heart in the world!"

John Gillway had not once visited the farm since Kitty's arrival. Diana wondered if he had heard that Kitty was married, and if the wound in his heart had healed. She so often thought about him, and she missed his visits in a way that astonished and puzzled her, considering that she had so rarely talked with him when he came to see her father.

One morning at the mid-day meal in the great kitchen, Farmer Strango mentioned the mysterious tenant of Honeypots Farm, and told Di that he had taken the Nabob to see some prize heifers in Gillway's yard. Kitty blushed and played nervously with her serviette as she asked if Gillway had been amiable.

"He's a bit of a bear," said the Nabob lightly. "Seems to have had a University education. Something queer about him—I feel sure I've met him—or seen his portrait somewhere—he's got a remarkable face, eh?"

He looked at Di. She answered simply that she thought John Gillway was handsome.

Gillway was still leaning against the wall.

"Oh, very," said the Nabob. "He's not exactly my son. I never can care for people who don't seem quite open. That man impressed me disagreeably. But I'd forgotten I couldn't expect him to throw himself into my arms, considering that I've deprived him of Kitty."

She was sitting at his side. He passed his arm around her shoulder.

"No wonder the fellow scowled so murderously at me, you little flirt, Kitty!"

"I wish you wouldn't go near him," said Kitty, jerking herself away. "He's dangerous. I know he'll hurt you—or me!"

Her husband laughed and tried to stroke her hair as he said:

"Not he! He's quite got over his disappointment. You should have heard the tender way in which he asked after Di."

"Di!" exclaimed Kitty incredulously.

Di laughed. She knew she had blushed. It was very silly—but, somehow she felt quite happy to think that John Gillway had asked after her. All that day she sang as she moved about the house. Some of the June sunshine seemed to have entered her heart. Kitty, huddled disconsolately in a deep arm-chair with a book upon her knee, watched Di flitting from room to room.

"It's all very well for you," she grumbled. "You're like Bernie. You adore the country. If Bernie doesn't go away soon—I—I shall go mad!"

July came with its roses, and still the Nabob showed no sign of taking his wife away. His interest had not flagged in agriculture, and he was as keen as ever in losing no opportunity of attending markets with his father-in-law, and in learning all that the elder man could teach him of farming. The Nabob's fine friends would hardly have recognised him in the sunburnt strong young fellow who wore rough tweed clothes and smoked clay pipes, and who ate his meals in a flagged kitchen. He knew all Farmer Strange's acquaintances, and he was made welcome and liked by all. His unchanging good-humour, his pleasant, easy manners, and handsome face won him friends wherever he went. It was useless for Kitty to pout and sigh and remonstrate. The Nabob simply laughed at her exhibitions of hurt pride and bad temper, and accompanied her father to the village inn where nearly all the farming people assembled in the evenings, and drank ale or inferior whisky and listened to the gossip about the big county families, the crops, and the latest news in the papers with kindly interest.

When August came Kitty began to cry. She appeared late at breakfast, with red and swollen eyelids and pallid cheeks. Sometimes she would not speak to her husband, and the hitherto cheerful meals were marked with gloom and depression. The Nabob gave up the long walks with Farmer Strange, and endeavoured to get Kitty to accompany him in her father's place. Usually she refused with angry petulance. Then he sat patiently with her, trying to interest her in his conversation. He read aloud to her, and was rewarded by peevish words and yawns. He took Di into his confidence, and asked what was to be done. Much crying both by day and night had taken all the brightness from Kitty's face and eyes. Her little nose had a swollen, red appearance. She took no interest in her toilette, she who had always been so coquettish and dainty in her dress.

"I think," said Di frankly, in answer to the Nabob's question, "that you must take her away. She needs a change. She never did care for Thorneydene."

They were standing in the dairy. Kitty sat in the rose-covered porch, slatternly clothed, with untidy, roughened hair drawn into a fuzzy knot upon the summit of her head.

She looked years older than Diana as she sat staring with regretful eyes at the tall, gay hollyhocks and round, big-eyed sunflowers.

The Nabob's vexed, troubled regard wandered from Kitty and rested upon Diana's sweet serious face, and tall, simply clad figure. She looked brave and courageous. There was truth in every line of her face; strength in her hands with their long, broad-tipped fingers and well turned-back thumbs. As she stood watching Kitty with tender maternal solicitude in her beautiful eyes, the Nabob must have compared her with her sister, for a sudden impatient sigh escaped him.

"We are all so happy—all but Kitty!" said he regretfully. "Di, I sometimes wonder if I can ever make her happy."

"She will be happy if you give her more excitement. You see," said Di in an apologetic tone, "she has always been used to a lot of gaiety. It is dull here."

"You never find it dull."

"I am different."

"I remember your telling me at Capri how you loved the country, and I can understand it. There is a fascination in leading the simple, good, homely life that we have been leading together lately. Must I go, Di? Must I take Kitty away? Decide for me. I cannot!"

He had taken her hand, and unconsciously he pressed it between his, looking into her face with an expression that troubled her.

"I think you ought," she faltered. "Yes—I think you must go."

"If you tell me that it is my duty I will do it."

Di turned her eyes away, feeling strangely embarrassed, though she could not have told why.

"It must be your duty to make your wife happy," she was about to say, when a shadow fell before them. John Gillway stood in the open doorway.

The Nabob dropped Di's hand and went forward with an unconstrained greeting, but Di knew that her cheeks were crimson and her lips twitching.

She heard Gillway saying that he had met Farmer Strange, who had asked him to let Miss Strange know that he must return late to dinner; a dog had got into a sheep-pen and had worried and injured some of the sheep.

"In Longacre field!" cried the Nabob. "I must go and see if I can help." With a bright nod to Di and a clasp of the hand to Gillway, he hurried away.

"It's a long time since we met," said Gillway, looking at Di with a curious compression of his lips.

She had recovered her self-control, though her heart was beating quickly, so quickly that she wondered if its rapid throbs were audible to the man leaning against the dairy door.

"Yes," she answered. "You never come to see dad now."

She had not meant to speak reproachfully, for what right had she to criticise John Gillway's actions? Perhaps it was only her fancy that there was an accent of reproach in her tones.

"I am afraid of meeting your sister."

Di drew up her head. A wave of angry indignation had surged over her.

"Afraid!" she cried, and Gillway winced beneath the scorn in her clear eyes. "Come and see her now; she is in the porch."

"Thanks. I'd rather not. It would be uncomfortable for both of us. Don't you understand, Miss Strange, that I might find it difficult to forget, and——"

"You ought to have forgotten everything," said Di. "I—I should be ashamed of myself if I were you."

She spoke passionately, angry at thinking that this man still loved Kitty—Kitty, who was making her husband miserable by her selfishness, and who had done her best to spoil John Gillway's life. Di had never seen how very much Kitty was to blame until John Gillway told her that he was afraid to meet his former sweetheart.

"I do feel ashamed—very often—but I don't find that it helps me," said Gillway in a quiet voice.

"Then it ought to help you," cried Di in fine indignation. "What is the use of being a man if you are not strong?"

She saw Gillway smile. She knew that she was illogical, and she suspected that she was ill-tempered. Di hardly knew her own emotions that day.

"If you don't mind," she said, "I should like to pass. I want to go into the house. I won't ask you to come, since you are afraid."

Gillway drew back at once. His face had whitened.

"I beg your pardon," he said, and Di read the concentrated passion in his dark eyes. She felt ashamed, and, once on her way to the kitchen, she half paused, asking herself if she had not acted foolishly and rudely, and whether she ought not to return and tell Gillway that she was sorry.

"No," she said to herself. "Why should I?"

And yet, almost with the last thought in her mind, she found herself hurrying back between the flaunting hollyhocks. Gillway was still leaning against the wall.

"I came to say that I don't know at all why I was so rude," said Di, holding out her hand. "But I was rude, fearfully rude, and it doesn't matter at all to me whether you're afraid to meet Kitty or not, but I am sorry—you must know that I'm sorry for speaking as I did."

Gillway's eyes had widened in surprise. As Di blurted out her sentences the muscles of his set face relaxed. It was as though a carved stone figure had been suddenly endowed with life.

He opened his lips to speak, but Di had once more flitted away, and he was left alone among the flowers and honey-seeking bees.

At the end of that same week, the Nabob took Kitty to inspect a fine old property called the Towers. The estate was about fifteen miles from Thorneydene. Its owner, Lord Powers, was compelled to reside abroad for two years, and he was anxious to find a tenant for the period of his absence.

The dwelling was an odd mixture of many styles and periods. It had been begun in the reign of Elizabeth, and added to from time to time according to the taste and requirements of its occupier. It took its name from a disused part of the house—an old wing with a couple of small towers, that looked like a pair of bloated pepper-pots.

Kitty brightened up at the pleasant prospect of becoming the mistress of a finer house than she had ever imagined reigning over in her wildest, and most ambitious dreams. True, it was still near hateful Thorneydene; but the prospect of filling the house with guests and of showing off the jewels that were now locked away in a bank was delightful to her.

And in addition to these joys, her husband had promised that in May she should rent a house in London for the season. The Nabob appeared resigned to quitting the simple life that he had so much enjoyed. He exacted promises from Di and Farmer Strange that they would visit him and give him an opportunity of returning their hospitality. At this period Di heard the Nabob for the first time speak harshly to Kitty. The house and all its appurtenances had been rented. Kitty's trunks were locked and strapped waiting to be carried away, and Kitty and the Nabob were standing in the sitting-room as Di came came down the passage.

"Your father must come for the shooting," the Nabob was saying jovially. "There's not any sport for the poor old chap here."

"Oh, Bernie!" exclaimed Kitty. "You can't ask dad! If you do we must shut up the house to everybody else. Just think how bad his manners are!"

Di had almost reached the door. She saw the Nabob's face pale, and a furious light spring in his eyes.

"By George, Kitty!" he exclaimed in a disgusted voice. "If you can't help thinking such things, you might keep from saying them! You make me despise you!"

Di drew back, uncertain whether to advance or recede.

"Oh, I know you don't love me any longer!" cried Kitty with quick resentment. "I'm not blind! I—I know quite well what has changed you—it is because Aunt Caffyn gave me no money, there!"

The Nabob took Kitty by the shoulders and looked fixedly into her eyes. Di shuddered and trembled as she watched. "It only wanted that," said the Nabob. "So you can think that of me!"

Did he shake her? Di could not tell. She ran back to her room and threw herself down by the bedside. Kitty came up for her at last, and marvelled at the pallor and anguish in her sister's face. She was all smiles, and looked as though she had never been angry or ruffled in her life.

"Bernie is waiting to say good-bye; the new carriage has come. I shan't be able to come over to see you to-morrow—I shall be so busy, and Bernie says it takes four hours, here and back—but the day after you might come. I'll send a carriage for you. And, Di, don't bring dad; he would feel so out of place in our surroundings, poor old dear!"

Di went down again and shook hands with the Nabob. His face was very pale, though he tried to smile.

"God bless you, dear Di," he said; "I can never thank you and your dear old dad enough for all your goodness to me! It's an understood thing, mind, that while we are at the Towers it is as much your home and your father's home as it will be mine and Kitty's, and at Christmas we will have a real, good, old-fashioned house-warming, with mistletoe and a big ball, and all the rest of it."

THE MOTH AND THE STAR.

I SAW her first in the Old Salon in Paris. She was standing before Paul Langdon's picture, "The Moth and the Star," which at that time was creating a sensation in the artistic world.

It was early—too early for the gay, laughing throng that would an hour or two later fill these rooms, criticising, admiring, rejecting. At this time in the morning one expected only to see artists scattered sparsely here and there, and they were too absorbed in contemplation and study of the feast before them to waste idle words with one another. It was, therefore, with a feeling of curiosity that I scrutinised the girl standing before "The Moth and the Star." That she deeply loved and reverenced art could be seen by her air of rapt devotion her utter unconsciousness of her surroundings. Something within me said she was not an artist herself, though she might and must have had the artistic instinct.

Perhaps it was the sight of a maid in attendance, standing respectfully near the entrance-door, that precluded any such thought, for the women artists never hesitated to come to any of the exhibitions unattended—one saw them everywhere alone.

The picture which I could see made so deep an impression upon the girl before me, represented a solitary vestal virgin in white flowing Grecian costume, which was adorned at the throat by a single jewelled star; even on the canvas it shone with the lustre of a real gem.

She was engaged in lighting the tapers on the altar of an old church; two are already burning—when she is surprised by the appearance of a dashing young courtier, dressed in the magnificence of a knight of past ages.

That he breaks into a passionate avowal of love can be read in the expressive portrayal of his countenance, but there is no answering sympathy in the virgin's beautiful face—only calm wonder and dismay. The exquisite carved work of the church's interior—the solemn gloom of the subdued light—form a fitting background for these two figures, and I, as an artist, am free to confess that it was worthy in almost every respect the admiration it excited from all Paris. There was something wonderfully fascinating in the grace of the maiden's unconscious pose—in the strong man's passionate appeal—and in every detail of colour and form. I have seen people gaze at this picture and wander away to others, only to come back to it again and again as though drawn by some unseen force.

The woman, or rather girl, who at present was the sole devotee before this shrine, was herself a study for an artist. Taller than the average height of woman, she was slender and lithe, though perfectly rounded in form; every turn of the head was queenly, and her skin fair, and as delicately tinted as the first flush of Aurora stepping out of the realms of dew-kissed night. The crown of all was her hair, a deep, rich gold-brown, with just the faintest suspicion of a crinkle; this was worn, not after the disfiguring English fashion nor the exaggerated knot of American women, but simply in a soft, graceful coil lying close to the head. I thought I had never seen anything more lovely or effective, and a great desire seized me to paint her.

She must have stood fully fifteen minutes almost motionless before me, but I was so absorbed in studying her that sense of time was forgotten. At length, however, she turned; a quick, ecstatic sigh escaped her parted lips, for one fleeting moment her eyes met mine, and then she was gone, followed at a short distance by the maid at the door.

I drew a long breath; all my artistic sensibilities were on the alert. Sitting down on the nearest chair, I drew my note-book out and tried to sketch her from memory, just in profile as I had seen her standing; the result was unsatisfactory, and I put it back in my pocket dissatisfied. People were already beginning to throng into the rooms; the rustle of satin gowns swept to and fro over the polished floor; mingled perfumes made the air heavy, and before the picture she had admired were grouped half-a-dozen women of fashion whose extravagant exclamations fell incongruously on my ears.

How different women are: Some cannot admire without voluble verbal attestation; others say nothing, because the appreciation of the soul cannot be expressed by mere words—their emotion is of the silent kind, which touches an artist most deeply

I rose and went out, and after walking aimlessly for a half hour or so, proceeded to my rooms in the Rue Montmartre. As I was about to mount the stairs which led to my apartments, a newsboy rushed over with the Figaro. Lighting a cigarette, I threw myself on a couch near the window and proceeded to read the news.

The absorbing topic of interest I perceived to be the announcement of the betrothal of a certain Princess Marie Louise Dolores Aimée de Vandois to the notorious Russian Count Vlagmasdi, who was closely allied to the house of Romanoff. I do not know why I waded through three columns of this, for I cared not whether the prospective bride was gifted with the charms of Venus and Minerva combined, or that she was descended from one of the most ancient families of France; neither did the Count's accomplishments and praises interest me, for I knew him to be one of the fastest men of gay Paris—and delighting in the fact. Truly a fitting match for a beautiful and innocent girl; I turned away in disgust.

My reflections were here interrupted by the entrance of two artist friends, Jean Doubet and Jules Busoni. "Ma foi!" said the former, "what are you doing up here on a day like this? Throw away the newspaper and come with us out to Passy."

"Yes," urged Busoni, "I can't imagine any one reading the paper on a day fit for the gods; besides, there's nothing but the fair Princess in any paper to be had—Vlagmasdi is a lucky dog—a man to be envied, ah!"

"He has it badly," laughed Doubet good-naturedly. "Fortunately she's a little too far above his reach or we'd lose him from our ranks in the twinkling of an eye."

"That you would, indeed," assented the would-be lover with such earnestness that both Jean and I burst into laughter.

It was three days later before I again had an opportunity of visiting the Salon, as on returning from Passy I found a telegram from a friend in Marseilles desiring me to meet him there at once. I must confess to a strong reluctance to leaving Paris just then, but it was for my own interest to go, as this friend had secured a buyer for one of my pictures, and my presence was necessary to complete the bargain.

The morning after my return found me again in the Old Salon. Need I explain that my earnestness to behold my devout adorer of "The Moth and the Star" was the sole object of my visit! I was doomed, however, to disappointment. In vain did my eyes travel over the vast rooms—she was not there. I sat down in front of the picture, feeling a little surprised at the great chagrin which surged through me; still I waited, half expectant, until twelve o'clock, and then went down to the Palais-Royal to breakfast. I began to fear I should never see her again, and the more such a contingency presented itself, the more determined I was to find her—to see her again, if only once. So the following morning I was again at my old station, and within five minutes after I had entered, she came. I felt repaid a hundredfold for my pains, she was such a goodly sight to artistic eyes.

I gazed at her in her radiant loveliness—furtively, delightedly. This time she bestowed passing interest on a dozen or more pictures, but came back and seated herself before Paul Langdon's. At last a sudden irresistible impulse seized me to hear her speak. I advanced slowly towards her and addressed her in English: "Madame, may I ask, as an artist, your opinion of the picture before you—pardon me my presumption, but I would like to know how an outsider is impressed by it."

She turned her eyes to me, and though she replied in excellent English, there was a very charming French inflection in her words.

"I am flattered, monsieur, that you, being an artist, should wish for my humble opinion on the lovely picture before us. I cannot say more in its praise than that it is perfect."

The French maid in the distance was eyeing us a little curiously, but I was too delighted at having her speak to me to object to anything so trivial as that.

"Ah," I said, "you think it is perfect—this indeed is delightful praise, and I would that its creator himself might hear, but despite my boundless admiration for the picture there is something wanting in it to me."

"Wanting!" she echoed, in surprise. "I do not understand you. What is it, monsieur?"

"Well," I replied, a trifle embarrassed under her searching, perplexed gaze, "that woman's face wants a soul, she is unmoved by the adoring love offered her; having felt the divine motion of love, she could not stand there unmoved, unpitingly, unsympathetic, merely disturbed by the inability to perform her duty."

"But don't you think, monsieur," asked the clear voice beside me eagerly, "that she, as a vestal virgin, might never have known—never have felt this divine emotion of which you speak?"

"What woman, be she vestal virgin or the woman of fashion, has lived a score of years on this tumultuous planet of ours and can own the flame of Love's passion has never burnt her soul?" I questioned incredulously. Then it occurred to me—could my beautiful companion be speaking of herself—was it possible that love was an abstract to her? Though unbelieving, the words rose involuntarily to my lips: "Have you never loved?" I asked abruptly.

A sudden carmine dyed the exquisite oval of her cheek, her eyes grew dark a moment, and then she said in a low voice: "No," and I felt she had spoken the truth. A silence fell between us, and in that silence the white-robed vestal virgin in the picture shone out as never before; she was no longer an unknown myth of some past age, but symbolized an ideal type—that of the woman beside me.

It was her voice that broke the stillness. "I would rather have her as she is," she said musingly. "Love in her case would only mean sadness."

"And yet," I said impressively, "it comes to all; wanted or unwanted, the chaste star shall tremble into light; it is not only the moth whose wings are burnt, for in that awakening, perhaps, the star shall be consumed in its own flame."

"I do not like to think of such things," said my companion, restlessly plucking the petals of a crimson rose to pieces. "You shall not exterminate my star in so ungracious a fashion; the painter has interpreted better; it is well she has never known love."

I bowed and was about to reply, when there was a stir at the other end of the vast room, and someone whispered the ex-Empress Eugénie was about to enter. My companion grew very pale. "Adieu, monsieur," she said hurriedly; "I must go."

"But the Empress is coming," I began. "Surely you would like to see her?"

She appeared disturbed. "No," she replied; "I have engagements; I must go," and she passed on, leaving me wondering and half inclined to believe I was dreaming. Most puzzling of all, why should she wish to hurry away just because the ex-Empress was coming? Women were generally delighted to catch a glimpse of her.

The days somehow passed very rapidly about this time, and I continued to haunt the Salon assiduously. Sometimes I saw her, but more often not; she was always attended by her solemn-looking maid, and was invariably gracious, though I began to notice the radiancy which attracted me so much at first had almost vanished.

There was a deep thoughtfulness in her eyes, in the repose of the exquisite mouth. She told me once in our brief conversations that Paul Langdon the artist was an old friend of her family's, and that years ago he had loved, unrequited, her elder sister, who had been dead now nearly ten years.

"Ah," I said, "that probably explains his picture of 'The Moth and the Star.'"

"Yes," she answered, half sadly; "you see his own experience disguised; the face and form of this vestal virgin before us are those of my sweet dead sister. Do you wonder now, monsieur, why I come here so often?"

Her voice was mournfully reflective, as though she were travelling over long-past scenes. It was on this day that I asked her to sit to me for her portrait; she hesitated and demurred at first, but I urged her so strenuously that she finally consented to give me half-a-dozen sittings if that would content me, and then she gave me one of her dazzling smiles, and I thought I was the most fortunate man in the world. Promptly at ten she came the first morning—oh, the delight of having her sit so near me, bewildering my eyes with her loveliness, beautiful beyond the dream of man, in a gown of rich, shimmering white satin that showed her fairness to perfection. The time being so limited, I was forced to strain every nerve to accomplish a certain amount of work at each sitting.

Her grim maid, who sat near the door, I soon learnt could understand no English, and this consoled me in some measure for her presence. My studio, after she left, seemed illumined with her personality until she came again—it was joy simply to live.

On the morning of the fifth sitting, just as she was preparing to go, conversation turned in some unaccountable manner to the coming marriage of the Princess Marie de Vandois. I cannot remember which introduced the subject, but my sentiments were unvarnished and plain. "I would rather my sister were lying dead than married to the Count Vlagmasdi," I said quietly.

"Why?" she asked with spirit; "he is handsome, rich, and fascinating—what more would you have?"

"I would have him hold women a little higher than the lightest thing God ever created," I replied with some heat; surely everyone in Paris knew the Count's reputation. I could not refrain from quoting to her a few lines of Coventry Patmore's that rose in my mind;

> "Ah, wasteful woman, she that may
> On her sweet self set her own price,
> Knowing he cannot choose but pay,
> How has she cheapen'd paradise;
> How given for nought her priceless gift,
> How spoil'd the bread and spill'd the wine,
> Which spent with due, respective thrift,
> Had made brutes men and men divine!"

She was standing erect, drawing on her glove; the smile had died from her lips, and I saw tears standing in her beautiful eyes. In some way I felt I had hurt her, and in a moment my long pent-up passion burst forth. Time, place, maid—all were forgotten, I only knew that I loved. Twice she tried to interrupt me, but I would not—she must hear how she had come to be the light of my life itself, that I lived but on her smiles from one day to another.

She stood motionless when I had finished, her eyes dark with pain, her lips white and tremulous. "Mon Dieu!" she murmured; "what have I done—I would have been your friend. Forget me, I am not worthy of your love." Her voice broke into something like a sob, I looked up and she had vanished—a mist swam before my eyes.

The next thing I remember was walking out to the Bois, striding madly, feverishly on, I knew not whither. Late in the afternoon, retracing my steps back towards the Champs-Elysees, I encountered Jules Busoni. His gay pleasantries and jocular remarks jarred on my nerves, and it was with difficulty I could answer him civilly; he took the hint, however, and soon left me.

The Bois was black with a continuous stream of carriages. It seemed as though all the beauty and fashion of Paris had turned out to bask in the warm June sunshine. Suddenly my eyes were riveted on an approaching carriage. Were my senses suddenly leaving me, or did I really behold her sitting there in regal state beside the Count Vlagmasdi? No; it was true; she was looking in my direction, and, with one of her dazzling smiles, bowed in recognition; the Count, too, glanced half carelessly round—and they had passed. A terrible fear possessed me. I grasped a passing boy by the arm.

"Who is that lady riding there with the Count Vlagmasdi?" I demanded hoarsely.

"La belle Princesse Marie de Vandois; la fiancée de Monsieur le Compte," replied the boy, shaking himself free from my tight hold.

I fell back stunned; a dozen little things rose up in my mind to confirm his statement. How blind I had been, how wilfully! It was indeed a case of the moth and the star. I laughed bitterly. No wonder she did not wish to see the ex-Empress Eugénie that day in the old Salon; her mother was one of the Empress' dearest friends. Fool that I was not to have seen it all, I groaned in spirit.

At any cost I would quit Paris. I would not witness her triumph, I would not stay to hear the very street resound with her approaching nuptials. Paris had suddenly grown hateful to me. Yet I found it vain to strive to forget in the whirl of London season. Like a beautiful vision of unrest, her face floated ever before my eyes, but its joyousness mocked me. My remembrance of England must always be a painful one, for 'twas there I spent the most bitter three weeks of my life.

At last I could stand it no longer. I had thought to drown pain by fleeing from the cause, but it seemed only to increase with the distance from her, and I determined on the very eve of her wedding to return to Paris, if only for one more glance at her. From the Gare du Nord I went straight to my rooms in the Rue Montmartre. It was raining in torrents, and I found that in the suddenness of my flight to England I had left the east window of my studio open. Alas, what a sight met my eyes! The easel on which her unfinished picture stood had blown over and the portrait lay face downward on the floor. I raised it tenderly, it was blurred almost past recognition and soaked through with rain. A rap sounded at the door, and the concierge entered, bringing me a batch of letters that had accumulated in my absence. There were two lying on top which arrested my attention; the writing, in a woman's fine hand, was unknown to me. Was it possible she might have written? I tore open the first and glanced at the signature. It was dated over two weeks back and was signed with her name—"Marie de Vandois."

There was no beginning.

"You told me once," it ran, "that some day the soul of every woman awakens. Life until I knew you was simply a joyous passing to and fro—a song that had no minor strain—endless—beautiful! Then I knew you! It was you who taught me the supreme value of a woman's soul and I would have given for nought the priceless gift. I thought to forget you—strove to put you out of my life The power to do so is beyond me. If you love me as you said three days ago, come to me—save me from a worse fate than death. Until then I wait, counting the hours.—Marie de Vandois."

The world suddenly grew radiant again. Oh God, was it too late? I tore open the second note with feverish haste; what must she think of my silence! It was dated this morning, and read: "I ask not why you have not come, it is but just that you should despise me, but for the love you once bore me, pray for me—pray for my soul. When the clock in St. Dunstan's strikes eight to-night, I shall be his wife. Do you remember the day you told me that when the star awoke there was danger of being consumed in its own fire? I was incredulous, yet that fate has o'ertaken me. The moth singed his wings, but pity the star that has been burnt out by its own flame."

It ended abruptly. My star—mine—my own! even at the eleventh hour I would save her! In my frenzy and exhultation. I groped blindly about for my hat. The candle flickered and went out. The rain poured in through the open window (I had forgotten to close it), and through the blackness and desolation sounded the death-knell to my hopes—the clock in St. Dunstan's struck eight.

TOLD BY THE DOCTOR.

III.—THE MESMERIST'S DAUGHTER.

(Concluded from last week.)

"Surely you are Dr. Favel whom we are expecting?" she said, cordially; and, when I bowed, she inquired how I had managed to come so far out of my way.

"They must have misdirected you at the station," she said in her musical voice; and I confessed candidly to my presumptuous faith in my own powers of local discovery.

"You must trust to it no longer," she said, with a smile as sweet as her voice; "but accept my guidance, or you will inevitably be lost before you reach the château."

I thanked her, and called her naturally, "My lady." I never doubted that Lord Aldwyn had made her his wife. But as soon as the name was out of my mouth, I saw by the colour which flashed to my companion's face that I had made a mistake.

"You must not call me that," she said with a little laugh; "I am only Miss Vaudary."

I was startled, and murmured an apology awkwardly. I looked forward to seeing my host, and knowing exactly how the case stood.

When I arrived at the house, however, under Miss Vaudary's pilotage, I found that the Marquis was absent, while the old Marchioness, his mother, was confined to her room, as my guide had already informed me. I was shown to my own chambers in the east wing of the fine old mansion, where Lord Aldwyn called upon me as soon as he got in. He seemed extremely glad to see me—so much so that I began to fear that his mother's health was worse than his letter had led me to expect.

I inquired anxiously whether such was the case, and discovered at once from the careless manner in which the Marquis replied, that it was not.

He seemed extremely glad to see me.

"She has been pretty much the same for months now, but I thought she was perhaps getting a little weaker, under the care of her doctor here. Possibly you can do something for her, although there is little that can be done, I know, in cases like hers, where the heart is at fault."

I was a little surprised to hear this, after travelling so far and with some haste, expressly on the Marchioness's behalf.

Possibly I made my surprise evident, for the Marquis seated himself by my side, and told me in a confidential undertone the true reason why he was so anxious for my presence.

"It is not often that I am in want of other men's advice or sympathy," he said; "but I am just now. You promised, you remember, to assist me once more in relation to my curious love-story, if I found assistance to be necessary."

"Certainly," I said, wondering what was coming.

"It is scarcely as a doctor or as a student of mesmerism that I wish to consult you this time," he went on, "but rather as a man whose judgment I know is sound, and whose sympathy can be relied on. You are the only man, too, except Canise, who knows the early part of the history; and I shrink from taking more into my confidence, especially now that it promises to end so unhappily for me."

"Indeed!" I said in some surprise. "I should have thought from Miss Vaudary's presence at the château, that an unhappy termination to the affair was impossible."

My companion only shook his head.

"You will recollect that at our last meeting at the Professor's," he went on, "I surprised you by expressing my intention to avail myself of that wicked man's influence over his daughter, to marry her while under the effect of his mesmerism. I was led to that determination by two considerations; the chief one, you will do me the justice to believe, was the fear that a refusal on my part to go on with the case would merely lead to the substitution of another bridegroom or protector. The old man, I could see, had had his appetite whetted both for personal profit and for professional achievement; and if I withdrew, it was almost certain that some rich man, probably less scrupulous and more brutal than myself, would take my place.

"That was the chief consideration. Then, again, I made no pretence of denying my love for the old charlaton's daughter. I hoped that, if I removed her from her father's influence into my own care I should in time manage to awaken in her heart some love for me. I believed, you see, that Paul Terry was dead."

"Paul Terry—the man whose personal attractiveness for Miss Vaudary you borrowed? Surely you did not accept the Professor's word as sufficient authority for the fact of the man's death?"

The Marquis shook his head.

"Certainly not. I wrote to the address in Paris, which, you may remember, appeared on the young man's card. I received a reply, assuring me that the young artist had indeed died as the Professor stated."

"Ah, that is well," I said, with a sigh of relief. "I was very much afraid you were going to say that this Paul Terry was still living."

The Marquis answered quickly:

"He is still living. I presume that the concierge at his lodgings had been bought over by Vaudary before my letter reached him."

I shrugged my shoulders.

"And has he met Miss Vaudary?"

The Marquis's answer startled me a little.

"He has met the lady who was Miss Vaudary, but who is now my wife."

"Your wife!" I could not help exclaiming. "She assured me that she was unmarried."

It was Aldwyn's turn to be startled.

"You have met her and asked her the question?" he inquired excitedly.

And I related to him all that had happened. As I did so his look of anxiety gradually disappeared, and he asked me, when I had done, the most minute questions as to the lady's appearance and manner when she informed me that she was not "My lady."

"Thank you," he said at last, when he had made me tell him every conceivable detail of the scene in the lane. "Perhaps I had better continue my story now, then I shall be able to ask your advice in the horrible situation in which I find myself. Possibly my life will depend upon it."

I needed nothing to quicken my interest, and assured my companion of the fact.

"Well, to begin with," he went on, "I married Miss Violet Vaudary just a week after our visit to the Professor, in the house which he still retained at Paris."

"While the bride was under the influence of mesmerism?" I asked.

"Yes."

"Under the name of Paul Terry?"

"Yes."

"Pardon me," I said. "Does that fact make the marriage invalid?"

The Marquis shook his head.

"I am afraid not. If it did, the fact would provide an easy way out of my difficulty—a way which would render necessary the sacrifice only of my own happiness. But a false name given by one of the parties to a marriage does not invalidate the tie, unless the other party is aware of its falseness. To proceed, however. Immediately after the ceremony we started by train for Dildac, where I had lately bought the château, and where my dear mother, who knew the whole story, had promised to take care of my wife.

"The beginning of that journey was a honeymoon; for Violet, still under the influence of her father's will, believed herself travelling with the man of her heart. Before long, however, she fell asleep with her head resting on my shoulder. The sleep was deep and heavy. You are aware, no doubt——"

"That the sleep which follows mesmerism is akin to a stupor. Yes. Pray go on."

"During that sleep I took pains to change her position so that she no longer rested upon me, and to remove the wedding-ring from her finger. Of course, we were alone in the compartment. Luckily we had not to change—Dildac, as you found, is on the main line to Lyons—and my newly-made wife did not wake until we were within a few miles of our destination.

"As I anticipated, she no longer viewed me with affection, but was startled to find herself travelling in the express without having the least idea whither she was going. In a few moments I looked up from my paper, which I had been pretending to read at the other end of the compartment, and addressed her with distant and respectful courtesy. My story was all prepared, of course, beforehand.

"Her father—of whom, poor girl, it was easy for her to believe any evil—had plotted to marry her, against her will, to a stranger, while she was in a state of mesmerism. I had been begged by a friend of hers, whose name I was able to give, to rescue her, and place her out of her father's power. We were on our way to a place of refuge, where she would be safe in the care of my mother. I had the story ready, in its most convincing form, and Violet listened, in a sort of startled fear, from beginning to end. I am afraid she did not believe me, and I am sure that nothing would have persuaded her, friendless and quite lost as she was, to accompany me to the château, had not my dear mother met us at the station.

"She achieved everything. You have not yet seen my mother, I believe; when you do, you will understand how she won my wife's confidence in a few minutes. Their friendship is beautiful, and I am inclined to be jealous of the affection of both.

"My wife took up her residence with us quite willingly, and has remained since, without question. She is too conscious of her father's villainies to wonder at my story. She has no curiosity, apparently, as to its details. She is happy to enjoy our friendship without inquiry, although I have had to invent a distant relationship between us, to account somewhat for our care of her welfare.

"I thought it best to keep myself and my own part in the affair as much as possible in the background, at first. I made a point, therefore, of making trips to various parts of France, and also to London, and of visiting only occasionally at the château.

"During those visits, I was beginning to think that my wife—whom we still call by her maiden name, and has not the slightest idea that she is my wife—that Violet was beginning to extend to me, in a slight measure, the affection with which she certainly regarded my mother. I decided to 'hasten slowly'—it is the motto of our house. Then came the death of her father and with it a revelation, which destroyed my peace.

"Paul Terry was not dead. Vaudary wrote me a letter on his deathbed, to inform me of the fact—'as a duty he owed me,' he said. The artist's death was a fiction, he confessed, invented solely by himself, to obtain for his daughter a more aristocratic alliance than Terry could offer. Inclosed was the young man's photograph, to enable me, the Professor said, to be on my guard, and prevent my wife ever meeting him."

"But they have met?" I asked.

"Yes; a week ago. He came here sketching, of all places in the world."

"And your—the lady retains her affection for him?"

"I have no doubt of it."

CHAPTER III.

"Now, I want your advice as to what I can do," said the Marquis. "It may seem a little thing to drag you over from England for, when the whole thing is so clear; but if you knew how I have worried my poor brain, thinking the thing over and over, until my mind is sick and dizzy, you would understand how necessary it is for me to have somebody to talk it over with. Although I have had but two conversations with you, I can think of nobody with whom I would rather do so than yourself."

I bowed and smiled, really pleased by the confidence which he had in me.

"I see your difficulty," I said. "If you keep secret any longer the fact of your marriage, you stand the risk of this Paul Terry paying addresses to your wife, under the impression that she is still 'Miss Vaudary.' If, on the other hand, you announce the fact of your marriage, you lose the chance of gradually winning your wife's affection while she considers herself unbound."

The Marquis interrupted me with an exclamation of irritation.

"Great Heaven! no," he said. "You mistake me. What troubles me is the thought that I have raised an insuperable barrier between the woman I love—and happiness. Do you think I am considering my own happiness? Why! man, I would willingly die to-morrow, knowing that my death would unravel the web I have woven round poor Violet's life. The questions are these: Is there a way of setting her free? Is Paul Terry as devoted to her as she is to him, or is he only trifling with her love? The latter I want you to find out. As to the possibility of annulling the marriage, I should like your opinion. If there is no other way, and the young artist loves her, and is worthy of her love, I shall remove my embarrassing presence with the aid of a revolver. But for my dear mother's sake, I hope that course will be unnecessary."

"You must not think of it," I said gravely. But the Marquis took no heed of my words.

I tried then to persuade him that the marriage could be annulled in a court of law. "If the judges accept the fact of Miss Vaudary's mesmerism," I said, "they will certainly decide against the marriage, which, I believe, has not been consummated."

"Of course not," said the Marquis irritably. "But no judge will accept the fact that my wife was mesmerised and unconscious of her actions."

"Then she must have been aware, in their opinion," I said, priding myself on my logic, "that you were marrying her under a false name, since her father, no doubt, introduced you on the first occasion by your true name."

"It is uncertain whether he did so," said the Marquis; and the melancholy with which he said it almost made me laugh in spite of myself. It seemed so grimly humorous for a man to be trying with might and main to prove that no tie held to him the woman he loved.

I promised, finally, to cultivate the acquaintance of Paul Terry, with a view to finding out the state of his feelings with regard to Violet, and also his worthiness to her hand.

"I shall go away," said the Marquis. "It is impossible for me to stay here and see her every day, knowing that I shall never be able now to win her heart. It would drive me mad. I know I can depend upon you to find out everything, and let me know the result. I shall start for Paris this evening."

"Tell me, before we part," I said, "what makes you so sure that the lady cares for this painter?"

"Why, it stands to reason," said the marquis, "when she married the man she believed to be him. However, that is nothing. I judge entirely from her manner. Before I knew that he was in Dildac, I knew she had seen him, from the joyousness of her manner. Afterwards her air has become sad and melancholy. It breaks my heart to see her and to know that I am the one barrier which she evidently unconsciously feels existing between herself and the man of her choice."

"I hope you are mistaken," I said. "At any rate I shall soon be able to see the state of her feelings, and his, I trust, if I get a chance of seeing them together."

"You will have the chance before long," said the Marquis, "as Paul Terry is often at the château."

"What!" I exclaimed, aghast. "You have invited him here? You throw them together?"

"Certainly. I can always drop out with the aid of a pistol shot if the position becomes too complicated."

I looked hard at his honest, matter-of-fact face, and could not restrain myself from taking his hand.

"Most men would call you mad, my lord," I said candidly; "I think you a hero."

The marquis shrugged his shoulders.

"I am neither," he said quietly. "I am simply in love. To possess my wife at the cost of her happiness, and without possessing her heart, would be as painful as life under any circumstances without her presence. Can I trust you to act for me as I have stated? I should like you to give my mother what attention you can at the same time. Probably I shall not see you again before I leave for Paris, so here is my address—and good-bye."

Lord Aldwyn handed me a card with the name of a large hotel in Paris, and shook hands with me. It was, as he said, the last time I saw him before he left the château.

Next morning I visited my patient, the old Marchioness, a dear old lady, who charmed me. I was pleased to find that her illness was due less to her heart than to her liver, and eventually her health considerably improved. This is by the way, however, and does not concern my story.

I was anxious to see how she regarded the girl of her son's choice, and must confess that I was a little surprised to find her speak enthusiastically in her favour.

"My poor boy has told you his story, I believe," she said. "Oh, I do trust that you will be able to find out that there is some hope left for him — some loophole of escape from the terrible state of affairs which he believes to exist. You will give him what encouragement you can, won't you, Dr. Favel?"

There were tears in the old lady's eyes as she placed her hand pleadingly on my arm, and I hastened to assure her that all my sympathies were excited for her son, the Marquis, and that nothing in the world would give me greater pleasure than to find his fears unfounded.

Walked towards me with her arm in his.

The old lady went on speaking of Violet.

"I will confess," she said, that I was a little prejudiced when Cyril told me about his love; but, of course, I knew that he alone had the right to choose whom he should marry. And my prejudices vanished almost as soon as I saw dear Violet. She is indeed the woman of all others I would have chosen to make Cyril happy. I feel, somehow, as though you would find out that he need not lose her."

It seemed to me that everybody was expecting a great deal from me; and, as far as I could see, there was not very much for me to do. The first thing, of course, was to find out, if possible, the true state of the lady's feelings towards Paul Terry, who was staying, I understood, in a picturesque little tavern near the château gates.

I seized the opportunity next morning, when the Professor's daughter offered to show me over the grounds, of accepting promptly and turning the conversation round to the young artist, whom I regret to state, I spoke of as an acquaintance of mine.

The pious fraud availed nothing. Madame turned to me quickly and, with flashing eyes, startled me with a sudden thrust.

"You have an object in speaking to me of Monsieur Terry?" she said, looking straight into my face—so straight that I could not deny the truth of her assertion.

"Yes, Miss Vaudary," I said instead.

"It is useless, I suppose," she went on, "inquiring what that object is?"

I had to confess to her that it was useless.

There was silence then for a few minutes, while we walked onward side by side through the beautiful English-like park which surrounded the château. Then my companion startled me once more by asking, as if the question was led up to by a train of thought:

"Can you tell me, Dr. Favel, if a marriage would be binding supposing the bride entered into it unconsciously?"

"Unconsciously?" I repeated.

"In a stupor — or under the influence of mesmerism, say?"

"I think it would be binding," I said honestly. For the question of a false name was not concerned in her question.

"You have heard of such a marriage?" she said quickly, making me regret the celerity with which I had replied; and I changed the conversation determinedly as soon as I had given the inevitable affirmative.

By some means or other my lady had arrived very near to the truth, I thought; and it occurred to me that Miss Vaudary was prospering a good deal more with her questioning than I with mine. I felt quite ashamed of my impotence to assist my host as he expected me to do. For though Miss Vaudary had satisfied herself on some points by my answers, I had gained nothing at all from hers.

I was quite relieved when the walk was ended and I was back in my own rooms, away from the young lady's clear-reading eyes. I sincerely hoped, though, that the old Marchioness would not want to see me and question me about my success. The Marquis, I knew well enough, would be expecting a letter on the subject by the next morning's post; but I had no news to give him, and therefore did not write. After Miss Vaudary's thrust I had decided not to seek Terry out immediately, for fear of further awakening her suspicious curiosity.

After the post had gone that night, however, I felt bound to telegraph to Aldwyn. And this was the message I sent:

"V. V. has left the château; it is believed with P. T."

I trust that the Postmaster at Telliers, our nearest telegraph office, did not recognise in the message the initials of Violet Vaudary and Paul Terry.

This is how the message came to be sent. After spending all the day in my room, I was summoned by the Marchioness at eight, and found her in considerable alarm, Miss Vaudary had not been seen since the morning. Subsequent inquiries showed that she had taken a ticket for Paris, and travelled by the noon train. Also, that she had received a letter by post some little while before starting. On hearing which I hastened to the tavern in the village, and inquired for Paul Terry, only to be told that he, too, had left by the same train for the same destination as the Marquis's wife.

To say that the news filled me with consternation, is is to speak too mildly. To think that after Lord Aldwyn had reposed such trust in me, and had counted upon me so confidently to give the best turn to affairs that was possible—that I had allowed the worst to happen, and most probably hastened the horrible dénouement. All this filled me with a shame that was scarcely bearable.

Instead of assisting the noble-hearted Marquis to arrange matters in the best manner, I had allowed the woman, for whose happiness he cared so much, to guess from my words and manner what she had evidently only suspected before, that she was legally married to my friend, and had thus driven her to bring shame upon herself and him by an elopement with the man she loved. I upbraided myself bitterly, and dared not face the thought of seeing the man who trusted me, and confessing to him how I had bungled everything.

The more I thought of it, the worse the ordeal appeared to me, and by the evening of the next day I had resolved not to face it. I had given my patient a prescription and certain rules of diet, which I considered would do wonders for her; and towards evening I packed up my baggage, and leaving a letter for the Marquis to have when he returned to the château, set out for the station.

I decided not to return to Paris, for several reasons, one of which was the chance of meeting Lord Aldwyn Instead, I purposed going down to the Rivi-ra, for a short visit. I had to wait, therefore, for the train which passed through Dildac on its way from Paris to Lyons, I regretted the fact since it suggested the chance of my meeting the Marquis if he returned from Paris that day. We had received no word from him, and did not know when to expect his arrival.

I hung back nervously as the train steamed in, and eagerly looked for the exit of passengers from the train. The Marquis had come after all; for I saw him open the door of a compartment and step on the platform.

Judge of my surprise, however, when he helped from the train—his wife, and walked towards me with her arm in his. When I saw that both looked radiantly happy, my surprise became so great that I lost my train and forfeited my ticket—to hear Lord Aldwyn's explanation.

The full explanation, however, I did not learn till after our arrival at the château, when the Marquis tapped at the door of my room, as he had done on the night of my arrival, and came in to set my mind at rest.

"Since you have heard so much of my love-story, of course you must hear the rest," he said, "although it seems almost too sacred to speak of now."

I had a hard struggle with my conscience before I could make the necessary reply, which, luckily for my curiosity, Lord Aldwyn ignored.

"Thanks to your telegram, I met my wife on her arrival at Paris," he said. "She was not aware that Paul Terry was in the train. She would have been even more unhappy had she known it, for it was to avoid Paul Terry that she left Dildac. From the first my poor little wife—who I shall marry once more in my own name, as soon as it can be done—had some latent suspicion that when I took her away from her father's guardianship he had already compelled her unconsciously to go through some form of marriage. Later she began to suspect that it was with me, and was well content, for, thank Heaven! she had learned to love me at Dildac. When she met Terry he assured her for a fact that she was married, having heard it from her father. He was ignorant however, of the bridegroom's name, and finding Violet equally ignorant, amused himself by hinting after awhile that it was himself. My unfortunate encouragement of the artist made her more steady to believe him, as did also your show of interest in him.

"Meanwhile my poor wife had written to a friend she remembered in Paris, begging her to make inquiries among the marriage-records there; and, when the friend discovered the mention of Violet's marriage to a Paul Terry—whose name, you remember, I assumed under the belief that the man was dead—of course my poor little wife had no longer doubt on the subject. Since her heart was given to me, the thought of belonging to another was terrible to her. You understand everything now?"

"Yes," I said, somewhat startled. "Her affection for Terry, in the first place, was a myth, of course?"

"Not altogether; she was prepossessed in his favour at their one interview; so much so that she did not care to make my acquaintance afterwards. But all the rest—the falling in love, the engagement, the marriage—belong to her mesmerised existence, and have no relation whatever to her real life and feelings."

Such was the Marquis's explanation; and I suppose it is all I need tell of the strangest love-story which ever came under my observation, except that a week later Dildac was en fête to celebrate the prettiest wedding I have ever seen.

I sometimes wonder what would happen if the Marchioness of Aldwyn were mesmerised once more; but I think I can trust the noble Lord, her husband, not to allow the experiment to be made.

Answers to Correspondents.

IF any readers would care to collect any money for the FRESH AIR FUND I shall be pleased to forward any number of printed forms to facilitate their work. It is the best possible means of swelling the F.A.F., for where one person cannot himself give a substantial sum he will find it a comparatively easy task, and certainly a pleasant one, to induce his friends and relations to give a little. A post-card addressed to the secretary of the FRESH AIR FUND, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., will bring along the number required.

SMOKER.—The most valuable pipe in the world is the property of the Shah of Persia. It is set with precious stones, and is worth £80,000. The "Vesuvian" column in Pearson's Weekly was discontinued some time ago.

SYBIL.—Yes, it is quite possible to judge character by the eyes to a certain extent, although the mouth is a much better indicator of a person's disposition.

S. B. A.—Ireland was first called "The Emerald Isle" in a poem written by a Dr. Drennan in the latter half of the last century.

C. G.—Try an ostrich egg at your next party, for a change. Ten people can make a meal off one, and it takes an hour to boil.

R. E. W.—Half-farthings were coined in the year 1843, but not being of much use they were soon withdrawn from circulation.

T. T.—Ordinary dreams, by which I mean the dreams of healthy people, which generally occur a few minutes before waking, are perfectly harmless. Dreams, however, which are the result of mental anxiety or over brainwork are decidedly injurious.

No, the letter was not received.

V. N.—Audiences are forbidden to applaud in Russian theatres.

TEETOTALER.—The quality of the various kinds of tea depends almost entirely upon the season of the year when the leaves are picked, the best tea being that made from the youngest leaves.

CLERK.—Certainly forty words a minute is very good speed for writing in longhand. The majority of people do not write faster than twenty-five words a minute.

VIOLET.—Yes, the old story of "The Mistletoe Bough" is really founded on fact. The sad event occurred in the family of the Hawkesburys in the year 1689.

F. D.—Your dog has certainly a remarkable appetite. A similar instance came under my notice recently. This time it was a bullock, which evinced a great liking for nails, gun shots, skewers, or any other delicacies of the kind.

F. H. G.—The reason is that the Chinese have a horror of a straight line; to them it is suggestive of death and demons. They employ only curves and zigzags.

H. L. B.—Many thanks for your letter, and the interesting facts it contains about bees. The venom of the bee is considered by some people to be a remedy for cancer, rheumatism, snake-bite, and other ills.

M. M.—You should certainly sleep with your bedroom window open, unless you are exceptionally delicate.

B. A.—The coin of which you speak may be good, in spite of the fact that it does not ring when tested. Gold and silver coins often get slightly cracked, causing them to sound "dead."

H. D.—A detective's salary varies from £3 to £10 a week.

MINNIE.—The rate of growth of the human hair varies. In some instances it has been known to exceed two inches a month.

E. W.—About 4,000,000 tons of potatoes are used annually in France in the manufacture of starch and alcohol.

A CONSTANT READER.—Ants are certainly not the most delightful guests to have in one's house. Try the following method of getting rid of them: Wash the wood-work round their haunts with turpentine and water; strew camphor about, and dust insect powder, or snuff, wherever they appear.

T. R. R.—Bangkok is the capital of Siam, not of Annam. It is a floating city, containing 70,000 houses, each of which floats on a raft of bamboo.

U. R.—No, it is not correct for a man to walk arm in arm with his fiancée in the public street, but people in love do not always stop to consider etiquette.

INQUIRER wishes to know which is the best British regiment.——Do you mean physically, or morally, or what? The 17th Lancers and Scots Greys in the cavalry, and Black Watch (42nd Highlanders) in the infantry, have all wonderfully good records.

H. M.—The three holes in the top of a cocoanut are for the purpose of allowing the young tree to issue from the shell when the nut is planted, and are not intended for the purpose of taking out the milk. The poem never appeared in S.S.

GINGER.—You should be proud of the colour of your hair, instead of wishing to change it. Auburn hair is fast becoming rare, and in years to come it will probably be quite extinct.

V. C. W.—The Bank of France is much the larger of the two. It does more than four times the amount of business done by the Bank of England.

SUSAN.—You are not the only girl in Britain dissatisfied with the Christian name given you by your parents. It would almost seem better if one could choose one's own name; but as that is impossible, the best thing is to make the best of it.

H. H.—If the skin of a human being were to be dressed and made into leather, it would very closely resemble pig skin.

T. H. W.—The oldest police force, as distinguished from the gendarmerie, appears to be our own. The principals engaged in the Tichborne trial and the de Goncourt frauds were far superior to any others in the detective force, past or present.

W. F.—I know of no cure for left-handedness. Constant effort and strength of will may do a lot towards overcoming it.

G. F.—The British Crown is worth nearly £300,000.

R. C.—"Bluenoses" is the nickname given to the inhabitants of Nova Scotia.

E. E. W.—The reason you are asked to write your manuscript on only one side of the paper is not that the editor may use the other side for scribbling, but for the convenience of the printers.

G. C. B.—No, it is very seldom that both sides of a face are exactly alike. The left side has almost invariably a softer outline and more pleasing expression than the right, and you will generally find that it is the left side which is portrayed in a photograph.

W. R.—You might be able to sleep better if your bed were turned towards the north. Many people cannot sleep with their heads to the south, east or west.

F. F.—I believe there is only one plant whose perfume is fatal to life. It is found in the volcanic districts of Java and Sumatra.

THE NEW LEMONADE.—Many people suffer from extreme thirst during the hot weather. Messrs. Foster Clark & Co. have supplied the want that has so long been felt, by making a concentrated Lemonade, which is far more economical than the ordinary Lemonade. It is made from the finest lemons, and the great advantage is that it is partly manufactured in Italy, in the midst of the lemon orchards. The lemons are taken direct from the trees to the factory to commence their transformation into the "Eiffel Tower" Concentrated Lemonade. You can get thirty-two tumblers (or two gallons) for 4½d. If you cannot get it from your Grocer, send 6d. to G. Foster Clark & Co., 290, Eiffel Tower Factory, Maidstone.—(Advt.)

KOKO

FOR THE HAIR

ROYAL TESTIMONIAL.

"Berlin, Alsenstrasse,
"February 25th, 1896.

"'KOKO' for the Hair is the best dressing I know. It keeps the head cool, promotes growth, and is in every way excellent.

"PRINCESS HOHENLOHE."

ORDER FROM ROYALTY.

"Detmold-Lippe, Germany.

"I beg you to forward by return 6 Bottles of 'KOKO.' It is for H.R.H. Princess Victoria of Schaumburg-Lippe"

(Grand-daughter of Queen Victoria and sister to the German Emperor.

MISS ELLEN TERRY, the Great Actress, writes: "I have used 'KOKO' for the Hair for years, and can assure my friends that it stops the hair from falling off, promotes growth of the hair, eradicates dandriff, and is the most pleasant dressing imaginable."

1s., 2/6, and 4/6, of all Chemists, Hairdressers, etc.

The Celebrated Authoress,

MRS. E. LYNN LINTON,

"Brougham House, Malvern.

Dear Sir,—"I have used your 'KOKO' now since June last, and I have not only stopped the falling out, which has been excessive after a severe illness, but I have an entirely new growth of hair, while the old hair is longer. As I am not a young woman, but an old one, I think this is a convincing test of the value of your preparation."

I was Quite Bald.

Mr. EDGHILL COLES, a wealthy City merchant, writes: Arundel House, Putney, July 9, 1896. "Gentlemen,—I am now convinced that, without exception, 'KOKO' is the best preparation possible for restoring hair. I was quite bald on the front, top, and back of my head, and I have now a fine crop of hair. I am strongly of opinion that if the Duke of Cambridge, the Prince of Wales and his good brother knew your 'KOKO,' they would use it. . . I am willing to answer any question from anyone on the subject.

"P.S.—I enclose my photo, just taken, and I consider it a marvellous recovery of my hair, especially as I am over 60 years of age. It is also a splendid specific for headache, and an excellent tonic."

MEN WHO HAVE MADE THE EMPIRE.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

FOREWORD.

THE Epic of England has yet to be written. It may be that the fulness of time for writing it has not come yet, or it may be that Britain is still waiting for her Homer and her Vergil. Perhaps the matured genius of a Rudyard Kipling, that strong, sweet Singer of the Seven Seas, may some day address itself to the accomplishment of this most splendid task, and perhaps it is his only to sound the prelude. That is a matter for the gods to decide in their own good time, but this much is certain: that when this work has been worthily done the world will hear echoing through the ages such a thunder-song as has never stirred human hearts before.

It will begin, doubtless, with the battle-cries of the old Sea-Kings of the North, chanted to the music of their churning oars and the rush and roar of the foam swirling away under the bows of their longships, and from them it will go on ringing and thundering through the centuries, ever swelling in depth and volume as more and more of the races of men hear it rolling over the battle-fields of conquered lands, until at last—as every loyal man of English speech must truly hope—the roar of the Last Battle has rolled away into eternal silence, and north and south, east and west, the proclaiming of the Pax Britannica heralds the epoch of "The Parliament of Man, the Federation of the World."

But in the meantime, while we are waiting for the coming of the singer whose master-hand shall blend the song and story of Britain into an epic worthy of his magnificent theme, materials may be gathered together, old facts may be presented in new lights, and the great characters who have played their parts in the most tremendous drama that has ever occupied the Stage of Time may be re-grouped in such fashion as will make their subtler relationships more plain, and all this will make the great work readier to the hand of the Master when he comes.

It is a portion of this minor work that I have set myself here to do. The making of a nation and the building of nations up into empires is, humanly speaking, the greatest and noblest work that human hands and brains can find to do, for the making of an empire means, in its ultimate analysis, the substitution of order for anarchy, of commerce for plunder, of civilisation for savagery—in a word, of peace for strife.

Now, the British Empire as it stands to-day is unquestionably the greatest moral and material Fact in human history, and hence it is permissible to assume that the makers of it must, each in his own way, whether of peace or war, have been the greatest empire-builders the world has yet seen, and it is my purpose here to take the greatest of these and tell with such force and vividness as I may, the story of the man and his work. I am not going to write a series of biographies arranged in prim chronological ranks, nor am I going to confine myself to the narration of collated facts so dear to the hearts of educational inspectors and scholastic examiners. Such you will find already cut and dried for you in the school-books and in many ponderous tomes, from the reading of which may your good taste and good sense deliver you!

I shall seek rather to show you the living man doing the living work which his destiny called him to do. The man will not always be found of the best, nor the work, seemingly, of the noblest, but what I shall seek to show you is that the work had to be done that a certain end might be accomplished, and that the man who did it was, all things considered, the best and, it may be, the only man to do it. In so far as I do not do this I shall have failed in the doing of my own work.

One more word seems necessary in order to anticipate certain possible misconceptions. Our empire-making is not yet complete, even at home. The centuries of strife during which the hammering and welding together of the nations which now make up the United Kingdom has been progressing, have naturally and necessarily left certain national jealousies and antipathies behind them, and the last thing that I should desire would be to arouse any of these.

There are two kinds of patriotism, a smaller and a greater, a National and an Imperial. Both are equally good and noble, and it is necessary that the first should precede the second. But it is equally necessary that it should not supersede or obscure it, and it is to this later and greater, this Imperial patriotism that I shall appeal, and I would ask my readers, whatever their nationality, to remember that on the burning plains of India and the rolling prairies of Canada, in the vast expanses of the Australian Bush and the African Veld, there are neither Englishmen nor Scotsmen, Welshmen nor Irishmen; but only Citizens of the Empire, brothers in blood and speech, and fellow-workers in the building up of the noblest and stateliest fabric that human hands have ever reared or God's sun ever shone upon.

I.—WILLIAM THE NORMAN.

Pirate and Nation-Maker.

It may strike those of my readers who have only got their history from their school-books as somewhat strange that I should begin my record of British Empire-Makers with a man whom they have been taught to look upon as a foreigner, an invader, a conqueror, and a ruthless oppressor of the English.

The answer is simple, though manifold. The school-books are only filled with potted facts and are therefore wrong and unreliable. It has been well said that England was made on the shores of the Baltic Sea and the German Ocean. The so-called Englishmen who occupied it at the time of the Conquest were not Englishmen at all, for the simple reason that the true English race had yet to be born, and, after it, the true British.

The England and Scotland of the eleventh century were peopled, not by nations, but by tribes mostly at bitter and constant war with each other. There were still Jutes and Angles, Picts and Scots, Danes and Swedes and Norwegians, each occupying their own little stretch of country, and governed, more or less ineffectually, by their chieftains, in proof of which it is enough to recall the fact that Harold's last fight but one was against his own brother, who had come across the Narrow Seas at the head of a miscellaneous crowd of hungry pirates to steal as much as he could of the ownerless heritage that Edward the Confessor had left behind him.

A good deal of sentiment, more or less born of deftly-written romances, has glorified the memory of this same Harold. Whether it was deserved or not does not concern us now, any more than does his right or unright to the throne of England. It is enough here to grant him all honour as an able leader of armies, and a man who knew how to snatch victory from defeat, and glory from disaster, by dying like a hero surrounded by the corpses of his foes.

The idle question whether he or William had the better right to the crown of England may be left to those who care for such quibbling. Let us, at the outset, in the words of the Sage of Chelsea, "clear our minds of cant." There is no "right" or "wrong" in these things, saving only the eternal right of the strongest and wisest—the fittest or most suitable, in short, to wield power and dominion whether the less fit like it or not. The peoples are thrust headlong into the fiery crucible of War, and, on the adamantine anvil of Destiny, the Thor's Hammer of Battle beats and crushes them into the shape that God has designed for them. It seems a rude method, but in many thousands of years we have found no other, so at least we may conclude that it is the best one known.

There is a very deep meaning in the seemingly flippant and almost impious saying of Napoleon: "God fights on the side of the biggest battalions." He does—but you must reckon the bigness of the battalions, not only by their numbers, but by the value of their units, remembering always that one man with a stout heart and a cause he honestly believes in is worth a score who have neither heart nor faith.

Just such a man was William the Norman, son of Robert the Magnificent, otherwise styled the Devil, and Arlette the Fair, daughter of Fulbert the Tanner of Falaise. It is in this birth of his that we find the first clue to his real greatness. He was born of a union unhallowed by the sanction of the Church, among a people proud beyond all modern belief of their royal sea-king ancestry.

How did he come to achieve this almost miraculous triumph over a prejudice and hostility of which we can now form but little idea of?

We have to look no farther than his cradle to find the answer. Lying there, the little fellow used to grasp the straw in his baby fists with such a grip that it could not be pulled away from him. The straw broke first, and ever after what William the Norman laid hold of he held on to; and that is why he became the first of our Empire-Makers.

No doubt it was the strain of the old pirate blood which ran so strongly in his veins that made him this. If we have successfully cleared our minds of cant, we shall see plainly that, since all nations begin in piracy of some sort, it is natural to expect that the best pirates will prove the best Empire-Makers. That old strain is, happily, not yet exhausted. When it is, Great and Greater Britain will be no more.

Drove the good steel through mail and flesh and bone.

Few men have passed unscathed through such a stormy youth as his was. When he was seven years old his father, Duke Robert, having exacted an oath of unwilling fealty from his under-lords to his bonny but base-born heir, went away on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, from which he never returned, leaving him to the wardship of his friend, Alan of Brittany, and soon after Duke Robert's death was known Alan was poisoned. After that for a dozen years the Boy Duke was in constant peril of his life.

One night two lads were lying sleeping side by side in the Castle of Vaudreuil, and in the silence and darkness of the night one of the Montgomeries, bitter enemies of the Lords of Falaise, to whose hate Alan of Brittany had already fallen a victim, crept up to the bed-side with a naked dagger and drove it blindly into the heart of one of the boys and fled.

Young Duke William—he was only a lad of twelve then—woke up to find himself wet with his playmate's blood, but all unknowing then how nearly the history of the world had come to being changed by that foul and happily misdirected dagger stroke. Had it found his heart instead there would have been no Norman Conquest, no blending of the two strains of blood from which has sprung the Imperial Race of earth, no British Empire, no United States of America—without all of which the world would surely have been very different.

Seven more years of plot and intrigue, of strife and turmoil young Duke William lived through after this, growing ever keener in mind and stronger in body, and, as we may well believe, hardening into the incarnation of ruthless and yet wisely-directed Force which was so soon to make him a power among men. Before he was twenty he shot his arrows from a bow which no other man in his dukedom could bend, and he was already a finished knight, a pattern of the gentleman of his age, good horseman, good swordsman, gentle towards women and stern towards men, pure in his morals and moderate in his living, a good Christian according to his lights and the idea of his day, and above all faithful to the ideals that he had set before himself.

Already at nineteen—that is to say in the year 1044—not only had he shaped his plans for reducing the disorder of his turbulent dukedom to discipline, but he had made his designs so manifest that the lawless lords and robber barons could see for themselves how stern a master he would make—as in good truth he did—and the deadly work of conspiracy started afresh. One night when he was sleeping in his favourite castle of Valognes, Golet, his court-fool, came hammering at his bedroom door with his bauble, crying out that some traitor had let the assassins into the stronghold. He leapt out of bed, huddled on a few clothes as he ran to the stable, mounted his horse, and galloped away all through the night toward Falaise along a road which is called the Duke's Road to this day. No sooner was he safe across the estuary of the Oune and Vire and in the Bayeux district than he pulled his dripping, panting horse up in front of the church of St. Clement, dismounted and knelt down to say his prayers and thank God for his merciful deliverance. Such was the youth who was father to the man justly styled William the Conqueror.

It was not long after this that the years of intrigue and plotting ended in armed revolt. Guy of Burgundy, William's kinsman and once his playmate, looked with greedy eyes on the fair lands of Normandy. He was master of many provinces already, and among his hosts of friends there were not a few of William's own underlords in whose breasts still rankled the shame of owning a bastard for their master. To his side came the Viscount of Coutance, Randolph of Bayeux, Hamon of Thorigny and Creuilly, and that Grimbald of Plessis whose hand was to have slain William that night in Valognes, and in the end this long-gathering storm burst on the grassy slopes of Val-ès-Dunes.

Master Wace the Chronicler, in his "Roman de Rou," gives us a brilliant little picture of that long-past scene where the future Conqueror won his spurs—of many a brave and gallant gentleman clad cap-à-pie in shining mail, seated on mighty chargers impatiently pawing the ground, of long lances gay with fluttering ribbons tied on by dainty hands that morning, of waving plumes and flaunting pennons, and mild-eyed cattle grazing knee-deep in the long wet grass in peaceful ignorance of the bloody work that was about to be done.

But with all this we have little to do, and one episode must suffice. The starkest warrior among the rebels was Hardrez, Lord of Bayeux, and he, like many another, had sworn to slay William that day with his own hands. The oath had proved fatal to others before it did to him, but at length his turn came. Young Duke William saw him from afar, and with lance in rest made for him at a gallop. One of the knights who had followed Hardrez to battle charged at him in mid-course. The next moment horse and man went rolling in the grass, and William, dropping his splintered lance, drew his sword, and, the Lord of Bayeux coming up at the instant, he drove the good steel with one shrewd, strong thrust through mail and flesh and bone, and Hardrez never spoke again.

That stroke won William his dukedom, and the Chronicler, though a man of Bayeux himself, tells in stirring lines how the young lord and his faithful knights hunted the flying rebels off the field and rode them down like sheep.

This was not the last fight that William had for the mastery of his own land, but it left his hands free to begin the work that he had set himself to do, and he did it. To him unity was strength, and he was ready to go to any lengths to get it. His methods then, as afterwards in England, were severe—we should call them brutal nowadays, but these days are not those.

When the citizens of Alençon defied him they indulged in the pleasantry of hanging raw hides over the walls and beating them, shouting out the while that here there was plenty for the tanner's son to do. He set his teeth and swore his favourite oath—by the Splendour of God—that they should have work enough ere he had done with them. When the city lay at his mercy he had two-and-thirty of the humourists sent out to him and cut off their ears and noses and hands and feet and had them tossed over the walls as a sort of hint that he was not quite the kind of person who could appreciate jokes about his ancestors. It was an inhuman deed, but history records no other public aspersions of the good name of Duke William's mother.

Yet one more battle the young Duke had to fight before he crossed the Narrow Seas to the famous field of Senlac. Henry of France, his titular over-lord, and Geoffrey of Anjou, jealous of the fast-growing power of Normandy, united their forces in an expedition which was half an invasion and half a plundering raid. Duke William, with infinite patience and a quiet, marvellous self-restraint, held his own fiery temper and the angry ardour of his knights in check, watching the invaders burn town after town and village after village, and turning some of his fairest domains into a wilderness.

He never struck a blow until, one fatal afternoon, he swooped down from Falaise and caught the French army severed in two by the rising flood of the river Dive. Then he struck, and struck hard, and when the bloody work was over, Henry was glad to buy a truce and his liberty from his vassal with the strong castle of Tillières and all its lands, and so heavy-hearted was he at his defeat that, as the Chronicler tells us, "he never bore shield or spear again."

Normandy had now become the most orderly and best governed country in Europe. Robbers, noble and otherwise, were ruthlessly suppressed, and the poorest possessed their goods in peace, while William himself had time to turn his thoughts to gentler and yet not less important matters of policy and love-making.

Hanging raw hides over the walls and beating them.

The old story of his courtship of the fair Matilda of Flanders with a riding whip is evidently a myth manufactured by some Saxon enemy, for Duke William was in the first place a gentleman, and, moreover, the lady and her parents were as anxious as he was for the marriage, for he was now the most desirable of suitors. The truth is that the Church opposed their union on some shadowy grounds of consanguinity, and it did not take place until after a courtship of four years.

And now, having got our Pirate Duke happily married and seen him undisputed lord of his own realm, we may go with him to St. Valery on the coast of Ponthieu, and watch him working and praying and offering gifts at the old shrine, during those fifteen long days that he watched the weathercocks and prayed for the south wind that was to waft his fleet and army over to the English shore.

It was on Wednesday the 27th of September that the wind at last veered round. The eager soldiery hailed the change as the granting of their prayers and the consent of Heaven to the beginning of their enterprise, and flung themselves into their ships like a great host of schoolboys setting out on a holiday. Soon the grey sea was covered with a swarm of craft, and it must have seemed as though the old Viking days had come back as the great square sails went up to the mast-heads and the shining shields were hung along the bulwarks.

William himself, in his golden ship Mora, the present of his own dear Duchess, led the way with the sacred banner of the Pope at his mast-head and the three Lions of Normandy floating astern. The Mora was lighter heeled or lighter loaded than the rest, for when morning dawned she was alone on the sea with the coast of Kent in plain sight. But presently a great forest of masts and clouds of gaily-coloured sails rose up out of the grey waters astern, and the whole vast fleet came on, urged by oar and wind, and by nine o'clock that morning the fore-foot of the Mora, close followed by her consorts, struck the English ground in Pevensey Bay.

It has often been told how William, as he landed, stumbled and fell on his hands and knees, and how those near him cried out that it was a fatal omen. The story may be myth or fact, but nothing could be more characteristic of the true man than his springing to his feet with both hands full of sand and laughing out in that great voice of his:

"Nay, by the Splendour of God, not so. See! Have I not taken seizin of my new kingdom and lawful heritage?"

But the army of the so-called English that they had come to seek was nowhere to be found, and some days were spent in uncertainty and debate as to whether they should march on London or await battle on the shore with their sea communications open, and in the end they took the latter and the wiser course.

Meanwhile, as has been said, Harold was away in the North fighting and conquering his brother Tostig and his fellow robbers, and the news of Duke William's landing was flying northward to him. It must have been something of an anxious time for both—the Norman waiting day after day in that deadly inaction which is most fatal of all things to the courage and discipline of an army, and Harold hurrying southward at the head of his victorious troops, knowing that he was about to try conclusions with the best leader and the finest soldiery in Europe.

It is of little import here and to us now which of them had the best right, as the lawyer-quibble has it, to that which they were about to fight for. The point is that such claims as either had they were going to submit to the stern and final ordeal of battle—and in good truth a stern ordeal it proved to be.

As he came to the South the standard of Harold—the Fighting Man—was joined by troops of recruits attracted by the fame of his northern victory, and it was a great and really formidable army which at length assembled between London and the Kentish coast. Meanwhile the Normans, after the fashion of the pitiless warfare of those days, were dividing their time between the building of entrenched camps and ravaging, plundering, and burning throughout the pleasant Kentish land.

Of course messages and parleyings passed between them. Harold from his royal house at Westminster bade Duke William come and fight him for his capital and his kingdom, to which Duke William warily replied: "Come and drive us into the sea if you can!" This at length King Harold was forced to attempt. And so it came to pass that, at length, on the 14th of October, the hosts of the Saxon and the Norman confronted each other on the field of Senlac by Hastings, on the morrow to strike blows whose echoes were to ring through many a long century, and to do deeds more mighty in their effects than either Harold or William dreamt of.

The Norman host has been called a horde of mailed robbers and cut-throats, eager only for plunder, and the Saxon army has been almost canonised as a band of heroes, gathered together to die in defence of their native land and their lawful king. Yet, strangely enough, the robbers and cut-throats spent the best part of the night confessing their sins and praying for victory, as well as in making the best dispositions to attain it. The patriots spent the same hours feasting and drinking, and swaggering to each other about the brave deeds they had done in the North and the greater things they were going to do on the morrow.

So the night passes, and the morning dawns grey and chill on the two now silent hosts. Then, from the Norman ranks rises the solemn cadence of the Te Deum, and as this dies away the archers move out—forerunners of those stout yeomen whose clothyard shafts were one day to win Creçy and Agincourt. Then came the foot-men with their long pikes, and after them the mailed and mounted knights, in front of whom rides Taillefer—Iron-Cutter and Minstrel—tossing his sword into the air and catching it, and singing the while the Song of Roland and Roncesvalles. As the archers and pikemen spread out in skirmishing order he sets spurs to his horse and charges at the Saxon line. He kills two men and then goes down under the battleaxe of a third.

Then the arrows flew fast and thick, and charge after charge was made upon the palisades of stakes that fenced the Saxon position, high above which floated the Dragon Standard of Wessex and the banner of the Fighting Man.

But the double-bladed Saxon axes were no playthings, and they were swung by strong and strenuous arms, and every time the Norman front came up to the breastwork it was hewn down in swathes by the deep-biting blades. The arrows fell blunted and broken on the big Saxon shields and stout Saxon armour, and so Duke William, with that ever-ready resource of his, bade his archers shoot up into the air, and then down from the grey sky there fell a rain of whirring, steel-pointed shafts, one of which, winged by Fate, struck gallant Harold in the eye—doubtless as he was looking up wondering at this new manœuvre—and, piercing his brain, laid him lifeless in the midst of his champions.

Soon after this a cry went up that Duke William too was dead, and he, hearing this, tore off his helmet, a somewhat unsafe thing to do in such a fight, and roared out that he was alive, swearing—as usual by the Splendour of God—that the land of England should yet be his by nightfall.

So they laid on again. William's horse went down under a pike-thrust. He clove the pike-man to the chin and asked one of his knights to lend him his horse. The knight refused, thinking more of his skin than his loyalty, whereupon William pitched him out of the saddle, swung himself up and led another charge against the ever-dwindling ring of heroes who were still hammering away with their battle-axes—and this time the stout line wavers and breaks, the mail-clad warriors pour up the slope, shouting that the day is won; axe and sword ring loud and fast on helm and mail, the Saxons reel back, closing round the body of their king and the staff of his banner.

"Dex aide! Dex aide! Ha-Rou! Ha-Rou!"

Duke William's men yell and roar again as they scramble over heaps of mangled corpses filling the trenches and blocking the breaches in the palisades. Another moment or two of brief, bitter, and bloody struggle and the last Saxon ring breaks and melts away, and Hastings and England are won.

What followed is history so familiar that few words more from me will suffice. What Duke William had done in his own land he did after the same methods in the land that had been the Saxons'. Cruel, bloody and savage they were beyond all doubt, but it is a question whether, even in the doing, they were more disastrous than the ferocious anarchy and the unceasing plunder and outrage and murder that had disgraced the weak and divided rule of the Saxon kings. In their effect they were a thousandfold better. Duke William believed that order was Heaven's first law, and, by whatever means he had at hand, he was honestly determined to make it earth's as well. And he succeeded, which after all is not an unsatisfactory test of honest merit. How well he did so let us ask not one of his own chroniclers or troubadours, but the man who wrote the story of his own conquered people, and this is what he will tell us:

"Truly he was so stark a man and wroth that no man durst do anything against his will. Bishops he set off their bishoprics, and abbots off their abbacies and thanes in prison. And at last he did not spare his brother Odo. Him he set in prison. Betwixt other things we must not forget the good peace that he made in this land, so that a man that was worth aught might travel over the kingdom unhurt with his bosom full of gold. And no man durst slay another though he had suffered never so mickle evil from the other."

Such was this grim, stern, Thor's-Hammer of a man, who by his strength and cunning hewed into shape that which in after days was to become the corner-stone of the glorious, world-shadowing fabric which we call the British Empire.

A Heroine FOR A Story.

A TALE OF THE TIME OF RICHELIEU.

"SPEAK! Let me know the worst!"

The Countess of Armile fell back in her chair with a gesture of despair. Her daughter, Isabelle, and the Abbé de Rainy stood by her, endeavouring to afford some consolation in this dark hour. The young man whom she had addressed stood before her, hesitating to say the words which should fill both mother and daughter with anguish.

"Dear aunt," he said at last, "I would not permit anyone else to convey this news; but now that the moment has come for me to fulfil this sad duty, my heart fails me. My unfortunate uncle has been found guilty of treason and sentenced"—he hesitated and then added—"to death."

A groan escaped from the lips of the Countess. Isabelle turned paler, but made no sound.

"He made no defence," continued the young man. "There is some mystery about his strange silence. It is incomprehensible." He was about to continue when the priest stopped him.

"The Countess can bear no more now," he exclaimed. "Leave us, and communicate to your cousin in another room the details of the trial."

At a sign from the Abbé, Isabelle followed her cousin into an adjoining room.

Once out of sight and hearing of her mother, Isabelle gave way to her pent-up feelings and wept bitterly. Henri tried to comfort his fair cousin, but he was forced to wait until the paroxysm was over.

"Oh, Henri," she exclaimed in broken accents. "They will kill my father!"

"I have an important message from him for you," was his reply. He felt that he could do nothing to alleviate her sorrow, which almost unnerved him. He hoped that his words would have the effect of distracting her attention somewhat, and he was not disappointed.

"What is it, Henri? Tell me! Quick!" She took a step forward and, placing her hand upon his shoulder, looked at him entreatingly.

"I saw your father and was able to speak to him for a few seconds; I saw him as they brought him from the torture chamber."

A shudder ran through Isabelle's frame at the last words.

"He was lying on the cold stones," continued Henri, "and his guards left him for a while alone. I slipped to his side and spoke to him."

"My poor father!"

"This is what he said: 'Henri, listen! The secret which I have suffered so much to keep would become known if my enemies obtained possession of a certain letter. I was reading that letter—I had just finished it—when the officers came to arrest me. I had no time to destroy it; all I could do was to drop it quickly into Isabelle's jewel-case and shut the lid down. Tell my daughter that I command her, as she loves me, whether she has read it or not, to burn that letter. I am dying to preserve the secret which it contains.'"

"A letter in my jewel-case!" said Isabelle wonderingly. "I have not opened the case since my father was arrested. What can it mean?"

"I feel that it contains proof of your father's innocence, but for some reason he wishes the contents of the letter to remain unknown," replied her cousin.

"Can nothing be done to save my father?" cried Isabelle, her tears flowing afresh.

"There is only one chance," said Henri dubiously, "and that is but a poor one. The Cardinal is coming into this town to-night. A word from Richelieu would save him. Can that word be obtained from him? I fear not. This conspiracy of the Duke de Montmorency, had it succeeded, would have overthrown the Cardinal, so he is not likely to forgive anyone who took part in it."

"I will try to get an audience with him," exclaimed Isabelle, a ray of hope lighting up her pale features. "Can you think of any way of helping me, Henri?"

"There is a man who might be able to assist me," replied the young fellow. "I will go to him and see what he says."

"Yes, yes! Go at once!" said Isabelle eagerly.

Henri lifted his cousin's hand to his lips, and hurried from the room without uttering another word.

Left to herself, Isabelle stood for a second with her hand up to her forehead as though trying to collect her thoughts; then she remembered the message delivered by Henri, and ran into the drawing-room, where the case had remained untouched, forgotten, since the day of the Count's arrest, when she had locked it. She hastily opened it. There lay the letter as it had been dropped on the jewels.

Her father had said "whether she has read it or not." Then he thought she had most probably read it. Would it be a breach of honour to read it now? It contained a secret which might save his life; why should she not save him? The temptation was a strong one; she hesitated—and then read the letter.

It was from the Duke of Montmorency, and it clearly proved her father's innocence, but it implicated several important personages who were not suspected.

It was a reply to a letter written by the Count, urging the Duke to give up his "mad project, in which I will take no part." Her father's very words were quoted. Then the Duke tried to persuade the Count to alter his decision, and mentioned the names of those highly-placed persons who were secretly ready to assist. Now she understood her father's silence; he refused to purchase his life by destroying others whose names had been given to him in confidence. What could she do? Nothing! She could not make use of the letter, yet it proved that her father had not taken part in the conspiracy. Her brain reeled; she staggered to a chair and sank into it in a swoon.

How long she remained in that unconscious condition she knew not. Strange sounds reached her in a dreamy fashion; gradually they became more distinct, and consciousness came back with a rush. She sprang up to find herself face to face with a young officer and half-a-dozen soldiers. The officer held something in his hand, which he was about to read; a pang of fear shot through her heart as she recognised the fatal letter.

"That letter belongs to me!" she exclaimed, in as calm a tone as she could assume, holding out her hand. "I was not aware that it was part of the duty of an officer to read private letters which he might find in houses he entered so unceremoniously as you appear to have entered this residence."

"I have authority for entering this house," replied the officer, flushing. "And I am here in search of a letter."

Isabelle had great difficulty in keeping her composure. The existence of the letter was known—or at least suspected. A thought flashed across her mind. If she allowed the letter to be taken, her father would be saved. But at what a cost! And she would be guilty of a base act of treachery if she let it go without doing her utmost to prevent it. Her doubts were quickly dispelled; her duty was clear and she must do it—even at the cost of her father's life!

"That letter is mine; return it to me!" she said in a tone of command. And as he still hesitated, she stepped forward and deftly drew it from between his fingers before he was aware of it.

Isabelle breathed again; the letter was safe and had not been read. The officer's face clouded angrily at being thus baulked in front of his men. Isabelle expected that he would try to regain possession of the letter or make a strict search for the one he had come to find, but to her delight and surprise, he uttered a sharp word of command to his men, and all marched from the room.

* * * * *

Cardinal Richelieu paced up and down the spacious apartment, while his secretary waited for him to begin. It was a favourite amusement of the great Minister, when State affairs were running smoothly, to turn his attention to literature and write some treatise or dissertation. The discovery of the conspiracy initiated by the Duke of Montmorency, and the punishment of the Duke and his accomplices, had cleared the political atmosphere, and the Cardinal was busy with a drama, the subject of which he regarded as a splendid conception.

"Where was I when that fellow disturbed me with his story about the letter?" he asked. "Oh! I know! I fear he has upset my train of thought; there may be something in that letter after all."

But the Cardinal was doomed to be interrupted that morning. He had scarcely began to dictate when a servant announced that the daughter of the Count of Armile begged an audience of him on a matter of great importance. The great man frowned.

"Show her in here," he said, after reflecting for a few seconds.

Two minutes later Isabelle entered, followed by Henri.

"Monseigneur," stammered Isabelle, her carefully prepared speech taking wings as she found herself confronted by the powerful Cardinal, "my father is innocent." She could say no more; her heart was too full.

"Your father was a friend of the Duke of Montmorency," said the Cardinal after sharply scrutinising the condemned man's daughter. "He received a letter which he wished to have destroyed—gaolers sometimes have sharp ears. That letter was from the Duke."

Isabelle's heart sank. The officer had recognised the handwriting. Her father's fate was certain unless she produced the letter, but that meant betrayal of the Duke's unsuspected friends. It was a terrible trial; the Count's life was at stake, she could prove his innocence, yet——

"Monseigneur! That letter proves that he is not guilty of taking part in this conspiracy. As you are powerful, spare him. Let me die in his stead. Oh, have pity, have pity!" cried Isabelle, falling on her knees before him.

"If you have proof of his innocence, produce it!" said the Cardinal coldly.

"It is here." Scarcely knowing what she did, the girl arose and drew the letter from her pocket. As she held it towards Richelieu, the face of her father seemed to rise before her eyes and she remembered.

"No!" she exclaimed, drawing back her outstretched hand. "I cannot show it! I will be true to my father, even though it cost him his life!"

She walked to the fire and threw the letter on the flaming logs. All present watched it as the flames devoured it. Then, with a heavy heart, Isabelle saluted the Cardinal and turned to go.

"Stay!" commanded Richelieu. "You are a heroine such as I am trying to portray in my drama. My secretary says that such a one is not to be found in all France, but you have proved the truth of my conception. I believe your story and I will pardon your father!"

Unheeding the incoherent words with which Isabelle tried to express her thanks, Cardinal Richelieu sat down at the table and wrote a few words on a sheet of paper, which he handed to Henri, who was endeavouring to calm his cousin.

"Take her away and see that she has every attention," he said in a kindly tone. "And tell the Count of Armile not to meddle in conspiracies against the State."

With a motion of his hand he waved them away. As they left the apartment in bewilderment he turned to his secretary, and, with a gleam of triumph in his eyes, said:

"Who is right—you or I? Now I can go on."

A PARDONABLE SIN.

Sir Robert Melton sat at the writing-table which had belonged to his dead wife. In his hand was a paper, slightly yellow with age, which he was reading for the hundredth time; a letter, written on a delicate kind of note paper which he had never used. It was dated ten years previously, addressed to his wife and signed "Lionel."

He had been seated in that position for over an hour, a look of intense anguish on his handsome face, convulsively clutching the missive with one hand while the other was pressed against his forehead.

What was the meaning of this letter, which, judging by the piece of silk ribbon found attached to it, was not the only one received from the writer?

His wife had been dead two weeks only. The day before her death she had been found insensible on the floor, close to this writing-table. Letters and papers were strewn about the floor, as if she had hurriedly sought for something, and there was a smell of burning. She had left her death-bed—for everyone knew that her case was hopeless, and she herself had perceived it by the doctor's earnest manner—and had made her way into this (an adjoining) room, where she had been discovered insensible.

The next day she had passed away with strange words on her lips, crying that she heard sweet music as she had heard it years before, talking of her child—their union had never been so blessed—and calling: "Lionel."

He had taken it for delirium; all of it. And now, on looking over her knick-knacks, performing a last labour of love, he had drawn from the back of a drawer, where it had slipped and remained hidden, this—love letter?

Had her eight years of married life been one long lie? No, no! He could not believe it! Yet——? Once more he read the letter:

Margaret,—The child is dead. The last link between us is broken. I am sick unto death and shall soon follow the little one. Then you will be free.—Lionel.

At the bottom of the sheet was a piece of music; was it the music that his wife had spoken about? Was this child hers? Who was this Lionel? Oh, what horrible mystery was this?

A thought struck him. He went to the piano and tried to play the bars of music written at the end of the letter. At first he could not find the right keys, although he was a good musician; he struck the wrong ones and produced wild discords. But at length he mastered his feelings sufficiently, and played it correctly. A weird piece of composition; sad and melancholy, it pictured the last moments of a human creature in such a vivid manner that Sir Robert shuddered and hastily snatched up the letter and quitted his seat. Whoever composed that work, for he was convinced that it was but a fragment of a masterpiece, was a genius. And he was Margaret's lover? What else could he think? He walked up to her portrait and gazed at it.

"No, Margaret!" he exclaimed. "I cannot—I will not believe it. There is some mystery here which must be cleared up. For your sweet sake I will unravel it, and until then I will believe nothing!"

And it seemed to him that there came over the features of the portrait a look of gratitude and happiness.

The first thing to be done was to find this man Lionel; the task seemed a hopeless one, but he must make the effort. Where could he be found? If that music were his own, he would be amongst the foremost composers of the day, but he could discover none bearing that name. Probably it was not his own composition, or "Lionel" might be an assumed name. Or the man was dead—did not the letter say as much? Ah! Then there was no chance of clearing up the mystery of that letter! Nevertheless, he would make the effort; he could no longer stay in Melton Abbey.

For two years Sir Robert Melton wandered from place to place all over Europe in search of "Lionel," trying to discover the opera of which he knew just a few bars. But all in vain. He returned to his home at the expiration of that time, broken in spirit, weary of life.

Strange are the ways of Fate. He had been home but two days when, as he was passing through the main street of the nearest town to Melton Abbey, a man thrust into his hand the programme of a circus. His first impulse was to throw it down, but out of curiosity he glanced at it. It was of the usual kind—wonderful acrobatic feats of persons with names almost unpronounceable, performing horses and the like. With a smile of contempt he began to screw it up into a ball, but stopped and started as though struck by some unseen hand. Smoothing out the paper, he read the last item:

THE GREAT LIONEL

The Wonderful Musical Clown.

Was this the man he had been hunting for all over Europe? A clown! Surely not! He dismissed the matter from his mind, but some strange power impelled him to go and watch this man's performance. It was nearly time for the circus to begin; he hurried towards the hall and entered.

With ill-disguised indifference he watched the performers. He was not in the least interested in the marvellous (?) doings of the acrobats with the hard names; he was waiting to see the clown, the man Lionel.

When Lionel made his bow to an admiring audience, the supercilious curl of Sir Robert's lip became more pronounced. He was only an ordinary clown. He could not be the man for whom he had been searching so long. But the programme said he was a musical clown. He would wait a little longer.

After indulging in a few of the usual antics, the man walked to the side and received a violin from an attendant. With the skill of a practised player he ran the bow over the strings, tightened them and began to play. Sir Robert sat spellbound; habitué of the opera as he was, he doubted if he had ever heard anything so exquisitely performed. The piece of music represented the last moments of a dying man; no words were necessary to explain it; it was so vivid that even the least intelligent of the audience understood and appreciated it, and many were moved to tears. As the end approached, the clown first sank on his knees and then lay flat on the floor, playing the moving chords all the while. Fainter and fainter grew the sounds from the violin; then, with feelings impossible to describe adequately, Sir Robert heard the bars which he had played from the music written at the end of that letter.

The next minute, the clown was playing a lively air indicative of an awakening to life, and the charm of the music was over for the Baronet. His agitation was too great to permit him to join in the well-deserved applause; he hurried from his box and made his way to the private door where the artistes entered. He was determined to see this man and learn more about him.

"Can I see the clown?" he asked, his voice quivering with suppressed excitement.

The doorkeeper looked at the new-comer in surprise, and shook his head.

"But I must see him!" exclaimed the Baronet, slipping a silver coin into the man's hand.

"I'll do what I can, sir," said the man. "But there he is, along the passage. Suppose you go up to him yourself?"

Sir Robert needed no second invitation, and he was soon face to face with the mysterious Lionel.

"May I speak to you in private?" asked the Baronet, speaking courteously, and as calmly as he could.

"No!" was the abrupt response. "I don't perform in private!"

Melton hesitated a moment and then said, with an effort, and scanning the clown's face narrowly the while:

"I come from Margaret."

With a startled cry Lionel sprang towards him and grasped him by the shoulder.

"Margaret! What do you know about Margaret? Where is she?" Then, collecting himself by a great effort, he continued with a forced laugh: "Bah! What is your Margaret to me?"

The Baronet's countenance betrayed the strength of his emotion. There was something behind that letter. What was the mystery between the two? He must know the truth at all costs! Taking out his card, he handed it to the clown.

"I must speak to you alone and at once!" he said peremptorily. "Put on your things and come with me now!"

At that moment a child came running up to the clown.

"Dad, if you don't make haste and dress you won't have any time for yourself before the evening performance."

The clown stooped and kissed her tenderly. She was about ten years old; a pretty child, with curly, golden hair and a sweet, lovable face. In appearance she resembled her father.

"If you like to come to my rooms," said Lionel, "I will talk to you. They may not be so comfortable as Melton Abbey, but they are close by, and I have but little time."

"Anywhere you please," returned the Baronet.

Half-an-hour later the two men were seated in a small, poorly-furnished room in a lodging-house near the circus. The child, Angela, had been sent down to the landlady while her father had a talk with "the gentleman." The Baronet had had some difficulty in persuading the man to speak, but a final appeal "for Margaret's sake" opened his lips.

"I was not always a clown," he began, with a tinge of bitterness in his voice; "I was one of the foremost musicians of the time. I was received in Society, and might have risen to the highest position in the world of music if—well! I was always careless and good-for-nothing!" He sighed, and continued: "About thirteen years ago I met Margaret. You know what her position was; you know the kind of man she had for a father—grasping, selfish, ready to make use of his daughter's good looks and personal charms for his own advancement. I became infatuated with her, and I thought she loved me. She thought so apparently, for she was prepared to marry me." Sir Robert started. "It was arranged that we should be married clandestinely, for Margaret did not know my exact position—she was captivated by my skill as a musician and, presumably, by my manner—and she feared that her father would stop it if he knew."

"Why did you not tell her?" asked the Baronet.

Lionel shook his head mournfully. "The truth is that it was simply an infatuation on both sides. But with this difference: that after marriage my infatuation deepened into maddening love—all sacrificing love—whereas hers cooled into indifference. Her father learnt of our union and was furious. A child was born to us, the one you saw with me, Angela."

"Go on!" cried the other hoarsely.

"Seeing the way in which Margaret was being treated by her father, and that she was growing more and more indifferent towards me, although she idolised our child, I formed a plan for her release and punishment. I do not intend to excuse my conduct," he added as Sir Robert uttered an exclamation.

"I took the child and went away, to Margaret's grief and the father's delight. I wrote to her occasionally. Then I pretended that the child had caught diphtheria. The next letter announced the child's death; that was the letter you found. She must have written the music. Shortly after that, I got someone to write to her, telling her that I was dead. I gave no address in those three letters. I actually got a man to go to her and say that he had been to my funeral. Margaret believed she was free, I suppose, and married you. I never let her know my whereabouts, and she had never heard my true name. It is only since I have descended to the clown business that I have again taken the name of Lionel."

The story was finished. The Baronet understood it all now. Poor Margaret! Her only fault was that she did not tell him.

Dazed and overwhelmed, Sir Robert Melton left the clown and made his way homewards. He had a vague notion that he had promised to go again and see Angela, but he could recollect no more.

On the following afternoon a man came to the Abbey with a verbal message for the Baronet. The clown, Lionel, had met with a serious accident, and was in a dying state; he had asked for Sir Robert Melton. The Baronet, whose horse was saddled ready for a ride, dashed off towards the town, but with all his haste he was only just in time.

The clown's eyes lit up feebly as the Baronet entered; he tried to speak, but no sound came. With a last effort, he lifted his hand and pointed to the child. Sir Robert understood.

"I will be a father to her; she shall be my daughter as well as Margaret's!" he said.

A faint smile spread over Lionel's features; and with a deep sigh he expired.

Sir Robert Melton was as good as his word. As soon as her father was buried, he took the child to the Abbey. One of the first things he did was to take her to Margaret's room and lead her up to the portrait of his wife.

"Angela, my child," he said, "that is a picture of your mother!"

And it seemed to him that a look of mingled love and gratitude appeared on the features of the portrait.

The Man of Gold.

There was great grief in Burgos when it was known that the beautiful Incarnacion, the idol of the city, was dead. She would grace their streets no more with her pink cheeks like the oleanders which grew in the Moorish palace at Granada.

She had been seen the day before entering the house of the Jew Ishmael, the usurer who refused to help his old parents in their poverty. And when she came out of the abode of this unclean Jew, she tottered along in the darkening night, her clear, honest eyes fixed on the ground. In the morning the monks of the monastery of Miraflores found her body on the banks of the Arlanzon.

And from every street, and every house of the city, arose a cry of hatred towards the murderer.

The young girls wept, remembering their companion; the old women gave vent to harsh words and maledictions; while the men looked at each other darkly, swearing under their breath.

The peasants, coming from the mountains on their mules, were amazed at the uproar, and asked if the heathen had captured the standard of Castille. And when they heard the crime of the usurer they joined in the public anger, for nearly all owed him money for advances to be paid at harvest time.

"This Jew deserves to be put to death."

Some young cavaliers were playing dice. One of them cried:

"I claim the head of the Jew to hang at the door of my house." Another said: "I want his skin for my tambourine."

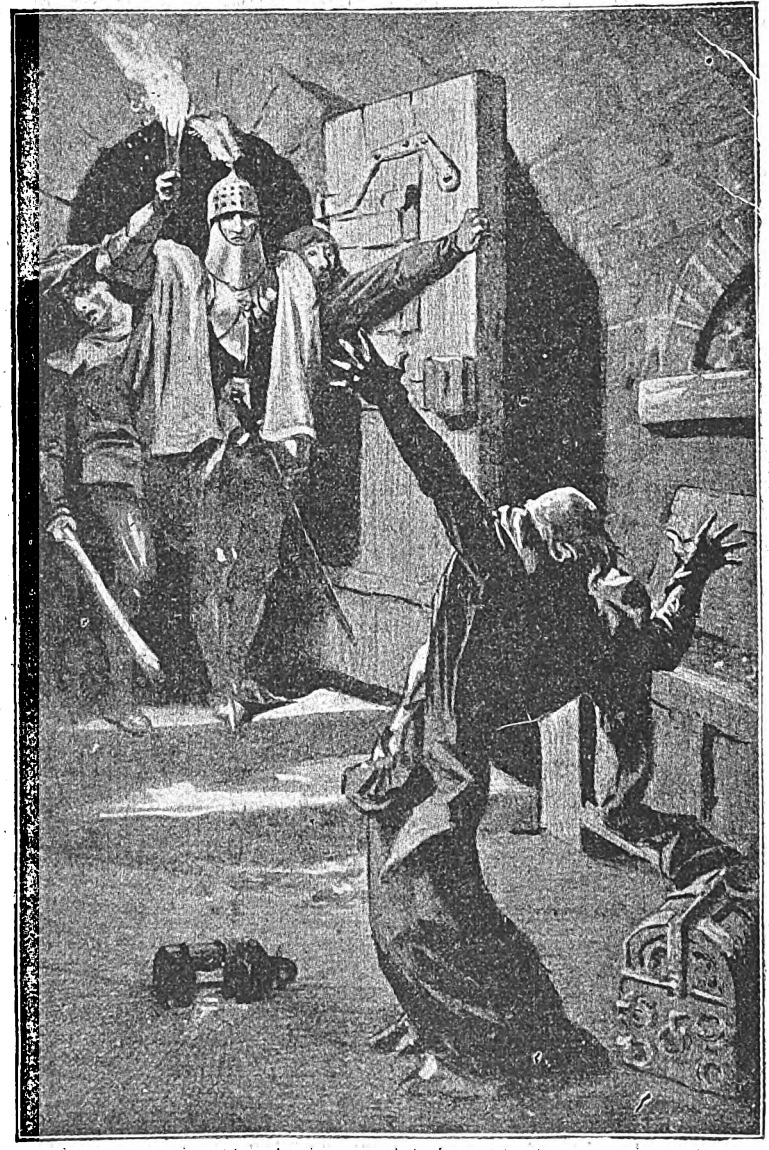
Digitized by Google

"I speak for the same," said a third, "because I wish to give to the ladies of Huelvas a crucifix covered with the skin of a heathen."

"The skin of a murderer—it would be sacrilege. I will take it myself, I will make an image of a Judas to expose in a public place, behind a grating, so that all who pass may revile it."

"To please everyone then we must toss for it. The highest gets the head and skin. The others share the money."

"Silence," cried a young knight, clad in white armour, whom no one had recognised. "Silence! You would not disgrace your knighthood by soiling your hands with such a fellow. I will punish him in the name of justice, and none can dispute my privilege."



The word came from his throat with a rattle, and he fell.

A monk dressed in a black and white robe advanced.

"I claim this man. We are told in the Gospel, 'Thou shalt not kill.' It is God who disposes of the lives of men. This one cannot be condemned without the judgment of our tribunal, of us, the Inquisitors of Castille."

The knight bowed, knelt on one knee, and kissed the robe of the monk.

"'My father, your words are just. But this man betrayed me and delivered me to the heathen. Let me be the instrument of your justice."

"Who are you—you, the unknown one?"

"I am the Chevalier Pedro de Miranda."

Then all recoiled a step, as from a ghost.

They remembered that some time ago a knight of this name made all the heathen of Granada tremble by his exploits. One day he was betrayed and poisoned. His body had disappeared; they thought it had been given to the Mussulmans.

And no one had heard of him any more.

The monk blessed him and said:

"This is a miracle of Heaven, peace be with you. We will give you your wish."

* * * *

In truth the Jew Ishmael had not slept peacefully. Not that he felt remorse in any way whatever for striking the young girl when she had reproached him for allowing his parents to live in misery, whilst he was enriching himself by defrauding others. But Incarnacion, her head reeling from the savage blow, had so frightened him by her imprecations that the terrors of superstition were awakened in his soul, and disturbing visions haunted him.

He could not rest, and before the first rays of daylight he arose from his bed. With the wariness of a cat, he glided through the village towards the banks of the Arlanzon, on the road to Miraflores, to claim the payment of a debt.

But there, on the sand by the river, Ishmael saw a black form. And upon approaching nearer, he recognised the corpse of Incarnacion, who had had no strength to go further on her way to the shelter and care of the monastery. Then the Jew was afraid, and ran away as quickly as he could. And as he turned to look at the place where the body lay, he saw numerous mysterious lights surrounding it. The monks were taking away the body for burial.

But Ishmael imagined that it was a band of demons, and he felt that vengeance was near. He ran, terrified, towards his house. There he descended in great haste to the cave where his gold was hidden, and plunged his hands among the doubloons. For he knew from the Arabs that the sound of metal always put phantoms to flight.

Above, he heard cries and shouts which he realised were approaching him. And now they were at the end of the long corridor which led to the underground refuge. In the darkness a light appeared. Ishmael jingled the pieces of gold still more. In vain. The light came nearer and nearer.

And before him a phantom rose, gigantic, clad in white armour, with a torch in his hand.

The Jew had scarcely strength to murmur: "Mercy." The word came from his throat with a rattle, and he fell, his face on the ground.

"Come, you rascally Jew, lift your head and look. Do you not recognise your victim?"

"My victim. Yes. I am a criminal, I am a sinner. Mercy."

And the Jew remained stretched on the ground, not daring to lift his eyes, and trembling like a leaf blown by the wind.

"Well, are you a whipped dog that you crawl thus on all fours?"

"By Javah! Incarnacion! mercy! look! Here is all my money. There are in these coffers doubloons and doubloons. Take what you will. Leave me only enough to give my parents to comfort them in their old age."

Behind the knight a number of people had crept in without Ishmael's knowledge.

A grave voice spoke.

"This man has confessed his crime, it is therefore unnecessary to question him. It now rests with us, the inquisitors of the State, to pronounce judgment. We will do what we think best for the good of all before the assembled people. Let the officers of justice bind this Jew. Let them bring him before our tribunal, and let him prepare himself to hear his condemnation."

And when the people saw the pale, fear-stricken face of Ishmael, their shouts redoubled, and the usurer felt himself crushed under the hatred of the whole city.

Then the Inquisitor pronounced these words:

"The Gospel says: 'He who strikes with the sword will perish by the sword.' Therefore it is just that he who has caused the death of his fellow-creature because of his gold, perishes by his gold."

This sentence was received with acclamation by the people, and a recorder read a judgment in Latin, that Ishmael could not understand.

Then he was led to the prison.

The next day the goaler introduced the executioner, followed by men carrying earth in baskets.

The Jew thought his last hour had come. He was deprived of his clothes, and stretched on the ground, trembling with terror and cold.

His agony was intensified by his ignorance of the punishment which awaited him. He shut his eyes and felt his body being covered with something moist, which seemed like wet paint, and in which he was buried alive. First his feet and his legs were covered, then his body was weighed down by something as heavy as lead; finally his head was inclosed in a mask of clay. And Ishmael awaited death.

But he soon lost consciousness.

When again his senses returned to him, he felt that his limbs were free.

Only the goaler was near him, and he thought he must have had a nightmare.

Many days passed.

One morning, the door of his cell was again opened, and the officers of justice entered, stripped him, bound him with ropes, blindfolded him, and led him from the prison.

Once more Ishmael heard the curses of the city. And as he approached the scaffold, they removed the covering from his eyes.

Then he saw on a raised platform the Inquisitor of Castille with his assessors; then, below, the white knight on his horse, in the armour of a phantom; then the penitents in their monks' cowls, who awaited his corpse; then cursing and threatening, all around him, the crowd. Instead of the scaffold, a pedestal of marble was erected in the middle of the square, and on the pedestal stood, sparkling in the sunlight, a statue all of gold. Ishmael noticed that this extraordinary statue was separated down the middle in two pieces.

The executioner said to him: "Look at that statue; it is made entirely of gold from your coffers."

The Jew grew faint and weak.

The executioner added: "That statue is to be your tomb."

A minister of religion addressed the doomed man, exhorting him to repent and be converted. But the Jew heard nothing.

He saw far away the banks of the Arlanzon and the place where the body of Incarnacion lay. Then the executioner seized him. For the last time Ishmael saw the sky and the light of day. Then he was placed in the statue, the two parts were fastened together, and eternal darkness began for the sinner, while the statue shone like the sun in the eyes of man.

Thus it was that for many years a statue of gold stood at the gates of Burgos. M. E.

A ROMANCE OF CARNIVAL TIME.

CARNIVAL! Visions come to me of the maddest dances, of flowery assaults upon beauty-lined equipages of dominoes in all the rainbow colours, of masks—masks? ah, yes! and chiefly of The Mask!

In all that carnival time, in that brilliant Roman atmosphere, the memory of Her shines out like the sun at noon. Some six or seven times I had met her, always at balls, where the delicious mystery of the mask covered all faces. Perhaps—who knows?—I met her many a time at the Opera, the theatre, or on the promenades; but, if I did, I was unaware of it, and she, for her part, gave no sign.

She wore, invariably, a black domino, and the identical jewel decorated her breast—a golden leaf, with pearls. She wore it as a pin, and by it I knew her.

From the very first there had been something about her that fascinated me. She was not tall! The jealous cloak that hid her figure gave no more than the merest hint of grace and beauty of line. Between the edge of the black glove and the sleeve a morsel of the whitest arm peeped out, and where her neck flowed from her shoulders, the curves were of the most dainty, the skin of the fairest, the modelling the most beautiful.

It was bewitching, the way she turned her head, now and then, in just the most delicious hint of coquetry, conscious, perhaps, that the splendour of her neck was something that it would have been a crime to hide or forget. Small curls of crisp brown hair caressed that neck. Her mouth, too, I have seen—a mouth not too small, with full red lips that could laugh, laugh until they awoke the spirit of laughter in the most woe-begone heart. Those lips pout, too, sometimes, but they were none the less kissable.

Her gowns were always in the subtlest taste; she avoided excess of chic just as she avoided the common. And her feet were ever shod in a way that proved their owner as proud of them—as who would not have been?

Chance—dear chance!—brought us together. We talked and we laughed in the easy manner of people to whom the world of masks is familiar, and who intend to make the present hour bring all it can of jest and pleasant chatter. From the first our spirits leapt in unison, and our conversation swept on pleasantly with the buoyant flow of souls that understand each other.

We had no need of the weather, the season's music, its books or its players; we brushed aside at once all these mere topics d'occasion. Somehow, with her, one was never at a loss for the more intimate theme; the sense of fellowship of thought made me, at any rate, feel as if I had known her always. Then, at that first parting, I asked her if I were not to see her again.

"Oh, yes—in domino."

"And how am I to know you?"

She pointed to the golden pin. A week later we met again at the Grand Opera ball. Her fascination grew; there was no need of any of the usual aids to conversation; ourselves and life were interesting enough. And at this parting she told me, of her own accord, where I might see her again. Of course, only behind the mask.

So we would meet, first here, then there, and spend the hours together until she drove home. I could take her to the carriage but no further; she had made me promise never to follow her beyond that. I used to wonder if she came for my sake. As for me, I know well enough that it was for her sake that I haunted those ballrooms. And soon I was to realise why I went so gladly.

I was in love—with a domino! Who was she? Was she of the world of society or only of its half? A wife? Or a maid? When I would ask her, or try for the answer on all manners of byways, she would only laugh with that sweet, bell-like laugh of hers, and ripple out the words:

"Chi lo sa?" ("Who can tell?")

And so I came to call her Madonna Chilosa.

There was nothing reckless about her conversation, nothing that was not delightful; yet she did not mind a witticism, now and then, that was a trifle bolder than the strictness of the drawing-room permits. But once when, in an unguarded moment, I pressed my lips to her hand for the faintest instant, she neither rapped me over the face with her fan nor flamed out into rage. She merely said, quite quietly, and almost pleadingly:

"Oh, don't do that, or I shall never come again."

And so I never repeated that moment. How it was that we escaped the perils of premature fencing with the weapons of flirtation remains a mystery to me; often as we might mention or discuss the thing called love, we yet allowed no application to ourselves. Sometimes I touched on subjects from the finer side of life; her answers puzzled me; short, oftimes happy and apt, she never would allow her remarks in these fields to take her far; it seemed as if she had culture, rather than the lack of it, to hide.

Don't think I did not try to see her face all this while! At the end of the very first ball I had asked her to unmask, but she only laughed, and fled. The same thing happened the second time. At the third, when we felt that we were good friends, that we could trust each other, she promised me that on the last night of the Carnival she would lift her mask for me—if I were good. If I were good? Of course I would be, under such a hope; and I stilled my curiosity as best I could, though at each meeting it grew like wildfire and with it another feeling.

Was she worth it all, this Mystery? Dared I hope that she deserved the love that leapt in me every time I saw her well-known domino-covered figure. Was she beautiful? Was she young? Or faded? Good? Or bad?

I was certain she was not ugly. And how could any woman be old with such a neck, such shoulders as those? Again, no schoolgirl could talk so cleverly, so intelligently, as she. What was the answer to the riddle? What would I learn when the mask capitulated. It seems absurd that a man who has seen the world with open eyes for more years than he cares to count, who has lived and loved, should have allowed a mask—a riddle—to disturb him so. But the fact remains that I thought of nothing else, dreamt of nothing else; and then there came one night when sleep never touched my eyes, and when I made the most foolish resolve, the maddest of plans for a solution of the mystery, the bringing it wholesale into my future.

And yet—one hardly likes to choose one's wife from behind a mask! One's wife! Yes, it had come to that; and I did not even know that she was not another's. Nothing—I knew of her absolutely nothing.

Yet the minute I was with Madonna Chilosa once more all doubt, all stress and strife in me was stilled; I chatted with her, looked into her eyes, listened to the music of her voice and felt myself happy.

And, then, too, there came to me the certainty that she was young and charming, and good and clever. But, an hour or so later, as I walked home through the chill night, doubt crawled gloomily back to me, and the old refrain, the old text for hesitation, awoke and would not die. "But if—but if——"

* * * * *

To him who waits come even the dying of the Carnival. It was the last night. We were together, she and I, in a dear little nook of the ballroom, a table between us and a bottle of Ruinart. It was the first since I had known her. Known her! I misuse the word; but it serves. Before this it had been nothing but ices, lemonades, and such-like trivialities. "It is for the last time!" had been my plea, and so she had smiled and said, "Very well, then; to say good-bye."

Was it a fancy of mine or was it really a tremour in her voice? I filled her glass and she lifted the veil of her mask a trifle, while my gaze went thirstily to her mouth.

"To-night, at last, I shall see your face," I said. My voice was almost choking with emotion. She laughed a little softly.

We talked of other things. We were both of us strangely moved; our words came more spasmodically; our silences were longer. Once, when my hand touched hers, she held mine for an instant. Only an instant, but I am sure there was a faint, sweet pressure.

Our glasses rang together.

"To the next hour's happiness!"

"Here's happiness—in this hour and all others!"

"And here's to you—you dear one, fair one!"

"Dear? Fair?"

"Oh, yes. I know—I know you are!"

"Chi lo sa!"

Of a sudden we were quiet. There in the hurly-burly of the Carnival's last feverish fire, ours was the only silent space. Every moment the rooms grew hotter, the people were uproarious. There was intoxication in the air.

"Tell me—do you love me?" This was the foolish way in which I broke our silence. "Why don't you answer? At least—at least you could—say no."

"Neither a yes nor a no would help you."

Still mystery and always mystery. But twelve o'clock came.

Twelve. Slow, sonorous—almost gruesome—coming into this whirl of folly, came the bells of the cathedral striking the hour.

"Twelve!" I cried.

"Yes," she said. "Ash Wednesday."

I took her hand. "You will keep your promise and unmask?"

"Yes, if you wish it."

Another moment she hesitated, then she began fingering the fastenings of her mask. The knot was obstinate. "You will have to help me," she said.

I stood up, my heart beating so that I thought I could hear it. This was no longer for me merely the solving of a ballroom riddle; it was the final chapter of an ever-growing, agonising passion, the romance of a life, that was now to die, or to flame up all the more fiercely, who could tell? A nameless dread came over me, a dread that was not yet fear, nor doubt. I was standing beside her, looking into her flashing eyes and listening to her voice as it laughed at me.

"You are so sure, so certain, that I am neither old nor ugly?"

"Ah," I said, "that would not be the worst; more, it would be the best possible cure for this tattoo my heart is beating."

"Ah, I am sorry, but I fear it is a cure I cannot offer."

"Do you know that I am tempted to leave the veil unlifted, you dear, veiled picture! Perhaps—perhaps it were the wiser way."

"Perhaps."

And suddenly there welled up in me the resolution to leave my unknown in her incognito, and the clearer my resolve grew the quieter the torment in my brain. To leave the dream a dream; to keep the tender memory of the mystery—that was the right, the real way! Who could tell? Perhaps all the magic charm that drew me to this fair, masked mystery might pass and perish on the instant that the veil was drawn aside. A single furrow here, a wrinkle there, might shatter all the sweet illusion. Should I, of my free will, remove this page from the thin volume of my happy moments?

I am just in time to prevent.

"No," I said, "I leave you the mask. Perhaps it is better for us both."

"In one way or another, surely," was all she said.

I had filled the glasses again, and we drank to my sentiment:

"To our meeting again, somewhere, somehow, by some good chance. May it come to pass, and happily!"

"It may be! Chi lo sa!" And she emptied the glass.

As she drank her eyes shimmered as with a mist. Lifting the veil of the mask, she showed the fair redness of her mouth; and as I watched there came that battle in my breast. Then, in another instant I had won the battle. I was calmness itself.

A few moments we lingered together, thinking of the weeks that were now ended, and noting the crowd of people that surged about us.

Without a word we rose to go. It was the end. With the knowing care of a husband I helped her into her cloak and accompanied her to her carriage. There was a last pressure of the hands, a last hesitation. I felt, somehow, that she was debating whether there was not yet something she would do or say at the last as a farewell; then she got in, and the wheels went swiftly over the street.

Gone! Gone!

I went home slowly, alone. The damp breeze of spring cooled my brow. The streets were crowded with masqueraders—loud, song-singing, wild-walking. What would be their portion from the Carnival? Dull heads and empty pockets, much wasted time and energy and feeling.

Whereas my portion——

* * * * *

Ah well, Ash Wednesday is come again, another carnival is come and gone. But what a different carnival from that over yonder. This time I was as happy as a lover who has no doubts, no fears of conscience, no jealousy. What I had loved so well was gone, was naught save mist—a mist, a mask. Can one have heart-ache for a phantom?

Why are we not wise enough to keep all our illusions in this wise?

And yet, and yet, deep down beneath it all, serving as seed for all this calm, this peace, this happiness, was there not the hope, the dream, the fancy, that some day, from the whirlpool of life, a pair of dear, familiar eyes might yet gaze upon me, and all this vague love for a masquerader blossom forth to a real, tangible, lifelong happiness?

Chi lo sa!

* * * * * *

Heigho! Was it months ago, or years, that I wrote that chronicle of two carnivals? I can remember the vivid glow of my hope as if it were all in the immediate yesterday. Hope! How would we live without it? And yet do the sweet longings that we surname hope give quite the complement of happiness that lies in fulfilment?

As I write, a roguish whisper brushes past my ear, a whisper that says: "Chi lo sa!"

And I take the whisperer and kiss away those roguish taunts, and wonder aloud how she ever found it in her heart to hide that sweetness from me for so long. No mask but kisses ever should have covered that face! Dear face! When it was masked it was a thousand torments—a text for battling hopes and fears. And now, now that it is fair before me always; now that it is mine for all time, how yet more wonderful in variety is it; what infinitely sweet shades of tenderness it shows, what——

Again a roguish person tells me I am writing foolishness. She hints that men tire easily; she shrugs her pretty shoulders, she begins to say once more: "Chi lo sa," but I am just in time to prevent. For a kiss is always in time.

The Last Battle of the World.

By Percy Hart, in the Illustrated American, with Introductory and Incidental Remarks by Levin Carnac.

The Author looks into the near future and sees Uncle Sam officiating as Deputy Providence of the Planet—The Banded Nations of the Old World wait till he gives the signal for mutual annihilation—General smash—What Uncle Sam does with the pieces.

Although this really remarkable conception is put in the favourite and perhaps inevitable form of prophetic fiction, it is still something more than fiction, because it is a definite and pertinent expression of that sentiment which now appears to be the salient note of American policy. The United States, with the easy confidence and perhaps pardonably bombastic assurance of intelligent and lusty youth, seems to be fired with the gorgeous if unattainable ambition of playing the part of Deputy Providence of the Planet Terra, of arbitrator between the nations before they go to war, and of referee and final umpire of the death-grapple itself.

It is hardly to be expected that the intoxication of this enthusiasm should leave the American mind cool enough for a dispassionate study of the histories of nations which had risen to the dizzy heights of imperial glory, and plunged down to ruin through the fiery maelstrom of war, uncounted centuries before the Bird of Freedom startled the world with its first vociferation: while Atlantis was yet a dream and the Sunday newspaper a glory of the undawned.

It might, however, be reasonably expected that the American intellect should be cognisant of the history of the last couple of years. During that period the would-be Arbiter of the Nations and Deputy-Providential Peace-Preserver has thrice deliberately endangered the peace of the world, and once—to the eternal shame of those who profess to be its rulers—destroyed, perhaps for ever, the brightest prospect that human eyes have yet seen of ranging all the forces of the dominant race of earth under the banners of peace, progress, and civilisation. So much for the facts; the fiction is as follows:

It is the year nineteen hundred and something—the date, as usual, is left conveniently open—the whole world, saving the United States, has gradually ranged itself under two leaderships—that of Great Britain and that of Russia. The United States has preserved absolute neutrality and kept her counsels with such skill that the wiliest diplomatists of Europe "knew not on which side the impenetrable heart of Columbia lay." No details are given of the methods taken to gag the Press and throttle the stump-orators in and outside of the Representative Chambers, but of course this must have been accomplished somehow.

At length the United States Government modestly offers its services as general umpire and arbiter of the destinies of the world. Curiously enough the nations read but heeded not, as thus: "The roar of war-like preparations rolled through every land.... The very earth trembled with the thunder of big guns at the testing grounds.... The beasts of the fields huddled in corners and shuddered as before a coming storm.... At last the gauntlet was flung and the official declaration of war went forth...."

At this solemn juncture, the Bird of Freedom flapped up on to the fence once more and delivered its final message to the nations shuddering on the brink of mutual destruction. It was distinctly the most amazing message that even such an astonishing fowl could have crowed out. It was nothing less than a suggestion that the two hostile fleets into which the sea-forces of the Old World were divided, should mobilise themselves, one off Bordeaux and the other off Nova Scotia, each watched by a squadron of the United States Navy—one part of which, by a quite phenomenal stretch of journalistic imagination, the writer has somehow got across the Atlantic without the battleships sinking or turning turtle—to perform the office of Derby-course policeman and starter.

The signal being simultaneously given, naturally, by the firing of an American gun, the fleets were to start, steam into the middle of the Atlantic and there batter each other to pieces—of course always under the supervision of the American squadrons.

Here comes what is perhaps the most astounding part of the story. The allied nations, instead of telling the self-appointed world-policeman to mind his own business and scattering his toy squadrons in splinters over the face of the waters, actually accepted his suggestion and, in forgetfulness of all the lessons of war, and in defiance of all the principles of naval tactics, permitted themselves to be ranged up on either side of the Atlantic like a couple of football teams at either end of the field, and awaited the Bird of Freedom's signal to kick off. The awaited crow came in the shape of the simultaneous bangs of two eight-inch guns which the presumably blank cartridges do not seem to have burst.

But this is enough—and more than enough—of introduction. It is time that I stepped aside and allowed Mr. Percy Hart to tell the rest of the story in his own soul-shaking words. I regret to say that several S.S. and P.W. artists have succumbed to brain-fever in a gallant effort to do justice to the double-page illustration which adorns the story, "painted by Walter Russell from detailed suggestions given by leading United States naval officers."

The Nations Get Ready.

Every war-vessel—no matter how antiquated—in the possession of the nations involved was called into service, from the huge, fortress-like battleships of the present day down to the old, scarred frigates, veterans of many wars, tranquilly dozing away their last days of usefulness as receiving or training ships, in calm, sleepy harbours, and now to be rudely awakened from their slumbers, caulked, re-armoured, fitted with new engines and modern guns, and steered lumberingly out to sea to buffet once more the billows of the main.

The fastest ocean-going steamships going were confiscated to the uses of war and fitted with rapid-firing guns.

Sea-going tugboats were adapted to the torpedo and other services, and private steam-yachts of exceptional speed were subsidised as dispatch boats.

Only the most useless old hulks were sent to the foreign stations in place of the ships withdrawn, and the most antiquated commanders and worthless officers and men appointed to them.

Nevertheless, curses loud and deep arose from cabin, wardroom and forecastle of each old naval relic as her people realised that they would miss the glorious fray in mid-Atlantic.

In order to complete these tremendous preparations in the quickest possible time, the mechanicians of all the conflicting nations were pressed into service, and the dockyards of the world became huge hives of industry, in which no distinction was made between day and night; and in the glare of the great electric lights the huge trip-hammers only paused in their thunderous blows to allow their heated parts to cool.

Innumerable private shipyards were subsidised by the various governments; and factory buildings and even private dwelling houses were hastily adapted for the manufacture of materials.

Every industry known to man was brought into requisition in fitting out the fleets; coal was in such demand that few private families could afford to use it, and the prices of all other commodities rose in proportion.

The Gagged Press Adopts Yankee Methods.

For some time the world's newspapers contained scarcely anything but comparisons of the respective fleets and detailed accounts of the fighting qualities of the different vessels; but in due course such publication was officially suppressed, and the editors were obliged to satisfy their readers by sensational and purely imaginary articles on the subject.

Yet, owing to the well-organised spy system maintained, each government was informed of every important step taken by the others, and was thus enabled to meet it.

Inventors of all kinds of offensive and defensive war material came forward and offered their plans and services to their respective governments; models of every conceivable description were sent in, from indestructible warships to cork legs.

Public-spirited capitalists poured their wealth into the national coffers.

Vessels and guns were planned, made and tested in a small fraction of the time that would have been thus consumed ordinarily.

Ammunition was manufactured and stored in such enormous quantities that scientists gave warning of the terrific atmospheric results and possible danger to the world itself in case of certain accidents.

Speculators tore their hair in wild uncertainty, and stock exchanges became pandemoniums of raving Bedlamites.

In order to fully man the fleets, the bulk of the immense standing armies of the nations were put into naval uniforms and assigned in due proportions to the different vessels; marines became bluejackets and soldiers became marines, artillerymen being especially in demand.

Officers of high rank in the armies eagerly sought for positions in the navies.

The forces were still further supplemented by conscription among the civilian classes, including residents abroad, who were at once summoned home.

This gave rise to numberless complications, and the few consuls who had not been recalled were driven to the verge of lunacy, while the legal profession rubbed its hands and laughed in glee.

Sailing ships rotted at the wharves for want of crews to man them; fish became scarce and dear, because there were no fishermen—for no conscripts were so prized as the sturdy fisher-lads of England, France, and the North Countries, who left their wives and children to handle the boats and trawls while they donned the cutlass belt, and drilled at the big guns, learning the meaning of the division officer's orders: "Cast loose and provide!" or "Boarders away!"

Maimed old veterans in naval hospitals straightened their rheumatic backs, drew plans in the dust and cackled of how it should be done.

Children just able to toddle procured wooden weapons and fought instead of playing.

Mothers with babes in arms crooned war-songs half unconsciously, and wept, while they crooned, for the husband or son so soon to go.

Sisters, sweethearts and wives in every land listened, with heavy hearts, blind with tears, to the glowing words of their loved ones, bade them go and be true to the flag, and did their duty as only brave women can in times like these.

And all this for what? Ah, who could predict the sublime, awful climax that came all-unforeseen?

Bulls and Bears.

In accordance with the arrangement, one squadron of the American navy proceeded to Bordeaux, France, and another to Halifax, Nova Scotia.

At the former port what was known as the "Bear Alliance" fleet was to rendezvous, each ship flying her national flag, emblazoned with the Russian Bear; while at the latter port were to gather the vessels of the "Lion Alliance," their colours similarly adorned with the emblem of the British Lion.

The magnitude of these two fleets was almost beyond comprehension; in comparison with them the fabled aggregations of ancient war-galleys or the Spanish Armada sink into insignificance.

Digitized by Google

The fleets had annihilated each other.

At the time it was impossible to count or even estimate approximately the number of vessels which assembled at each port. There were miles of them—hundreds—yes, thousands of them!

The noise of the sailors' steps assembling for inspection at certain hours, the continuous piping of whistles and ringing of bugles, the words of command, the rattle of marines' rifle-butts on deck, the creaking of davits as boats were lowered and raised, and, above all, the simultaneous striking of bells every half-hour, created an accumulation of sound that was simply appalling.

Mountains of coal lined each shore for miles and melted away like snow in summer. The health authorities of each port were compelled to exert every effort in their power to prevent an epidemic arising from the quantities of refuse thrown overboard. The cavalry and other troops of Canada and France which had not been transferred to the navies were summoned in haste to do police duty in controlling the crowds of sailors ashore and the hordes of adventurers and harpies who throng every naval station and make poor Jack their prey.

Within the harbours the older, less effective men-of-war and the subsidised merchant steamers were moored closely together. Outside in the open roads lay the armoured and protected cruisers at anchor.

Out beyond these, and of necessity in deep water, lay the great battleships, retaining their positions by means of their propellers, while in and out among the ships darted launches, cutters and gigs like gigantic water-bugs. Hours before the time appointed for starting, the different squadrons were manœuvring for positions; but at last the two mighty fleets lay at exactly ten nautical miles out at sea from the mouths of the respective harbours, in line of battle according to rating—the fast cruisers, gunboats, and torpedo-boats forming the advance guard and skirmish line ahead of the big battleships, while astern of these lay the mercantile auxiliaries and less serviceable warships.

Astern of each fleet hovered and raced the swift dispatch boats, armed with rapid-firing guns, under orders from their respective admirals commanding to prevent any non-combatant vessels from accompanying the war-vessels, under penalty of being fired upon should they persist in doing so—an order which called down anything but blessings upon the admirals' heads from the enraged Press representatives, and from certain enterprising individuals who had chartered steamers and sold excursion tickets at unheard of prices, which were eagerly bought by would-be spectators of the fray.

The perfectly adjusted chronometers on the flagships of the two American squadrons assigned for the duty of "seconds" in this terrible duel left no chance of uncertainty as to time; and as the appointed moment drew near a stalwart Yankee bluejacket, with chevrons on his sleeve, stood coolly on the deck of each, the lanyard of an 8-inch rifle gun in his brawny fist, awaiting the order to fire.

At last! The great guns simultaneously, though three thousand miles apart, boomed out the welcome signals, and with a roar of rushing water like that of Niagara, the sea was instantly turned into creamy foam for miles, as the stately fleets moved majestically forward, one toward the east and one toward the west.

From the hills behind them and the hosts of vessels clustered around the starting-points arose two mighty shouts like crashing thunder, which shook the very earth, as, with bands playing and colours flying, over five millions of human beings were taken out to sea; and amid the sobs of lonely women the last monster of war disappeared on the horizon.

THE COLD-DRAWN AGONY.

Then throughout every land a Sabbath-like stillness prevailed for days; there was little thought of work or play. The very savages in Africa wondered: for the whole world watched and prayed. Watched and prayed through a long, long month of wretched, miserable suspense—for no word came from the warships: the Atlantic billows rolled in to the shores, but told not what they had seen.

Men grew haggard and women pale, with an awful dread of they knew not what, and prayed aloud to the sun and the stars to tell what they knew.

Longer suspense could not be endured, and the two American squadrons were ordered to sea to reconnoitre, with orders not to interfere with or in any way impede the movements of the combatants.

The squadrons sailed, and met in mid-Atlantic; they separated, and cruised north, south, east and west over the broad expanse of ocean; but never a sign did they see to show that a battle had ever taken place.

Imagining that the tide of battle might have turned into a chase, ships were sent to cruise in every navigable ocean on the globe; from the Arctic to the Antarctic, through the Indian to the North and South Pacific, around Cape Horn and through the stormy China Sea and the calm inland Sea of Japan, they cruised and cruised.

And then, as the reports came in, one after another, from the remotest corners of the earth, always saying "Nothing found!" the world began slowly to realise, with sinking hearts and bated breath, that a thing had come to pass, the dread of which no man had dared to whisper: The fleets had annihilated each other!

Vainly the world waited, still hoping against hope, till, as the waves cast up on different shores fragments of splintered wood-work and sea-worn cabin trimmings, we were forced to comprehend that modern science had rendered warfare so mighty in its power, so accurate in its calculations and so deadly in its effects that the two enormous fleets had simply demonstrated a problem in regard to the meeting of two evenly matched, irresistible forces.

No man was left to tell how the fight was fought; there they lie, admiral, cabin-boy and all, and there they will lie, in sailors' graves, while the great waves sweep along and the storm-winds sing their requiem, till the sea gives up its dead!

None can say how the battle began; who fired the first shot and who the last, or what deeds of valour were done that day; how the great guns crashed and roared, and the rifles in the armoured tops poured down their leaden hail; how the blood dripped on the snow-white decks, and how the wounded screamed while the surgeons did their noble duty all in vain, or how the ships went down, one after another, with hideous roll and plunge.

How many went down, like the Birkenhead, with crews singing a death-song as they stood drawn up on deck?

How many sailors thought of home as they sank, how many cursed, and how many prayed?

What Farraguts, Perrys or Cushings were there in the fight, whose names will never go down on their country's roll of honour. Who can tell?

UNCLE SAM ASSUMES THE HALO.

But out of this a great peace has arisen. It is the peace of a world awakened by the vision of hell which it has seen.

Nerveless with horror and despair, the nations turned with one accord to the United States and besought her offices in mediating peace. Again the American Government recognised its opportunity and made its position serve for all humanity. It stipulated for the dismantling of all fortifications, and for the abolition of all great standing armies and navies. To this the world assented.

It was further agreed that the United States, as the one nation whose voice had been invariably against aggression, should be chosen as the police power of the world, and that its small but efficient navy should be authorised to prevent, by coercion, if need be, any nation from building another fleet of warships.

And thus the future prosperity, advancement and happiness of the whole world were hidden in the hands of a country that a little more than a century ago was fighting for its own independence.

Whether the end has justified the means—whether it were right that this mantle of peace and prosperity should have been woven amid the sobs of widows and orphans, desolated homes and broken hearts—it lies with our Government of the future to prove by its management of the great trust that lies in its charge.

And some day we shall know it all—when the sea gives up its dead!"

BUT NOT JUST YET.

Now that, of course, is all very pretty and poetical. The idea of Uncle Sam in a halo and white robe sitting on the fence and thrumming the harp of peace while the Bird of Freedom, perched on his shoulder, crows the hymn of universal brotherhood to the tune of the Star-Spangled Banner is a conception which few, if any, of the poets or painters of the effete Old World could have done justice to.

Unhappily, however, the practical mind of the brutal Saxon will, I fear, be prone to turn aside from its somewhat overwhelming glories to ask, not how peace came to the world, but what Uncle Sam did with the pieces after he had persuaded the other nations to obligingly sink each other's fleets in the middle of the Atlantic, and leave him in possession of the only efficient naval force in the world.

This isn't poetry, but what other kind of question could one, in all seriousness, ask with reference to a nation, which, a short time ago, did its best to plunge the Anglo-Saxon race into a fratricidal strife for the monopoly of an alleged gold-field in a little twopenny-halfpenny State run by swindlers and murderers, and which only the other day wiped its boots upon the tatters of the Anglo-American Arbitration Treaty and turned to cheer to the echo the utterances of a traitorous ex-convict when he mendaciously stated that the United States had whipped Great Britain three times, and that there would never be war between England and America because England never fought any nation that used Gatling guns.

It is not from a people which applauds or even tolerates such villainies as these that the nations can seriously hope to receive the olive-branch of universal peace.

The Snares of the Ungodly.

THE STORY OF A FLIRTATION.

"You are a very pretty woman, my dear, but you can scarcely expect all the world at your feet."

"Are you worried about Tom in this instance?" the beauty said lazily.

"Tom is a fool," Mrs. Black retorted. "Why don't you take fair game?"

"But he is so refreshing, that brother of yours. He actually believes in things. Fancy that!"

"Of course he does, Madge. He is young enough to treasure his illusions. Oh, don't spoil the world for him yet," she said half beseechingly.

The beauty stretched herself out in a big arm-chair and waved a fan indolently, stirring the wisps of hair that strayed about her temples.

"I wonder you asked him here to meet me," she said indifferently.

"I did not ask him; he came unexpectedly. He might better have jumped into the lion's mouth!"

"Thanks, my dear. It's only a difference of beasts, as you say. My method of devouring is, possibly, more leisurely," she said, with a lazy drawl that was part of her fascination.

"Madge, you must marry; you need an establishment," Mrs. Black said abruptly.

The beauty said nothing, but sat down before the dressing-table and powdered her face and throat profusely, taking care that the puff should not brush against her wavy brown hair. She could see in the mirror that Mrs. Black was gazing at her intently, though her thoughts seemed to have gone beyond the range of her eyes.

Suddenly Mrs. Black exclaimed: "I've got him!"

"Got whom?" the beauty inquired.

"The very man for you. He's game that will require your best ammunition. Even then I'm a bit sceptical as to the result, but at least I'm giving you a chance to try."

"It sounds interesting, Grace: most difficult things are."

"He is a man of endless affairs with women, but somehow he always slips the leash at the last moment. At least he will amuse you, and his money is not the least of his attractions."

"Will he come here to stay?"

"I will ask him, for a week."

"I think I shall marry him, Grace," the beauty said complacently. "He will ask me at the end of the week, you see!"

"Your assurance is superb, my dear Madge."

"Of course. When one has not money one goes through the world on other things. Do you want to bet on your prodigy?"

"By all means, Madge. I frankly acknowledge that you hold trump cards, and I shall play into your hands, so the odds are decidedly in your favour, but I'll wager you don't land him high and dry in a week."

"Make it chocolates, and it's a go. Send for the victim while I arrange my bait; and I won't use Tom—not if I can help it," she added. "I'm going to take a nap and prepare for the fray. When shall we open the encounter, Grace?"

"At dinner. He arrived an hour ago while you were cycling with Tom, and I sent him off for a swim with Jack. You did not suppose I meant your visit to be deadly, did you?"

"I never suppose, Grace; it's such an exertion in hot weather. Au revoir then until dinner," and the beauty sauntered out of the room.

Mrs. Black did not call them house parties in her pretty villa by the sea, but the times were few when she had not charming women and several men staying with her. Madge was of a type she found useful, but irritating, and in this particular instance she was annoyed because, forsooth, Tom was head over heels in love with the beauty, and he was the one thing on earth Mrs. Black adored.

She thought, as her guest left the room, that she had been preparing for her a very pretty comedy. Griswold was a man no woman could marry, and she knew what she was talking about from experience. Not that anything would induce her to enter again the bonds of matrimony, but there had been a time when she had spread her net for him in vain. Madge could have her fling at him to no purpose, and Tom would be saved. The end justified the means. Mrs. Black congratulated herself upon her cleverness in bringing in so useful an element.

But two days after, fate took the game out of Mrs. Black's hands, sending Tom to Edinburgh and leaving Griswold to have things quite his own way. That he admired the beauty was a matter which brooked no conjecture. He seemed already absorbed in her in a manner that excluded his hostess, and for that she had not been prepared. All necessity of saving her brother from the snares of the ungodly having been for the moment removed, Mrs. Black was suddenly confronted by the fact that she objected to being set aside for any woman, even though she had deliberately planned the game Madge was playing so skilfully.

She took her cousin Jack into her confidence one evening while they strolled on the beach after dinner. Jack was dull, but observing, and the best of safety valves.

"You and Madge don't seem to hit it off exactly," he said.

"I hate her, Jack," the woman said fiercely. "Do you know why? She took Tom away from me—dear old Tom, who was like clay in her hands—and why? To feed her insatiable vanity. That's why I got Griswold down. I thought he would fill her to the brim and Tom would be disgusted. But the boy has gone off with the love of her in his heart and Griswold is bewitched beyond reason."

"I'll settle her game, old girl. Just leave it to me," Jack said consolingly. "Griswold is much too good for her." And a conspiracy having been formed between them, the two finished their walk in silence.

On the balcony the beauty was tilting back in the hammock, which she kept swaying by occasionally touching one tiny foot to the floor. She wore a pink mulle that rivalled a flower for very simplicity, but the experienced eye recognised that much thought had gone into the creation of so artless an effect. Her wavy hair was drawn into a loose coil on her neck, which gleamed white and soft in the light that fell from a lantern above her head. Griswold sat in a chair pulled close up beside her and leant over her with a caressing movement which was a way he had with women.

"Have we been awake or dreaming?" he was saying. "Life seems to me only to have begun since—can you think when?"

"Time is as nothing to me ever," she said. "It is only events for which I care."

"Am I an 'event,' you pretty primrose?"

"You?" she queried, lifting her eyebrows. "I don't think I had thought of you at all."

"Then it is cruel of you to say so after all these days together."

"Oh, forgive me," she said, with a pretty show of penitence. "I am brutally frank, I know."

"I like it," said the man seriously; "it's an uncommon trait in a woman. You are beautifully honest and honestly beautiful."

"Then you are not cross any more?" she said, slipping her hand into his with beguiling innocence.

"Kiss me," he said, bending his face down to hers.

But there was a sound of steps on the balcony, and the kiss floated off in the air as Griswold slipped into his chair, and two figures came round the corner.

Madge bit her lip with vexation, and the man was conscious of having gone pretty far.

He was thinking of it later when the women had gone off to bed and he was left to the solace of his pipe in the smoking-room. So many women had played havoc with his heart before! But she was not like the rest, and he wanted her—of that he was sure. But for always, his conscience questioned? Ah, there was the rub! To kiss and caress was one thing—to marry, another—and yet——

Two soft arms were round his neck, and a woman tilted his head against her breast.

"They spoilt our paradise," she whispered, "and I've stolen away to say good-night. Are you glad, my dearest of men?"

For answer he drew her down and held her.

"I love you beyond——"

"All other women?"

"You will marry me soon, you dainty primrose?"

"Perhaps," with a show of reluctance. "Good-night just once more. I am going before I am discovered," she said.

As she vanished through the doorway, Jack came in from a stroll which Griswold had refused to take with him.

"There's a suspicious odour of violets about you, old man," he said, sniffing the air; "and your pipe's gone black out. Any visiting angels hovering near?"

"Haven't seen any, Jack. Visitors aren't in my line."

"No, you stick to cold facts. There's one satisfactory thing about you, Griswold; you haven't any imagination."

"The world is so explanatory it leaves nothing to be imagined, Jack. Sit down and smoke a bit," he said, with an excess of sociability.

"Thanks. I will," sinking into a chair and lighting a cigarette. "It's beastly damp outside," he suggested, as if the weather crowded all other thoughts from his mind.

"Is it? Well, I'm much too lazy to get up an argument."

"Is your affair with the beauty so exhausting?"

"What do you mean?" the other said stiffly.

"That a rattling old pace sometimes lands one in a ditch, though by some miracle you've leapt all the treacherous places so far."

"Then I would not bother about me now," he said soothingly. "I may wear a charm round my neck."

"Goodness knows you need it with a woman like that!"

"Oh, come now, Jack, you're too melancholy! Liver gone off again?" he asked sympathetically.

"Liver be hanged! You're making a fool of yourself for the first time in your life. The woman's playing for you on a wager."

"It's a lie!"

"Take care, old man; friendship has its limit," Jack said warningly.

"Pity that did not occur to you before," sneeringly.

"I'd no idea you were so deeply involved. She's not worth a quarrel, old man—few women are; but when a man's off his head I realize he's not responsible."

"Then keep your beastly ideas to yourself. They're an insult to decency." And Griswold stalked out of the room.

It was nearly noon the next day when he awoke with a delirious feeling that something most unusual had been happening.

Was it love and not passion that was stirring within? He dressed with an eagerness that was not habitual, and wondered if the primrose had unfolded her petals. How exquisitely sweet she was! As he started from his room a paper slipped under the door for the first time attracted his attention. He stooped and picked it up—the writing was not familiar.

"Forgive me if I deceived you," it read. "Being proof against the fascinations of all women, but yourself beguiling the unwary, you were lawful prey. I really half loved you last night, and you did ask me to marry you. What other woman can say that?

"Grace thought she had the game in her hands. It was a harmless deception and threw her off the scent, for I'm going to marry her adorable brother, Tom. He believes in me, and as Grace herself said, I need an establishment. You could afford me, I suppose, if I wanted you, but I don't. Tom is charmingly young and tractable, and you—you love so many women.

"To be honest—which is a virtue I seldom indulge in—I happened to play my game more cleverly than Grace because I had so much at stake—Tom, and a bet to win. And as I hate to pay a bet, I always make a point of not losing. Ask Grace, and tell her I stipulated for chocolates!

"So you can fancy me already en route for Edinburgh, where Tom is counting the hours in the most approved lover-like fashion, and I am counting many things besides. You and Grace and that horrid cousin Jack are an amusing trio——"

"And I called her a 'primrose'" he said, as he tore the note into fragments.

A BROKEN MASK

BY JOAN BARRETT.

SUMMARY.

The story opens with an introduction to the inmates of two farm-houses in an English village named Thorneydene. Honeypots Farm has recently been taken by a young stranger, John Gillway, about whom there seems to be a mystery.

His neighbour, Farmer Strange, is a widower with twin daughters, Diana and Kitty, who have been brought up for the most part by a wealthy aunt, Mrs. Caffyn, who is about to take them on the Continent.

Gillway has already fallen in love with Kitty, who was at first pleased by his attentions. She soon wearied of them, but being half afraid of him, makes many promises of fidelity before going abroad with her sister and aunt, which she never intends to keep.

At Capri they meet with Bernard Eliot, nicknamed "the Nabob" on account of his wealth. He speedily wins the affections of all three ladies, but seems to prefer Di's society.

At the end of three months they return to London, and as the two girls have now attained their majority they are given the option of remaining with their aunt or returning to their father for good. Kitty chooses the former and Di the latter.

Henceforth Diana devotes herself to the management of her father's house and dairy. She meets Gillway, and hears for the first time of the relations which had existed between him and Kitty. Soon after, the Stranges are surprised by the arrival of Kitty and the Nabob, who explain that they were married that morning, and have come to spend their honeymoon at Greyhouse Farm!

"The Nabob" is delighted with the simple home life of the farm, and shows no inclination to depart. Kitty, however, soon begins to pine for excitement and gaiety, and in consideration of her health her husband, very much against his will, rents "The Towers," a beautiful country seat, a few miles from Thorneydene. Kitty's spirits brighten rapidly at the prospect of entertaining the élite of the neighbourhood in one of the finest houses in the county.

CHAPTER VIII.

What Happened during the Skating Party.

The trees were all naked, and the wind, as it hustled their dead children away, seemed to be forcing them to dance to its shrill, cruel music. The snow lay in broken patches over meadows and green hills where the hungry rooks were cawing and wheeling, and the smaller birds twittered plaintively to each other in the hedgerows about the paucity of berries and the hardships of winter. A grey sky, whose clouds foretold more snow, frowned angrily down upon the wintry world.

"The Towers is full of guests," said John Gillway, looking at Di's pure, pale profile as she hurried along by his side, with her hands tucked into her muff, and her head a little lowered. "Are you going there for Christmas?"

"Yes. I didn't want to go. Dad won't accept, and I don't like to leave him all alone. It seems unfeeling."

"I don't suppose he minds," said Gillway thoughtlessly, and the hot colour rushed into Di's cheeks as she cried:

"Mind! Of course he minds! Dad and I are all in all to each other, and I wouldn't leave him if Bernard had not seemed so hurt and sorry at our refusal."

"And Kitty—wasn't she hurt and sorry, too?"

Di glanced up quickly, catching the irony in Gillway's tones. The flush grew deeper in her face.

"Yes, she was sorry," she answered, her anger melting away as she looked at Gillway's shabbily clad figure and careworn, haggard features.

"I have heard that nearly all the county families have accepted invitations for the ball, and that Mrs. Caffyn is going to bring a large party of swell friends from London. Your aunt must know a great many rich people?"

Di nodded, and wondered why John Gillway was taking so keen an interest in the Towers gaieties.

"Are many of them going to stay long?" he asked.

"I don't know. Kitty told me that the house would be packed for New Year's Day."

Gillway appeared to be reflecting as he walked with his eyes fixed upon the ground.

"Shall you be there for New Year's Day?"

"No; I am only going for the ball. My wardrobe is not big enough to provide me with sufficient frocks for a fort-night's visit—not large enough for a week even. Kitty was rejoicing because she had a new gown for every day, and her jewels have come from the bankers. She had not seen them since Bernard gave them to her for wedding gifts, so it is just like being given presents all over again."

"Has she much jewellery?"

"A great deal."

"Eliot is a lucky fellow," said Gillway with bitterness. "Unlimited riches and a lovely young wife! I expect Kitty will be able to make a finer show of precious stones than old Lady Rivers"—he paused, suddenly aware that Di was looking at him in surprise. "I've heard of her famous tiara," he added. "My housekeeper, Mrs. Shales, is my authority. According to her, the emeralds in her ladyship's 'crown' are as big as 'reddishes.'"

Di laughed.

"Oh, they are large," said she. "I don't know if Kitty will dare to compete with Lady Rivers. She will have a chance, because the famous tiara will be on view. Lady Rivers has accepted for a week, I know."

"I wish," Gillway said, plunging his hands into the pockets of his rough ulster, "that I had a few of those green 'reddishes' in my possession, or the sum of money that they are worth. Everything is going wrong with me just now. I am beginning to realise that a man must be a genius to make farming pay."

Di echoed his sigh. Things were very much in the same condition at Greyhouse, and she knew that in spite of her economies, and Betty's excellent management, Farmer Strange would have a hard struggle to pay his Christmas bills.

"Well," said Gillway after a pause, "no reasonable man can expect to become rich by honest means. Everybody knows that thieves and rogues prosper, while honest men starve or worry themselves into early graves. To call a man an honest fellow is to call him a fool."

"I'd rather be an honest fool," said Di, in her clear, fearless tones, "than a wealthy knave. I don't believe you are right. Roguery can't always pay. It doesn't, I'm sure it can't, and it's good to feel that you can hold your head up, and meet everybody's eyes, and never feel ashamed to accept a proffered hand! A rogue must live in constant fear of being discovered."

"That doesn't trouble him," Gillway declared. "Your genuine rogue doesn't care a rap for his victim's opinion. To take all he can and to keep all he gets is his sole concern. And he's right. Might is valued before all your old-fashioned virtuous theories, and strength is more respected than good principle. A clever, wicked person will have a hundred admirers and imitators where your stupid, good fool has ninety-nine to despise him, and to take advantage of his weakness."

Di was silent. Her face had grown so grave that Gillway smiled, and asked:

"Do you think I am a very bad person to have such theories, Miss Strange?"

Di turned her head and looked steadily into the man's dark eyes. They were smiling, and his lips had parted.

"I don't believe you are bad," she answered seriously. "Only I'm sorry you think like that. I wish you didn't. It seems to me that having good thoughts makes one more contented with one's position, and helps one to buffet with troubles when they come." Her voice changed from grave to gay. "Here's daddy!" she cried joyfully. "I do hope he has sold his barley."

Farmer Strange, on his way home from market, drew in his old grey cob, and flourished his hand to Di and Gillway.

"Barley's sold!" he shouted. "I looked for you at market, Gillway, you'd have got rid of your hay if you'd took my advice and sent it in. Why didn't you?"

"Too much trouble," answered Gillway. "And not enough profit."

"Mustn't expect much profit nowadays, my lad. Come up to the house and have a cup of tea with us."

Gillway hesitated, looking at Di. She was following her father's vanishing figure with loving eyes.

"Shall I come?" Gillway asked gruffly.

"Yes, do," she answered, still watching her father's upright form.

"I don't think I will," he said. "Tell your father that I hope he'll look in upon me to-morrow. Good-afternoon."

An expression of pain crept round Di's lips, and her eyes grew darker.

"Good-bye," she said, with quiet pride; but he had seen the twitching of her beautiful, strong mouth, and felt savagely glad, and yet remorseful, because he owned the power to hurt her.

Di went to The Towers upon Christmas Eve. The Nabob drove over for her, leaving Kitty with her visitors. It had frozen hard for several days, and the skating was exceptionally good upon the ponds in the great park that stretched around The Towers. For the rich, this white, hard winter was delightful; but to the poor, shivering by scanty fires or under thin blankets, the frost and snow and the keen icy wind were cruel and dreaded elements.

"It's going to be a jolly old-fashioned Christmas, Di," said the Nabob joyously. He had tucked Di in well with the costly fur rug, and he had brought a sable-lined cloak of Kitty's for her. She was wrapped up like a helpless baby, and almost unable to stir. She nodded, smiling happily into his gay face.

"I do wish you had come in time to help with the decorations! They're a treat. Heaps of holly and ivy and mistletoe everywhere. I say, it does seem a shame that the old dad's left behind! I shan't half enjoy our festivities for thinking of him all alone, poor old chap! Have you got a pretty ball-gown in that box, Di?"

"I think it is pretty."

"What colour? White, I hope. I always admired you in white in the old days, at Capri, you know."

"It is white," said Di, wishing that her gown had been of any other colour.

The Nabob bent his handsome head, and a tender light shone in his eyes. But Di did not observe it.

"Thank you," said he very softly.

Di turned her face full upon him. There was keen surprise in her clear look.

"For what?" she asked. "Oh—you mustn't think that I remembered that you liked me in white! I didn't. I had quite forgotten it."

"You needn't have told me that you'd forgotten it. Serves me right! I'm a fool!" the Nabob said. He cut the horse sharply with the whip, and Di, in wide-eyed amazement, tried to think what there had been in her words to make him so suddenly angry.

"I didn't even know that you did like me in white," said she.

"Oh, you needn't rub it in. Confound that horse! He wants a bit of the devil taken out of him. Ugh! You beast!" There was silence for a few moments as they spun through the clear frosty air; the ground ringing beneath the horse's feet. "Seen Gillway lately?"

"He comes sometimes to see dad," answered Di a little stiffly.

"And sometimes to see you, eh? and now and then you meet him in the fields. You see I know a great deal of your behaviour, Di."

He spoke laughingly, but Di was not in the mood for swift changes. Her lips kept their grave compression.

"That's a fellow that I never can make out. Kitty and he are the greatest friends in the world, you know. He's always at the house. He made himself quite invaluable at hammering up festoons and wreaths yesterday. I wanted him to come to the ball to-night. He wouldn't, though I told him that you were going to stay until Boxing Day."

"I don't quite see why you held out my arrival as a bait to induce Mr. Gillway to come to your ball," said Di. Her nostrils were quivering, and she held her head very high

She had not known that Gillway was a constant visitor at The Towers; had not known that he had met Kitty. Why had he kept silence about the matter? She grew troubled.

"Don't you? Fie, Di! How fierce you are looking—Christmas Eve, too—when everybody is supposed to feel so Christian-like and amiable towards his or her neighbour. I'm afraid you've a bad temper. Let me see," said the Nabob in his pleasantest voice. "What news have I to tell you? Oh, Lady Rivers has arrived, and she's brought a jolly big party with her of ten ladies—poor Kitty was in an awful state of mind when she saw them land in. Kitty has not a decided preference for the society of her sex, a bad little woman! The Joneses have come, and the Duckletts, and Mrs. Caffyn has brought six friends, so you'll meet some old faces again. She's looking wonderfully well—quite young. What a kind-hearted soul she is! She brought Kitty a set of old jewels—diamonds and moonstones, I think Kitty said. She's coming out in 'em to-night."

Di knew the jewels well. They were very valuable and had belonged to her mother's grandmother. Clearly Mrs. Caffyn had decided that Kitty's marriage had turned out well.

"I am glad Kitty has them," said Di. "What a splendid Christmas box!"

The Nabob laughed and shrugged his shoulders.

"Splendid?" he repeated in a questioning tone. "That depends very much upon one's own ideas about splendour. I don't suppose these things are very valuable, you know. It is the kind action that makes them so appreciated."

"Oh, but they are worth a lot of money!" exclaimed Di very earnestly. "Aunt told me that they would fetch two thousand pounds now—old jewellery is greatly in demand, you know."

"Indeed!" the Nabob said with a careless inflection in his tones. And Di suddenly remembered that to a man of his vast wealth two thousand pounds would not seem the large sum that it appeared to her. "I do wish the old dad had come!" he said abruptly, as the dog-cart entered the park gates. "You would have stayed longer if he'd been with you."

"He doesn't get on well with Aunt Caffyn—and with strangers."

"I get on capitally with him!"

"Ah, but you get on well with everybody," said Di with such sincerity in her voice that the Nabob glanced at her and smiled.

Kitty was waiting to receive her sister. She looked prettier than ever in a gown of soft trailing velvet with a lot of old yellow lace about it. She kissed Di warmly, and seemed delighted to see her again. They had not met for several weeks.

"Bernie is so vexed because dad wouldn't come," said she to Di, as she took her to Mrs. Caffyn's room. "He thinks it is all my fault. I don't mind admitting that I did hint to the dear old thing that he'd better refuse, because you know, Di, how dreadfully out of place and awkward he would feel. Why, he can't eat properly. I often pity you, darling, though, of course, you are not nearly so sensitive as I am in such matters, or you could never live with him. I think I was right not to let him come, don't you?"

"I'm sure you were. Daddy never once thought of accepting. He feels that your friends can never be his."

"I do wish Bernie would see it in the same light," said Kitty with a deep sigh. "But he can't somehow. He says that it doesn't matter a pin about people's behaviour if the people love you, and he thinks I'm an undutiful daughter. I know he does! But he's the dearest boy in the world; so good to me, you can't think, and sometimes when I feel depressed I'm enough to try the patience of a saint. Bernie never gets cross with me. I really think we love each other more than ever, Di!"

"I am so glad! Marriages ought to be like that, Kitty—all marriages—to be really happy ones."

"Oh, ours is an ideal state of things!" said Kitty. "This is auntie's room. I won't come in. I'll leave you to have a long chat together, and I'll send tea up to you. Then you needn't come down before dinner. Oh, Di!" she exclaimed, throwing her arms round Di's neck. "I could cry with joy at seeing you, dear!"

There was pain in her voice. Di thrilled with sudden apprehension, and looked steadily into her sister's face. Tears were standing upon Kitty's long eyelashes, and her lips quivered.

"Happiness ought not to sadden you," said Di very tenderly. "Is it joy, Kitty?"

"Yes, yes!" Kitty cried, releasing Di with an abrupt kiss. "I always was a silly little goose, wasn't I, Di? Never strong like you, dear. When I'm not laughing I'm crying. I never had any self-control—never! Auntie asked me to send you to her as soon as you came. I shall see you before long, dear."

Di's face was grave as she watched Kitty flit down the broad staircase. The shadow still rested in her eyes when she entered Mrs. Caffyn's room.

"This is quite like old times," said Mrs. Caffyn when they had kissed each other, and Di had removed her outdoor garments.

"What a splendid girl you've grown, Di! Your figure is regal, I declare! I wish Kitty looked as strong as you."

"Kitty looks very well, auntie."

"I don't think she does! She seems overwrought, hysterical—cried when she met me—and can't speak two words unless it is to praise Bernard. Are they happy together, Di? I never could trust Kitty—she is too weak to speak the truth when it is disagreeable—but you are cast in another mould. Tell me!"

"They are very happy. Bernard is devoted to her."

"I know. But Kitty, is she devoted to him?"

"I—I think so. She always speaks lovingly of him,"

"Then why is that great farming man—I don't remember his name, but you know who I mean—why is he eternally after her? Yesterday, they were together all the afternoon. Bernard should remonstrate with Kitty. I don't like it."

"Farming man!" repeated Di feebly, and it seemed to her that a knife had entered her heart.

"Yes, a great, tall, dark man, who looks as though he could snap at everybody. He brought a heap of holly for the decorations. Anyone can see that he is in love with Kitty, and she encourages him. How pale you are, child. The room is too warm, perhaps. Open the door."

Di gulped down something that had risen in her throat.

"I don't feel hot," she said steadily. "Oh, Auntie, what a lovely bracelet!"

Her eyes had fallen upon an open jewel-case. A flashing circlet of green stones laid upon a white plush bed.

"I am glad you like it. I brought it for you, Di. It's my Christmas gift to you. Let me put it on your wrist!"

"It seems too costly for me," said Di, bending to kiss Mrs. Caffyn. Her lips felt stiff; she wondered if they would seem hard and cold to her aunt.

"Not a bit too costly! I intended to give it to you if you had stayed with me. Do you know, I was never so surprised in all my life as I was when Bernard told me that he loved Kitty. I thought he wanted you."

Di laughed, fumbling nervously with the bracelet clasp.

"The proof that I was mistaken was that he married Kitty without a farthing," said Mrs. Caffyn, "and he told me that he had settled fifty thousand pounds upon her! I suppose," she added hesitatingly, "you saw that he loved Kitty?"

"Yes," answered Di, and the falsehood fell easily from her lips.

She wore her bracelet down to dinner, and at the ball that followed. As she was dancing with the Nabob his eyes fell upon it.

"By Jove, Di!" he exclaimed. "You have got a stunning bracelet!"

"Aunt gave it to me—it is my Christmas box."

"I wish she'd given you something else!" he said in a grumbling tone. "I don't mind telling you now. I bought one for you, and its stones are emeralds, too! Let me see if my bracelet is as pretty as hers."

He drew her into the conservatory. It was quite deserted.

"I—I can't take a—a bracelet!" Di stammered as the Nabob drew out a leather case from his pocket. Her refusal sounded childish in her own ears. "It sounds ungrateful," she added desperately, "and unkind, but, indeed, I'd rather not take it."

"Oh, why not?" he asked coldly, fixing his eyes upon her face, and as she remained silent and embarrassed, he added: "Surely there can be no harm in my offering my wife's sister a trifling present. Why, when I was married I had to give brooches to every one of Kitty's bridesmaids, the confoundedest ugliest girls I've ever seen—four of 'em, too!"

"I don't see what that has to do with your offering me a present."

"I wanted to show you that there was nothing extraordinary in it, that's all. Let me see how it looks on, Di," he said, and took her pretty gloved arm. "Don't refuse it. Did I ever set up my back at one kind, sisterly action of yours when I was at the farm? You know I didn't. It will be unkind to refuse me this pleasure, Di."

"I wish——" Di began. The Nabob fastened the bracelet upon her wrist, holding it out beneath the light that fell from a hanging lamp. The great emeralds flashed and glittered like green fires. In spite of that strange shrinking from accepting the trinket, a faint cry of admiration fell from her lips.

The Nabob fastened the bracelet upon her wrist.

"It's a bigger one than Mrs. Caffyn's," said the Nabob with boyish exultation. "And I'm glad it is! I wanted to give you the best present you'd ever had, Di! I shall never forget how good you were to Kitty and me, when we were with you, you dear old girl!"

Further words of refusal died upon Di's lips. The brotherly affection in the Nabob's eyes was unmistakable. She felt ashamed of her hesitation and lack of generosity.

"It is too beautiful, Bernard," she stammered. "Just think—I shall never have an opportunity of wearing it, unless it is when I am visiting you."

He was still holding her arm. Suddenly he dropped it with a low exclamation, and Di, following the direction of his eyes, saw a face pressed against the glass. She started, and became as white as her dress.

"It's Gillway!" cried the Nabob. He hurried to the door, and, opening it, called Gillway's name several times. A rush of cold air entered the conservatory, and a few dead leaves, but the sole answer was the moaning complaint of a shrill wind.

Closing the door, the Nabob returned to Di, looking at her with suspicious surprise in his frank face.

"What a rum chap!" he exclaimed. "What could make him bolt like that? Anyone would think that he was anxious not to be seen."

"Perhaps it was not he," said Di.

"Oh, yes, it was. By George! if I thought he was after—— No—it's impossible! Let me take you back to the ballroom, Di. I must see Kitty—I mean I am engaged to her for the next dance."

They returned to the ballroom, making the tour of the big room. Kitty was sitting with Mrs. Caffyn. She smiled lovingly at her husband as he approached her. Di glanced from Kitty's pretty smiling face to the Nabob's stern, cold features. He looked angry and jealous, Di thought.

"Bernie," said Kitty, "what have you been saying to Lady Rivers about a skating party by torch-light?"

The Nabob passed one hand over his face as though he knew that he looked disturbed and was anxious to conceal his emotion from Kitty.

"Oh, nothing," he answered lightly, and now he smiled, looking his own, gay, pleasant self again. "She thought it would be fun, so I said I'd think about it. What do you say, Kitty? Would it be a bother, or would you like it?"

"It would be lovely," cried Kitty, clasping her hands. "Delightful! We ought to have it as soon as possible, in case this delicious weather changes."

"To-morrow, if you like—Christmas Day."

"Do!" said Mrs. Caffyn. "It is a charming idea of yours, Bernard."

"You mustn't give praise where it isn't due. Lady Rivers is responsible for the suggestion."

"Why, she said you proposed it, Bernie!" exclaimed Kitty.

"Oh, that's her modest way of putting things," said the Nabob. "I thought from her anxiety to get up the party that she'd got a new set of furs she was anxious to show off. There she is. Excuse me, Kitty. I'll tell her that it is settled for to-morrow night—half-past nine, eh?"

The ball did not break up until long after the Christmas bells had announced to the listening white world that Christmas Day had dawned. Di could not sleep when she was alone in her room. She was tormented with thoughts of John Gillway and Kitty.

Had Gillway prowled about the grounds in the hope of meeting Kitty? And did the Nabob suspect? Di shivered, thinking of the jealous light in the Nabob's face when he had hunted in the ballroom for Kitty.

In spite of his light disposition, there was a deal of latent strength in the lower part of the young man's face. He would be a match for Gillway in physical courage if they met—and here Di's terror and anxiety and the throbbing pain at her heart increased. Dared she speak to Kitty? Had she the right? And so, tortured with fear for the consequences of Kitty's imprudence—for Di was confident that Kitty's love of admiration, and probably a coquettish desire to win Gillway back, constituted the whole of her wrong-doing—Di paced her room through the hours of the sluggish winter morning, and tried to make herself believe that she was only hurt and disappointed because Kitty still flirted.

Christmas Day appeared hard and white and rimy, and there was feasting and merry-making in the great house. The Nabob dispensed his hospitality with generous hand. In the servants' hall a large number of poor people were given meat and bread and pudding, and there was a Christmas tree for the children, laden with gifts of warm clothing, toys, and sweets.

"What a good fellow he is!" Mrs. Caffyn exclaimed to Di, when the happy, noisy troop of ruddy-faced children had been sent home laden with their treasures.

"Indeed he is!" cried Di heartily. "He has given such a lot of soup and blankets away this winter. I—I didn't know it," she added in a half-ashamed tone, "until the vicar told me of it just now. He says that he has never had so generous a parishioner!"

"Such men ought to be rich," said Mrs. Caffyn. "They do so much good!"

She glanced at the Nabob as he stood at the end of the hall by the rifled Christmas tree. He had been the gayest of the gay, and had joined in the children's games, seemingly as indefatigable as they. His fair wavy hair was disordered with his romps with the little ones, his eyes sparkled with animation and kindness. He looked vigorous and handsome with youth and strength.

"Oh, Di!" whispered Mrs. Caffyn, "I do hope that Kitty will make him happy!" and Di's heart echoed the aspiration.

The night was crisp and cuttingly cold when the skating party left the house for the fishpond in the park. All the guests had turned out, and nearly all the men servants had been utilised as torch-bearers. The flaming yellow-red lights threw warm patches of flame colour upon the snow as the procession made its way over the stiff, frozen grass to the water, and pretty eyes grew brighter and cheeks rosier in the ruddy glow.

"Let us have a spin together," said the Nabob to Di. "You only gave me three dances last night."

She smiled at him, excited by the novelty of her surroundings, and impressed with the ghostly appearance of the white-armed trees, and the keen-eyed, twinkling stars that looked down so searchingly upon the merry party.

The spin was a long one. Round and round the gleaming ice-bound pond they went, hand in hand, Di's long fur boa fluttering in the Nabob's face, and the perfume from the violets at her throat reaching his nostrils from time to time.

She was languidly brushing her hair.

Neither of them spoke. The stillness of the white park, with its big spreading trees and air of mystery, seemed to have fallen upon them and wrapped them in its silence. On and on they glided, the Nabob's eyes fixed upon the girl's profile, and hers dreamily looking at the glittering sky. Bursts of laughter fell from other skaters as they sped past them; little cries of real or affected alarm, shrill giggles and screams; but Di and her companion appeared deaf to all sounds. It was as though they were floating alone in the ghostly-looking world, enveloped and caressed by its weird quietude.

"Di," whispered the Nabob softly.

She turned her face. He smiled, and in her contentment and happiness she returned the smile.

"I wish we could go on like this for ever and ever," said he. "Do you?"

She nodded, looking away at the stars with a strange sensation of unreality creeping over her. Kitty passed them, laid her hand upon Di's arm, and stopped her.

"Auntie's getting tired of it," she grumbled, "and she's got a hot water-bottle, too. She shouldn't have come if she can't skate. She wants to go home."

"What a prosaic young woman you are, Kitty," said her husband. "We can't let Mrs. Caffyn go home yet. I'll find a chair and take her on the ice."

As Di stood near the edge of the pond watching the animated crowd, a passing torch-bearer threw a red light upon the face of a man who stood at a little distance from the skaters.

It was John Gillway. Di's first impulse was to join him. Why was he watching the Nabob's guests? Was he anxious to see Kitty? Had his passion for her revived? When Di looked in the same direction, the man had vanished, and though she kept a watchful eye upon the assembled people, she failed to see him again.

The skating-party did not return to the house until morning had dawned, and then half-an-hour was spent over hot coffee and brandy. A little clock in Di's room struck three as she began to undress. She felt weary and depressed.

The thought of returning to her father that day was strangely pleasant.

She was languidly brushing her hair when a hurried knock came at the door. Mrs. Caffyn's voice, shrill with alarm, cried: "Di! Di! Let me in!"

Her face was haggard; her hair in disorder when Di admitted her. She still wore the long fur cloak that she had enveloped herself in for the excursion. It hung by one string around her neck.

"I've been robbed!" she gasped, stretching out an empty jewel case.

"Robbed! Oh, Auntie!"

"Look," cried Mrs. Caffyn. "I found the case like this when I went to put away my diamond brooch. Everything has been taken from the safe!" and while Di was staring at the case she added excitedly: "The bracelet I gave you, child; have you got it?"

Di opened the drawer in which she had placed both bracelets, with the few trinkets that she had brought with her. An exclamation fell from Mrs. Caffyn's lips as she bent eagerly forward and watched Di open the boxes. Like her own, they were all empty.

And as the two women stood staring into each other's pallid features a shrill cry rang from the room occupied by Lady Rivers, and the next moment the sound of a bell being frantically pulled followed the scream.

"She has lost her emeralds!" cried Mrs. Caffyn. Di followed her from the room, carrying the rifled bracelet cases.

A Pump in a Church.

THE most extraordinary tomb to be seen in Great Britain is in the chancel of Newbiggin Parish Church, Cumberland. It commemorates a former squire, and is in the form of a pump. Originally this quaint tomb was simply erected as a monument, but water has been laid on, and in case of fire in the church the pump would serve a most useful purpose. You will find further interesting particulars about this remarkable tomb, together with an illustration, in this week's Sunday Reader.

Among other contents of The Sunday Reader may be mentioned, "Advertising on a Pulpit," "A Distress Signal at a Bazaar," "Preaching to a Cannibal King," "Children with Royal God-parents," "A Postponed Wedding," "Sleeping in a Church," two complete stories, and a serial.

Five thousand rewards are being offered by the editor, and any reader can secure one of these. Go right away and get a copy of the The Sunday Reader at once.

A DIVERSION OF FATE.

AT the upper end of the village, near where the road stretched away in an endless white spiral to the far line of the great mountains, the village folk were crowding together before a little open space.

Apart from them, on the broad verandah near by, Dinsmore Sahib and his two guests lounged easily in their chairs. A swarthy, six-foot Indian servant moved softly about with a tray of cooling drinks.

Before them, naked, save for the loin-cloth, and looking like a shining bronze statue, was one of those travelling conjurers whose art is the despair of Occidentals. He was about to conclude a remarkable performance with the time-honoured basket-trick, which may be as old as India itself.

"Yes; it's an old trick, but a good one," Dinsmore was saying. "I can never help the chill in my bones while the thing's going on, though it always turns out all right."

"Why, where's the danger? It's done with a false bottom to the basket, isn't it?"

"It is often done in that way," Dinsmore admitted, "but in this case the woman is trained to throw herself quickly from side to side to avoid the sword-thrusts which are made in regular order."

"Whew! hot work, isn't it?" said the first guest, while the other asked curiously: "How can you tell?"

"Oh, I got it from my servant, and he from the woman there," returned Dinsmore with a significant look.

A woman now came forward from beneath a clump of fig-trees. She was scarcely more clothed than the man, and her plump brown body, the arms and ankles heavy with bangles, her red lips and the scarlet flowers in her hair, with the bit of soft blue drapery about her, made a picture good to look on. As she moved quietly to the man's side her eyes caught those of the native on the verandah, and for a moment warmth and light flashed into her impassive face, but at the conjurer's words she turned away.

"Sahib," he said, addressing Dinsmore as he drew the light basket into position, "you shall see how one punishes the woman who gives him cause for anger." He bent a fierce gaze on his assistant, and her violent trembling scarcely seemed assumed.

This was the conventional patter of the trick, but one of the Englishmen stirred uneasily in his chair. "Good Heavens, how completely the woman is at his mercy! Just by a slip of the memory he might slice her into ribbons before he could stop himself."

At a gesture from the conjurer, who stood leaning on his long keen sword, the woman removed her many bangles, and stood with downcast eyes before him.

"Now, thou unhappy one," he said slowly. The woman winced, but stepped submissively into the basket, the lid of which closed on her a moment later.

The conjurer drew a few paces away, then, panting with fierce cries to enhance the effect of his harmless assault, made a mad rush towards the basket, thrusting his sword through the sides, up and down, with great rapidity. Each thrust was greeted with piteous cries from within, and the sword appeared to drip with blood.

It was truly a nerve-shaking performance. The audience hardly breathed, despite the full faith in the swordsman's dexterity; even the servant of Dinsmore Sahib turned a queer ash colour as he stood in the doorway with the forgotten drinks.

At last the conjurer stopped for breath, the perspiration streaming down his shining sides. He caught the eye of Dinsmore Sahib's servant as he stood there, and in an instant the fire which had smouldered at his heart all day broke into sudden flame. Since they had come into the hill-country the woman had been like one possessed; since she had seen, four days ago, the sahib's green-turbaned, monkey-faced Mohammedan yonder, she had spared but a look to her rightful lord. One careless thrust with this keen-edged weapon would end the jealous tortures he had endured since they left the plains.

Her discarded bracelets mocked him, and he swore no man should feel those soft brown arms around the neck but he.

She must be lying on the left side; instead of moving to the right, he would pierce the basket on the left from cover to bottom. It would be but an accident, they would all agree—all except the Mohammedan. He balanced the sword carefully in his hands and blood danced before his eyes as he took a step forward.

In a sudden he fell to trembling so that he dared not trust his hand to strike. He thought again of the warm brown arms that slid about his neck, of the soft red lips that were laid against his, of the eyes that had followed him even before he bought her. This hill-country bewitched one—he would take her back to the plains again. An accident could happen there as well as here, if necessary.

But to finish the trick.

Ah! was she on the left side, after all? What had been his last thrust? His heated brain could only turn the moves over confusedly; he could arrive at no decision. It was surely the left—or the right?

He prayed for a miracle to clear his muddled brain. He swore by all his gods he had not meant to hurt a hair of the woman's head. In thought he already felt the sword slipping hideously through her flesh.

The spectators moved impatiently, forcing the conjurer to action. Left—right? It should rest with Fate.

"Sahibs, this shall end it!" he said in husky tones, and made a terrible lunge. A series of heart-rending shrieks, dying away in groans, was the immediate response.

This was the usual conclusion of the performance, but the sequence was unexpected. The cover of the basket was thrown violently back, and the woman crept out, to throw herself at the conjurer's feet.

"Oh, my lord; it was in thy heart to slay thy miserable servant, yet thou didst stay thy hand. My life is thine once more."

"It was Fate," said the conjurer slowly, but he did not explain to the woman.

Answers to Correspondents.

Short Stories dated June 5th will contain an inset of a particularly interesting nature. It will consist of a clear and brief description of the aims and objects of the FRESH AIR FUND, and will also form in itself a collecting sheet for those who may care to either collect for themselves or get other people to collect for them. Make it a point to see first of all that you get this inset when you buy your next copy of S.S., for if you don't, it will be your loss. In the event of it having by some manner or means slipped out before the number reaches your hands, I shall be pleased to send along a duplicate on receipt of a post-card.

S. K.—You should certainly remove your pipe, cigar, or cigarette from your mouth when you meet a lady of your acquaintance in the street. It is not the correct thing for a gentleman to invariably raise his hat with his right hand, but with whichever hand is farthest from the lady passing him.

CYCLIST.—The best way to prevent your lamp from smoking is to soak the wick in vinegar for several hours and then allow it to dry.

MRS. A.—Most of the eggs you see offered for sale at very low prices come from the North of Italy.

G. P. P.—No; a medical man has never been raised to the ranks of the peerage. Thursday is the publishing day for our new paper, Girls.

B. S.—Duelling was most prevalent in this country during the reign of George III. If you wish for a reply to your letter by post you should inclose a stamped and addressed envelope.

G. J.—The custom of eating apple sauce with roast pork is not a mere matter of taste, but the acid of the apple assists materially in the digestion of the pork.

R. S.—Why not look in the library of the British Museum for the book you are in search of? It is almost certain to be there. No fewer than 31,000 books are added to this wonderful collection every year.

D. T. E.—The Bank of England was started in 1694, and the system of penny postage in 1840.

H. L. W.—The custom of shaking hands is a sign of friendship and trust. I do not agree with you in the opinion that it is a ridiculous practice. Every nation must have its form of greeting, and surely it is preferable to offer one's hand to a friend than to rub noses with them as some races do—the Maoris of New Zealand, for instance.

MUSICIAN.—The pipes similar to those played by Punch and Judy men is the most ancient form of musical instrument; it has been used from the very earliest days of the world's history.

W. L. is very much in love, but being of a bashful nature, cannot summon up sufficient courage to propose to the object of his affection. A brilliant idea occurred to him, namely, to use the language of flowers as a medium, and he writes to ask me what would be the most suitable flower to send to the lady?——A moss rosebud with a piece of myrtle is generally considered to be equivalent to a confession of love, but if you take my advice, you will go yourself and make a bold declaration of your passion. Believe me, the lady will be much more likely to look with favour upon your suit than if approached in a timid and faint-hearted fashion.

A. M. H.—I am surprised to hear how much your dog appreciates music, most of the dogs of my acquaintance have a decided aversion to it, which they exhibit audibly.

W. N.—There are eighteen flags used at sea, by which it is possible to make 78,642 signals.

D. Y.—It is quite true that the smoke from the wick of a candle after the flame has been extinguished is poisonous, and if breathed in great quantities it would cause death.

M. B. L.—No; the negro is not black when first born, but a yellowish white. It gradually becomes darker, however, until by the time it is ten days old it is quite black.

G. C. M.—Foolscap is so called because paper of that size was originally marked with a jester's cap and bells.

V. V. V.—Divan is a Persian word. Your friend is quite right. It means a collection, a council, an audience chamber, and so came to mean a couch or sofa, from the kind of cushioned seats which in an Eastern reception room are ranged against the wall.

G. F. B.—It would take about a pound of cork to float a man of eleven stone.

ANNOYED writes: "Every year on a certain day in July I cannot venture into the streets of our town without being confronted on every hand by a group of dirty little street children presiding over a collection of oyster-shells, and thrusting one of them in my face they request me to 'remember the grotto.' Is this a peculiarity of Otley, or are you pestered in the same way in London?"————It is quite a universal practice, and arises from a former custom amongst pilgrims of visiting a shrine of the Apostles at Compostilla on St. James' Day, to "remember the grotto" being to help the poor and needy. There was also a supervision that whoever ate oysters on that day would never want for money.

ELLA.—It is correct for the bridesmaids to follow the bride after the wedding ceremony from the church in the same order as they entered it, the custom for each of them to have a gentleman attendant having long been abandoned.

H. R.—William the Conqueror is credited with the invention of surnames; each man took his name from his particular trade or calling.

ETHEL.—Three feet six inches is indeed a remarkable length for a woman's hair. Yes, I have heard of a few instances of a still greater length, one, for example, being over six feet, and another over seven. Thirty inches is the mean length.

C. R.—The total weight of all the excavated diamonds in the world does not exceed five tons.

H. H.—If a person says, "I beg your pardon," it is much better to say "Don't mention it" than "Granted." The latter expression infers a wrong has been done and is forgiven.

D. L. M.—Yes; there is one—and only one—animal that does not swim instinctively, and that is the camel; immediately it enters the water it turns over on its back and dies.

A. G. S.—"Facetious" and "Abstemious" are the only words in the English language that contain the five vowels in their numerical order.

T. W. M. asks: "How long would it take a train to reach the moon?"————Supposing such a thing was in the bounds of possibility, it would take an express train, travelling at the rate of sixty miles an hour, six months to reach the moon, and a hundred and seventy years to reach the sun.

C. G. F.—It is not true that the brain of an imbecile generally weighs more than that of a sane person; indeed, it is more often considerably less in weight.

H. J. D.—Dogs were formerly used for drawing small carts, etc., in England, but the practice was prohibited by an Act of Parliament, some fifty years ago.

SHORT STORIES

No. 440.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending June 5th, 1897.

THE ADVANCEMENT OF P.C. GITTUS.

POLICE-CONSTABLE GITTUS, 555D, Metropolitan Police, was not gifted with a vivid imagination. But a dirty fog sat sullenly upon the dirty streets, and a cold, penetrating drizzle filtered down through the haze, so that even the constable's stolidity could hardly help conjuring up a vision of a cosy fireside, and a comfortable chair, and a pipe and bonnie Mrs. Gittus to finish off the picture.

No, no, "a policeman's life is not a happy one," to quote Mr. Gilbert—and when the aforesaid has only been married a month, and worships his wife, it seems especially hard to have to walk up and down and round filthy streets and squares, on the look-out for burglars that rarely come, and incidents that hardly ever happen.

P.C. Gittus's beat was a quiet one. It lay in a fashionable London suburb, where for the most part lived unostentatious comfort and dreary gentility, with here and there a more pretentious red-brick mansion to break the stuccoed monotony.

The nurse-girls and housemaids knew all about Gittus. They had found out, being feminines, about the little house in Putney and the young bride, and so did not waste their time in trying to ensnare the handsome constable. For the most part, therefore, Gittus, on duty, lived in a condition of splendid isolation. On this account his office was all the more irksome.

Ugh! What a wretched night it was! The neighbouring church clock clanged out 11.30. In vain might Gittus sigh. Respite lay far away.

The streets were absolutely deserted. The fog, the drizzling rain, and the policeman had Suburbia to themselves.

Gittus tramped wearily on past the wall that flanked the garden of Sir John Judkins, the rich brewer, and so into the obscurity of Love Street, a narrow enough thoroughfare, merely the link between streets more important.

Love Street! The policeman gave an aggrieved sigh. What had Love got to do with anything outside one tiny house in Putney? What! Hullo, who was that?

Someone had coughed. Yes, a figure was standing up against the wall, tall, heavily-coated, shadowy in the fog, who, as Gittus halted, coughed again, not, be it noted, the cough of one asthmatic, but that of a person who wishes to attract attention unto himself.

Back shot the policeman's lantern slide. The strong yellow glare ate into the gloom, and the figure came out from under the wall.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

A soft felt hat, a long coat with collar turned well up to hide the face, was all that Gittus could distinguish. At once his professional instincts leapt up.

"Now then, my man," he said brusquely, "what do you want?"

"A word with you, Gittus."

So cool was the answer, and so unexpected, that the constable was staggered. "I don't know you," he murmured, though an expert would have detected the suspicion of a query in his voice.

"Have you ever heard of Sam Green?" asked the stranger.

The lantern-slide stole back over the glass, and the two figures stood motionless, face to face in the fog.

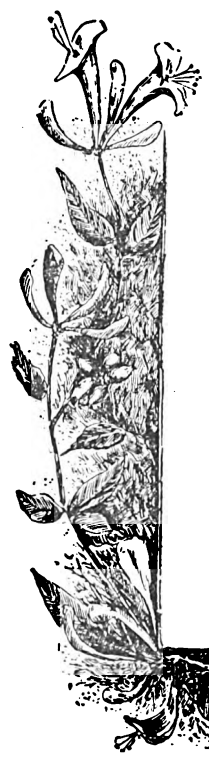
"Are you Sam Green?"

"That is my business. Perhaps I am, perhaps I'm not. We won't discuss that subject now. What I am going to tell you concerns you much nearer than the matter of my identity. I want to tell you something about Miss Mary Green—Mrs. George Gittus, I should say."

"What do you mean?" Gittus was a bad actor, and though he tried hard to put the proper amount of plain, unaffected anger into his voice, yet he could not altogether hide the lurking suspicion of apprehension that lay behind his words. He was a man of simple mould, and so much in love with his wife that he felt forced to vindicate his love, even to a stranger—which, by-the-way, he had yet to prove this man to be.

But the tall man was not to be brow-beaten. His answer was unpleasantly calm and concise. "Your wife is false to you," he said.

The policeman gasped. Then he advanced a step. The stranger could hear his teeth grind, and the quick, passionate catch of the breath that indicated rage, and he realised that Gittus meant mischief.



He drew back a pace. Then he went on, and so quietly that Gittus had to listen:

"Do you think I am just saying this for fun? I only tell you because—well, because I know what I do know, and that is that your wife is not worth the ground you tread on. Give me a chance and I'll prove it to you."

The stranger paused. The fog hid the pallor on Gittus's face, but it could not shut out the ghastly fear that trembled on his tongue, the mental terror of a doubting man.

"W—what can you prove," he stammered hoarsely; "what do you know about my wife?"

"While you are here on night duty she entertains an old lover, you know his name—Henderson."

Every word the man uttered rang out in the policeman's ears as though they had been bellowed into a speaking-trumpet. Henderson! Henderson! The handsome young butcher in Putney! The man who had been running neck-and-neck with Gittus—so disinterested onlookers had avowed—for the hand of Mary Green, and whom the constable had only beaten by a head a year or so ago.

A sweat broke out on Gittus's face.

"Prove it, prove it!" he gasped.

"There is only one way of proving it," came the answer, cold and deliberate, "and that is by the testimony of your own eyes. Your wife is too good an actress to betray herself by any action of her own."

"But how can I do that?" asked Gittus. All his manhood seemed to have left him. He was abject, piteous in his misery. Oh, to verify the truth of this hideous accusation!

"Listen; I will help you." The stranger's voice dropped to an impressive whisper. "Change clothes with me and go to Putney yourself. It will not take you long to convince yourself of my sincerity and your wife's duplici y. You can rely upon me to look after your interests while you are away. In two hours I will meet you here, and no one will have been any the wiser of your absence."

The fog hid the policeman's expression, but the stranger knew by the hoarse, tremulous gasp that escaped him, that the idea had taken root.

"Every moment is precious," the man went on softly, "every instant means much——"

"I'll do it!" The words seemed forced from between Gittus's lips. The next moment he had begun to take off his helmet, and unbutton his thick blue coat, an example that the other man was not slow to follow as regards his own clothing.

Like magic was the change effected. Who would have recognised Gittus now? The phlegmatic policeman had lost his identity beneath the long cloak of the strange destroyer of his peace. He crammed the soft felt hat down over his eyes. "Don't play me false," he muttered.

The next moment he had turned and was speeding madly off in the direction of Putney.

The stranger watched him out of sight. There was a curious smile upon his face, as, assuming the swinging gait of the man he was impersonating, he strode on out of the obscurity of Love Street.

For three or four minutes Gittus sped along as fast as his legs could carry him, unconscious almost of what it was he was doing, his one thought centred on the horrible task he had set himself to do.

Mary, his Mary faithless! The wife that he had worshipped, that he still worshipped—with a jerk he pulled himself up! Merciful Heavens, what was he doing? In a flash the enormity of his present breach of duty flooded his brain.

He had betrayed his calling for an impulse. His heart seemed to become ice within him.

Who was that man that had accosted him, that was at present patrolling the streets in his clothes? Suppose that the fellow was not fulfilling his part of the mad contract, suppose—a cold sweat broke out upon the policeman's face, and swinging round he suddenly dashed off again, back in the direction from which he had but just come.

In a few moments, however, he slackened his pace. His brain, usually so lethargic, was now working at high pressure. Perhaps he had been the victim of a hoax. Something was afoot to do him harm. Pray Heaven he might yet be able to repair his madness.

As he drew near the scene of his recent adventure, his caution increased, and keeping well in the shadow of the houses he crept stealthily forward, listening intently for any sound that might guide him on his further progress.

At the bottom of Love Street he halted. All was still, supernaturally so. The silence awed him.

Assuring himself that here at least nothing further could be gained by delay, he pulled his borrowed hat still more over his eyes, and like a cat stole on out towards the main street of his beat.

A high wall, flanking the garden of Sir John Judkins, mentioned above, ran along one side of the street, the other side consisting of a row of semi-detached houses, all of the same unpicturesque, monotonous, Early Victorian architecture.

A gentle rain was now falling, and the gas-lights shed a particularly anæmic radiance upon the glistening pavement. Still the policeman crept on, skulking fearfully against the black murkiness of the wall.

Hullo! What was that? A low whistle fell upon his ear. In a moment he came to a standstill. His heart began a most unnecessary throbbing. Again the whistle sounded. From the sound it seemed to come from above his head.

He peered cautiously upwards. A dark figure was sitting straddlewise on the top of the wall!

In a moment Gittus knew that the crisis had arrived.

"Where's the cop? Have you settled him?"

The unspoken question of a moment ago had been answered. In a flash the constable realised the whole plot that had been laid to entrap him, realised, too, the deadly peril of the situation. His every instinct leapt up to his aid. A low cry of pretended warning was his answer, raising at the same time his hand with a gesture of eager alarm. In a moment the figure on the wall seemed to comprehend, and before Gittus had had time to consider his next move, suddenly let down what turned out to be a slender, albeit strong, rope ladder.

In an instant the policeman grasped firm hold of the swaying structure. His pulses were quiet enough now. The desire to make amends for his recent minute of madness had made a new man of him.

Another moment he had clambered up the ladder. Not for one instant did he hesitate, but, panther-like, flung himself at the throat of the man beside him.

Providence was kind to Gittus. As the two men fell, firmly locked together, over into the garden on the other side of the wall, the constable was uppermost, with the result that, save for a slight shaking, he came off unscathed.

The other man was not so lucky. Gittus was a heavy man. Prone and apparently lifeless he lay, though the policeman was not allowed much time to examine the extent of his injuries.

For the next moment a low whistle from over the wall recalled him to the fact that in all probability the game had only just begun, and so, hastily pushing the inanimate body of the unknown beneath a convenient laurel bush, he answered the whistle with as near a repetition thereof as he was capable.

As a result he saw dimly outlined against the sky the figure of yet another man upon the wall. Silently he crouched down upon the wet earth. The figure swung itself off the wall and dropped with a dull thud upon its feet, only to be sent headlong as Gittus's right arm shot out to its limit.

Again that whistle! Again the answering call from Gittus. Again another form upon the summit of the wall!

And this time Gittus saw that the chance for redemption had really come. The last comer was garbed as a policeman!

Could it be the man who had tricked him, who—the fellow swung over the wall as his predecessors had done, and again the policeman's irresistible fist leapt out to stretch the new arrival prone beside the senseless bodies of his accomplices.

Yes, the "policeman" and the stranger who had been the cause of Gittus's desertion were one and the same. Dark though it was, Gittus could see that. He knew now that he was saved.

Quick as a flash he knelt down upon the wet earth and began to strip off the familiar dark blue coat from the prostrate man. He forced the limp arms through the sleeves of the ulster he had but that moment himself been wearing. Then, raising his whistle to his lips, he sent forth a shrill peal that rung out with startling distinctness through the stillness of the night.

* * * * *

All the papers were full the day after of the sensational capture, and of the wonderful courage and promptitude displayed by P.C. Gittus, of the notorious gang of burglars that had for so long evaded the clutches of the law. The Sentinel gave the policeman a leader to himself, while for days nobody could talk of anything else.

There was a reward of five hundred pounds out for the capture of the man who had deceived Gittus so cleverly, for he was none other than the notorious Blake—King of Burglars—while Sir John Judkins, whose house the gang had planned breaking into, added a cheque for £20, so that Gittus was well able to afford his wife the smart dress on which she had set her heart. And the little wife at Putney was the only person to whom Gittus related the true story of the heroic capture, so that if Sam Green and Blake were one and the same, the burglar never published the fact. Even at the trial he held his peace. Requiescat in pace!

Men Who Have Made the Empire.

BY GEORGE GRIFFITH.

II.—EDWARD LONGLEGS.

The Man who Nearly Made the United Kingdom.

Two centuries all but nine years have passed away since William the Conqueror, unwept, if not unhonoured, lost his life in avenging a paltry joke, and left his work for others to carry on. In the two centuries not much has been done, although no little show has been made meanwhile, and a great clash of arms has resounded through the world.

William the Red has died, as he lived, in a somewhat ignoble and futile manner. Henry I. has done one good thing, wedding, as it were, in his own person and that of the Lady Matilda, the two races who were afterwards to be one.

Stephen and Matilda have settled their differences and died, after the shedding of much wasted blood. Henry II., by the hand of Strongbow and his licensed pirates, has done a piece of the good work badly, in beginning that conquest of Ireland which is not to be completed until the Battle of the Boyne is lost and won.

Richard Lionheart has won much glory to very small profit in the magnificent madness of the Third Crusade. The barons, recognising, however dimly and clumsily, that they are, in good truth, citizens of the infant State whose lusty, turbulent youth already gives promise of its future strength and greatness, have become law-lords as well as landlords, and with mailed hands have guided that unwilling pen of John's along the bottom of the parchment on which the Great Charter is written.

And, lastly, Simon of Montfort has taken a swift stride through several centuries and, arriving at the modern idea that the making of nations and the ordering of the world can be achieved by Talk, has, after not a little violence and the spilling of considerable blood that might have been better spent, got together that first Parliament or Talking-Machine, whose successors have so sorely hindered the progress of the world and balked the efforts of those appointed by God, and not by the counting of noses, to do its work.

So the two noisy and somewhat foolish centuries have rolled away into a blessed oblivion with a good deal of shouting and swaggering, of strife and bloodshed, but of little progress, saving that one Roger Bacon has lived and written a certain book and made himself a name for ever.

But all this time the work with which we are here most concerned, the making of an empire, has been waiting for the next God-sent man to come and do it. and this man was Edward Plantagenet, surnamed Longlegs, next in lineal succession, not as King, but as Empire-Maker, to him who won the fight at Senlac and got himself so well obeyed that "no man durst do anything against his will"—which was a great deal to say of anyone in such days as those.

Edward of the Longlegs came on to the stage of History with long, swift, determined, and, in short, wholly characteristic strides. The Talking-Machine of the good Earl Simon had worked noisily, as is usual with such machines, and had produced little but sound and fury.

There was war all round, and the usual anarchy in Ireland and in Wales.

Llewellyn, Lord of Snowdon, had pitted himself gallantly against the logic of circumstances, and was seeking to reconstruct the ancient and now impossibly obsolete Celtic empire.

"Be of good courage in the slaughter, cling to thy work, destroy England and plunder its multitudes!" his bards had sung to him, and so he had honestly set himself to do, not recognising the fact that empires are neither made nor re-made by mere methods of miscellaneous blood letting.

To the north, Scotland was divided by schisms and rent by the bitter jealousies of its nobles and clan-chieftains, savage, rude and poor, but gallant, strong, and very full of fight, as the English were to learn later on.

Over the Narrow Seas the great domains which William the Norman had kept with his sword and which the second Henry had greatly increased by inheritance and marriage, were slipping piecemeal away from the throne to which they did not of right divine belong, and with which it was therefore impossible that they should remain.

Such, in briefest outline, was the scene into which Edward Longlegs strode, and of which he was to be for thirty-five years the central and dominating figure. His first look round, as it were, showed him the nature of the task which it was his destiny to forthwith set about.

With that clearness of vision without which no man has any chance of success at the business of empire-making, he instantly pierced the dust-storms of battle that were rising all about him, and the mist-clouds of debate which Earl Simon's Talking-Machine had commenced to vomit forth, and behind and beyond these he saw a certain Fact, a prime necessity which had to be faced—in short a real Something of an infinitely greater importance than tribal warfare, the aspirations of bard-inspired princelings, or even parliamentary debates.

This was neither more nor less than the fact that, when the Maker of all things mapped out this part of the world, it pleased Him in His wisdom to put England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland into one little group of islands, and from this fact Edward Longlegs drew the deduction that the King of Kings had intended them to be under one lordship.

It seems a simple thing to say now, a fact so patent that the mention of it seems superfluous; so does the larger fact that the world is round; but it was a very different matter in the times and circumstances of Edward Longlegs, and, indeed, his first and greatest claim to stand next in succession to William the Norman in the royal line of empire-makers consists in this: that he was capable of that master-stroke of genius which clearly demonstrated an imperial principle, of which six hundred years of history have been the continuous and emphatic endorsement.

No sooner was the bloody fight of Evesham over and the good Earl Simon had breathed out his generous, if somewhat premature soul in that last cry of his: "It is God's grace!" than Edward Longlegs seems to have set himself to prepare for the task that was to be his. He was not to be king in name for some seven years more, but as the historian of the English people with great pertinence remarked: "With the victory of Evesham, his character seemed to mould itself into nobler form." In other words he was, perchance unconsciously, performing that indispensable preliminary to all really great and true public reforms, the reformation of himself.

Hitherto his life had been none of the best. He had been the leader of a retinue that had made itself something like infamous in the land. He had intrigued first with one party and then with another. He is accused of a faithlessness which, it is said, forced the good, though mistaken, Earl Simon into armed revolt against his liege lord—though this may, after all, only have been a stroke of wise and necessary policy, since he possibly saw even then that Chaos would not reform itself into Cosmos just for being talked at.

Then again, and with curious resemblance to William of Normandy, and later of Hastings and England, he had avenged an insult to his mother by the slaughter of some three thousand men in the rout of Lewes and a quite unjustifiable indulgence in pillage and slaughter when the Barons War was finally over.

"It was from Earl Simon," says John Richard Green in one of those limpid sentences of his, "as the Earl owned with a proud bitterness ere his death, that Edward had learnt the skill in warfare which distinguished him among the princes of his time. But he had learnt from the Earl the far nobler lesson of a self-government which lifted him high above them as ruler among men."

It seemed, indeed, as though, by this reformation of himself, he was to typify that reformation of England which it was his life-work to begin. The new Edward was to be the maker of the new England.

His first action after the war was characteristic of the man and the work that he was to do. The cessation of the fighting, as was usual in those days, had left an undesirable number of truculent warriors of various ranks wandering at large about the kingdom with their legitimate occupation gone. Edward, with that instinct of order characteristic of all true empire-makers, saw in these the possibilities of disorder, and with a happy combination of wisdom and adventure turned their swords and lances away from the bodies of their fellow-citizens by taking them to fight the Paynim in the Holy Land.

An incident of this excursion has been adorned by one of those pleasant fictions which, if the paradox may be pardoned, are none the less true for the fact that they are false. Edward, having sent certain hundreds of Moslems to Paradise with a perhaps unnecessarily ruthless dispatch, was considered by the sect of the Assassins to be a person who would be better dead than alive in Palestine, and so one of them, after several attempts, succeeded, as one may put it, in interviewing him privately with a poisoned dagger. The fiction has it that his consort Eleanor of Castille sucked the poison from the wound with her own sweet lips and so saved his life.

It is a pretty story, but, unfortunately for its authenticity, no one seems to have heard of it or thought it worth the telling until Ptolemy of Lucca told it a good half-century afterwards. But the truth underlying it remains, and this truth is that Edward Longlegs was blessed with that greatest of all earthly blessings, a loving and devoted wife.

The facts of the matter are few but eloquent. Edward saw the dagger before it struck him, and gripped the would-be murderer with a grip worthy the muscles of Lionheart himself. There was a struggle, during which the dagger-point scratched his arm. A moment after it was buried in the assassin's own heart. Then some of Edward's retainers, hearing the scuffling, burst into the tent and satisfied themselves that the wretch had attempted his last murder by the somewhat unnecessary method of knocking out his brains with a foot-stool.

Soon after the symptoms of poisoning showed themselves, and Edward, in his usual business-like way, made his will and his peace with God and prepared to "salute the world" with becoming dignity. In the end not Eleanor's lips but the surgeon's knife removed the danger, and so once again a dagger-thrust which had come near to changing the history of Britain missed its mark.

It was during his return from this Crusade, as he was journeying through Calabria, that he met the messengers who told him that his father was dead and that he was King of England. Charles of Anjou, who was riding with him at the moment, wondered at the great grief he showed, and, being himself a man almost incapable of feeling, asked him why he should show more grief at his father's death than he had done for the loss of his baby son who had died a short time before. The answer was to the point and worthy of the man.

"By the goodness of God," he said, "the loss of my boy may be made good to me, but not even God's own mercy can give me a father again."

It was on the same journey that there occurred that curious incident which is called the "Little Battle of Chalons," and which is also instructive in giving us another view of the man who could use such wise and pious words as these. While he was travelling through Guienne, the Count of Chalons, one of the best and starkest knights of his age, sent a friendly message to request the favour of being allowed to break a lance with him. Edward, though he had been repeatedly warned of plots against his life by those who had designs on his French dominions, and though as a king he had a perfect right to decline the challenge of a vassal, was, as we should say nowadays, too good a sportsman to say no; but he took the precaution of going to the knightly trysting-place with an escort of a thousand men—in doing which he was well justified by the fact that the Count of Chalons was there waiting for him with about two thousand.

During the trouble which inevitably followed, the Count of Chalons did break a lance with Edward, but it was his own lance, and this failing, he gripped him round the neck in the most unknightly fashion and tried to drag him from the saddle. The Count was a strong man, but Edward was a little stronger, so he just sat still, and swinging his horse round, pulled him out of the saddle instead, after which, to put it into plain English, he gave him a sound thrashing, and when he at length cried for quarter, Edward, ever generous in the moment of victory, gave him the life that he had forfeited by his treachery, but, as a punishment, which the coroneted scoundrel justly deserved, he compelled him to take his sword back from the hands of a common soldier, and so disgraced him for ever in the eyes of his peers.

It may be added that the Little Battle of Chalons, in spite of the difference of numbers, ended in something like a picnic for the English, after which the King betook himself in leisurely fashion to the throne, and the work that was waiting for him.

No sooner was the crown upon his head, than he got to his task. The Prince of Snowdon, now calling himself Prince of Wales, had not only made himself master of his own country, but had pushed the war into England and reduced several English towns, the chief of which was Shrewsbury. Edward called upon him to restore the peace which he had broken and to come and do homage for his lands. Llewelyn, in the plenitude of his pride, told him to come and fetch him.

Edward took a note of this, but waited two years while he replenished the royal treasury by more or less justifiable means. During this time, as it happened, the Prince's promised bride, Eleanor, daughter of Earl Simon, fell into his hands. Again and again he summoned the Prince to perform the act of allegiance, holding his sweetheart meanwhile as a hostage in honourable captivity.

At length a fresh defiance from the Welshman roused him to action, and Longlegs strode swiftly across England and struck out hard and heavy. A single blow dissipated the dream of Celtic empire for ever. Llewelyn fled to his mountains and at length sued for peace. By rights his life was forfeit for rebellion, yet Edward not only forgave him but remitted the fine of £50,000 which he had imposed on the Welsh chieftains, and then invited Llewelyn to his court and married him with all due pomp and circumstance to the daughter of his old enemy—from which it will be seen that Edward Longlegs, like William the Norman, and indeed all good and capable empire-makers, was a gentleman.

Unhappily, Llewelyn repaid the kindness and courtesy by new rebellion, which ended, as it deserved, in disaster. Merlin had prophesied that when money was made round a Welsh prince should be crowned in London. During this last revolt Edward had caused round half-pence and farthings to be coined. When it was over the head of Llewelyn was sent to London and crowned with a garland of Ivy on Tower Hill.

What Longlegs had thus done with Wales he sought by more devious and less effective means to do with Scotland. The dispute between Balliol and Bruce gave him the opportunity of intervention, and of this the dismal results are too well known to need detailed description from me.

Here, again, we have nothing to do with personal right or wrong, or with the ethics of national independence. The business of empire-making is too urgent to wait for matters of this kind. It would perhaps have been better if Edward, after the sack and slaughter of Berwick, had hurled the whole weight of the English power against the object of his attack, as William the Norman would have done, and once and for all crushed the opposition into impotence.

It would have been bitter and bloody work, as the work of empire-making is apt to be, but the end might have justified the means. Certainly some centuries of bloodshed and bitterness would have been saved. The high ideal of a United Kingdom would have been realised nearly five hundred years earlier, and the progress of both realms in civilisation, wealth, and power might have been quickened immeasurably.

And after all, neither side in the long struggle would have lost anything to balance against the greatness of the gain to both. There would have been no Stirling Bridge, but then there would have been no Falkirk; no Bannockburn, but also no Flodden Field. All this, as it happens, however, was not written in the Book of Destiny, and so it does not concern us here, since we have to consider how much of the work of empire-making Edward did, not what he failed to do or left undone.

The surrender of Stirling in 1305 apparently completed the conquest of Scotland, and Edward was for the time being the actual and undisputed sovereign of the whole country from the Pentland Firth to the English Channel, and it is probable that the conquest would have been a permanent one but for the entrance of another power into the field, and this was nothing less than the English Baronage itself. It was as though the chiefs of his own army had turned against him, and, in the fatal dispute which followed, Robert the Bruce saw his opportunity, and in the end re-won for Scotland that independence which has cost her so much and which, however precious as a matter of sentiment, was destined to prove of so little value to her.

All that is past and done with now, but still no one who holds that an empire is greater than a nation, even as the whole is greater than its part, can help looking back with regretful thoughts upon those pages of our history which would have been so much brighter and more glorious if those gallant Scots who fought so splendidly through those long and bitter wars could have stood, as they have done since, side by side with their brothers of the South, and so made possible centuries ago the beginning of that great work in which they have borne so splendid a part.

Had that been so Edward Longlegs might have been the founder instead of only one of the makers of the British Empire, and that last piteous scene by the sandy shores of the Solway Firth would never have been enacted.

But though in the end he neither conquered Scotland nor founded the United Kingdom, he did something else which, as the centuries went by, proved but little less important, for he began to make the British Constitution.

Gallant soldier and great general as he was, he was perhaps even a greater statesman. He saw far ahead of his times, too far indeed, for to his enlightened conviction that in the matter of taxation "what touched all should be allowed of all" we have the real reason for that revolt of the Baronage, which made a United Kingdom of the Fourteenth Century an impossibility.

Yet as law-maker he did work which lasted longer than that which he did on the battle-field. Like William the Norman, he was a stark man who knew how to get himself obeyed, and order, no matter how dearly bought, was the first thing to be got, and he got it. He could "make a wilderness and call it peace," as he did over and over again with Wales and Scotland—and, indeed, to him a wilderness was better than a place where disorder dwelt—but he also made another peace within his own realms which was the first fore-runner of that which we enjoy to-day. The laws which he made were for rich and poor, great and small, alike. The hand that was pitiless in destruction was also ready and strong to protect.

The manner of his death is as characteristic as any of the acts, good or bad, of his life. Old and weak and sick he made the long journey from Westminster to the Solway to fulfil the oath which he had sworn at the knighting of his unworthy son to avenge Bruce's murder of Comyns and to punish his rebellion.

Too feeble to keep the saddle, he was carried in a litter at the head of the hundred thousand men who were to be the instruments of his vengeance, but at length the news of victory after victory won by the Bruce stung him to a fury which for the time was stronger than his weakness, and at Carlisle the old warrior left his litter and once more mounted his charger. It is a pathetic sight even when looked at through the mists of the intervening centuries. We can picture the gallant struggle that he must have made to sit his horse upright and to bear without fainting the weight of the armour that was oppressing his disease-worn and weary limbs. The mailed hand which had struck the great Count of Chalons down could not now even draw the sword that hung useless at his side.

Only one thing remained strong in the man who had once been the very incarnation of strength. His inflexible will was still unbroken and unswerving in its devotion to the great ideal and master project of his life. Had that will had its way, the flood of English strength and valour that was rolling slowly behind him would have burst in a torrent of death and desolation over the war-wasted fields of southern Scotland, and there can be but little doubt as to what the end would have been.

But it was not to be. The Spectre Horseman was already riding by his side and, like the wine from a cracked goblet, the dregs of his once splendid strength ebbed away. At last the skeleton hand was outstretched, and he who had never been unhorsed by mortal foe was stricken from the saddle. Yet even then the proud spirit refused to yield. He took his place in the litter again, and, with almost dying lips, ordered the army forward; and, though the end was very near, he did not submit without a struggle, pathetic in its hopeless heroism, to conquer even Death itself and carry out his purpose in spite of the King of Terrors. Die he must, and that soon, but his spirit should live after him and he would still lead his army.

"Bury me not till you have conquered Scotland!" were almost the last words he spoke. Though they were disobeyed and Scotland was never conquered, yet they were well worthy of the iron-hearted man who said them.

FOUND IN DEATH.

On the long cane lounge at the side of the room a man lay asleep, one velvet-clad arm thrown across his eyes to shut out the hard glare from the skylight above him. Through a coloured window at the end of the studio a bar of sunlight struck redly and fell upon his dense bronze curls and the short, powerful fingers of his upturned hand. A half-smoked cigarette had fallen upon the dark red rug beside him. A yellow-backed French novel lay at the man's feet. His lips, red and full, were half unclosed in a faint smile.

The shutting of the door he had left ajar did not rouse him. A woman came in, swishing her long skirts over the bare floor. She wore a loose house-gown of peacock-blue silk, somewhat faded and worn about the hem. Her dark, rusty-brown hair was twisted up not too tidily in an unbecoming knot. Her bright blue eyes blinked in the strong light, and she put up one long nervous hand to shield them.

She stood still for a moment in the middle of the floor looking at the sleeping man. Then she went to his side, picked up the novel and the cigarette, tossed the latter into the fire in the grate, and looked at the book as though she would have liked to dispose of that in the same manner. However, she laid it down on a table, pushing it under a pile of other books.

The light at its strongest fell upon some large object standing in the centre of the floor on a wooden pedestal and shrouded in a white cloth. The woman's eyes rested on this with a bitter curiosity. She hesitated for some time, glancing at the man on the lounge. At last she went up to the pedestal and carefully lifted off the cloth, which had rested on splinters of wood stuck into the wet clay.

There was revealed the figure of a woman, somewhat more than life-size, lying at full length in an attitude of rigid calm, the arms straight at the sides, the hands laid palms upward, with relaxed fingers. The loose hair swept sideways from her face over a sheaf of flowers as yet only roughly indicated, and curled in a deep wave over her arm.

The thin drapery, drawn in long oblique folds from right to left, revealed outlines full and firmly moulded, composed now to an unnatural quiet. The face, too, with heavy, downcast lids, and lightly-closed, full-hewed mouth, seen in profile, wore an expression of life held in some strange trance. It was not sleep; a latent mockery hid beneath those brows and lurked in the corners of those unsmiling lips.

The clay model seemed nearly finished, with the exception of the detail of the feet.

"Well, what are you doing?" demanded a voice suddenly and sharply. The man sat up, yawning and frowning slightly.

"I wanted to see how you get on," said the woman, her fingers twitching nervously at the corner of the white cloth which trailed upon the floor. She tried to speak lightly and to smile, but her lips were dry and hard.

"You might have asked. You know I hate you prying about before the thing's finished."

The artist's thick brows knitted over his grey-blue eyes. He got up and took the sheet from the woman's grasp.

His eyes, resting, too, on the clay figure, darkened moodily. And the woman, watching, smiled—a swift, involuntary, yet bitter smile.

"Has Masterson seen the design?" she asked. "And does he like it?"

"Like it"—the sculptor began and stopped abruptly, casting a hard look at his wife. A latent irritation edged this look, which seemed to comprehend every detail of her untidy person, and expressed a distaste approaching active dislike. He shook his broad shoulders as though to dismiss her question, and turned his back on her. Instant resentment appeared in the woman's eager eyes and compressed lips.

"I think it is unworthy of you," she said impetuously. "It is not up to the level of your work."

The artist moved towards his statue as though to veil it from this unwelcome criticism.

"Fortunately, your opinion, my dear, is not of prime importance," he said indifferently.

"You used to value it," she flashed at him. "And you trusted to it, once!"

His suppressed smile stung her almost beyond control.

"At least you seemed—it may have been only pretence, like the rest."

"My dear Martha, are we going to quarrel—and, pray, over what?"

"Quarrel!" She stopped and bit her thin under-lip. "It seems that we cannot speak to one another without quarrelling."

"Let me suggest, my dear, that we keep in future to our different sides of the line, and meet, when we do meet, on common ground. You have your own occupations—I, my work. Let us not interfere."

"You want to shut me out. Oh, I have known it for some time. You don't like me to come to the studio! And once—once you weren't happy unless I was sitting by, reading or sewing, while you worked."

"It was some time ago," he murmured to himself, and shrugged his shoulders, half ashamed. A kindlier glance showed him that her hands were trembling and that her eyes had the hard brightness of pent-up tears.

Perhaps he comprehended something of the nervous strain under which she was suffering, though he would have been puzzled to define its cause. He went closer to her and laid his hand on her arm. The colour sprang to her averted face.

"When I have done anything good you are the first to see it," he said, more gently. "But no artist likes to exhibit his beginnings or his failures——"

"You admit, then, that it is a failure?" she cried suddenly.

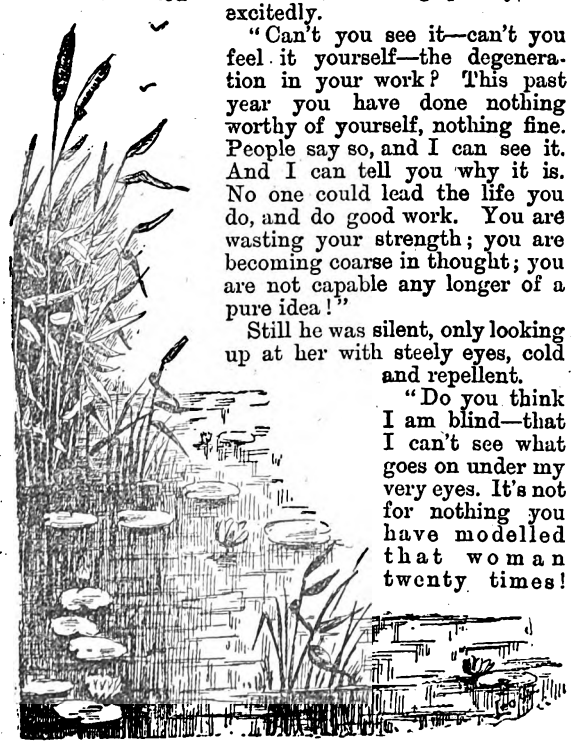
"The statue—a failure? What—what are you talking about?"

He moved away from her abruptly.

"I tell you it is, Herman! You have failed. That statue—is it the expression of an idea, a noble conception? No, it is a portrait of your model! There is no imagination in it. That woman there—what does she mean? Oblivion? She's a coquette dreaming! shameful!"

The sculptor silently threw the sheet over the clay statue. He walked away to the fireplace, lit a cigarette, and stood looking down into the blaze on the hearth, a scowl on his handsome face.

His wife turned to face him, breathing quickly and excitedly.



"Can't you see it—can't you feel it yourself—the degeneration in your work? This past year you have done nothing worthy of yourself, nothing fine. People say so, and I can see it. And I can tell you why it is. No one could lead the life you do, and do good work. You are wasting your strength; you are becoming coarse in thought; you are not capable any longer of a pure idea!"

Still he was silent, only looking up at her with steely eyes, cold and repellent.

"Do you think I am blind—that I can't see what goes on under my very eyes. It's not for nothing you have modelled that woman twenty times! And she is not even a professional model! Perhaps you didn't think I knew."

"What stuff you are talking!" he interrupted roughly. "You are behaving like a child—an idiot!"

"Oh, I know! I know her as well as you do. I could point you out a dozen likenesses of her in this room. That is a cast of her arm. I know her, I tell you. She's Corinne, the dancer."

"What of that?"

"You shall not—you shall not have her here, within a stone's throw of my house!"

"Your house, my good Martha? I don't propose to talk to you in this mood. I'll wait till you have recovered your senses. But I may as well tell you now that I shall employ just what models I find most useful, and if I can get what I want by going outside the profession, I don't know anything that will prevent me from doing so. That hardly need be said."

"Not that woman, Herman!"

"That woman, or any other. What has come over you, Martha? Upon my word, I believe you're insane. You used to be sensible enough. Nowadays you clog me, hold me back, worry me to death with these perpetual disputes. Do you think I can stand this sort of thing? Can I work in an atmosphere like this? Good Heavens! and you are the woman that vowed she would die to give me success!"

"I said it, and I would die, even now, to help you! But I will not stand to be killed by inches—to see you growing worse day by day, and die of shame to see it! I will not bear it!"

He smoked his cigarette out and flung the tip into the fire, still in sullen silence. And then, without looking at his wife, he changed his velvet coat for a more conventional garment, put on his hat and light overcoat, and left the studio.

"Herman!" she called to him sharply.

"I shall not come back here for a week," he said, between the opening and the closing of the door. And some half-childish, half-savage impulse moved him to add: "I hate you."

A moment later his shadow passed the window, against which the wind flung a gust of yellow leaves. The woman stood listening, a stunned look on her face. Her eyes travelled slowly round the studio, resting a long time on the shrouded clay model. She took a step forward towards it and raised a clenched hand as though for a blow. Then she stood still again, and shivered.

The fire burnt steadily—a red core of heat, with little, fitful, bluish flames playing over it. She dragged a heavy straight-backed chair closer to the hearth and dropped into it, clasping her arms over her bosom, her face contorted with a sudden keen physical pain.

She felt in her pocket and found a small bottle. Without waiting to measure or dilute the dose, she put the bottle to her lips and swallowed part of its contents. For some time she lay huddled in the chair, gasping for breath. Then growing quieter, she reached out and dragged from a chest near by its covering—a dark blanket—and drew it round her head and body, and so sat, staring into the fading fire with eyes dull from exhaustion and pain.

The sculptor fought his way along the street, swept bare by a biting east wind, towards the quarter of hotels and cafés. He felt himself in need of something to soothe the pin-pricks inflicted by a nagging tongue, and to counteract the depression, mental and physical, which was too often his lot after a long day's work, like the present, of dubious results.

He ate his dinner and drank a bottle of good Burgundy and felt his blood running warmer. The subtle influence of the absinthe insensibly lightened his mood. He straightened up and lifted his head defiantly.

He stretched out his arm, opening and closing the powerful fingers of his right hand; it had not lost its cunning yet—he would show them.

Dinner over, he lit a cigar and turned about to face the room. He was rather glad to perceive at one of the tables near him, sipping his coffee and Cognac, a painter whom he knew. He joined this acquaintance and went off with him to a theatre, and later to a studio merry-making, at which Corrine, the dancer, happened to be the guest of honour.

It was in the small hours that the sculptor finally reached his home, sobered considerably by the walk in the chill night air. He had indeed found in it opportunity and some incentive to reflection. He thought over a remark or two which had fallen from one or another of the men during the evening.

There was a change in the attitude of his confrères towards himself; it was something subtle, slight, intangible, but it was there. They had ceased to look to him. He knew that the change must have been gradual, slow, but now his eyes were opened, and he perceived what he had long been blind to. This to a man who felt himself still in the prime of strength was inexpressibly galling.

He resolved that the tide should be reversed; that he would make them look again! He would put folly behind him and give himself once more to his art.

Filled with his new resolution he turned his steps towards the home he had recently left.

The house was dark, except for the light in the hall. With a sullen memory of the quarrel of the afternoon he went to the studio, a separate building in the rear, intending to sleep there, as he did often.

He unlocked the door, which had a spring lock, and closed with a catch. The room was in perfect darkness, the fire was long out, and a deadly chill numbed the air.

The sculptor struck a match and lit two gas jets, shivering at the prospect before him, but resolved not to enter the house. He did not at first perceive a figure heavily shrouded in some dark drapery, seated with its back towards him before the ashes on the hearth. When he did perceive it, his first thought was that his nerves had played him an uncanny trick; his second, that his wife had waited here for the opportunity of baiting him on his return.

His impulse was to turn on his heel and leave the studio in her undisputed possession; he hated scenes and nagging, and he was not far at that moment from hating the woman who had become identified with these things in his mind.

He turned towards the door, and then paused, withheld by the strange stillness of the room, and the motionlessness of the dark figure. He thought she must be asleep, and felt no desire to waken her; but he knew that he could not rest, leaving her as she was. He approached her, therefore, reluctantly, dragging himself slowly over the floor. The moment he looked upon her face he knew she was dead. The cold white face in the shadow of the blanket showed only as a pale glimmer; but the man felt death.

He recoiled, and dropped upon the chest at the side of the fireplace, staring. It did not occur to him to call out, nor to see if the woman's heart still beat. Half consciously he stared at the face whose sharply-cut features, shadowed and softened by the simple strong line of the drapery, took on a nobility so piercingly impressive. This—this! This was what he sought—this majesty, this austerity. Did one seek oblivion—forgetfulness of things earthly? This woman had found it. This was the secret of her locked lips, her half-closed, inscrutable eyes. Here, then, at last—at last.

A brain excited, spurred to action, and now stung suddenly into fullest life, possessed the man. He found paper and crayon, and, sitting before the body of his wife he drew like one driven by a demon. Eye and hand held tense till he had mastered what lay before him. He made three sketches, and the livid dawn filtered in as he finished the last. He locked them in a drawer and put the key in his pocket with a throb of exultation.

The reaction came instantly, and for the first time the full consciousness of what sat there came upon him. A thrill of natural pity tempered his repulsion. He had known that she suffered from a disease of the heart.

"Poor Martha! Who knows—who knows if you have not died for me, after all?" was his murmur, egotistical, even in that moment of recognition.

He wished to kiss her, but he could not. He backed out of the door, shut it softly, and hurried towards the house to call the servants.

WHEN Peter S. Cockle was appointed road-agent at Rasselstoke depôt, his daughter refused with some heat to sanction the arrangement.

"You go West if you want to," she said with a scornful nod of her pretty head, "and the days will come along to you after I've done with them. Catch me lettin' Sal Banks and the rest of them here get to Sunday before I'm through with Saturday."

Her father winced perceptibly.

"It's beautiful country thar," he said, fingering his promotion in a nervous manner, "real beautiful. Besides, you'd be somebody thar; in Winnipeg you're jest a stem in a barley stack. I'm not depraising you," he added, with a hurried glance of admiration, "because thar ain't anyone handsomer 'n you around these parts, but at Rasselstoke——"

There was a depth of compliment in the unfinished sentence, and Peter S. Cockle awaited the effect with some pride.

"It's people that makes a woman's life—not places," said Dolly, puckering her brows.

Peter S. dreaded these "book-learning" attacks from his daughter; but he summoned his wits and carried the day with a brilliant epigram.

"It's places make people," he said.

Dolly hesitated. There was civilisation and insignificance for her on one side; on the other the desolate Selkirk mountains and supremacy. A girl who could play the piano and sing and knew how to dress well, and could speak proper English, would flash like a meteor across the benighted minds of the inhabitants of Rasselstoke, and the meteor rôle rather appealed to Dolly.

"Anyway, it's on the C.P.R. just the same," she reflected.

Those three letters were mixed indissolubly with her life. Their whole home seemed shaped to the pattern of that monogram. A "C" and a "P" and an "R" were on everything; on the knives and the spoons and the forks, on the cups, on the saucers, on the thick white plates. They ornamented the butter, and were woven into the fabric of the household linen, they decorated the stiff antimacassars that hung on the parlour chairs, they made the central ornamentation of the little patch of carpet in the waiting-room, just as they were the controlling design of the upholstery in the railway cars, which were the most familiar things she knew of.

A railway which stretches 3,053 miles across a continent which links the Atlantic with the Pacific, joins level prairies with prodigious mountain peaks 10,000 feet in height, which makes the West East, and the East West, is an almighty big home for anyone to have; but wherever the C.P.R. came and went, Dolly believed she could never be unhappy.

Yet when the novelty of the move wore off she began to hate Rasselstoke. They had arrived in the winter, and the winter appeared interminable. The sky seemed always grey, the sickly silence of the huge snow-clad mountains tainted everything with a feeling of drear depression. Their sky-kissed peaks no doubt were beautiful; their jagged sides spangled with countless hemlock trees (chiefly bare poles in the wake of the forest fires), and streaked with the broad paths of glaciers and snow-slides, were grandly majestic, but Dolly would have exchanged them again and again for the wooden side-walks of Winnipeg without a pang.

The town whose society she had come to dazzle was a ragged row of deal board houses, filled with people who had drifted so far, and seemed to have caught there between the mountains like leaves against a wall and, not having the energy to go further, stopped where they found themselves and mouldered.

The 'bus from the Rest Hotel—a box mounted on runners which met the east-bound and the west-bound train in an inextinguishable hope of one day finding a passenger—had worn a trail through the deep snow from the depôt to the town, and beyond that there was nowhere to come or go.

At first Dolly had taken this walk daily, enjoying the fresh air, but after the first week she never went beyond the little platform under the shelter of the lake-coloured buildings which formed the ticket bureau, the baggage room, their own house, and the little restaurant where passengers might snatch a meal if they felt inclined.

Around the station the snow was all grimy with smoke; three or four dreary-looking cars stood on a siding opposite, and the occasional shunting and shifting of these was the only event which ever took place, save the arrival of the train from Vancouver in the morning and of the train from Montreal in the afternoon.

Twice a day Dolly shook off the stupor which had settled on her, and came to life again. For two minutes the platform would be crowded. There would be fur-coated millionaires and rough miners, none the less fur-coated, but wearing their sables outside; Englishmen, Americans, Indians, Chinese, all pacing up and down together, and Dolly would mix in the throng, and study the latest fashions among the ladies, and talk with the train conductors whom she knew, and be perfectly happy until she heard the nigger porters calling their ever-lasting warning: "All aboard," and saw the crowd clambering back into their cars and heard the stoker's bell begin to toll as the engine moved slowly off, and then the settled misery would come back more horribly, and she would strain her eyes along the dreary stretch of track, a lonely, depressing link in the world's big girdle.

Peter S. Cockle's pretty daughter had become quite a landmark to the commercials who spent their life travelling along the line. Laurence Wyndham overheard two of them discussing her as his train rocked over the Manitoba prairie and the vast plains of the North-west, scarred and pitted with the trails and wallows of the vanished baffalo, and peopled only with lonely coyotes and inquisitive prairie-dogs, squatting on their mounds.

He looked out for her when the train reached Rasselstoke, and coming from big cities where pretty women were almost a weariness, was duly disappointed.

Dolly's big eyes had met his curious stare with coquettish defiance. She had picked out his fine athletic figure and his handsome face the moment he descended from his car, and long after the train had disappeared again into the engulfing fissures of the mountains she thought about him, and, womanlike, felt glad that she had kept to her custom of putting on her best dress after dinner, which, for very tiredness, she had nearly given up with many another touch of civilised life relinquished one by one, knowing that in the end she must be brought to the dismal level of everyone else in Rasselstoke.

It was about a year later (when the passengers on the morning train had taken their seats again, and the last porter had dragged his little stool after him into the car) that Dolly noticed a solitary figure standing beside a small bag at the extreme rear of the platform. The moment he turned toward her she recognised him, and the slightest flush coloured her cheeks.

He came to where she was standing and raised his hat.

"Could you be so good as to tell me where I could get a bed for to-night?" he asked.

A year in the West had made a difference to Wyndham. He remembered what the commercials had said about Dolly, and wondered why he had not seen how pretty she was before. Her bright face and trim figure were like a flash of colour from that European life out of which poverty had forced him into exile.

Dolly's long lashes dropped slowly over her eyes.

"There is the Rest Hotel," she said, "but I'm afraid it's not what you would call an hotel." She hesitated a moment.

"A roof is all I want, and more than I can afford," said Wyndham with a smile, and he stooped to pick up his bag.

Dolly looked at him curiously. He was merely a shadow of the big athlete she had seen a year before; his voice was thin and weak, and she noticed his hand trembling.

"We have a spare room over the restaurant if you would like it," she said rather suddenly.

Wyndham met her eyes gratefully.

"You're very kind," he said "but——" He took a step towards the doorway, where a red-haired boy stood expectantly in charge of the little 'bus. But starvation and sleeplessness had done their work; he reeled suddenly, stretched out his hands with a helpless groping, and the next moment lay across the platform, his white face upturned, the vacancy of death in his eyes.

Peter S. Cockle, who came up at this moment, examined the fallen boy without taking his hands from his pockets.

"Better send him along in the sleigh to Parson Cloud's," he said. "I don't know what else they've sent a minister here for. The gal thar can nurse him."

Dolly's eyes blazed.

"Pick him up and carry him up-stairs," she said. "It's I who am going to nurse him, not Grace Cloud. Father, I don't believe you've got a bit of feelin'."

The railroad agent blinked stoically.

Thar's too many of 'em," he said. But he obeyed his daughter's behest, and when it came to carrying the poor fellow he was as tender as a mother with her child. "Whenever a mining boom comes along," he said, "thar's a hundred victims to one man who comes out on top."

It was spoken at random; but the whole story of Laurence Wyndham was summed up in the sentence.

A fortnight of Dolly's nursing, however, made the Englishman look more like his old self. When he was able to get downstairs again he found Peter S. smoking over the stove, and then and there put the whole matter to him in a nutshell.

"I'm broke,' he said.

The railroad agent allowed he had surmised that already.

"How are you goin' home?" he queried, shifting his pipe from one corner of his mouth to the other.

"I've got an uncle placer mining up in the Cariboo district," said Wyndham, "and I've written to him to help me."

"Rich, mebbe?" queried the agent. "Raise your arm a trifle, young man." He spat skilfully through the aperture thus made on to the track, and resumed his inspection of the stove.

"They tell me he's worth a million," said Wyndham.

Peter S. shook his head.

"Like enough he won't help you any then," he said philosophically.

Wyndham was still musing on the wisdom of this when Dolly came in to fetch him, with pretty imperiousness, for a walk. The sun had come out and was drawing silvery clouds up the jagged sides of the mountains. The sharp air brought the colour to his cheeks. They walked down to the town and back again without saying much. Dolly was unusually quiet, though her eyes were sparkling, and Wyndham fell naturally into her mood. Near the depôt they overtook Parson Cloud and his daughter—a tall, slim girl with a pale face and pretty grey eyes, that contrasted vividly with Dolly's black ones and the high colouring of her cheeks.

Dolly was for passing on, but Parson Cloud insisted on an introduction.

"An Englishman is a rara avis indeed in these parts," he said, with a courteous smile of welcome. "I heard for the first time to-day of your arrival and of your illness, and am glad to see you so far recovered. Yet with such a charming nurse, illness itself must have its pleasures."

Wyndham's reply brought a flush to his companion's cheeks; but when she raised her eyes to his he was looking towards Miss Cloud, and there was something in that glance, quick and fleeting as it was, which turned Dolly's heart to lead.

For a moment her head seemed to swim.

Then she heard Grace saying in her low, refined voice:

"Father, you must invite Mr. Wyndham in to dinner."

"My patient must not go out at nights," Dolly said quickly, and for a moment the black eyes and the grey eyes met and their glances clashed.

Wyndham accepted Parson Cloud's invitation almost greedily.

"I never listen to my doctor," he said lightly. "No patient would ever recover if he did."

They all laughed; but Dolly only because her eyes were filled with tears.

* * * * *

Peter S. Cockle's prophecy appeared to be correct. Wyndham's appeal to his millionaire uncle received no response. He became desperate. He could neither stay where he was nor afford to go away. Finally he decided to set out on foot.

Ever since their chance meeting he had spent the larger portion of his day at Parson Cloud's house.

"He is a capital good fellow," he used to say to Dolly.

If he had said: "His daughter is so charming," it would have made no difference. To Dolly's mind it was perfectly clear he meant this. In reality she suffered terribly; but Wyndham had not the least idea of what was in her mind. She had been good to him, and he was grateful, and that was the beginning and the end of it with him.

His sojourn in the West had not deleted one national characteristic. If anyone had mentioned Dolly to him he would have answered:

"Oh, yes; the railroad agent's daughter."

Grace Cloud, on the other hand, was socially and intellectually his equal. "If only I was a little better off," he used to say to himself.

Dolly did not appreciate the distinction, but she realised that there was a difference, and she hated Grace Cloud for it. In the meantime, her little head was busy concocting a hundred plans.

One night when Wyndham had just finished supper, she came up to him and touched him on the arm.

"I want to speak to you," she said.

He got up, wondering, and followed her into the sharp night air. It was very clear, and the stars were shining brightly against the deep blue of the sky; a crescent moon was rising slowly over the towering peak of Mount MacKenzie. For some distance they walked along the railroad track in silence. Then Dolly turned and faced him.

"You are going?" she said.

Wyndham nodded.

For some time there was silence. Dolly stooped down and gathered a ball of snow in her hands.

"Suppose," she said slowly, "suppose I could tell you how to get rich?" Her eyes sought those of Wyndham, and he could feel her hot breath on his cheeks.

He felt inclined to laugh, but there was that in her manner which checked him.

He took her hand in his, emptied the snow out, and began drying the small, white palm with his handkerchief.

"Well?" he said.

"It would require pluck," said she, loosening his fingers, but still keeping her eyes on him.

A lean wolf slouched past them not a hundred feet away. Wyndham pointed after it.

"Despair and pluck go together," he said.

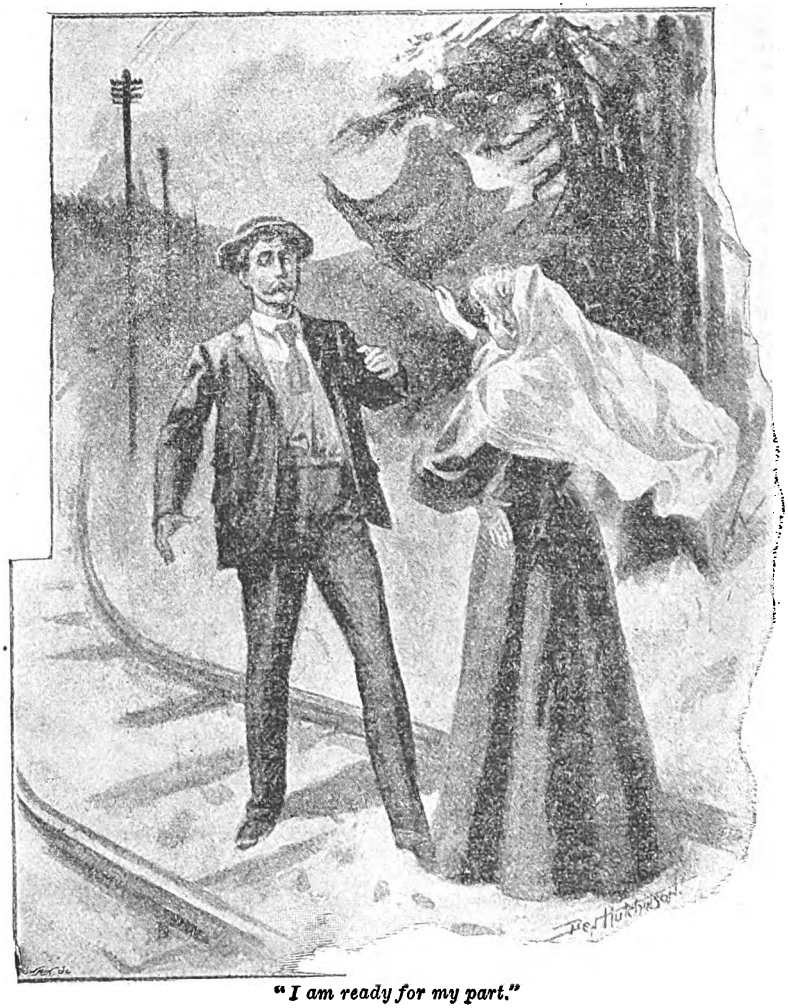
Dolly leant her slim figure slightly towards him.

"Listen," she said softly, so that her voice was hardly above a whisper. "In the express car of the east-bound train to-morrow they are carrying 5,000 dollars in gold and notes."

She stepped back a little to better watch the effect of this communication in Wyndham's face. But he merely laughed.

"How do you know?" he said. "And how does it better me if they are?"

"The express agent tells me a great many things that he ought not to over the wires," she answered. "If I were a man I would count it a grand adventure to hold up a train in a wild place like this."



"I am ready for my part."

Her companion stared at her in amazement.

"One to hold up a whole train?" he said laughing.

"Four are needed," she answered, "one to flag the engine; three to overcome the officials. See," she added, "I am ready for my part," and unrolling a scarlet flag, she waved it backwards and forwards tauntingly before his face.

Wyndham sprang forward and seized her wrist.

"Look here, what do you mean?" he asked. His face was quite white.

"Hush," she cried, "even the hills have ears. Bend down and I will tell you exactly what put the idea into my head. Yesterday two men got off the train here, and came into the bar for two cigars. They told father that they intended to rest here a day and then start over the mountains southwards, prospecting for copper. When they went out he pointed them out to me." Dolly folded her arms and began to mimic her father's voice. "'I reckon thar's mischief in the air,' he said, 'I don't take much stock in that prospecting yarn. Those two men is Jim and Fred Owen of Kansas City. There's some devilry back of 'em gener'lly. When I was in Loss Anjelus, afore I married your mother, gal, I reckon they two were the worst feared men this side of New York State. Six times they held up the Sante Fé express, and thar wasn't a deputy sheriff in the country dare raise a finger against 'em.' That's what he said," finished Dolly a little breathlessly.

The moon had sailed up high into the heavens, and the broad glaciers on the mountain sides shone like burnished silver. When Dolly's whispering ceased the stillness was so great that Wyndham could hear his heart beating horribly against his side. He made a motion as if on the point of saying something, but no sound came from his lips.

The girl's hands slipped up his coat and met round his neck. He could feel her heart beating wildly as his own. She raised her lips to his, drawing his head down to her upturned face.

"Kiss me," she whispered. "Now go and fix up those men."

Wyndham found himself standing alone in the middle of the tract. Perhaps it was the cold night air which made him shiver.

* * * * *

All day long Rasselstoke depôt had been the scene of the wildest excitement. Peter S. Cockle was still busy at five o'clock in the telegraph office. Wyndham was sitting alone over the stove, holding his hands towards it, and every now and then his teeth chattered, as if the cold were eating into his marrow. Suddenly the door opened, and he started to his feet. It was Dolly. She had a newspaper in her hand, and she passed it over to Wyndham with a laugh. "Read that," she said.

The paragraph was headed in black type: "Train Robbery," and, underneath, "C.P.R. train held up within ten miles of Rasselstoke."

Wyndham scanned it eagerly.

"A passenger and express train on the C.P.R. was held up and robbed by three masked men this morning in the pass known as the Devil's Canyon. The scene of the robbery was less than ten miles from the nearest depôt. The train was flagged at the entrance of the cut, according to the story the engineer tells, by a woman. While one of the robbers stood guard over the passenger coaches, the other two covered the conductor, engineer, and fireman with their pistols, and compelled them to go to the express car. There the robbers commanded the messenger to open the door of the car, threatening to use violence if he refused.

"After some delay the robbers were admitted. They compelled the messenger to open the safe, and extracted from it several packages. How much booty they secured cannot at this hour be ascertained, but the conductor of the train declares that the bandits secured nothing save several packages of jewellery, and a considerable sum of money addressed to a private individual.

"The express messenger had surmised what the trouble was, and while the bandits had been demanding admission he had concealed the greater part of the wealth he carried in a chickencoop, where it remained untouched.

"Taking up their booty, the robbers uncoupled the express car from the coach following it, and then marched their prisoners forward to the locomotive, where they compelled them to sit down on the bank alongside the track. The leader climbed into the cab, tried the air and steam, and then called to the man who was guarding the passenger coach to come forward. At this juncture the engineer cautioned the bandit to be careful with the locomotive, warning him that they were on a hill, and if he left the engine improperly guarded at the top, it would crash back into the train. The outlaw said he would take care of the locomotive. With this the men pulled out, having held up the train without firing a shot. They ran the locomotive several miles to Eagle Cutting, where they abandoned it. Passengers on the train did not know what had caused the delay until two hours afterwards. A deputy sheriff and a large posse have gone out in search, but it is thought the bandits have got well away. The stolen money was addressed to Laurence Wyndham at Rasselstoke. The consignor was Mr. Frank Wyndham, a well-known mine proprietor in the Cariboo district."

"I hate you!" she cried vehemently.

Wyndham looked up and found Dolly staring at him.

"You knew this?" he said quietly. "You knew that the money was consigned to me?"

"I did," said the girl defiantly. "When you tell Grace Cloud that you have reformed being a train robber you can tell her why it was. You can say you paid two accomplices 2,000 dollars to rob an express messenger of 5,000 dollars which happened to be your own. And you can say the other accomplice was a woman—a girl whom you despised, anyway, so it didn't matter, though she risked ten years in gaol to get even with you. There!"

And then in the midst of her defiance a great sob welled up and choked her.

"I hate you!" she cried vehemently, "I hate you!"

The truth was that she loved him.

Spanning a Chasm.

The liner Nicaragua was steaming up the Gulf Stream to Tampa. The weather was unexceptionable. There was little wind; the indigo sea was smooth and enlivened with the gambols of the flying fish; even Cape Hatteris had been in a good temper. Consequently, most of the saloon passengers were scattered about the after-decks, smoking, reading, chatting, or promenading beneath the awnings. There were some fifty men and women booked as first-class voyagers, and, with one exception, these were all aft or amidships.

The steerage passengers were forward, and were amusing themselves after the manner of their kind. There were but eight—on the South American lines steerage accommodation is limited—and these were evidently gentlemen who preferred a life on the "Long Trail, the trail that is always new," as Rudyard Kipling calls it, to any superfluity of worldly goods whatsoever.

Their raiment was not immaculate; their hats were disreputable; to a man they either chewed tobacco or smoked an atrocious brand of the same weed, and garnished their conversation with grisly oaths and objurations.

Two of them were reclining in the sunshine so lazily as almost to forget to puff their tobacco smoke, and the remaining six were engaged in a game of poker, of which the circulating medium consisted of matches, representing what cash basis I am unable to say. Cards are awkward things to handle on the open deck. It is necessary to keep them strictly under guard, lest a sudden breeze scatter them all abroad. This happened once or twice, causing profuse swearing and a hasty scramble to prevent them from going overboard, while the reclining pair opened their eyes and jeered at the players. Then the game proceeded anew.

The Rev. Samuel Oliver leant against the rail and watched them from a discreet distance. The Rev. Samuel was a student of character and characteristics, and especially of the characteristics of the classes which he was accustomed to consider "lower." The study was not precisely to his taste, though he strove to interest himself in it, for he believed that every clergyman should have some knowledge of how that Other Half lives which it is the object of his religion to benefit.

He engaged in the pursuit of this knowledge in a strictly scientific spirit, and was at first surprised to find that the masses possessed individualities, and were merry or sad in a personal, rather than an automatic fashion. In fact, he had always had a vague impression that they existed at all chiefly as material for philanthropic experiment.

It was on account of this habit that the Rev. Samuel had deserted the more refined companionship of the cabin passengers to watch from a distance the crude diversions of the denizens of the steerage. He did not like to approach them more closely or to address them, lest they might be impolite, and the minister hated to have people impolite to him. Even to speak to them would be of little advantage, for, as he pathetically reflected, he was at a great disadvantage.

He could not make himself sociable, as the heathen might, by the proffer of whisky or cigars, and of course there could be no subjects of common interest on which they might converse. He was, in fact, completely cut off from the men he wished to investigate.

One of these poker players in particular attracted his attention, as much by the easy grace with which he squatted on the deck and dealt the cards, as by an indefinable air of savoir vivre, of supremacy, with which he comported himself. When the game exploded in a perfectly amicable altercation, composed chiefly of profanity, this man swore more than all the rest together, and with a freedom and ingenuity that vexed the minister's soul.

Then a pocket flask was circulated in which peace seemed to be restored again. The man whom the Rev. Samuel had noticed glanced up as he was about to drink and saw the minister looking at him. Perhaps he misunderstood the look; perhaps not.

"Have a drink, partner?" he said, proffering the bottle.

The Rev. Samuel declined, and turned away with irritation in his heart—irritation against the man who could offer him liquor, and irritation against himself, for in the deepest depths of his own heart he was conscious of an embryonic sympathy with all this lawlessness—oaths and whisky and gambling, rank tobacco smoke and reckless irresponsibility.

Yet he was half conscious of what was going on behind him, and became aware that the man had followed the bottle with a tale. The Rev. Samuel heard it with half a mind. Big names rattled through it; London, Chicago, Paris, and Port Said were the stages where the drama transacted itself. There were strange and unlawful adventures, and the man was the hero of them all. The listener did not consider whether the man were lying; the story filled him with a sharp hostility. It was repugnant to him. It reminded him of Kipling's "Lost Legion," and the Rev. Samuel did not like Kipling. He inspired him with the same sort of holy terror—as of a billowy sea of lawlessness, wherein all the standards of morality and ethics were swallowed up.

Now the article which he was accustomed to consider his conscience began to reprove him for so far encouraging forbidden acts as to listen to their history. He went aft again, into the clear atmosphere of education and refinement, white collars and civilisation, and felt better for the change. He told himself that a minister of the Gospel had no right in such company as that forward. Poverty, perhaps, and involuntary degradation, but never defiant vice. That was quite beyond the pale.

Yet this much-enduring man, this Ulysses of the steerage, had taken a strong hold on his mind. He sat on the little blue-velveted seat in his state-room and tried to imagine what such a life could be like. He could form only a vague idea of the shifts of fortune, of the kaleidoscopic changes, from saloon to steerage, and then to the stoke-hole; of aristocratic hotels and dock-side boarding-houses; of the tossings of every sea, and the armed march through life which the adventurer must support; of the bluffs and bullets, the cards and liquor, the Rev. Samuel supposed, and every kind of injury and peril that coloured such a career red, rather than black.

Down in the little narrow steerage cabin the man was singing, amid a company of his friends and spare deck-hands:

> We don't know nothing about the channel,
> What the lay of the course may be;
> But were out from the level, and away like the devil,
> On the criss-cross curly sea!

There was a shout on deck, an agonised screech from the whistle, and a rending crash that seemed to send a thrill through the very entrails of the big steamer. The screw gave a flutter and stopped, there was a roar of escaping steam, and the ship lay motionless, save for a nervous tremour that ran from bow to stern.

The Rev. Samuel Oliver was pitched to the floor in the midst of his meditations when the crash occurred. He picked himself up and opened the door into the saloon.

The great hall was full of people, swarming out of their rooms in every stage of undress, and crowding up the broad stairs to the deck. Nobody asked what was the matter; it seemed to be the general aim to get out into the open and see as quickly as possible.

The minister went up, or was carried up, with the current. Everybody stopped and stared about when they reached the deck, for there was nothing amiss, so far as could be seen. The electric lights burnt clear; the steamer lay quietly on the water; there was neither land nor ship in sight, and the steam was blowing off from the escape-pipe so violently as to drown most other sounds. When they looked forward, however, it was to behold an excited group of sailors gazing over the side, while the officer glared down from the bridge, and the captain issued orders to men who ran hither and thither about the decks.

There was a simultaneous rush to this point, which appeared the scene of action, but the gates of the fore-castle-head were closed, and the captain sternly ordered the passengers back from the cross-railing. Then they clustered amidships, and wondered and waited. Somebody had talk with some of the crew, and declared that the ship had struck upon a coral reef and torn three or four plates out of her bottom, and this explanation was accepted. Then came a rumour of the water-tight compartments having been closed, and having failed to prove water-tight; of insufficient boat space; of lack of life-buoys; of shoals of sharks that swarmed alongside. The raw material of a panic was rapidly developing itself.

Presently the steam stopped blowing off, and in the silence they could hear a rushing sound from the bows, as of running water. Then the screws began to throb again, and the ship moved forward with a grating noise over some obstacle, and then lurched heavily down into deep water. She steamed ahead for a hundred yards with apparent difficulty, and then came to a full stop again. This seemed to the passengers to be a confession of helplessness, and they were ready to rise up in mutiny. Then the captain came back, and his burly, laced presence restored some confidence. But his words were not reassuring.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he said, "kindly go aft and form in two lines on the after-deck."

This was done, and it gave the frightened people something to think about.

Next the captain said:

"I am sorry that it has become necessary to leave the ship. But do not alarm yourselves, for there is no danger whatever. The shore is not many miles distant, the boats are quite sufficient to carry passengers and crew, and the weather is fine. The boats are being lowered, and the ladies will go first with the children. I trust that there will be no disturbance."

Now ensued a frenzied rush below to secure valuables and goods which it was clearly impossible to leave behind. In a few minutes they reappeared, most bearing huge bundles, which were promptly stopped by the officers. Nothing but the smallest of hand-baggage was allowed to go.

The gangway was lowered, and the boats secured at the bottom. Then the women and children came to the side and descended, one by one, very pale and frightened, but mostly silent. One by one they went down, the electric light shining on their white faces, till one boat had received its load and had pushed off.

Meanwhile the men were drawn up at a distance, watching the process of embarkation with severe self-control. A spirit of panic seemed to be abroad, which was only to be kept down by the most determined efforts. The Rev. Samuel felt it—a voice urging him to rush forward and seize his chance lest he be too late. He imagined he felt the ship sinking beneath his feet, that it was quivering for the plunge, could see the forms of sharks haunting the water alongside. There seemed enough on board to fill the boats twice over. Of course he must wait for his turn, but, good Heavens! why did they not make haste? He looked about and saw the same thought staring from the faces of the men about him. The sight vaguely alarmed him, and he turned aside and looked out over the rail. Even so he became aware of a man leaning over the side, close to him. It was the Man—the adventurer from forward.

He was looking down at the water as indifferently as if passing events were of no personal consequence whatever. He was chewing an unlighted cigar, and his hat was pulled over his eyes. The Rev. Samuel wondered if shipwrecks were of such frequent occurrence in his life as not to disturb him.

One boat had been filled and pushed off, as I said, and another was being brought round, when there was a sudden crash from below. It was only the upsetting of a barrel or crate, but it came upon the strained nerves of the passengers like thunder. A moment later the ship sagged forward and settled a little, with an obvious lurch.

That finished the business. There is always some one to rouse up the insanity dormant in every crowd, and this person raised a cry that she was going down. Two or three men started from the ranks. The action was instantaneous. Before the Rev. Samuel knew it, he was running headlong for the boat steps in the midst of a group of other men.

The captain dashed into their path, but he was trodden down. The crowd, mad with mere animal terror, rushed into the band of women gathered about the gateway, beat and hurled them to right and left, and struggled one with another, striking and cursing, to get first down the narrow steps. Two men were pushed out, lost their balance, and rolled down the stairs and into the water, where they were rescued by the boats.

The Rev. Samuel Oliver's congregation of Bethnal Green would scarcely have recognised their pastor in the hatless, dishevelled, flushed and panic-stricken man, fighting in a mob of other panic-stricken and dishevelled men to save his own valuable life, and the devil take care of the rest. He was conscious that he had knocked a woman down and had kicked another out of his way, but he felt no sort of shame at the fact. All his mind was concentrated in a wild endeavour to get in first, somewhere, to rescue himself from the ship that was sinking under his very feet. He screamed aloud, without being aware of it, and swore furiously with the same unconsciousness at those who blocked his way.

Suddenly there was a pause in the fighting, and the Rev. Samuel was aware of a man pushing his way into the press by main force. He carried an unlighted cigar in his mouth. He picked up a huge rioter with apparent ease and dropped him over the side, where he was rescued by the boats. Bang! and another was shot to the deck by a straight left-hander. He knocked a third over the prostrate one, and the others, as they were pushed forward by the pressure behind, fell over the pair, till a kicking, writhing heap was erected on the deck.

The rest of the crowd stopped, but the Rev. Samuel Oliver ran in blindly on the man who thus barred the way to life. He struck out wildly, but what could he do against practised hands? Like a flash the Rev. Samuel was lying on the heap of fallen, feeling as if a thunderbolt had struck him.

And now, the rebellion having been quelled, the man stepped forward and said:

"This way, ladies, if you please."

The embarking was continued, while the ship sank even lower, and the men at last got aboard in sullen silence. They were ashamed of themselves and of their conduct, and not one dared to look his neighbour in the face. Worst of all was the case of the minister. His eye was rapidly closing, his head ached furiously, and he had the consciousness that he, a minister of the Gospel, had played the part of a coward and a bully, while this outlaw and man of sin had acted the hero.

The reflection was intensely humiliating and yet contained a world of revelations. The minister had studied ethics and systems of morals, and had cultivated all the niceties of conscience; what was it, therefore, to chance upon a moment when all these things were swept away by the rush of raw human nature, and only the strong barbaric virtues could endure the shock? And to find himself wanting in these virtues, which had grown up in the breast of a man whom he had but lately called a heathen man and a publican, was a revelation, and if an unscriptural one, none the less wholesome for that. It was new to discern that there were big morals as well as little ones, and that the tougher kind did not always derive their strength from books of divinity.

The black mass of the steamer lay huge and low in the water behind them. The electric lights had gone out. The four boats were rowing steadily landwards. Each was filled to its utmost capacity, but not a soul was left behind.

The Man sat at the stern, talking carelessly with the second officer, who was in command. As the Rev. Samuel looked at him, he felt a wild desire to humiliate himself before this man, to apologise for his former contempt, to show that he admired his heroism and could almost condone his vices.

An idea came into his dazed brain, still humming from the effect of the blow. He leant over.

"I say, can you give me a drink?" he said, in as convivial a tone as he could manage.

The man looked at him curiously and handed his flask.

"Here's luck to you, partner!" said the Rev. Samuel Oliver, tipping it up.

The passengers stared at the aristocratic clergyman in amazement. They thought he had gone mad.

But the Rev. Samuel knew what he meant.

WHAT GIRLS SHOULD READ.

The question of what to give our girls to read has long been a difficult and moot point, but with the first Saturday in June all doubts on the subject must vanish. Our new paper, "GIRLS," is just the thing you are looking for. It is as bright and spirited and go-ahead as you like, and yet kindly and wholesome withal.

It is definitely intended for girls—all girls from ten to thirty—and the first monthly part, containing all the weekly numbers for May, appears, as I have already remarked, on Saturday, June 5th. The monthly parts, which are bound in a charming pale green cover, cost 6d., post free 8d., while the weekly numbers are a penny.

"GIRLS," I think I may say without any undue pride of possession, is the cheapest pennyworth going. The modern school-girl will find in its pages a bright, healthy, active note that I am sure not only she, but her parents will be delighted with, and consequently I advise you, if you want a copy, to send out and get it before they are all gone.

The June "GIRLS" will contain four excellent short stories; several chapters of an exciting serial by Miss Winifred Graham—"The Great House of Castleton"—and any number of fascinating articles touching on all the subjects that really do interest growing girls.

SUMMARY.

Honeypots Farm has recently been taken by John Gillway.

Farmer Strange is a widower with twin daughters, Diana and Kitty, who have been brought up by a wealthy aunt, Mrs. Caffyn.

Gillway has already fallen in love with Kitty, who was at first pleased by his attentions. She soon wearied of them, but being half afraid of him, makes many promises of fidelity before going abroad with her sister and aunt, which she never intends to keep.

At Capri they meet with Bernard Eliot, nicknamed "the Nabob" on account of his wealth. He speedily wins the affections of all three ladies, but seems to prefer Di's society.

They return to London, and as the two girls have now attained their majority they are given the option of remaining with their aunt or returning to their father for good. Kitty chooses the former and Di the latter.

Diana meets Gillway, and hears for the first time of the relations which had existed between him and Kitty. The Nabob purchases an estate named The Towers, and lives there with his wife.

Di goes to The Towers for the Christmas festivities, and after the return of the house-party from a moonlight skate, Mrs. Caffyn discovers that her jewels have been stolen.

CHAPTER IX.

Aunt Shales Gives a Clue.

The corridor was filled with frightened people. Some of them had not discovered their losses; there was a rush into bedrooms and a wild overhauling of trinket cases and trunks when Lady Rivers had announced the theft of her jewels. In most cases the result of the search was disastrous. Almost everyone had been robbed of money and jewellery, but Kitty was the greatest sufferer. She had lost every article of personal adornment—Mrs. Caffyn's Christmas gift, her wedding presents, her husband's Christmas offering of a diamond spray, and a roll of banknotes, whose numbers were unknown to her.

The Nabob had also lost a large sum of money, together with many valuable papers and effects. In the drawing-room, the thieves had carried away a vast quantity of costly bric-à-brac, and a descent into the butler's pantry proved the robbery to be still more extensive.

The plate that had been used during dinner had disappeared, and a window, opening upon a path fringed with shrubs, was ajar. Below the window the shrubs had been broken and trampled upon, the gravel was displaced and scattered, and looked as though some heavy burden had been thrown down from the window.

The Nabob sent for the police and summoned the servants together in the library. All of them had been engaged with excellent characters, and the butler and housekeeper, who were man and wife, appeared to feel their position deeply. They brought the keys of their boxes and gave them to their master with entreaties that he would examine their possessions.

"It must have been done while the men and maids were watching the skating, sir," said the housekeeper tearfully. "I was in the kitchen with one of the girls, and I thought that I heard somebody moving about in the pantry; but I never dreamt that Marshall had gone with the torch-bearers, or I'd have gone and seen who it was!"

"I told you I was going," said the butler.

"I never heard you, and being so tired, sir, what with the ball and the clearing up to-day, I can't swear that I didn't fall asleep in my own room, and the green baize doors do shut out all sounds so, that unless they're propped wide open, it's for all the world like living in another house. You don't hear a sound of what goes on upstairs."

A party of searchers opened the servants' boxes, while another scoured the grounds. In some of the rooms a trinket or so were found upon the floor, but in most of the apartments the robbery had been so neatly done, that it was evident the thieves had felt themselves to be perfectly secure, and had not hurried over their nefarious task. Nothing to implicate the servants was discovered. They were dismissed, and the housekeeper left the library in tears.

The police arrived; the guests were interviewed, and a list of the lost property taken. The servants were cross-questioned by the inspector, but nothing fresh was elicited from them. It was evident from the inspector's manner that he suspected some person in the house to be in league with the thieves, and the housekeeper became more and more tearful.

"Oh, I'm sure he thinks that I know something about it, Miss Strange," she sobbed to Di, who stood near her.

"He must suspect somebody," said Di. "But that is no reason why he should suspect you more than another. Don't cry, Mrs. Marshall, you know that you are innocent, and that is everything."

"The master's sure to suspect me, too!" said Mrs. Marshall despondently, as she glanced at the Nabob's pale, stern face. And this reflection seemed to add to the poignancy of her grief.

Later in the morning as Di was in the garden, she saw a man peeping over a wall that divided the park from the grounds. He saw her, and hastily disappeared. Di fancied that it was Gillway, and she wondered more than ever why he hung about The Towers, and seemed so fearful of meeting her.

Possibly she had been mistaken in thinking that the man was Gillway. It might have been someone from the neighbouring village who had heard of the robbery, and had followed the policeman as far as the house. But a few hours afterwards, something happened that revived Di's suspicion that it was Gillway whom she had seen. In the vicinity of the wall, hidden in the shrubs, one of the gardeners discovered a flour sack partly filled with the stolen plate and small articles that had been missed from the drawing and dining rooms.

Clearly the thieves had been disturbed, and were unable to get clear away with their burden. Di was among the anxious crowd that collected to view the sack. She examined it closely, and grew pale. By a certain mark upon it she knew that it belonged to Honeypots Farm! Was John Gillway concerned in the theft?

No one raised any objection to her leaving The Towers that day. Kitty was too hysterical and upset to think of anything except her losses. Mrs. Caffyn was depressed and gloomy, and the Nabob seemed anxious and miserable.

"I wonder if I dared suggest to my friends—if they would let me replace the things!" he said to Mrs. Caffyn, when they were waiting in the hall with Di for the dog-cart that was to take her back to her father. "I suppose it wouldn't be quite the thing, would it?"

"Good gracious, no, Bernard! As if you can help it, you poor boy!" exclaimed Mrs. Caffyn, growing suddenly bright. "Your own losses are considerable, and you've the annoyance of hearing everybody's complaints, and the horrid feeling of helplessness to bear that we haven't. Poor Di!" she added, passing her arms lovingly around Di's waist. "I meant to send you home richer, my dear, and you are going back poorer than when you came!"

"Di, you'll let me make it up to you, won't you?" the Nabob asked eagerly.

"Catch the thieves," said Di; "that is all I want——" She stopped suddenly. What had she said? If John Gillway was a thief, she did not want him to be punished.

"But he can't be!" she told herself angrily as she drove home by the side of a stolid groom. "I am wicked to have such a thought."

Farmer Strange's endless exclamations and questions concerning the robbery gave Di no time to think of anything else that day.

"I'm glad I didn't go," said he complacently. "I might have lost old granddad's turnip, and none of your new-fangled timekeepers 'ud ever have made up for it."

Di called upon Aunt Shales the following afternoon. Her anxiety about Gillway seemed to grow deeper, in spite of her constant reiterations to her listening heart that Gillway could have had no hand in the robbery. She found Aunt Shales in the cosy, well-kept kitchen, talking to her niece Polly in a sweet, cooing voice that contrasted strangely with the younger woman's shrill, vixenish tones.

"Lawks, Poll, my dear, I wouldn't take it to heart—no, that I wouldn't! Everybody knows what Jane be to their sorrer. Bless us, if it ain't Miss Strange! Do 'e come in. It's a rare long whiles since you've put your ten toes inside of my kitching. That it is, an' I've got the kittle on, an' that Em'ly's a-toasting Sally Lunns in the scul'ry. Leastways, she ought'er be a-toastin' of 'em, but it's more likely she's a-burnin' an' a-blackin' of 'em to match the grate in colour. Talk about havin' trials!" cried Aunt Shales, fixing her small twinkling eyes upon the wrathful-looking Polly. "Some folks dun'no the real meanin' of the word, that they don't. I'd like some of 'em to live inside my shoes, that I would. Well, there, everybody's got somethink to bear—some's got one thing and some another—but as I say, do let's be happy while we can, seein' as the hearse an' the undertaker's a-waitin' for us—leastways, for all of us as ain't obliged to have a walkin' funeral—an' the sooner it comes for some folks the better for them as is left behind, spesh'ly when they seems to be here for no other purpose than to breed mischief and riots in fam'lies, an' atwixt parties what asks nothin' better than to be lef' in peace an' quiet. What, goin' already, Poll? Well, there, the best of friends must part, musn't they? I on'y hopes as Jane'll step this way! I'll give her a towslin', drabbit her. Trust me for it, Poll!"

"If I'm disturbing you," began Di, as Polly departed with a loud bang of the heavy door and an exclamation to the effect that other folks besides Aunt Jane merited "towslin'."

"Lawks, that you ain't. I on'y wishes as all my visitors was as pleasant to the eyes as you be, Miss Di, that I do!" cried Aunt Shales, beaming upon Di, and making a cheerful rattle with the best gold-and-white tea-things upon a gaily-painted tray. She paused, with a glittering tea-pot in her hand, to say feelingly: "What a dreadful thing that rob'ry is at The Towers! Miss Kitty that was—Mrs. Eliot, as I oughter call her, seein' as she's married an' done for, po'r thing—must 'a felt reg'lar upset a-losin' all her jewels like that! An' Lady Rivers, po'r soul, to go an' be robbed of them em'ralds of hers! Seems as if it was to be, don't it? An' to think as I was a-tellin' Mr. Gillway about 'em on'y the other day, 'cause I saw 'em at the hunt ball, when she was a-dancin' like any May Queen, through the cracks in the hangings, po'r lady! I did hear as she'd gone stark, starin', ravin' mad, and I dun'no who'd blame her for it, that I don't," she said, placing the tray upon her cherished oak table and turning up its shining leaf in honour of her visitor. "'Course you lost your things, too, seein' as the whole house was swep' as clean as that blessed chimney when Cranks ain't drunk, which ain't none too often, wuss luck!"

Di related her own losses and those of the other guests, to the intense delight of her listener. When she came to the recovery of the stolen plate in the flour sack, Aunt Shales became greatly excited.

"Lawks, Miss Di!" she exclaimed, "just to think of that now! As I've allays said, there's them as can keep things to their own selves, and there's them as is too open to keep quiet when they can speak the Gospel truth. An' as I says, what's the use of our bein' given a tongue if we're to sit stock still like one of them scarecrows in a cherry orchard what never opens a lip, nor can't, not if it was to be paid twenty golden sovereigns! In a flour sack! I do declare it gives me the cold shivers to sit here in my own kitching an' think of it! It's a mercy we wasn't all murdered in our blessed beds, an' so I said to Mr. Gillway when he told me not to breathe a word about them sacks bein' missin' from the granary, an' I should never have known about that if one of the men didn't come as bold as brass an' ask me if I'd bin a-takin' them new sacks to lay down in my scul'ry!"

"When were the sacks missed?" asked Di. Her heart was beating violently. Had John Gillway a hand in the robbery after all?

"Well, it was yesterday as that Fletcher poked his impudent face inside that very door, an' asked me what I meant by takin' them new sacks as was all marked in red with a H and a F for Honeypots Farm. I sent him out of this room a sight quicker than he came in, that I did, and Mr. Gillway came in soon after, and sez he: 'Mrs. Shales, don't go a-talkin' to anybody about them sacks bein' took, or we shall never catch the thief,' sez he. But, 'pend upon it, he'd his own reasons for a-wantin' me to keep a still tongue, Miss Di. Mr. Gillway must have heard as that sack had been found, an' to think as he could shet his lips to me, an' never let out a blessed word about it!" said Aunt Shales, with a shake of her grey head.

"Was it early yesterday morning that—that Mr. Gillway spoke to you?"

"It was just after breakfast, 'bout eight by that very clock a-hangin' by your side, Miss Di. Lawks, you ain't a-eatin' nothin'! Let me put a drop o' somethink in your tea to keep the cold out, do now."

"No, no, thank you," stammered Di. "I never eat much at tea."

She felt sick and choking with fear. The sack of stolen plate had not been discovered until ten or eleven o'clock. As she rose to pull on her gloves, despite Aunt Shale's protestations, Gillway came abruptly into the room. Di thought that he cast a quick, suspicious glance from her pale face to his housekeeper's rosy, smiling visage. His own face looked dark with care.

"I was going to Greyhouse to-night," said he when he and Di had shaken hands. "I wanted to see Mr. Strange; I'll return with you now."

As they crossed the frozen fields he said sharply:

"How pale you are! Have the festivities been too much for you, or has the robbery frightened you, Miss Strange?"

Di looked at him very steadily. She saw the red colour burn in his face as his eyes met hers.

"I," not so easily frightened," she answered, "nor so

"When were the sacks missed?"

"Oh, I know I'm wicked!"

weak—as you think. Have you heard of the discovery of one of your missing sacks, filled with plate, in the garden at The Towers?"

"Yes. I knew of the discovery yesterday. Did you lose many things?"

"I had so little to lose. The thieves took two bracelets that had been given me for Christmas presents. Aunt Caffyn gave me one and Bernard the other."

"Valuable ones?"

"I think so."

"You must have deeply regretted your loss—especially the loss of 'Bernard's' bracelet," said Gillway in a bitter voice.

"I would rather be the loser than the thief, Mr. Gillway."

"So I should imagine, from what I have seen of you," he retorted; and then he added, in the same morose tones: "You appeared to enjoy the skating very much on Christmas night."

"I did—very much. I saw you by the edge of the pond."

"And I saw you—with Mr. Eliot. You passed me several times."

"Why didn't you speak? And why did you run away on Christmas Eve, when I—when we were in the conservatory?" she demanded.

"I ran because I had no wish to be seen."

"It is not very honourable to—to prowl about people's grounds, and to stare in at their windows, and—and—to do things that are not quite open," cried Di, growing incoherent in her pain and anger.

"Do you think not? I might retaliate—if I had the right. Not having the right to criticise your conduct I am dumb."

"I don't understand you! And I have no desire to," said Di. "I know that I have no right either to criticise what you do, but I think that for Kitty's sake you—you ought not to be seen hanging about The Towers. She is thoughtless, and means no harm."

"And I am not thoughtless, and I do mean harm. Is that your opinion of me, Miss Strange?" he asked very quietly.

"I don't want to form any opinion about you. But if you run away when you are seen staring into windows, and refuse to take any notice when you are called, and must know that you have been seen, I can't help thinking that you feel ashamed of having been detected. That is all, Mr. Gillway," said Di, holding her head very high, and passing into the house before he could answer. "Oh, he is not a thief!" she said to herself when she was alone in her room. "He still loves Kitty, and it was to see her that he watched by the pond and in the grounds. But he is not a thief! I am sure he is not!"

The reflection did not seem to afford her much relief, for she cried a great deal that night, and looked so wan when the Nabob called the following morning that he was distressed to see her.

The Towers was nearly empty, he told her. Kitty was intensely miserable, and no clue to the perpetrators of the robbery had been found. Di returned with him to The Towers, yielding to his persuasions that she could comfort Kitty. But Kitty refused to be consoled.

Tired and wretched-looking, she cried over the loss of her ornaments, and grew angry and impatient with Di and the Nabob when they tried to take a cheerful view of the case. Nor did her distress lessen as time went on. She relapsed once more into the irritable woman who had found no happiness in life at Greyhouse Farm. She was peevish with her husband, rude and curt in her manner to him, and seemed to take a childish and unreasoning delight in paining him.

Sometimes when Di was taking a lonely walk over the fields or through the wintry lanes, she came upon Kitty's horse tethered to a tree, and two figures—a man and a woman — talking together. Di returned home with a sore heart. She knew that the man and woman were John Gillway and Kitty. Did the Nabob suspect the flirtation that was going on? Di told herself that he must, for only a blind man could fail to see Kitty's strange vivacity when Gillway was present, and her dull depression when he had left her. But her husband made no sign of understanding.

He seemed to grow even more patient and gentle with Kitty, taking no apparent notice of her snubs and irritability, but always treating her with the same kindness and tender consideration. He appeared determined to shut his eyes to her caprices and ill-temper and growing infatuation for the man whom she had jilted for his sake.

"Oh, Kitty!" Di said once to her sister when she had ridden over to The Towers. "How can you speak so unkindly to Bernard?"

Kitty laughed, and the laugh was not pleasant to hear.

"I don't speak more unkindly to him than I feel," she said passionately. "Oh, I wish I had never married him!"

"But you were so happy at Christmas," said Di. "You said then that your marriage was an ideal one."

"That was all pretence," said Kitty; "I wanted aunt to think we were happy, so that I might get the money she promised me. I shan't get it now; she's not going to give me anything until she dies; the loss of her jewels is to blame for that."

"You are most unreasonable, dear. Surely you don't hold Bernard responsible for the robbery?"

"He ought to have made the horrid police find my things! Just think of my beautiful diamonds, and the moonstones and emeralds and everything!"

"I forbid you to utter one word to your sister."

"How can he make the police discover them, dear? Do be more reasonable, Kitty. Have you forgotten how Bernard forgave you for practising that deception about your fortune upon him?"

Kitty burst into tears, covering her face with her thin hands.

"Oh, I know I'm wicked," she sobbed. "But I can't help it, Di. I thought I loved him, indeed, I did. And now I hate him!"

"Hush, hush, dear," Di said gently, placing her arm around Kitty's shoulders. "Kitty, don't think me prying or censorious, dear; but is it right to meet John Gillway as you do? Aren't you giving people cause for gossip?"

With a quick jerk Kitty wrenched herself away.

"Bernie has told you to speak to me about John!" she cried. "I don't care what people say. He's the only person who understands what I suffer, and if I didn't talk to him I should kill myself."

The robbery at The Towers took place at Christmas. In the early days of February a second robbery at the residence of a big country magnate was perpetrated, and this time the plunderers escaped with an enormous quantity of plate. Before the police had finished making inquiries about this second robbery, a third one was committed, and again the thieves made a most successful haul.

Di met Kitty and Gillway walking together near Honeypots Farm upon the morning that succeeded the night of the third robbery. Kitty seemed greatly excited. Her cheeks were scarlet, and her eyes unnaturally bright.

At sight of Di she broke from Gillway's side and ran to her. "Oh Di!" she exclaimed, "I must tell you! I can't keep the secret——"

Gillway took a hasty step forward and laid his hand upon Kitty's arm. He had not winced beneath the steady scorn in Di's eyes.

"I forbid you to utter one word to your sister," he said in an authoritative manner. "There is no need to make her unhappy yet—she must learn everything before long."

"Oh, I must tell her. Do let me. She thinks——"

"You will ruin us, Kitty, if you break silence until no harm can come of speech," said Gillway, between his set teeth.

"There is but one man in the world who has the right to command Kitty. You are not that man," cried Di, as she turned imploringly to Kitty, throwing out her hands towards the shrinking little figure.

"Oh, Kitty, tell me, dear, trust in me—have faith in my love!"

John Gillway drew Kitty's trembling arm through his own, and faced Di. Once his stern mouth had twitched; it was the only sign he gave of understanding her pain.

"Kitty cannot tell you, Miss Strange," he said. "I have a claim upon her obedience in this matter. I must exact it."

Ignoring Gillway, Di uttered her sister's name in tones of passionate entreaty and tender yearning.

"No, no," murmured Kitty, clinging closer to Gillway and looking now at Di with terrified, childish eyes. "I—I have nothing to tell you, Di, nothing at all; indeed I haven't!"

As Di turned almost savagely upon Gillway, the sound of a horse's hoofs ringing upon the frosty ground fell upon her ears. Kitty and Gillway caught the echo.

"It is Bernie!" Kitty cried breathlessly. "Take me away. Oh, don't let him see me!"

Gillway drew her into an adjoining field, and the next moment Kitty passed Di upon her horse. Her little face was ghastly pale under the narrow brim of her black riding hat, and her lips were blue with the chill of fear. Di made no effort to arrest her. Silently she watched Kitty disappear in the direction of The Towers, and then she retraced her steps homewards, cold with dread and oppressed with a sick, nameless apprehension that made her heart feel like a dead weight in her breast.

HEY, RUBE!

Who was he?

Only a circus performer—a leaper who was accustomed to doing flying-trapeze acts and leaping from a spring-board, amid the plaudits of the spectators, who enjoyed it all the more that it was just possible he might miss and dash himself into fragments at their feet. How graceful he is in his silk tights and spangled waist, slight and small, yet Hurculean in strength.

The doctor at the hospital was accustomed to dying men, accustomed to sorrowful heart histories, to sad, sad scenes of parting and death. But he had nothing to do with them. He was there to learn something of interest to science; to study the laws of anatomy; to reduce a fracture successfully, or kill a fever.

He looked into dying eyes, not to read the secrets they held of a life that had passed, but to observe how coma affected them, and to interpret the value of bromide or morphine. This hospital doctor would have done the same thing in the following case, but for one of those curious links in the chain of life which demand a conversation of interests whether we will or no. He had gone one day last summer to the circus, and his two little boys with him; they had been delighted with the double treat—that of being with papa, and seeing the glory of wonderland. One little fellow had gone wild over the gymnast and leaper, the man who shot into the air, came down upon his feet, turned a somersault, kissed his finger-tips to the spectators, and sped on feet of air from the ring.

Now, there was something strange in the fact that when one of the little fellows died—as he did suddenly and unexpectedly, as children go—he in dying talked of this man. And it was strange that the doctor saw nothing of interest in his patient till his other boy, going the rounds with him, pulled at his coat and whispered:

"It's Bertie's man, papa; the one that jumped over all the horses and into the air, and went over and over. Oh, papa! won't you mend him up?"

But the poor fellow was past mending, and the doctor knew it. He had made a mis-step, and, falling, struck on his head and shoulders, and they had picked him up and carried him out, and he had lain here ever since. His comrades had left him, with many a handshake and sympathetic tear, and gone on without him, and he did not care. What was there left for him in life?

When the doctor knew who the man was he thought of his dead boy, and at once began the task of making death easy to him. That was all he could do, just smooth with kindness that sure descent we must all tread.

"Who is Lulu?" asked the doctor.

The day which would have no morrow came at last to the sick man, and all the morning he lay sleeping and dozing, and at night he was dying; his cheeks were red with fever heat; he was in a delirium, and imagined himself in the circus, listening to the plaudits of the crowds. Over and over again he repeated the name of Lulu.

"Who is Lulu?" asked the doctor, with a hope of releasing the troubled spirit from dwelling on the past.

"An angel," said the dying man, faintly and brokenly; "an angel in Heaven now. But she was my good angel on earth—mine—mine—mine! Do you hear, doctor? I defy you to part us there—you cannot! You dare not!"

The doctor gave him a soothing draught, but he grew wilder, and raved of Lulu—only Lulu!

"Listen," he cried; "do you hear that call? It means trouble in the circus. Not among the animals, the wild savage beasts, but among men, aye, and women, too. Ah, doctor, she was all I had; just my little Lulu. We had thought it so cruel not to have known and loved each other all our lives, but she was a wife before I knew her. Good Heavens, how he abused her; and when they told her he was dead the poor child went out into the world for herself, and I found her—quick, doctor, give me water; I am strangling."

The doctor lifted his head, and the water gurgled in the throat of the dying man. He could no longer swallow, but it cooled his parched lips.

"I taught her to do the trapeze business. She was small and light and quick. She was beautiful and innocent. How I loved her! And after we had been together for about a year she married me, and we were happy—so happy! And she played so well. Her eyes shone with her new happiness. Her heart was so light that she attracted crowds, and one night in the season here—oh, doctor, it is hard for a dying man to talk—she—she just took the house by storm. There was an ovation. She was recalled again and again. The manager doubled her salary on the spot, but we didn't care for that. It was just the triumph in her art—we loved each other, and the life, too."

The leaper, who could never again hear the applause he once coveted, lifted the portrait in his hands to his lips and kissed it fervently. He looked so strong and bright that a neophyte in matters of life and death would have mistaken him for a man in good health.

"The next night Lulu was to give them a new and dangerous feat, and the house was full, crowded, and she never looked so lovely. I made my great leap and ran out of the ring, and found Lulu waiting to go on. She looked so small and sweet, so like a lovely, affectionate child; she was so innocent and altogether lovely, I just took her in my arms and kissed her. It was the last time!

"'Teddie,' she said, laying her soft cheek against mine, 'Teddie, we've been happy, haven't we?'

"'And will be as long as we live,' I said.

"Then I saw that she had been crying, and I was going to say she could not go on, when the call for her came, and she was gone. She turned and looked at me as she went in—Yes, yes, Lulu, I'm coming."

The doctor did not move; there was no irregularity in the man's breathing now, and he spoke distinctly and fast, but the medical man was not deceived. It was the beginning of the end. Even his thoughts wandered, and he held imaginary conversation with that Lulu he loved.

"I said she went on; she did her part splendidly, and won round after round of applause, and came off; but I did not see her, as I had another leap to make, and as I went into the ring the first person I saw was a cross-eyed man. We show people are superstitious, doctor, and—oh, this pain!—I knew that meant bad luck. I was just balancing for the leap when there came a cry—oh, doctor, I can hear it yet—that cry stands for 'Help' among circus people. It was Lulu, and her voice rang out over the whole crowd, 'Hey, Rube!' I heard it, and the shot that followed, but I was balanced for the leap, and could not stop, and I fell short. That was why they left me here."

"And Lulu?" suggested the doctor, as he saw the dying man's attention wander.

"Lulu is dead. Shot, they told me afterwards, by her husband, who was alive after all. But it's all right, doctor—all right. There is no marriage nor giving in marriage there. Yes—yes—my darling; I am coming—coming—coming!"

The doctor's watch lay on the table, and counted and ticked off the minutes. When the hand hour pointed to midnight, the ward was asleep, and strange, drifting shadows like intangible visitors swept up and down the long vista, and wrapt all the suffering inmates in their beneficent arms. Then, in the solemn stillness, a strange, weird cry rang out like the notes of a war trumpet or the midnight call of some brooding tropical bird:

"Hey, Rube!"

It seemed to come out of space. The white faces of disturbed sleepers peered into the shadows a moment, than all fell back to sleep, thinking it a troubled dream. The doctor looked at the face of the man he was watching—and he was asleep, too.

PADRE GIOVANNI'S MIRACLE.

I.

ANTONIO and Lucia were on their wedding journey. To Antonio it was not a new experience. In earlier days, with Margherita's little brown hand tucked under his arm, he had trudged over the dusty road to Brescia, where, in the church of Marie del Carmine, the good padre married them. Margherita was just sixteen and wonderfully pretty. Antonio was young too, and very proud of the dark eyes which sought his so trustingly.

Both were happy. They had always been lovers. People said she was much too good for the handsome, lazy fellow, but she did not know it. Another young man loved her madly, but she did not know that either, or that after she married he went away and became a priest.

One day they carried the little wife out through the Porto Milano, down the long avenue of cypress to the Campo Santo. Of course Antonio was disconsolate; but it came to pass that—from very loneliness, perhaps—he soon fell prey to another pair of eyes, blacker and bolder than Margherita's. Then, naturally enough, followed the second wedding journey.

They were going to Venice. Lucia was herself Venetian, and it had needed no argument to induce Antonio to remove there, since it had long been the darling wish of his heart. Although the day was warm, Lucia was arrayed in all her bridal finery. To be sure, the high collar of her gown was far too straight for her portly throat; her fat, red arms protruded awkwardly from the tight sleeves; but that was nothing; nor was she unhappy because her white gloves refused to become amenable to buttons.

The bridegroom, however, was not so passive under the restraint of his unaccustomed impedimenta. Once established in the railway carriage, he hastened to divest himself of hat and coat, bestowing them in the network overhead, along with Lucia's bonnet on its big bandbox, and Angelo's cap and shoes. Sure enough, there was Angelo—Margherita's child, big-eyed and olive-cheeked—who should not be overlooked; though when one comes to think about it, he did seem rather out of place in a wedding party. Yet the boy amused himself as only motherless children do, and troubled nobody.

At Verona, two priests got into the carriage. To one of them Antonio was well known. Was it not he who had settled the padre's fate for him by marrying the woman whom they both loved? Antonio had been unconscious of a rival, and there had been no quarrel; so there was now no ill-feeling on the part of either man. Padre Giovanni had forgiven Antonio for loving Margherita—who could help loving her?—but he pitied himself for losing her. Under certain conditions, indeed, he was even capable of compassion for another bereft of her, but now—Lucia rested her head on her husband's willing shoulder with her hand in his, quite openly, as without doubt they had the right, even in a railway carriage; for were they not newly-married? At a glance the young priest recognised in Lucia, Margherita's successor. He watched her furtively, noting the velvety blackness of her eyes, whose too heavy eyebrows met across a wide expanse over the nose. Then he recalled the sweet face of Margherita, and it was no wonder that the new wife suffered by the comparison.

A nod of greeting passed between the two men, but wishing to discourage further advances, the padre opened his breviary and fell to reading. Meanwhile, the love-making prospered in one corner, and the child—flushed and tired—slumbered in another. Yet strive against it as he would, Padre Giovanni's mind ever wandered from the printed page. By-and-bye his regard strayed to the motherless boy, and lingered there. Margherita's coquettish smile hovered about his mouth as he dreamt. Who would caress him now?

Of course, Antonio was proud of the child's beauty; but what assurance was there that this woman would be kept from ill-treating him? She seemed capable of it, the padre thought. His heart waxed hot within him as he brooded. "Ah, if it had but pleased God to give me Margherita's love," he sighed—"and this child!"

Angelo moved uneasily in his sleep. Both parents were too much engrossed with each other to notice him, so the padre adjusted the little body to a more comfortable posture, wasting, as he did so, a withering look on the all-unconscious couple.

II.

THE distorted shadows of a Venetian evening were lying darkly on canal and street, when Padre Giovanni passed out of the church of San Marcilliano and, seeing no gondola on the Rio della Misericordia, quickly made his way to the Ria San Felice where one was always sure to be passing. In the interval which elapsed between the "Spth" with which he hailed a boatman, and the appearance of a gondola, there was a splash in the water.

It was rapidly growing dark, and the padre was in a hurry, but something made him hesitate. Now, the padre's heart was tender towards all helpless things, and he could just discern a small, dark object, struggling in the canal. Without stopping to consider further than that some poor creature was in trouble, in cassock and shoes he plunged in, soon to reappear with the limp form of a child in his arms.

A ready application of the simple remedies at his command was at last rewarded by a faint sigh. Lighting a taper, the padre stooped low and peered into the face of—Angelo! There had been no outcry. The waiting gondola, until then unobserved, was impressed, and the good padre had slipped with his precious charge into the darkness.

During the next few days he was but dimly conscious that something had happened. Weak and inert, he accepted his new condition unquestioned. The unwearying devotion of the padre was such a new phase in Angelo's experience that natural home-sickness was turned to languid satisfaction.

Padre Giovanni was in no haste to spare his small guest. Long before he would admit—even to himself—the boy's convalescence, they were fast friends. At last there came a time when the padre could no longer temporise.

Then into his heart dropped an evil thought which took root and grew apace, for it had fallen in fertile soil. "What more fitting," he asked himself, "than that the Church adopt this child of the sea? Is not Her seal set upon him in baptism? Has he not been miraculously restored from death by a humble servant of the Church? Moreover," as the most binding clause of a will is its codicil, so the padre kept his stoutest argument in reserve—"moreover, surely Margherita would have it so, and should not he undertake that her son be trained for the priesthood?"

"For Margherita's sake," had been his dominating motive since he first beheld her face. Many a battle against the world, the flesh, and the devil, had he fought—and won, too—in the name of that sweet saint.

So, that which at first seemed but an episode in Padre Giovanni's quiet life, came by degrees to absorb it. One so methodical as he must of necessity resume his old habits after a time, but it was with a difference. The lad could not be suffered to renew his acquaintance with the neighbourhood of San Marcilliano; at least, not until it should have been effaced from his memory.

This was not difficult to accomplish, since Angelo was lodged with the priest's sister; but it involved the daily separation under which the padre fretted! Sometimes as he approached the house at night, a sickening dread possessed him lest harm had befallen the child. From the parting till the happy meeting a sweet refrain was ever singing in his heart. The church bells rang: "Angelo!" The great organ pealed: "Angelo!" The very splash of the gondolier's oars kept time to the name.

In the main, Padre Giovanni's conscience was docile, if one eliminated a menacing prick when he chanced to meet Angelo, gloomy and dark, as he paddled his boat—not for very joy of sky and sea—only for hire.

Were there no sunshine, there would be no shadows, and it is not strange that across these two happy lives a little cloud flitted. One day the padre awoke to the discovery that the lad hummed a lilting gondolier-song far oftener than the solemn music of the Church. That was but natural for one so young, the man admitted, comforting himself so; nevertheless he pondered over it a long time. Troubles, like snowballs, grow bigger every time they are turned over, and, truth to tell, the passing years did not mend matters.

"I wish I might have been a gondolier, amico mio," sighed Angelo, tossing away his book and stretching himself to his full height one day when an especially hard lesson confronted him.

"A handsome head to be so empty," thought the padre, but he said severely: "Boy, did God deliver thee from the danger of death to turn thy back upon Him?"

"Ah, no!" answered the boy humbly, "but I should have been happier so."

And the padre, perceiving the truth, took counsel within himself and resolved to give the graceful, restless youth a little longer tether.

III.

IT was Christmas Eve. The midnight mass was over. Prince and pauper jostled each other as they crowded out of the church. Stiff with cold, Padre Giovanni was gathering up his precious parcels of mustard and mandorlato, which he had secured a buon mercato, for Angelo's treat, when a woman in sore distress entered his confessional box.

"Oh, padre mio," she sobbed, "my heart is breaking. I am a second wife. I love my husband and I have been faithful to him. Ten years ago, our boy—his boy. I have never been a mother—was lost, or stolen, or drowned. My husband accuses me of the crime because I was jealous of the child. I was jealous, he looked so like his pretty mother. But God knows I never did him harm. Indeed, I tried to be kind to him for the father's sake. All these years we have lived a miserable existence. My husband is old, yet he is still a young man. I am all to blame for taking the dead woman's place. I can bear it no longer. To-night I am going to end it. Oh, padre mio, absolve me, absolve me, I pray!"

The church was oppressive with palpitating silence. The last priest had deserted his stall. The altar candles had been extinguished. The air was biting in its chill. Again the penitent pleaded for pardon.

"Pity me, padre! Oh, pity and forgive my sins." The voice that answered was hoarse and strange.

"I will pray God for thee, my daughter. I cannot give thee absolution for the evil purpose which is hidden in thy heart. Pray Him to cast it out."

"Alas, alas!" moaned the woman. "To die is happiness, but oh, to live, I cannot!" Her voice was choked with weeping. The rising wind wailed drearily. The padre shivered, but was silent. Another piteous cry was poured into the unseen, listening ear.

"In the name of the Church I forbid thee to do thyself harm!" sternly answered the priest. "Pray, pray, my daughter, against temptation," he went on more gently. "God is able to comfort thee, if it please Him. Thy son may be restored to thee. Go in peace, my child."

The first streak of dawn found Padre Giovanni where the woman had left him. It had cost a mortal struggle to give her his ghostly consolation. By the hint of possible restitution to averta crime, had he not compromised with his own conscience? Would God hold him responsible for the letter of his unspoken promise?

What was this stranger that he should be called upon to pay such a penalty for her life? Was not Angelo already her ward? And, after all, what right had he to settle the lad's fate? A blank wall seemed to shut him in. A sense of suffocation overpowered him, and he stepped out into the church. Perhaps the morning light comforted him, for with it came the thought: "Would Angelo leave me, were the opportunity given him?" He clutched at the gleam of hope which the question suggested. As he reasoned within himself he took heart. "Angelo shall choose between us," he said, and with a sigh he left the church and made his way towards home. Confident of Angelo's love, he tried to shake off his fears.

The sun was now fully up, and the streets were astir. The padre stopped at a stall and asked the price of a fine cluster of grapes, then passed on, without waiting to hear the reply. He turned his face up to the sun. It refused to warm him. Every step grew heavier. A revulsion of feeling took possession of him. He scorned himself as if he were regarding the moral obliquity of a fellow-man. He now no longer tried to put any other construction upon his evil doing. And he an annointed priest! Goaded by such reflections, he was almost ready to give himself up to justice, when the radiant face of Angelo shone out upon him from a balcony at a turn of the street. In that glance every consideration was put to flight, except the wild longing to keep the lad forever.

"Padre Giovanni!" cried Angelo, springing down to meet him. "Art thou ill, amico mio? How pale thou art, and how cold!" seizing, as he spoke, one of the padre's trembling hands.

"Angelo, there be they that would claim thee," gasped the man breathlessly, lest his courage fail him. "Wouldst thou change thy lot? Wilt thou leave me for strangers—strangers, dear child?"

"To go whither?"

"To thy father's house, boy, where are none but himself and thy—thy stepmother."

"And who is my father, padre mio? A glass-maker, or a merchant?"

The priest could scarcely suppress a groan, as he calmly answered:

"Thy father is a gondolier, my son."

"Truly! a gondolier. Say'st thou so, padre mio?" Angelo's eyes shone. "But thou—wouldst thou have me go?" He kissed the priest's hand, clinging to it as he turned upon him a look of fond affection.

"Yes, Angelo, if thy heart incline thee, go. It shall be as thou wilt, dear child."

It was bravely spoken, and with infinite tenderness, but the padre's whole being was shaken. Great drops of sweat stood like beads on his white forehead. He must have fallen but for the strong supporting arm of Angelo, who, pitying, comprehended not.

Not many hours later, hand in hand, the two friends threaded the narrow streets of a quarter of the city hitherto unknown to Angelo. As they went, Padre Giovanni told the lad the story of his life—as much, at least, as sufficed to satisfy his curiosity about himself—and happiness is not over exacting. If Angelo evinced more gratitude for the mere act of saving his life than for the love which had followed him so faithfully, who shall cast the first stone? If sorrow at parting with his foster-father was tempered by the thought of that unknown parent whom he was soon to meet, who shall marvel? Were there no self to overcome, where would be the need of an evangel? Angelo was about to realise the full fruition of his dream. The prospect filled him with joy, yet who shall say that he did not love the padre sincerely?

At last they stopped before a tall house, dingy and weather-beaten. In the moment before entering, they stood together in the damp loggia regarding one another tenderly. Then the padre embraced Angelo, and with faltering voice fervently blessed him:

"Be a good son, my child. Thy mother mourns thee as one dead. See to it that she repent not the day thou art found. God keep thee, Angelo!" whispered the priest, and was gone.

The miracle which was wrought that day in the name of the Church was greater by far than ever before was done by priest, or nun, or sacred relic. It had indeed pleased God to hear Lucia's prayer and restore her boy.

Aged with sorrow, Padre Giovanni had set forth to bestow all that he had upon strangers. When he returned it was with a face illumined, and the heart of a child.

A PUPIL OF VOLTAIRE.

"I HAVE a favour to ask of you on behalf of the Pichons. These Pichons are a family of domestic servants who have been transplanted in Paris for the benefit of my niece. One of the Pichons has just died, leaving several little Pichons behind him. I have requested that one of them be sent to me to bring up.

"I now learn that this particular little Pichon is, at the present moment, in the basket of the diligence; have the goodness to find out for me. Send him to us from basket to basket, and you will have performed a good action; I would rather bring a Pichon to manhood, than serve a king, were he King of the Vandals."

The Pichon whom Voltaire recommended so warmly to M. Tronchin in this letter, which has since become classic, did not arrive so promptly as his illustrious protector—who was promising himself great future gratification—in his impatience, could have wished.

"I prophesy well of this little Pichon," he would say, snuffing a delicate pinch of Spanish tobacco. "These children of the people are sometimes singularly gifted. I will form him myself; he will not be the first adept recruited to philosophy from the lower walks of life. He will be my little Jean Jacques!"

And with this shaft aimed at his rival and particular aversion, the malicious old man rubbed his hands in glee.

At last, one fine morning, the human package was delivered at Ferney. He proved to be a shaggy urchin of about ten years, timid and something heavy witted.

Brought into the presence of the master of the house, who examined him from the depths of his easy chair, he stood awkward and ill at ease, pulling at a string of straw-coloured hair that fell over his forehead and smearing the carpet with mud from his shoes, in a clumsy scrape that passed for a reverence. Then, embarrassed and mute, he hid his eyes behind his elbow and shifted uneasily from one foot to the other.

The philosopher tried him with a few questions. Unfortunately, in spite of the flattering predictions that had been made, the youthful Pichon (Jean Baptiste) possessed none of the brilliant dispositions of the little Arouet who had dazzled Ninon de l'Enclos' circle with his precocious intelligence and lively wit.

He was no prodigy, he was simply an ordinary child of very limited capacity, quite indifferent to the majesty of him who was already called "King Voltaire."

The basket from which he descended (a sort of wicker case suspended at the front of the coach) had communicated to him, thanks to the close neighbourhood of the horses, a very perceptible odour, which disagreeably affected the olfactories of M. de Voltaire, who, in spite of his democratic tirades, had passably aristocratic tastes and the dainty ways of a dandy. So with a grimace and a hand to his nostrils he began by consigning his future disciple to the kitchen.

But the next day, returning to those educational projects which had inspired him to write so pretty a letter, the patriarch of Ferney deigned to give the well-scrubbed, brushed, and tidied Jean Baptiste his first lesson.

The apprenticeship was hard to both.

The country boy, brought up by an aged grandmother to tend her geese and turkeys, and scarcely able to spell a few words out of his old prayer-book, did not understand the first word of the long explanations his improvised schoolmaster entered into—and patience was the least of his master's virtues, although it is supposed to be the dominating one of the sage.

Stormy sessions ensued in which the pitiless railler whose tongue had found such bitterness with which to lash the "King of the Vandals," by no means spared humble Pichon.

And thus it came about that while everyone was going into ecstasies over his good fortune; while the philosopher's heirs were becoming uneasy, and the servants jealous, the poor little fellow was often so miserable that he would run away off into the fields by himself and cry.

How much he would have preferred a rustic cottage with black bread, eaten in mirth and washed down with clear water, to the sumptuous chambers and the savoury food of the château; or the dilapidated costume of the little shepherds running barefoot through the mountains, to these severe black garments which transformed him into a miniature Genevan minister, stiff and solemn.

Never would he have had the courage to endure this life had it not been for the profound gratitude he bore towards his protector (heavily as this protection weighed upon him) and his friendship for Marie.

Marie was the Ferney milkmaid; a little Swiss girl, as pretty as a peach in her red fustian and velvet corselet. Her ease of manner and saucy grace contrasted with Jean Baptiste's awkward timidity, and her affection for him took on a shade of motherliness. M. de Voltaire could never have caused her a tremour with all his wig and his gold eyeglasses. Just from the pretty assurance of her salute when she happened to cross his path it was easy to see that he did not intimidate her in the least; ah! no indeed!

"What a goose you are!" she would say to her little friend. "Leave all those tiresome books that bother you so, tell the master you are not going to study any more, and come and work on the farm with my cousin Jacques."

He shook his head. He would have liked to follow her advice but he had not the courage. Then in pity at his weakness: "Let us study together," said the girl.

And, seated beside each other on the grass, while the cows grazed around them, she leant over his shoulder and set to work to solve the problems that were perplexing him.

Her bright, receptive mind made her much quicker of comprehension than her companion, and it seemed as though only for passing through her rosy lips the most difficult lesson became clear and easy. Jean Baptiste soon contracted the agreeable habit of carrying on his studies in this way.

"You are the one M. de Voltaire should take for a pupil," he would often exclaim in his admiration.

"I would far rather keep to my milking stool," she would make laughing reply.

At the setting of the sun, Jacques, coming down from the mountain whistling the "Ranz des Vaches," would collect, on his way home, dairymaid and cows; and Jean Baptiste's heart would sink as he watched them joyously return to the farm.

Thanks to this system of study, the pupil made rapid progress, the credit for which his learned professor took entirely to himself, ignorant of the fact that he had a petticoated co-labourer.

"If only God will spare my life, Little Pichon shall be 'Great.'"

he would repeat with conviction. Certainly, this, as an education, was fully up to the standard of Emile's.

When the eighty-year-old Voltaire was seized with a desire to see again that Paris he had left thirty years before, he took his pupil with him in the capacity of secretary.

This favour, which made him an object of envy to all, threw desolation into the soul of the poor youth, whom it separated from his kind little friend. But he docilely followed his master, sustained by the prospect of ultimate return, and intoxicated, just a little, perhaps, by that magic word, Paris.

And at Paris, for a fact, the secretary of M. de Voltaire became quite a personage; the glory of the great man irradiated him. He had his flatterers and his courtiers who encumbered the ante-rooms, waiting to cull from his lips some sally of wit or biting epigram which they could immediately spread about. Duchesses, eager to obtain a glimpse of the great man's august wig, humbled themselves so far as to beg "Monsieur Pichon" to allow them to take a peep.

And "Monsieur Pichon" swelled with pride at his own importance, said "Our tragedy" when he spoke of "Irene," which he was copying, and quite forgot his rustic friend.

The awakening was cruel.

When M. de Voltaire died, our Pichon, whom he had neglected to mention in his will, became simple Pichon again; just what he was when they took him from the basket of the diligence.

Did his heart turn to Marie then? Did he long for the little Swiss town once more? Yes, but false pride held him back. Besides, he who had once been secretary of M. de Voltaire could never take up a peasant's work again; his arms had lost in strength what his mind had gained in knowledge.

He was obliged, therefore, to nourish himself with the honey of science which had at first been fed him so against his will, and to mingle with the buzzing ranks of of those pseudo-philosophers who might fitly be termed "M. de Voltaire in small change." He was secretary successively to M. Condorcet, M. J. Chenier-Bailly, until at last he landed in the household of Collot-d'Herbois, who had played in Voltaire's tragedies before he had come to write one of his own—in blood. Pichon was an obscure, disappointed, embittered man, and he assisted an impassive, uninterested spectator of the fearful sacrifices of the Reign of Terror.

One morning he was engaged in opening a voluminous correspondence when the noise of a discussion reached his ears, and in a moment a woman burst through his door, and threw herself weeping at his feet.

"My husband, citizen; give me back my husband," she moaned.

"I am not Collot-d'Herbois, citizens," said the secretary coldly. "He sits in the Tribunal."

"The Tribunal that has just condemned my Jacques?" she cried, wringing her hands. "Oh, it cannot be. I must see him—speak to him. He knows me, I used to take him milk at the theatre in Geneva."

"What is your name?"

"Marie Cordier, wife of Jacques Bosson."

"Marie——"

He looked at her with eager eyes, searching her distorted features for some far-off memory.

"Do you not know me?" he stammered with fast-beating heart.

She gave a cry of joy.

"Jean Baptiste!" and threw her arms about his neck. It was indeed his old-time companion, the pretty dairy maid of Ferney.

With touching simplicity she told him her story. She had felt very badly when he did not come back to Ferney, had wept many tears, but, fortunately, Jacques was there, her poor Jacques whom she had so neglected and snubbed; he had shown himself so true and tender, so devoted, that he had finally consoled her grief. Insensibly she had been led to forget the forgetful one, and when Jacques had left to go to Versailles, where Mme. Elizabeth was organising a Swiss farm, she had shed almost as many tears as at the departure of Jean Baptiste.

Soon the good princess, touched by this rustic romance, reunited the lovers, married them, and made Marie mistress of the dairy at Montreuil.

"Oh, but since you are here, since you know all these blood-thirsty savages, you can tear my husband from them," went on the little woman volubly.

He protested feebly. It was impossible. Collot-d'Herbois would not listen to a word.

"Not a word?" she repeated indignantly. "I'll find a way to make him listen to me."

She spoke with all her old saucy audacity, then, in a pleading tone; "I beg of you, friend, save Jaques—your old comrade, my husband."

"It is just because he is your husband," he replied in smothered tones, in which all his hate was expressed.

She stood for a moment, hesitating to comprehend. "You refuse?" she asked.

"Yes," he answered, pitilessly.

She looked him in the face without a word, then she scornfully wiped her cheek as though to remove all traces of the kiss he had given her, and left the room.

Jean Baptiste's head sank into his hand, and he became lost in thought.

She had been the good angel of his youth, the consoling fairy who had never once repulsed him; now he had repulsed her most cruelly by his refusal. Was he then worse than the monsters that surrounded him?

Remorse pierced his heart; he felt a fierce desire to repair his inhumanity to save his rival. But how? By pleading? He knew prayers were utterly in vain. By trickery? A wild, heroic idea shot through his mind. "Why not?" he murmured. "The executioner will have his full complement of heads, and she will be obliged to weep for me."

The next day Marie was at the Barrière du Trone awaiting the approach of the funeral carts. Since her effort had not availed to save her husband, the courageous little woman was at least determined to be near him at the last.

Suddenly she felt a hand fall upon her shoulder and a voice murmur in her ear:

"Marie!"

"You, you! free!" she gasped, trembling. "How? Who did it?"

"Our friend Pichon, who brought me a permit he said you had sent me."

"He? Ah, noble heart! Where is he?—I must—"

Here a cry was strangled in her throat. A condemned man had just appeared upon the platform—it was he.

His glance wandered over the crowd, and finally rested upon the faces of his mute, terror-stricken friends.

His lips moved in a smile, then, bravely, he threw himself under the knife.

There was the flash of steel, a thud. From "basket to basket," little Pichon has at last come to roll into that of the guillotine.

Answers to Correspondents.

With this copy of Short Stories you are presented gratis with a four-page illustrated leaflet. One portion of it is devoted to explaining in a concise manner the aims and objects of the Fresh Air Fund, and the two inside pages are arranged for the benefit of those readers who feel sufficiently interested in the Fund to collect on behalf of the children. I feel sure you will not disregard these remarks. Even though you do not feel disposed to assist by actually collecting, surely you won't refuse to return the leaflet—together with a sma' wee subscription.

A. P.—It does seem melancholy that so many of the Jubilee souvenirs now being sold in England are German made, but so long as the British public continue to support cheap and nasty fancy goods in preference to the more expensive but substantial British manufactured knicknacks, this state of affairs will continue to exist.

Batsman.—The Surrey Cricket Eleven was established in 1844, and consequently is the oldest of the county clubs. Lancashire dates its beginning from 1866.

Student.—Ten or twelve ounces is the weight of the heart of the average adult.

X. X.—The Lord Mayor of London receives an annual salary of £10,000 from the Corporation, although this sum is generally considered insufficient, in view of the many calls upon his purse during His Lordship's tenure of office. Thus it may be taken that London Lord Mayors are always very wealthy men.

B. C.—There are several seaside places in Great Britain which claim the title of "Queen of watering places," but Brighton is probably the most persistent in this direction.

X.—(1) S.S. has nothing to do with politics, so that it is impossible for us to agree or disagree with your opinions. (2) The London Water Companies make a profit of something like £1,100,000 every year.

R. G.—The first silver coin struck in England was the ancient silver penny.

A. J. inquires as to what trade has produced the largest number of wealthy individuals?——The brewery and distillery interests, we should imagine, considering that nearly all the larger distillers and brewers are, if not millionaires, extremely wealthy.

X.—You must not send money in a letter without registering the letter beforehand. If you do the other party will have to pay a double registration fee of 8d.

Rab.—The Britisher and the American are the only people who fight solely with their fists. The Frenchman mostly uses his feet to vanquish his opponent, whilst the German adopts a blend of both for the same purpose.

A. E.—Only one person out of twelve in Great Britain is a regular churchgoer.

Inquirer.—Most of the cheap imitation ostrich feathers are manufactured in the East-end of London.

Anxious.—Certainly you can marry your second cousin if you wish. The widespread belief that such marriages are illegal is quite an erroneous one.

B. S.—The human voice has nine distinct tones. Thanks for your suggestion, but it has been made before.

T. Moore.—There is not, nor is there likely to be, any change in regard to wearing the Victoria Cross. The decoration was instituted in 1856, and is awarded to military and naval officers and men for conspicuous bravery.

E. S. G.—Yes; earthquakes are sometimes felt at sea.

Bridget.—The Norwegian word for "Love" is "kjaerlighedans." I should advise you to confine yourself to the English interpretation, it is much easier to pronounce, and I dare say your fiancé would infinitely prefer it.

C. C. T.—There are far more women workers in Great Britain than in any other country in proportion to the population. Twelve per cent. of the industrial classes are women.

R. B.—You have been misinformed. There is no such thing as a singing fish.

Tim is a "bit of athlete," as he modestly describes his muscular powers, and consequently very naturally enjoys reading about the feats of fellow athletes. He is not content, however, with the very meagre space allotted to sports in the majority of newspapers, and suggests that there ought to be a splendid opening for a publication that caters solely for sports and gives less attention to horse-racing. Undoubtedly there is an opening for such a paper as Tim describes, and we can speak from experience, for the Athletic Record, although but a few weeks old, is going strong.

Frank.—An oyster takes five years to grow to maturity. All the oysters on the market are at least five years old, but some are a good deal older.

S.—Greenland, we believe, is the only inhabited country free from cats. Probably most people will think this is well, considering that the nights in that happy country are six months long.

Cockney.—Probably the most remarkable railway station in Great Britain is to be found on the branch of the Cambrian Railway near Vyrnwy. It goes by the name of Brongwyn, and possesses neither booking-office, stationmaster, or porter. When a passenger desires to start from the station, he manipulates a signal placed for the purpose, which stops the train. His fare is taken at the end of the journey.

D. C.—No, pennies were not always made of copper; originally they were made of silver.

G. T. T.—(a) Yes; fashionable men now wear their hair much longer than hitherto. (b) No; the number of marriages is declining.

T. W. C.—It is impossible for you to get an order to view the Stock Exchange during business hours; in fact, I am afraid you would find it difficult to get one at any time.

W. R.—All articles of value found in the ground belong to the Crown, and not to the person who discovers them.

Blossom.—A good way of telling if pencil marks have been erased from paper: Hold it over the steam of a kettle, and if the slightest pressure has been made by a pencil it will be distinctly shown.

Reg.—On an average some fifty-five people meet with a violent end every week in London.

S.—The largest gun-making establishment in the world is Krupp's at Essen, where some 20,000 people are employed.

THE NEW LEMONADE.

Many people suffer from extreme thirst during the hot weather. Messrs. Foster Clarke & Co. have supplied the want that has long been felt by making a concentrated lemonade. It is made from the finest lemons, and the great advantage is that it is partly manufactured in Italy, in the midst of the lemonade orchards. The lemons are taken direct from the trees to the factory to commence their transformation into the Eiffel Tower Concentrated Lemonade. You can get thirty-two tumblers (or two gallons) for fourpence halfpenny. If you cannot get it from your Grocer, send sixpence to G. FOSTER CLARK & Co., 290, Eiffel Tower Factory, Maidstone.

Stand Back and Then Look.

"Madam," said a wise old physician to a woman who had brought a feeble, anæmic, and poorly developed daughter to him for examination. "Madam, the treatment of this girl should have been begun two hundred years ago."

"Sir," she exclaimed, "I don't understand what you mean."

"Probably not, madam," replied this student of men and of medicine, "and you wouldn't even should I try to explain it."

How do you best see a picture on a wall? Why, by standing back and looking through your hollowed fist or through a tube. Well, then, let us first read Mrs. Coombe's letter, and afterwards get a little of what painters call perspective on it, and see if we can understand the lesson it teaches.

"In the spring of last year, 1895," she says, "I had an attack of pleurisy, which left me low and weak. Subsequently I could not get up my strength, do what I would. My appetite was poor, and after eating I had severe pains about my chest, at my side, and between my shoulders. I had muscular pains in my arms and shoulders—in fact, all over me. I got little or no sleep, and felt quite worn out in the morning.

"As time went on I got weaker and weaker and was scarcely able to get about. I came to be so low that I thought I never should be better again. I saw a doctor and took medicines, but nothing did me any good.

"In December (1895) my sister who lives at Oxford told me of the benefit she had derived from Mother Seigel's Syrup. I got a bottle from Mr. Cooper, chemist, Oldbury Road, and after taking it found great relief. I could eat well, and food agreed with me.

"I now gained strength, and after taking four bottles was well as ever and free from all pain, muscular or otherwise. I know others who have been benefited by the same medicine. You can publish this statement as you like. (Signed) Charlotte Coombes, 177, Oldbury Road, West Smethwick, Birmingham, October 8th, 1896."

That is her letter—a plain, truthful, and well-written letter. But what do we see behind the simple facts as she sets them down? Is there anything suggested by that attack of pleurisy she speaks of? Was that the beginning? No. Pleurisy is the name given to an inflammation of the spaces or cavities in which the lungs rest. When the inflammation attacks the lungs themselves we call it pneumonia; if the bronchial tubes, bronchitis; and so on. But they are the same thing, from the same cause—namely, impure blood. When the blood is thus polluted, the smallest provocation—a slight cold—may set up any of the above ailments. Rheumatism (which Mrs. Coombes had) belongs to the same group or family of maladies.

But how comes that impurity or corruption of the blood in which these things arise? I'll tell you in the hope that you will remember it. Indigestion, dyspepsia, fermentation of food in the stomach, torpid liver, which leaves the bile acids in the blood instead of removing them, poisonous dirt and filth from the stomach getting into the circulation—that's where the trouble comes from. So we see that in cases of pleurisy, etc., there is always what the doctors calls a "history" of dyspepsia. Although this lady had keen dyspeptic symptoms after the pleurisy, a previous imperfection of her digestion—whether she realised it or not—laid the foundation for the pleurisy, the rheumatism, and all that followed.

Now that is what we see as we stand back and look. And this is the practical use you are to make of the knowledge: Take care of the condition of your stomach, and the first day you feel anything wrong with it, resort to Mother Seigel's Syrup without waiting to find out whether you are going to be worse or not. When your house takes fire you don't wait to see how bad it is likely to be; you stop it immediately. Do so with indigestion.

The old doctor was right in what he said to the woman about her daughter. The girl couldn't help the neglect of her ancestors; but we can do something towards taking care of ourselves.

CHAPTER I.

A BRUSH WITH THE MATABELES.

I USED to imagine that if anyone possessed a just grievance against Destiny, it was certainly I. I began well—indeed, in the best possible way—with a public school and university education; but whether it was that Nature had provided useful talents with all too niggardly hand, or whether I had neglected the pursuit of mere learning in favour of the far more important acquirements of cricket and football and running and so on, in all of which accomplishments I was somewhat eminent both at school and college, or whatever other reason there may have been for it, it is certain that when my father informed me that it was now time that I prepared to shift for myself in life, I found, to my surprise, that it was the most difficult thing in the world to set my hand to any single thing that would bring in a silver piece towards that end.

My father had, indeed, at various times suggested many different channels by which the final object of a young man's existence—"a living"—might be attained. He hankered from the first for the Queen's Services—or shall I say for the Queen's pay, and especially for the pension, which is so soothing to the "worn-out" servant, shelved in his prime from further service?

But I would have nothing to say to the Navy, having plain tastes, such as terra firma to walk upon, and more scope for my natural physical activity than is afforded by the limited area of a quarter-deck, and as for the Army—well, I loved the idea of it, as ardently as my father himself; but I entreated my parent to allow me to pass into Sandhurst as a University candidate, that is, to allow me to go through with my Oxford course, and then try my hand at the Sandhurst examination under the privilege of age offered to candidates coming up from the Universities, rather than renounce Oxford altogether (and with it my secret hope of becoming a "blue"), and go to Sandhurst straight from school, or crammer, like the majority of youthful would-be warriors.

But, alas! though I achieved in a manner my "blue," or a partial blue, having been chosen to run as Oxford's second string in the hurdle race in the inter-University sports, at the Queen's Club (for though I played for my college both in cricket and football, and was more than once called upon to act as substitute for some player more fortunate than myself in the University team itself, yet I never actually achieved the highest distinction in either game), in spite, I say, of my fair success as an athlete, my hopes as a warrior and servant of Her Majesty were doomed to disappointment, for I failed miserably to pass the Sandhurst examination, and found myself accordingly stranded.

It was at this critical moment that my father pointed out to me that I had enjoyed an expensive education and must presently shift for myself, since my brothers and sisters must also be educated—there were eight of them, all younger than myself—and, therefore, it was necessary that I should remove myself "off his hands" as soon as convenient. It must not be supposed that my father was unkind or harsh in this matter; on the contrary, he was sympathetic and hearty and kindly confidential, and all I mean is that what I have said was the gist of his remarks.

"I am most ready, father," I said, "to do anything reasonable to get a living; you wouldn't ask me to sit at a desk all my life, knowing me as you do, and how I hate indoor work and all that. I'm awfully sorry about Sandhurst, but—can you suggest anything else?"

In the end—for I need not waste time over our weeks and months of consultations and inquiries—it was determined that I should emigrate to South Africa in order to join the Bechuanaland Police Force, or any other militant body that would enrol me and accept my services in return for a modest stipend, which father kindly undertook to supplement by an allowance of £100 per annum.

Then I had a piece of luck, for just about the time of my arrival at the Cape the Matabeles under old Lobengula had filled up the measure of their offences against the protégés of England, and it had been determined to march to Buluwayo, their capital, and end or mend them as the case might be.

Young fellows like myself, with no particular occupation, and with no more pronounced desire in the world than to take a rifle and go forth to have a fling at anyone willing to be shot at, were volunteering by the score, and among them I, too, offered my callow services and was accepted with the rest. And so, after a period of drilling and practising of the art of riding, in which I was less proficient than in most other forms of exercise, I found myself equipped and in the field as a trooper of Jameson's Buluwayo force, and on my way to help chastise the Matabele and make a little geographical change in the map of Southern Africa by taking over their country and making it our own.

Now I can fancy some of my readers exclaiming at this point: "Oh, my goodness, the fellow's going to tell us a story about the Matabele war, of which we are tired to death already," and will forthwith replace the paper on the shelf or throw it on the fire, or at any rate, read no more of it, which—I hasten to assure them—would be a very great mistake on their part as well as an immense pity; for the present scribe has no such intention; the Matabele war shall be left severely alone, or only most cursorily touched upon as affording a hero for my tale, which shall be presently removed out of Africa altogether, and shall treat of matters entirely different, and far more original, than a mere native war.

Therefore, read on, suspicious one, and you shall see that you have done wisely and well.

There was one of my fellow-troopers who seemed to afford considerable amusement to many of the others, though for my part I felt the greatest interest in him and became, as the campaign went on, considerably attached to him, and with some reason, as I shall presently show.

This was an elderly man of some fifty-seven years—a storm-beaten, battered, wiry, grim-looking old fellow, who had a habit of talking to himself, or mumbling, as he rode along, which habit gained for him the nickname of "Mumbling Joe," and was the cause of much amusement to his fellows. He was a restless, uncanny person, old Joe, and his behaviour when asleep was astonishing and somewhat agitating for such as are startled by the peculiar conduct of restless sleepers, for he would talk loudly, suddenly shout or shriek, start up to his feet or into a sitting posture, and always, without exception (as I, being his chum and sleeping nearest to him was in a position to observe), the first unconscious movement of his hands was towards a certain light-brown satchel, like a cartridge case, which he wore day and night on a belt round his waist.

Even in daytime, when surprised by the enemy or by any kind of alarm, old Joe's first involuntary movement was to this satchel, which his fingers would first touch before proceeding to grip rifle or revolver, as the case might be.

Others, as well as I, noticed this peculiarity, and loved to chaffingly inquire of the old fellow what the case contained, and whether it was "'Arriet's letters," and so on; but when I saw that this kind of banter and curiosity disturbed him I never shared in such inquisitions, and I think it was this merciful consideration for his feelings that in the first instance endeared me to old Joe. He proved himself one of the best and bravest troopers in the force presently, a splendid and indomitable fighter, and a man of quite marvellous endurance and physical strength and activity.

He was, moreover, undoubtedly the finest shot with rifle or revolver that I ever met. His revolver was a clumsy-looking thing of ancient make and enormous bore, firing a bullet of huge size, and having but four chambers. He had picked it up, he informed me, years ago, and it shot splendidly.

Since those days it has become my own property, and it is at this moment one of my most valued possessions. How it became mine I am now about to describe, though I ought to mention that in this very Matabele campaign and before —well, before the revolver changed hands, old Joe Wright twice saved my life by its means, shooting a Matabele at close quarters in each instance when in the very act of assagaiing myself, I being at the time otherwise engaged.

Late one afternoon Joe and I with ten others went out on patrol duty. We were ten miles from camp, and had just sighted a strong body of the enemy watching us from an adjacent hill, covered with kopjes. This was a portion of the impi of which we were in search, and having sighted them we ought, undoubtedly, to have been content with this and ridden straight away to headquarters with the news. But instead of this, we foolishly approached the kopjes in order to discover, if possible, the strength of the force present.

Unfortunately for us this happened to be a well-armed body, and from behind their cover of rocks the fellows peppered us presently with a volley which we could not return because we could see no one to fire at. Under the circumstances it was wisely decided to retire, for, after all, ten men, however determined, are not a match for an impi of two thousand or more, as this might easily be. So we turned and cantered homewards, pursued by many bullets. No one had been struck, up to this, for the Matabele warrior of that day had not even the vaguest idea as to the handling of firearms, and shot merrily in any and every direction that the bullet elected to take, which was very rarely the right one, and was frequently enough straight into the person of his dearest friend, or others of his acquaintance.

Suddenly, however, old Joe's horse gave a kind of snort, threw up its head, plunged, and fell forwards, pitching its rider into the long grass five yards away, where he lay a moment stunned. The rest, not observing the catastrophe, for we two had been cantering together behind them, loth—I suppose—to leave the field, rode on and were quickly concealed in the bush and cover which each man did his best to place between himself and the enemy.

Well, I really do not mean to boast about it, because any other person would naturally have done no less than I did, but I must tell the story exactly as it happened, and therefore—at the risk of being misunderstood—I have to say in as few words as possible that I waited for Joe, and dismounted, and went over to where he lay in the long grass. He was just recovering, and sat up grabbing his yellow satchel in a comical way.

"What is it—what is it—what's happened?" he muttered.

"Your horse had been shot, and it grassed you in falling; get on mine with me, quick," I said, "no time for talking; if those beggars saw you fall they'll be after us directly—can you stand?"

Old Joe's eyes glanced gratefully into mine for an instant, but he only said:

"Rather!" and sprang to his feet. We scrambled upon my beast as quickly as we could, and looked back.

Sure enough, half-a-dozen of the dusky rascals were after us already, and set up a frantic shout when they saw us mounted together upon one steed; the foremost of them were but thirty or forty yards away, and a flight of assagais whistling about our ears soon proved to us that we had better get out of range as quickly as possible.

I was actually making a remark to this effect to my comrade when I felt him start, and heard him utter an exclamation. Joe was riding behind me, and he clung round my waist with his arms.

"What's up, old man?" I said "don't tell me they've struck you?"

"They have though," he gasped; "whip up the horse and get under cover, the infernal black rascals have done for me, I think!"

CHAPTER II.

THE DEATH OF JOE WRIGHT.

I WAS all for stopping a moment in order to attend to my stricken companion, but Joe would not hear of it, and bade me ride, for Heaven's sake, for all the horse was worth. He had much on his mind to speak of, he said, before he died, and we must get out of reach of these rascals so that he might make me his confessor at leisure.

"Nonsense, man, don't talk of dying!" I said bracingly, "you'll be all right when we get to camp; doctor'll soon make you comfortable!"

I looked round at him.

"No, there's no nonsense about it," he said, "ride on, old man, I'm cooked this time; but I've broken off the shaft of the blamed thing, and the rest may stop in as a kind of cork till I'm ready to go."

I looked round at him, and saw that poor old Joe was really badly hit; the head of the spear that struck him was still sticking deeply in his side, his kharki jacket being stained deep red in a circle round it. He had broken off the shaft, as he said, and the operation must have given him a nasty twinge. I made no further remark, but quickened my old horse up—he was a wretched old screw, but he served us well that day—and presently we were out of sight of our yelling pursuers, concealed by the thick bush and by the hilly and rocky nature of the ground. Joe leant rather heavily upon me as we galloped along, and I looked round once or twice in some anxiety, fearing that he had collapsed; but each time he bade me ride on a bit further, saying that he would be all right, only that the motion of the horse was rather painful.

"Ride about three miles or so," he said, "that'll be enough for the present."

I did so, and pulled up eventually at the foot of a large kopje, by climbing which I could at any time obtain a fine view of the surrounding country in case the enemy were still after us, which was not likely.

Then I helped old Joe to dismount. As a matter of fact, I lifted him from his seat and laid him down as gently as might be, for he was as weak as a kitten.

"Ah!" he sighed, "that's better. Now I'm good for half-an-hour or so, I fancy, but it may be less, so we'll begin business. Now you listen well, sonny, for what I have to say is worth hearing. I am dying here without a relative in the world that I care to remember or acknowledge, and without a friend—which is far worse!"

"Come, come, Joe Wright," I said, "I can answer for one, anyway!"

"Well, you're the pick of the bunch, certainly, and that's a piece of luck for you," said the wounded man, gasping as he spoke and looking very white. "Lord, how painful this hole this! I'm pleased that it's you beside me now, and not one of those inquisitive young devils up at camp; you've been good to me, I allow, and not too curious about what doesn't concern you, and I'm a-going to reward you for it. You see this satchel—well, you may have noticed that I am in the habit of taking rather particular care of it—well now, this satchel contains a secret that's worth a king's ransom, for anyone who's cute enough to read it. See here—no, I can't move without getting a devilish twinge in the side—open it for me, it's only strapped and buckled—now draw out that thing inside."

"You villain, Jake."

I drew out a kind of roll of paper, there was nothing else in the satchel. Outside the roll were a number of figures in rows; the roll itself consisted of sheets of paper sown together, and closely written.

"Open it out," said Joe; "can you read the writing?"

I read out the words that headed the first page in proof of my ability to decipher them; they were somewhat peculiar:

"The diary of Joseph Wright's adventures, discoveries, claims, crimes, and cowardice. Cursed be he who meddles with that which is not his."

"That's it, that's it," he said approvingly; "you're all right, I see. Roll it up again and listen; don't lose the last page or damp it, for a lot depends upon it. Now, do you know what a cryptogram is?"

I said I thought I did. I had, as a matter of fact, been somewhat interested in the foolish discussions in which it had been lately asserted that Shakespeare was Bacon, or vice versâ, and that this was proved by a cryptographic confession buried in the plays themselves, and to be read by those who desired to be taught to do so by some ingenious American individual, whose name had escaped me.

"Well, these papers contain my confessions," continued Joe, speaking faintly; "read 'em when I'm dead, but not before, and, remember, that there's a cryptogram in them, and that the key to it is those figures on the last page. When you've read it you'll know what to do. I didn't dare, for reasons that you'll understand; but it's different for you. You can take a partner, if you'd rather. Lord, how this infernal thing hurts—what was I saying?—I'm a murderer, sonny, or next door to it, and a thief besides, as you'll see when you've read all; can you shake hands with me, knowing this, before I die? I have an idea God'll be kinder to me, like, if He sees that an honest young chap like you didn't mind giving his hand to a stained old sinner like me?"

I gave the old fellow a grip, but said nothing, for, as a matter of fact, it made me feel a little chokey to hear him talk in this way.

"Thanks, thanks, sonny," he gasped, for I suppose my hand-shake gave him a twinge. "Lord, forgive me, what devils greed makes of us! I wasn't so bad at your age, nor for many a year after, but—Lord! that stone—they called it 'The Eye of the Sun'—and some 'The Glory of Rajpore'; a man sells his soul for a gem like that, sonny, he does, indeed! And that's what I've done, and gained nothing by it in the end! Lord, what poor fools we men are!"

Not being able to understand what the old fellow was driving at, I said nothing, and presently he began to wander, and then to rave; at last he suddenly tried to stand up, and the exertion caused a rush of blood; he staggered, and fell against me; at the same moment he fixed his wild eyes on my face.

"You villain, Jake; you spying, murderous, infernal rascal!" he gasped in his madness, trying to grab his revolver; "you——"

He got no further, for blood flowed from his mouth and stopped his speech; I laid him down, raising his head, and speaking encouraging words to him, but he did not rally, and died in my arms almost immediately. It was a sad and miserable ending to a life, and the sight of it made me feel very low in spirits. Presently, when I felt quite certain that he was dead, and had not only swooned, I emptied the poor fellow's pockets—finding a sum of money which surprised me by its largeness—and buried him, repeating what I could remember of the burial service over his remains, and so left him and returned to camp to report myself.

Our commandant bade me keep the money, which amounted to over fifty pounds, saying that I was at least as well entitled to it as anyone else, but expressed some curiosity to know the contents of Wright's notorious yellow satchel.

"Only the story of the poor old fellow's life and adventures," I explained.

"Oh, come," said the captain, "he wouldn't have been so ridiculously anxious about the welfare of his diary; there must be something else."

"There is not, really!" I said—"it is simply his 'confessions,' as he called them; and he has left them to me as a special legacy, marked 'private.'"

"Well, then, I wish you joy of your inheritance," said the skipper laughing; "for the fellow was evidently as mad as they make them, and there'll be some entertaining reading!" and so the matter remained in so far as it concerned him and the rest of our troop, namely, that old Joe had been as mad as could be, and had left me a bundle of yarns as a particular and precious legacy, as well as a little present of fifty odd pounds and an old revolver as a kind of make-up for the trouble of reading his precious diary.

This latter document was easy enough to read, for it was written in a clear, bold hand and in a business-like style, lacking, indeed, both romantic grace and classic elegance, but generally correct from a grammatical point of view, and correctly spelt for the most part, though homely enough in its expressions.

Now, as Joe Wright's tale is my own, or a necessary prelude to my own, I shall ask my readers to allow me to transcribe his diary or narrative into this story of mine, his experiences to form, as it were, the first act, and my own the second.

I must confess that I quite shared the opinion of the rest as to Joe's sanity, and that I began the reading of his confessions without any great amount of interest; I was not sanguine, I expected neither much amusement nor any profit in the poor old adventurer's secrets. What could he have to reveal that might benefit me? Still, I would read the rigmarole for the sake of the dead and buried human failure, who had expressed a special wish that I should do so, and I may say at once that the reading of the score or two of sheets intensely interested and engrossed me, and that by the time I was through with my literary enterprise, I was anxious enough to set to work to discover the secret buried by the narrator in the form of a cryptogram; indeed, if my readers become half as interested in the matter as I was, they will thank me for providing them with so appetising a morsel. I read the sheets whenever I had an opportunity to do so unobserved by my comrades, whose remarks, when they saw me so employed, were unflattering to old Joe Wright's sanity, and to my own for wasting my time in reading his trash.

Nevertheless, I soon came to the conclusion that, whatever Joe may have been, he was as sane as any of his critics, as well as one of the smartest and most wide-awake individuals I had yet come across, though apparently not overburdened with that serious impediment to success in this naughty world—namely, a conscience.

Here is the tale, word for word as Joe Wright penned it.

CHAPTER III.

The Visit to the Temple.

I am a gentleman by birth, began Joe Wright's narrative, but one way or another I drifted down stream and was forced, in the end, to take the Queen's shilling, enlisting in a Royal Rifle regiment quartered at the Curragh. My first ten or twelve years of service were not very eventful, and I got on fairly well, and should have done far better, but for an unfortunate infirmity in my nature, which impelled me at regular or irregular intervals to embark in some wild and foolish enterprise—to "run amock," in fact, in a mild way—and, as a necessary consequence, to get into trouble. Many and many a time during the long years of my service did I sacrifice my chances of promotion and advancement to this foolish tendency to periodical wildness.

The officers—those who took an interest in me—lectured me often enough, pointing out that I might and ought to do exceedingly well if I liked; even the colonel spoke to me very seriously, more than once; but neither he nor they produced more than a skin-deep repentance in me—for though I desired to get on and often determined to do so, yet the longing to play the devil would come upon me and lose me stripes and prospects time after time, and the wonder is—not that I remained a private—but that I was permitted to remain in the regiment at all! However, I was not dismissed, and eventually we found ourselves in India, where we were quartered first at Bangalore, and, for the last year or so of our stay, at Rajpore.

Enlisting in a Royal Rifle regiment.

It was here that the talk went one evening in the mess-room about a great Hindoo idol in a temple near at hand, situated in a grove of great trees, four miles or so from our quarters.

Someone told us that this idol had a diamond in his forehead which was the sixth biggest in the world.

"Lord!" exclaimed Johnny Phelps, one of my favourite companions, as wild as anyone when a lead was given him, but otherwise a thoroughly good fellow and everybody's friend. "Lord! I'd like to have a look at that!"

"Anyone can see it," said our informant. "I saw it with these eyes, as big as a plover's egg, s'elp me it is, and no one about to look after it but a priest or two."

"Then why don't someone knock the Jossers on the head and help himself?" asked a man called Jake Daws, of whom I shall have more to say—an unpopular and disagreeable fellow, given to fierce threats and low language, who professed to hate the service and all in authority, and to be the enemy, as he would boast, of God and man, his only true friend being Jake Daws.

"Well, that idol ain't such a fool as he looks," said the first speaker—I think it was Miles, but I don't remember for certain, and it doesn't matter much. "He can protect himself, can that idol, so I'm told, and even if you was to knock the Jossers on the head you wouldn't get the diamond."

"Why not, what can the blooming thing do to you?" asked someone.

"That's what I don't rightly know myself," said Miles; "but I'm told it ain't safe to go picking about for that there diamond. You can go and try for yourself if you want to know particulars!"

Digitized by Google

"Some blooming pistol that gives you one in the chops soon as you touch the jewel!" suggested another speaker; "no jewels for me, thank'ee, I ain't taking any to-day! I've heard of an idol as played those games!"

Everybody laughed, and the subject got itself changed and probably forgotten by most of us; but later on in the evening a few of us got together and reopened the subject, and as this is the real beginning of my tale, I give their names; there was myself, known as Joe Wright, though this is not my real name; Alfred Hitchins, a bit of a bad lot; Johnny Phelps—good old Johnny, whom I liked well enough; and lastly, Jake Daws.

I suppose the time had come round for one of my fits of wildness, for I felt reckless and desperately inclined that night for something to give one a flutter, and I started the subject of the idol and the big diamond, more—I vow and declare—in the hope of having some kind of a lark than with any ambition to possess myself of the famous jewel, which at this time I did not covet in the slightest degree, never having seen it or experienced the extraordinary fascination which the sight of it exercised upon me and others afterwards.

"Well," I said, "which of you Johnnies is on for a bit of fun to-night?"

"I am," said Phelps, who was always open to enterprise, and the first to come forward at the suggestion of anything racy.

"What kind of a spree?" asked Hitchins.

"Why, the idol," said I, "and the diamond."

"What, to-night?" exclaimed Jake.

"To-night," I echoed.

There was silence for about half a minute. Then Johnny spoke.

"All right!" he said, "I'm on, for one!"

"Oh, I'll come," added Hitchins, "but I don't believe there's anything in it!"

"There's a bit of a spree, anyway," I said; "it can't hurt us to go and have a look round; what say you, Jake?"

"Oh, I'm on," said Jake, laughing; "there'll be nothing in it, though, as Hitchins says. I'm not going to knock those Jossers you talked of on the head or get dabbed in the eye by the idol either. It ain't good enough; but I'll come and have a look round."

Then we all four set to and arranged matters, and I don't suppose four other men breathed who knew more about getting out of quarters at night without being asked awkward questions than we four did.

We had a couple of lanterns and a chisel or two, just in case there was anything to be done when we got to the temple, though I don't think we much expected to use them, and we mustered at a spot we all knew of not very far from barracks somewhere between midnight and one o'clock in the morning. The temple lay in a grove of trees about five miles away, and we had no difficulty in finding it, knowing its whereabouts from Miles; the place was locked, however, and we were obliged to make an entrance the best way we could, which was by forcing a window. We all dropped into the great, dark place, one after the other, and I confess I shouldn't have cared to do it all alone, for it was one of the creepiest things I ever experienced, to grope about there among a lot of heathen gods and idols that might be endowed, for all I knew, with all manner of mechanical dodges for stabbing or shooting trespassers as they impiously trod the sacred soil of this their sanctuary and dwelling place.

We stopped and listened when all were safely in, in case we should hear anyone moving, but there was not a sound to be heard, and we soon decided, to our relief, that the priests had deserted their charge and gone home to bed, which was just as well for them; for, though I should have voted myself against bloodshed, and so I know would Johnny, yet I was not so sure about Hitchins and Jake Daws, and the Jossers, as they called them, would probably have been knocked on the head if they had appeared and interfered with us in any way.

Then we lit up our lanterns and looked about us.

"Lord, what an army of Josses!" exclaimed Johnny under his breath. "Which is the old boy with the big jewel, I wonder!"

There were scores of idols of every shape and size, mostly sitting with their legs crossed in impossible attitudes, and wearing upon their faces leers of more or less diabolical malignity or of complacent inanity, and we wandered among them for a while without finding the object of our search.

Suddenly Johnny uttered a cry. The light of the lantern which he carried rested at the moment upon a large idol seated upon a kind of pedestal, cross-legged, its face wore—unlike the rest—an expression of great benevolence, which was slightly marred by a kind of ironical smile which seemed to hover about the mouth.

From its forehead, which was about five feet from the ground, there flashed a something responding with dazzling splendour to the rays which Johnny's lantern shed upon it, that arrested our steps at once and caused each to utter an exclamation, like Johnny himself, of surprise and delight.

"Lord, only look at it!" cried Jake aloud, forgetting himself in his excitement. "That's a gem a man might sell his soul for." His voice sounded strange and crude in this silent place.

"Great Cæsar!" said Johnny. "We must have that out, boys, if it's only to play with a bit and put it back afterwards—just to say we've fingered it! What d'you say?"

"I say, if we get it out we'll stick to it!" said Hitchins with an oath, which somehow sounded doubly sacrilegious here.

"We should be all right!" said Jake. "Each of us has an alibi. We've never left the barracks, we haven't!"

As for me, I was not a thief, with all my faults—that is I had never been one up to this night, but the sight of that gem as we gazed deliberately at it under the concentrated light of the two lanterns fascinated me, and seemed to scorch all right-feeling out of my soul; my compunctions withered, and died in the dazzle of the huge diamond, and I felt that I must have a hand in any enterprise that was started with it for an object.

Hitchins and Jake Daws were whispering confidentially together.

"Look here, boys," said Jake presently, "Alf Hitchins and I have decided that we are on for this yer diamond; either or both of you fellows can go partners if you choose—if not, you've got to swear Bible oaths that you don't give anything away, and then you can get home when you like."

"All right, I'm on!" I said, and Johnny, with a laugh, said he'd have a hand in it, too, though burglary wasn't, so to speak, much in his line.

"Burglary!" repeated Jake angrily, "don't talk Tommy-rot; why, who should we be robbing? Nobody but this Joss-house mummy here, and a fat lot it'll hurt him! There's no burglary about it, we're saving a magnificent gem from utter waste; better some Christian dook or prince should enjoy it and pay us well for it, than keep it stuck in a blooming image's forehead which doesn't even know it's there. Come now, who's going to pick for it? Who volunteers first to go at it? Profits divided, of course!"

"We 'll draw lots, I say!" said Hitchins, and we did so, and the job fell to Johnny.

Important to Our Readers.

Mr. H. G. WELLS' story, "The War of the Worlds," at present running through the pages of "Pearson's Magazine," bids fair to become not only the greatest work he has yet produced, but the most popular piece of fiction of the year. Our readers will, therefore, be glad to know that we have secured his next story, and that the opening chapters of it will appear in the BANK HOLIDAY NUMBER of PEARSON'S WEEKLY,

On Sale Friday, June 4th.

It will be entitled

"The Invisible Man."

Other writers have treated this theme, but they have generally given the invisible man a power which it was something more than a satisfaction for him to have. Mr. Wells, however, is original in all things, and shows us in this story what a disadvantage it is to become invisible. He describes how, if a man becomes invisible, it does not follow that his clothes become invisible also, and on this supposition has woven a story that will hold the reader with breathless interest from start to finish.

The Flask and the Clock.

It was generally conceded that Herr Professor Max Hofmeyer was a very queer man, almost as queer, in fact, as the little clock that hung on the wall of his laboratory.

And, to tell the truth, it was with respect to his same tiny timepiece that Hofmeyer had first manifested his queerness. In as much as the clock was a gift from a Swiss watchmaker whose life he had once saved, and was in itself quite a curiosity—consisting of a silver ball about an inch in diameter, flattened on one side to make room for the diminutive dial with its golden hands, the whole to be hung up by means of a ring curiously fastened into the top of the glittering sphere—Hofmeyer persisted in using it in his laboratory, where the most accurate of chronometers would have been much more in place. When his friends ridiculed, and warned him he would be sorry some day for his obstinacy, he was wont to mutter something about "his clock," "his laboratory," and "his risk."

Of course, people did not think him any the less queer for refusing to take their advice.

But what was more intolerable to his brother professors, he had some startlingly unconventional ideas on the subject of hypnotism. He studied its phenomena deeply, but in his own way and according to his own theory, and thus, to every other scientist, who believed himself to have the one correct way and the one infallible theory, he seemed very queer indeed. He held that hypnotism ought to be studied from the subject's point of view as well as from the operator's, that an accurate record of what a man felt as he passed into and emerged from the hypnotic state, was quite as valuable as the record of what he did while in that state.

When a hypnotist desired to make an experiment, Hofmeyer was ready to offer himself for a subject, and after waking from the somnambulistic state which each recurrence of the experience rendered more easy of induction, he would jot down in a note book whatever flitting recollections he might have of his sensations during the transitional moments between sleeping and waking.

While his activities and interests were for the most part focussed upon the study of hypnotism, he had lesser hobbies whereon in moments of leisure he occasionally took a canter, chief among which might be mentioned an Edison's phonograph. This ingenious mechanism possessed for him all the charm of a plaything. To set it going from any part of the room where he might happen to be, he had deftly connected it with an electric key; and more than once a somewhat long-winded and long-staying caller had been startled by suddenly hearing behind him a metallic yet perfectly audible voice informing him that his carriage was at the door and the coachman tired of waiting.

But the talking machine performed also a more practical service. Like many a scientific genius, Hofmeyer was exceedingly absent-minded, and often loitered in his laboratory puzzling over some refractory experiment long after it was time for him to take his daily exercise, which consisted of an hour's walk along the boulevard.

To render such lapses impossible, he contrived so that whenever he began an experiment that was likely to take considerable time for its satisfactory completion, he could, by a simple clockwork attachment, "load," as it were, his phonograph, and at the desired moment it would "go off," reminding him that his recreation hour had arrived. "Ah!" Hofmeyer used to say, "these great inventions must be applied to everyday life before you can appreciate them."

It once happened that his friend and junior professor, Baumline, was in the laboratory when the phonograph rolled off its monotonous admonitary announcement.

"Fairly good imitation of the human voice that, isn't it?"

"Yes, but not to be compared with what we'll have in a half decade," Hofmeyer replied. "We've scarcely graduated from the kindergarten of invention yet."

"I don't know about that," objected Baumline. "It is useless to hope that we can ever reproduce exactly the sounds of human articulation. There is that mysterious something, that indefinable fibre to a real voice which reveals and proves the mind behind the utterance; and until we can endow a machine with the power of thought we can never expect it to reproduce with any approximate perfection, the voice of a thinking being."

"Nonsense!" ejaculated Hofmeyer, and there ensued forthwith one of those fierce and learned discussions that were not at all infrequent between him and his young friend. They argued for more than an hour, the professor claiming for the American's invention an all-successful future, Baumline maintaining, on the contrary, that in its attempts to give an exact reproduction of the human voice, if in no other respect, it was doomed to certain failure.

"But you will admit this much, at any rate, won't you?" Hofmeyer asked at length, "that if all imitations of the human voice are in some essential, but, we confess, indefinable way unnatural, the fact would be most surely detected in the state of exalted sensibility to external impressions that characterises the condition of the hypnotised subject?"

After a moment's thought Baumline nodded his head in the affirmative.

"You must also grant," the professor continued, "that a subject who has always received his suggestion from a human voice would not respond to any reproduction of that voice unless it were enough like the original to deceive his sense of hearing, even in its exaggerated acutenes; and if now, in the very infancy of invention a copy can be made so natural as to elicit his response, we have every reason to expect that in future years the means of imitation may be so perfected that the reproduction can be exact in every particular?"

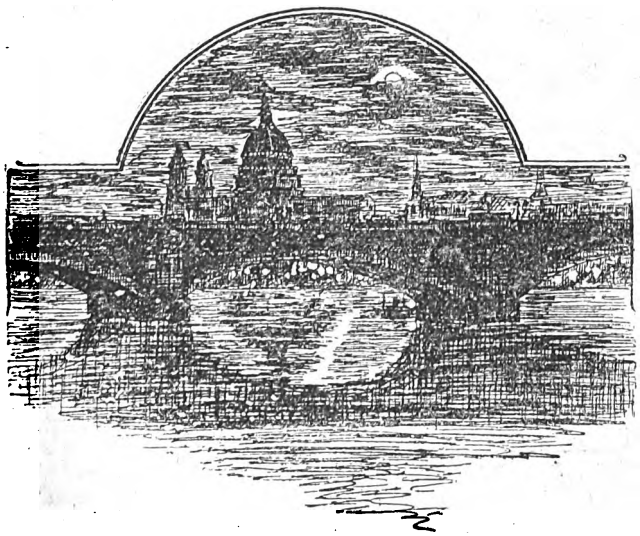
Baumline again nodded his assent.

"Well, then," Hofmeyer went on, "you come to my laboratory next Saturday at three o'clock, and in one hour's time, from these concessions of yours, I'll prove my position by scientific test to be inexpugnable."

For a moment the younger man hesitated, but finally acquiesced and declared his intention to be present "with a vengeance" at the time specified.

All the following day Professor Hofmeyer was afflicted with cold feet, or in other words, did some hard thinking. Towards the end of the afternoon he seemed to come to a satisfactory conclusion, for with a smile that might have been prophetically triumphant, he entered his laboratory, and to prevent interruption of any sort carefully locked the door behind him. He then fitted to his phonograph an unused wax cylinder and attached the large, bell-shaped receiver, after which preparations he pressed the key and began to slowly enunciate into the instrument:

"Friends and fellow professors, you have been invited here this afternoon to investigate with us whether an exact reproduction of the human voice by mechanical means is within the range of possibility. It is charged that I, a mindless, soulless thing of steel and wax, am incapable of copying with any reasonable fidelity the utterance of the mind-endowed and soul-endowed thing of flesh and bone, man. In contradiction I am to demonstrate that so essentially faithful and natural is my reproduction of the sounds of human speech, that even to the abnormally acute senses of the hypnotised subject, my words come with all the compelling power of the original utterance.



"The man whom you see Professor Hofmeyer now leading into the room is Max Nutberger, a youth that has been hypnotised within the last few moments by the ordinary method of the revolving mirror. Upon this young man I will now proceed to experiment.

"Max, you are fast, fast asleep, utterly overcome with weariness. Your muscles are all tired out. Why, Max, you can't raise your foot from the floor! No, not if you put forth all your strength, I told you you couldn't. But wait a minute—just one moment—and the result will be different. Now you have no trouble in lifting your foot, have you? Of course you haven't. I'll tell you a secret, Max; I had an immense magnet under the floor a moment ago and it attracted the nails of your boots so that you couldn't pull them away."

It is unnecessary to rehearse all the words Professor Hofmeyer intoned so deliberately into that gaping receiver; but after suggesting several of the more common hypnotic tests he continued:

"Friends, you see I have clearly proved my control over Max's muscles; I will now by a single experiment demonstrate my equal power over his sensations. Max, you see that flask upon the bench? That is filled with some of the finest wine that has ever passed through the custom house of Weinfurt. Drink it and tell me if it isn't fit to put before the Kaiser! See, friends, he smacks his lips, and I can assure you the very nectar of the gods could not have been sweeter to him than was that common water. But, Max, Max, you've slept long enough. When I count three you must wake up. One, two, remember, you must wake up—three, awake!"

The professor paused a few minutes before resuming:

"My dear friends, our experiment, you will agree, has been crowned with unusual success. My word was as law to this man, and had I ordered him to kill himself he would have obeyed as unhesitatingly as a child. Further words are unnecessary; I trust my demonstration has been convincing."

After Hofmeyer had completed his dictation, he listened carefully while the phonograph reproduced his speech. Not a word was wrong, not a pronunciation indistinct; and as he left his laboratory for his afternoon stroll his face was wreathed in a smile that betokened unmistakable satisfaction.

During the days that intervened before the decisive Saturday, Hofmeyer was subjected alternately to chills of fear and fevers of hope. Suppose Baumline were right after all, and his words when repeated by the phonograph should lack the strength and power that demanded obedience. It would be disgraceful, he thought. And with a score of invited guests to witness his humiliation! Perhaps he ought to have made the trial a little more private. But on the other hand there was no reason why he should fail.

The reproduced words were perfectly audible, and it was ideas, he assured himself, and not mere sound vibrations that were to govern the subject's action. And if he succeeded, how gloriously triumphant it would be to have every word in the whole course of the experiment spoken by the phonograph—a machine appearing in its own defence, and pleading for man's favour in the very words of men! The Zeitung would devote a leader to commenting on his success and everybody in the street would be talking about Hofmeyer! Ah, but any beggar he met that night would fare well.

The Saturday came at length, and so nervous was the professor through the early morning, that he concluded about eleven o'clock that unless he occupied his mind for the next few hours with something besides the approaching experiment, the fatal time would find him in no condition to perform the duties of direction and supervision. He bethought himself of a difficult problem in chemistry that had perplexed him up to the day of his discussion with Baumline, but upon which, since that time, he had bestowed scarcely any attention.

"The very thing," he said half aloud. "It's abstruse and it's long, and perhaps it's very intricacy will serve to draw my mind away from this accursed test." And so after a light lunch, about noon, he went into his laboratory, took down his flask of prussic acid and the other chemicals involved in the problem, and began his mixing and compounding.

At first his mind wandered, and persisted in taking note of every detail under the sun that had nothing whatever to do with the experiment. His last lot of tubes didn't seem to be nearly so brittle as those of previous lots; and what a funny odour that prussic acid had, just like peach-blossom! But as the desired reactions obstinately refused to come, Hofmeyer gradually forgot Baumline and hypnotism and peach odour and everything else, save his one stubborn problem. At the very moment, though, when he seemed most absorbed, that inexplicable attraction that ever exists between extremes brought him back with a jerk to the subject which after all was deepest in his thought.

It flashed upon him that he had told Baumline he could convince him in an hour's time—what if his phonograph speech required more than sixty minutes for its delivery? Baumline might claim on this technicality that the experiment had failed. Upon glancing at his bullet-shaped clock, Hofmeyer saw that it was ten minutes to two. There was plenty of time yet to ascertain whether his experiment would come within the promised limits, and so he determined that just as the hands indicated the even hour he would start the phonograph and measure the length of its speech.

With this purpose, he seated himself before his bench with his finger lightly touching the key that was to set the talking cylinder in motion, his eyes glued upon the clock as it hung on the wall, a few feet above the level of his head. Eight minutes to two! These chemicals, he thought, and especially that flask of prussic acid, didn't look very nice on his bench, to be sure; but then, after he had started his machine talking there would be plenty of time to straighten up his laboratory before his company arrived. Five minutes to two! Just then the sun in his downward course shone in through the window and transformed the silver clock into a gleaming fire ball. How it flashed and burned! Only three minutes!

Hofmeyer was staring at the blazing timepiece as though fascinated, his pupils dilated, his body bent forward in the eagerness of his gaze. Two o'clock! Two minutes past! And yet no motion from the professor. Apparently he had forgotten the very purpose for which he was watching the clock. Three minutes past! His eyelids fluttered and drooped, an almost imperceptible shudder ran through his frame—sufficient, however, to complete the circuit in the electric key—and Professor Hofmeyer was asleep, with the prussic acid still rebukingly before him, and visitors expected in less than an hour! Hark, from across the room sounded a low humming noise, that soon took the form of distinct words:

"Friends and fellow professors, you have been invited here this afternoon to investigate with us whether an exact reproduction of the human voice by mechanical means is within the range of possibility."

* * * * *

About a quarter to three, Baumline knocked gently for admittance at the door of Professor Hofmeyer's laboratory, but received no response. Placing his ear to the keyhole to learn whether Hofmeyer was inside, he heard with great distinctness these words:

"Max, you see that flask upon the bench? That is filled with some of the finest wine that has ever passed through the custom house of Weinfurt. Drink it and tell me if it isn't fit to be put before the Kaiser."

"This is pretty evesdropping business for me to be in, isn't it?" Baumline suddenly asked himself, and began pacing the hall. But curiosity was strong. Again he stopped at the door and listened.

"When I count three you must wake up. One, two—remember you must wake up—three, awake!"

"What nonsense is this he's trying on his phonograph now, I wonder," thought Baumline, but again a reproving conscience dragged him from the key-hole and made him walk the hall. He had hardly taken a step when a piercing scream rung from the laboratory. He rushed to the door and attempted to open it. It was locked!

"It's Baumline, let me in!" he shouted, but no reply.

"Do you hear? It's I, Baumline. The door is locked."

The only answer was a groan, "Oh, my God!" Almost frenzied, Baumline hurled himself against the door. It yielded a little, but still held. Again and again he dashed against it with all the weight of his athletic frame, until finally it gave way, and he burst into the room. As he entered a faint odour of peach bloom greeted his nostrils, but blinded by the bright sunlight—for the hall had been but dimly illumined—he was unable at first to distinguish anything in the apartment. It was only an instant, however, before his eyes adapted themselves to the increased light, and there before him, sunk down into his chair, was the professor, his eyes fixed and glassy, his limbs flaccid, his utter immobility showing that death had already supervened. On the bench within easy reach was a flask labelled "Prussic Acid," and on the wall, with almost impious energy, ticked that accursed little Swiss clock. At that instant the phonograph resumed its talk:

"My dear friends, our experiment, you will agree, has been crowned with unusual success. My word was as law to this man, and had I ordered him to kill himself he would have obeyed as unhesitatingly as a child. Further words are unnecessary. I trust my demonstration has been convincing."

THE CITY OF ANGELS

"IT is a pity," I said to the head waiter, "that every hotel in this country does not have a professional host. Now at the Coranado——"

"But, monsieur," he said, with the barest shrug of his shoulders, "if there is anyone that monsieur desires to know——"

He ran his eyes over the room (the rascal was a connoisseur, upon my life) and then he bent rather lower over my chair.

"Mademoiselle is living here," he said. "I will, if you prefer it, put you at the same table to-night. A pretty face, monsieur; a fine figure, too."

"Devilish fine," I thought. But I put on an air of indifference.

"You need not trouble," I said, stroking my moustache and scrutinising the wine-list. "It is nothing to me where I sit."

"Of course not, monsieur."

Long-stemmed roses, delicate, coral-coloured flowers of exquisite perfume decorated the little tables, with their spotless cloths and bright silver. A dish piled with the reddest and largest strawberries I had ever seen stood before me, and this when it wanted but four days to Christmas.

"The City of the Angels," I mused. "Truly the name is well chosen." Los Angeles certainly had its advantages over Piccadilly.

I had spoken, I suppose, aloud, for the head-waiter bent over me again.

"The City of the Queen of Angels, it used to be called, monsieur," he said, and once more looked meaningly across the room.

Over the tops of the flowers a pair of dancing black eyes met mine and instantly dropped again, slowly, irritatingly, finally. I studied the girl's face for a moment. The whiteness of the skin, the soft colouring of the cheeks, the arched eyebrows, had something deliciously old-world about them.

The brown hair was parted in the middle as one may see in the big pictures of the beauties of the eighteenth century, but most of all, it was the sweet laughing mouth which led me to do the rash act which afterwards made Los Angeles a name which goaded me each time I heard it mentioned.

The waiter was away fetching my wine, and I got up and passed close to her table, ostensibly to take a glance at the grand view of hill and mountain which made a charming background to the city. And as I passed I dropped a lady's handkerchief (how it came into my possession I cannot surmise) almost at her feet, but with some skill that I conceived prevented her from noticing the act.

I remained at the window for some time, and then turned leisurely back. The handkerchief was still lying where I had dropped it unobserved. So I picked it up, and, bowing slightly, presented it to the owner of that laughing mouth which had enraptured me.

"I think," I said, "you have dropped your handkerchief."

"Oh, thank you ever so much," said she. And then she looked at it and seemed to have some doubts, and felt in her pocket.

"It is not mine," she said. She glanced round and saw no other lady near. "Well, that's real curious, isn't it?" said she.

"It must be yours," I said emphatically.

"But it isn't. I'm sure it isn't," said she. Her eyes were flashing at mine bewilderingly. "Say, don't you think you have dropped it yourself."

I looked shockingly horrified and a little bit injured.

"It's a lady's handkerchief," I cried. "Surely you don't suppose——"

"Oh, you're English," she said delightedly, cutting my sentence short. "I guessed so, the first minute you came into the room. You can't bluff an American girl like that. I saw you drop it, you know, and if it isn't yours, whose is it?"

I felt foolish, but it was no good looking so.

"I don't know," I said truthfully. "I haven't the least idea."

I shifted the conversation.

"You live in Los Angeles?" I asked.

She nodded her pretty head, still laughing at my dilemma.

"And you?" she queried. "How do you like the Wild West?"

Digitized by Google

"To me it has only seemed wild as the primrose is wild," said I.

There was no excuse to stay longer. I bowed amiably, and went back to my wine and dessert. But after dinner that night we found ourselves together in the hall, and for several nights following that. Once when the conversation was reaching rather a critical point, "Georgie" (we had reached that stage some time) was called up on the telephone. The peremptoriness of telephones has always been a source of annoyance to me.

"It's Elalaine Murray," she said (I hadn't the least idea who Elalaine Murray might be), "and she wants me to go up to her place to-night. I told her I was going to bring you with me, and she was delighted. I'll go right now and get ready."

Much would I have preferred to do nothing of the kind. But apparently I had been taken in tow, and the prospect of the drive together was not so bad.

"Elalaine is the prettiest woman in the city," Georgie informed me, her eyes fixed straight in front of her.

"I don't doubt it if our hotel's in the suburbs," said I.

"You spoil yourself by being so ridiculous," said she.

It certainly was ridiculous—but I hadn't seen Elalaine Murray then. Directly that piece of good luck came to me, I shifted the association in my mind with the City of the Queen of Angels from Georgie to Elalaine. It is often like this when you are travelling about and constantly meeting new people. Georgie, however, did not like it.

The three of us played poker that evening at two cents the dozen. I sat opposite to my hostess, and more than once I thought I had four queens in my hand, and when the cards were shown down there were only three. She had beautiful auburn hair and blue eyes; her features were quite straight, and her chin squarely sculptured. It was rather an impassive face, and her laughter lay chiefly in her eyes, but the bare fact of being in the same room with her made you gay.

We played on and on, stopping every now and then to lean back in our chairs and talk. Elalaine (I like to call her by that name best), Elalaine and I were hitting it off admirably, but Georgie seemed rather silent. I believe she did not look in my direction once, but I did not notice.

All too soon the villainous clock on the mantelpiece struck eleven. Georgie glanced at me (it was rather an angry glance, I thought), and rose from her chair.

"We must be going, dear," she said (she was speaking to Elalaine). "It has been such a delightful evening."

"Going!" cried Elalaine, with a little ring of consternation. "But I asked you to spend the night. Surely you needn't go?"

It seemed that her husband had gone out to some dance and had proposed sleeping with his friends, and that she did not want to be left alone. Georgie, however, insisted that she could not stay.

"Momma made me promise to be back by eleven," she said. "I guess the elevator will have stopped running already, and I hate climbing up those horrid stairs."

"Then Duncan will have to come home," observed Elalaine. "He won't like it; but if you are sure you mustn't stay, of course——"

I looked at Georgie as much as to say: "Don't be selfish; can't you see what a lot of trouble you are causing." But she only tossed her head. I believe she was doing it on purpose. Elalaine went outside to the telephone and began calling up her husband.

Georgie looked sulky, and said nothing to me. Five hours before, such treatment would have driven me to despair, but under the circumstances, I was indifferent. It has never been my way to have two women in mind at once.

"Well?" I said at last. The silence was a little bit marked. Georgie sat down on the sofa and began pulling on her gloves.

"I think," I said, "you have dropped your handkerchief."

"What do you think of her?" she said suddenly, her eyes on the door. I remembered that she was Georgie's friend, and that she had described her as the prettiest woman in the city.

"She is the most charming woman I have ever met," I cried rapturously. "I cannot thank you enough for bringing me."

"I don't think you have had very much experience with women," said she.

"Very little," I said, because I thought I had had a great deal. "But why?"

Digitized by Google

"Because it is not usual, when you are with one girl, to talk about another," said she. Her cheeks were flushed and her eyes flashing.

"You asked me," I said stupidly. "She doesn't give you the impression of being afraid to be left alone, does she?" I added. I think I had Elalaine on the brain.

"It seems hard she should have to drag her husband back. He won't like it. 'Pon my word, I think you ought to stop if you can, Georgie."

She tossed her head.

"Really," said she, "a woman of Elalaine Murray's age ought to be able to take care of herself. I prefer to be called Miss Mayland," she added.

"Very well, Miss Mayland," said I, with a mocking bow.

Fortunately, Elalaine came back at that moment.

"I cannot bear to be left alone in this house," she explained, helping Georgie on with her coat and kissing her affectionately. "When the servants have gone to bed one feels so lonely and helpless, and since the rush to the Randsburg mines began the place has been filled with roughs."

"Mr. Murray is coming back?" I asked, holding out my hand.

"Not till three or four, I'm afraid," she said. She looked nervous and a little bit white about the lips. It was on my tongue to suggest that I might stop till his return, but a certain difficulty about the choice of words, and also Georgie's presence prevented me from doing so. But I went rather reluctantly, cursing my want of courage, and when at the garden gate Georgie discovered her muff had been left behind I went back with alacrity, my heart beating a little faster at finding the opportunity had come suddenly again.

I had some hesitation about knocking at the door. Knowing we had gone, and that her husband could not have returned, Elalaine would naturally be terrified.

She threw open the door, however, boldly enough, though her face was deathly white, and I could see she was breathing hard. I went in for a moment, found the muff, shook hands again, and, since Georgie was out of earshot, I said half jocularly:

"I will come back and sit on the doorstep till your husband returns if you like."

"I think we might give you a chair in the hall," said she with a bright flash from her eyes. Now, whether she meant it or not I do not know, but I scrambled Georgie off my hands at the hotel door and took the first car back.

There are people at home who suppose that a Western city is at best a collection of wooden houses on two sides of a sandy trail. But Los Angeles has more electric light than London, and miles of asphalted streets, and shops which neither Paris nor New York could rival. The white posts of the cable-car wires give the streets a gay air, as Cheapside looks when coloured poles have been put up for the decorations on Lord Mayor's day. Late as it was, the sidewalks were still crowded with people, and every seat on the car was filled.

Two people sitting next to me were talking.

"I am sorry for her," said one of them. "Everyone likes her, but the husband's a devil."

"He's almighty handy with his gun," said the other rather enviously. "I was down there at the bottom of fourth street election time when Jim Blane pulled on him and shot him just beside the eye. He dropped down on his knees like a log and put his hand up to his eye; but he shot Jim through the heart afore he fell back unconscious. If that ain't shootin' I 'llow I don't know what shootin' is." The man laughed appreciatingly. "Dan Murray's not going to be left far behind in this world," he added. "There's his house."

He was right. I swung off the car and made my way to the door. The conversation I had heard deepened my respect for Elalaine, who could be so lady-like and so charming with such a brutal husband. She was surprised to see me, but decidely she was glad I had come, for she had worked herself into a terrible state of nervousness. She pushed a chair nearer the fire, and settled herself on the sofa. Her presence stirred me deliciously.

"Georgie Mayland's a very attractive girl, isn't she?" she said, evidently thinking that she had read something between the lines.

"I should be in love with anyone who was the means of bringing me here," said I.

Her graceful arm was resting on the curve of the sofa, her hand slighty dropped so that it looked like the neck of a swan. Over the top of her hand her eyes were laughing at me.

"I am afraid you think me a terrible coward," she said. "I would dearly like to have a man's courage."

"There is very little that is admirable in courage," said I deprecatingly. "Courage comes of bodily strength, and strength of good health, and a man with good health is not cursed with nerves. We can hardly be proud of a quality which the brutes in the fields have far better developed than it is with us."

But she shook her head.

"The lower animals don't appreciate fine degrees of danger," said she, "I have seen a dog attack my husband, which no man in his senses would do. It was ignorance, not bravery."

She got up and handed me a little silver box of cigarettes.

We talked on and on about a hundred things, and she drew from me many stories, which I always reluctantly tell, of my adventures in many countries, and chiefly how I had once defended a friend from a mob of two hundred who had come out to lynch him. In spite of the light way in which I naturally referred to such things, I think she was rather impressed with the brave deeds I had done.

Presently we both became hungry, and instituted an excursion to the servants' regions, and in ten minutes time had the little dining-room table spread with sardines and biscuits and whatever else we could find. I was drawing the cork from a bottle, standing just beside her chair, when she looked round at me and laughed.

"Do you know this is highly improper?" she said.

"It can never be improper to do good," said I, "and you are doing me a very great deal."

"I was wondering what Duncan would say if he came in and found us like this," Elalaine responded, pushing her glass a little towards me.

I laughed amusedly.

"What would he?" I asked.

She tilted her chair back the slightest possible bit, still keeping her hand on the glass.

"I don't suppose he would say much," she replied. "In fact I'm sure he wouldn't."

"As for what anyone thinks, it really does not matter so much," I observed, pulling at the cork.

"I don't suppose he would think a great deal either," she said. "When a man has lived so long as he has in mining camps and places he is apt to shoot first and leave speaking and thinking till afterwards."

The bottle slipped out of my hands on to the floor. Elalaine looked round in surprise, and I could see she was laughing.

"What is the matter?" she asked.

"Nothing," I said rather quickly, "I thought I heard someone coming up the steps, that's all."

I mopped my forehead. The room was very hot, and I was perspiring.

"I wish Duncan would come," said Elalaine, with a little contraction of her brows. "It would be a lesson to him."

The sound of footsteps must have been imaginary, for no one came. Our supper was most delightful, though the conversation was a little bit frivolous. At three o'clock in the morning one cannot be expected to discuss logic. However, I was rather glad when Elalaine suggested we should move back into the drawing-room. It was more conventional there than sitting tête-à-tête over champagne and sandwiches.

She went back to her corner of the couch, and I to my easy chair before the fire.

"Sofas are very comfortable," I said philosophically, selecting another cigarette from the box which still lay within reach. "In my own rooms in London I never use a chair except for meals."

She was laughing at me over her hand again. I had a great mind to stretch out my own and take it.

"You luxurious creature," she said, pointing to where the matches stood on a little table at my elbow. She got up suddenly and sat down again, making more room on the couch. "Look," said she, "you can have that corner if you like."

I went and sat down beside her.

We talked of many things, and so pleasantly that I had no idea what the time was, but I knew it must be getting late. Elalaine had suggested that if I felt like a whisky-and-soda I might mix myself one in the dining room, and I was hunting for a syphon when I heard some one coming up the front door steps. There was no illusion this time. I put down my glass and ran into the hall.

"Mrs Murray!" I called breathlessly. I wanted her to explain matters. If her husband were to come in and find me there he might, as she had playfully said, keep his thinking and saying things till afterwards. A couple of words from her would put matters right, but a man coming back to his own house, probably in a bad temper, and finding a stranger drinking his whisky-and-soda at four o'clock in the morning would just as likely as not be unreasonable and violent. It would not occur to him —right out —that I had been introduced by a mutual friend, and had stayed on out of consideration for his wife's nervousness.

The collar of his coat was turned up.

I could hear the latch-key already in the door.

In two strides I was at the drawing-room.

Elalaine was leaning back on the sofa asleep.

"Mrs Murray! Quick. For heaven's sake wake up!" I whispered fiercely.

But she did not stir.

I threw a quick glance over my shoulder. The front door was being slowly opened. A big screen was drawn across part of the hall, hiding the entrance to the servants' quarters, and behind this I darted. It was no good standing there to be shot. I was quite willing to attack burglars, but I had no wish to be mistaken for one. I crouched down instinctively, and partly because my knees were aching. Through a crack in the screen I saw Dan Murray come in like a man whose suspicions had been aroused.

The collar of his coat was turned up and his opera hat was tilted slightly over the right eye. He was a handsome fellow, with a pale complexion, and a heavy moustache, which drooped over the mouth. Somehow I felt relieved that I was not standing there facing him with my explanation, which I realised would sound uncommonly lame. If Elalaine had not been so idiotic as to fall asleep my horrible predicament would never have arisen. As things were, my best plan clearly was to stop where I was until they went up-stairs, and then to let myself out with as little noise as possible.

If ever one man has mesmerised another, I am sure by sheer force of will I preserved Dan Murray from hanging up his coat and hat, and at the same time discovering mine. But when I tried to keep him away from the dining-room where the remains of our meal were spread, I suppose my will-powers were not sufficiently under control. I heard him open the door, which I had taken the precaution to close behind me, and was seriously perturbed lest I should collapse on the spot with terror. My first impulse was to dart out of my hiding-place and forcibly to wake Elalaine up. I was gingerly shifting one lapel of the screen so that I could creep into the room unperceived, when the thought struck me that perhaps even her explanation might not be in time to save me from the attack of that quick-tempered giant. On considering the matter, I determined to stay where I was.

At the same time I made frantic endeavours to wake her up, in order that I might catch her eye and make signs to her to explain my position. But though I could see her when the screen was drawn back, I utterly failed to wake her. It was my fear that, not knowing where I was, she would make some rash remark and not only commit herself but me.

Presently I heard the dining-room door open and close again. Dan Murray had evidently swallowed that pill without a grimace. Or perhaps he had put the second place at the table down to Georgie's account. That, as a possibility that had not occurred to me before, caused me no little relief.

At the same time my mouth felt dry; and the ignominy of my position was particularly galling to anyone with a fine spirit such as I had. Here was I, hiding like a criminal, when my worst offence was that of being indiscreetly considerate for a woman's feelings. A man with sympathies is perpetually a man in difficulty, and the more I thought the matter over in that narrow corner behind the screen the deeper grew my determination to be in future over-selfish rather than too altruistic.

I knew Dan Murray had come out of the dining-room, but he had not gone past my little peephole. After an interval, which seemed to me like hours, however, I heard him coming down the stairs, and the next moment he had crossed over to the drawing-room.

Instinctively I drew the screen round me and stood there listening intently. There was another interval which seemed interminable; my heart throbbed unmercifully, and I was compelled to mop persistently at my forehead. I wondered what Georgie would say and think if she could have seen me at that moment, and I would gladly have given £1,000 to have found myself spirited back to our hotel.

The next thing I remember was hearing a piercing cry, and in an instant, forgetful of everything, I had sprung from my hiding-place, the huge screen falling behind me with a stupendous crash.

Elalaine was on her knees before the couch; her husband was standing over her; it seemed to me with his hand pressed on her throat.

He turned as I came in and loosened his hold. Then, before I had realised his purpose, he sprang at me, hurling me with the force of his blow across the room, and the next moment was out into the hall and had his hand on the front door.

Elalaine, too terrified to speak, was crouching back against the couch wringing her hands.

It seemed to me the verge of a terrible domestic tragedy.

"Look here," I cried, taking two strides in his direction; "it is for me to go, not you." I had drawn my revolver, but I flung it from me on to a chair, and stood there with my hands behind me, my lips tightly closed.

He stared at me for a moment with a world of mad hate in his eyes, and then threw open the door and went out.

I heard the sound of a window being thrown up, and as I swung round there came the crack of a revolver. It was Elalaine.

"What have you done?" I cried.

Her hands fell to her side, and she stood staring at me, her head thrown back, revealing the full rounded neck, her eyes blazing, her auburn hair tossed wildly over her forehead.

"You coward," she breathed at last.

I looked at her with amazement, wincing beneath the scorn of her voice. Then I pushed past her and drew the heavy curtains aside, expecting I do not know what awful horror.

"Your husband," I cried, "what has become of him?"

It was perfectly dark outside and quiet as death.

Elalaine glanced up at the clock; her face was ashen.

"I don't know," she said. "He ought to be back by now, and if I were you I should go before he comes." She kicked the revolver which lay smoking on the carpet towards me with the tip of her shoe.

"But——"

She silenced me with an imperious gesture.

"Take my advice," she said, "and go. Dan is a man, and can do things which I can only wish to do. No," she went on, as I tried to interrupt, "I won't listen. You came here on the pretence of affording me protection, and when the need arises what has become of you?" She laughed in a way that cut me to the quick. "Where are you?" she repeated with infinite scorn. "Hiding behind a screen. And there you stop shivering I suppose in your shoes while you allow the house to be burgled—even while I am attacked. A pretty figure forsooth!" and she laughed again.

It had never occurred to me that the man who came in with that deliberate step could be anyone but her husband. I tried to explain, but the words stumbled on my lips.

"Good-night," she said, her hands still behind her.

"Good-bye," said I. And I took down my hat and coat and went outside.

The man she had fired at had evidently not been hit. A woman's best shots come from her mouth.

The next night Georgie came to me after dinner.

"I suppose," she said; "you are going up to the Murrays' to-night."

"I would rather stop here," I said truthfully.

I think she was rather pleased at that.

"But Elalaine?" she queried, with her head a little on one side.

"I don't care if I never see her again," said I.

I think I shall marry Georgie if I ever go back to Los Angeles—that beautiful City of the Angels under the bright Californian sky. MERRIDEN HOWARD.

Another couple of centuries with a few added years have slipped away, and the next scene of the slowly-unfolding drama opens on the sea instead of the land. The Idea which Edward of the Longlegs had so clearly conceived and so very nearly realised, the idea that the frontiers of the United Kingdom of which he had dreamt should be its sea-coasts has all the time been growing and deepening, for, like all ideas which faithfully reflect some fact in the universe, it could not die, and was bound some day to become a fact itself.

Politically, England and Scotland were still independent kingdoms, but many old differences had been forgotten and forgiven, and they had come a great deal closer, as it was fitting that they should do on the eve of their final union. Moreover, they were one in their dread and hatred of that cruel and implacable Colossus which, with one foot on the East and the other on the West, bestrode the world, drawing vast treasures from hidden El-Dorados with which it built countless ships, and hired and armed innumerable men for the enslavement of mankind. For now we have reached those "spacious times of great Elizabeth," when that lusty young giant of Liberty, recently born into the world, was girding on his armour, and making him ready to grapple with the powers of oppression and darkness which were just then most fitly incarnated in the shape of Spain.

It is almost impossible for us of the present day to understand clearly what the Spain of those days was. She was the first naval and military Power of the world, her ships and armies were everywhere, her wealth was honestly believed to be illimitable, and moreover she was the recognised champion of the Catholic Church, whose spiritual thunders mingled with the roar of her guns, and which supplemented the terror of her arms by all the diabolical enginry of torture, and the awful powers of the Holy Office.

The world, in short, was on the eve of great and marvellous doings—on the one hand, so terrible in their deadly earnestness and tremendous consequences, and on the other so fantastically splendid in their almost superhuman daring and undreamt-of rewards, that it looked as though the Fates were preparing some gigantic miracle wherewith to astound mankind. And so, in sober truth, they were, and the miracle about to be wrought was the making of what we now call the British Empire.

In the beginning of the latter half of the sixteenth century there was a yellow-haired, blue-eyed, round-faced and sturdily-built youngster sailing to and fro as ship's boy in a tiny cockle-shell of a craft plying with humbler kinds of merchandise between the Thames and the coasts of France and Flanders. Whether or not he had heard any of those wondrous stories which the western gales were wafting across the Atlantic from the golden Spanish Main we do not know, but probably he had, and, like many another sailor-lad of his day, he had dreamt wild dreams of blue seas and bright skies, of white-walled cities crammed with gold, and of stately galleons staggering across that mysterious sea stuffed to the deck with the treasures they were bringing to pour into the coffers of the King of Spain.

And yet, wild as these dreams may have been, they would have been commonplace in comparison with the bewildering exploits with which this same blue-eyed sailor-lad was one day to realise and excel them. For this was he whose name the mariners of Spain were soon to hear shrieked out by the voice of the tempest, booming in the roar of guns, and echoing through the crash of battle. This, in a word, was Francis Drake—El Draque the Dragon, child and servant of the Devil himself, Scourge of the Church and Plunderer of the Faithful.

As I say, he may or may not have heard the story of the Golden West, but it is quite certain that he did hear much of the black and terrible tale which the refugees and exiles from France and the Netherlands had to tell, for not a few of them crossed over in the little barque in which he served, and he could not fail to hear what they had to say of the murders and massacres, the torturing and outrage with which Spain was disgracing her knightly fame and her ancient faith. They are horrible enough for us to read even here in the security which that gallant struggle won for us, and now when we can only hear the shrieks of the tortured and the groans of the dying echoing faintly across the gulf of three centuries; but what must they have been to Francis Drake, when he heard them told by those whose eyes had only just before looked upon the hideous reality—perhaps indeed by some of those racked and mutilated unfortunates who had managed to escape with their lives to see the sheltering hospitality of Gloriana the Queen? Was it any wonder that deep down in his boyish heart there were planted those seeds of hate and horror which later on were to bear such terrible fruit?

The lad Francis seems to have performed his duties as ship's boy as well as he did everything else, whether it was leading the Queen's ships to harry the coast of Spain or raging and storming through one of his piratical raids among the Fortunate Isles of the West, for when his master died he made him his heir, and so Francis became a trader on his own account. For a few years he was just a peaceful shipmaster, making an honest and hard-won living; but all this time events were arranging themselves in more and more martial array, and the bursting of the storm was not very far off.

The actual fighting did not begin in the guise of recognised warfare for a very considerable time. Spain and England were at peace, each trying to humbug the other, but between Protestant and Catholic it was otherwise. Armed cruisers manned by angry Protestants made their appearance in the Narrow Seas, and whenever they got a chance fell upon Catholic ships and avenged the sufferings of their fellow-heretics in a fashion at once prompt and pitiless, and this at length so exasperated Philip that he closed his ports to English trade, and Drake's occupation was gone. Better, in truth, had it been for Philip if he had left him undisturbed in his business!

He sold his little vessel, went to Plymouth, and entered the service of two kinsmen of his, one of whom was soon to prove somewhat of an empire-maker in his own line and whose name, with certain others soon to be mentioned, was destined to go down to everlasting fame indissolubly linked with that of Francis Drake. This was Captain John Hawkins, and when the young trader reached Plymouth he had just come back with a ship-load of gold and other precious things from his first venture in slave-trading, and now at least Drake, who was still a lad in his teens, must have heard something of the wonders of El-Dorado. Yet, curiously enough, when Captain Hawkins went back he did not go with him. He sailed instead, as a sort of super-cargo in another of Hawkins' ships to Biscay, and there a momentous revelation awaited him, as though to guide him on the path of his destiny.

At San Sebastian about a score of English sailors, once strong and stalwart men of Devon, crept out of the dungeons of the Inquisition and took passage with him home. King Philip had taken off his embargo now, and these men were the remnant of a crew of a Plymouth ship which he had seized in port when the embargo was laid on. The others had rotted to death during the six months that he had bestowed his hospitality upon them. We can imagine what talks they had on the way home, and no doubt El Draque bore the stories of these forlorn mariners well in mind on that most memorable day when he "singed the King of Spain's beard" at Cadiz.

John Hawkins came back from his second voyage richer than ever, and now all the mariners of the South Coast were beginning to dream golden dreams which were soon to become yet more golden deeds, and King Philip, to whom all such ventures were the flattest piracy, began to fear for his monopoly and instructed his ambassador in London to drop the hint that foreign trade with the Indies was forbidden, upon which, foolishly enough, or perhaps not knowing their own true strength, Queen Bess's councillors backed down and forbade John Hawkins to start again.

He, obediently enough, stayed at home, but a certain George Lovell got together an expedition and slipped out to sea westward bound. With him went Francis Drake, at length to see for the first time the blue waters and green shores of El Dorado. This time, however, it proved no El Dorado for him or his companions, for they came back with shattered ships and still worse broken fortunes. They had drawn a blank in the great lottery which half Europe was wanting to gambie in.

Nothing daunted, he shipped again, this time with George Fenner, bound for Guiana. Again, financially speaking, the voyage ended in disaster, but there was one incident in it destined to bear good fruit. A big Portugese galleasse, backed up by six gunboats, tried to enforce the prohibition against foreign trade. Fenner had one ship and a pinnace and with these he fought the "Portugals" and thoroughly convinced them by the logic of shot and steel that he was not the sort of man to be prohibited from doing anything he wanted to do.

This forgotten action is really one of great importance. It was Francis Drake's first taste of fighting, which in itself means a good deal, but it was also the beginning of that lordly and magnificent contempt which the English mariners of that day were soon to feel for all enemies, no matter how strong they might seem. It was this spirit which a few years later was to take Sir Richard Grenville

> With his hundred men on deck and his ninety sick below,

Into the midst of the fifty-three Spanish ships, which he fought for an afternoon and a night before he surrendered so sorely against his will and fell dead of his wounds on the deck of the Spanish flagship. It was this, too, which, when that long seven days' fight against the Armada was raging and roaring up the Channel, brought the flag of the Spanish Rear-Admiral down with a run just because the Little Pirate stamped his foot on the deck of that same Revenge and said that he was Francis Drake and had no time to parley.

Meanwhile the rumblings of the war-storm in Europe had been growing louder. The Netherlanders were at last turning on their torturers, Darnley had been murdered and Mary Queen of Scots put in prison, so Gloriana, feeling herself somewhat at leisure, took a hand in the next buccaneering expedition. If may be noted here, by the way, that there was no more ardent buccaneer and slave-trader in her dominions than Good Queen Bess herself. She lent ships though she witheld her commission, and her pirates did the rest. If disaster overtook them or if the Spanish Minister raged against their doings she promptly disowned them and felt sorry for her ships. But if they came back happily filled to the hatches with plundered treasure, she took her dividends and lent more ships.

It was thus with the expedition which sailed out of Plymouth on October 2nd, 1567, under the command of Admiral John Hawkins, whose second officer was Francis Drake. The diplomacy of the times called it the trading venture of Sir William Garrard and Co., but for all that there were two ships of the Royal Navy in it, the Jesus and the Minion, and the merchandise it carried consisted mainly of cannon and small arms, powder and shot, and cold steel.

The voyage began with a slave-raiding expedition down the Portuguese coast of Africa, whence with five hundred slaves they crossed to the Spanish Main. Here after varying fortunes, they filled their ships with treasure, and Hawkins turned his prows northward for home. But while crossing the mouth of the Gulf of Mexico a furious hurricane burst upon them and drove his gold-and-pearl-laden vessels so far into it, that he came to the bold decision to put into the Spanish port of Vera Cruz to refit.

In the harbour he found twelve great galleons loaded with gold and silver, waiting for the convoy to escort them to Spain. They were utterly at the mercy of the English ships, but John Hawkins, pirate and slave-dealer, was still an English gentleman, so he made a solemn convention to leave the treasure-ships alone on condition of being allowed to refit in the harbour. Hawkins was already known in Spain as the "Enemy of God," and Don Martin Enriquez, the new Governor of Mexico, had come out with special orders to abolish him by any means that might be found the readiest.

Don Martin seems to have thought that in this case, treachery would suit best, so he signed the convention and gave his word of honour as a gentleman of Spain that the English ships should be allowed to come and go unmolested. So for three days the work of dismantling went on in peace, and on the fourth, half-disabled as they were, they were attacked. It was a fierce and bloody fight, and it ended in the sinking of four galleons, the wrecking of the Spanish flag-ship, and the killing of five or six hundred Spaniards.

But on the English side only the Jesus, the Minion, and the Judith got away and, shot-shattered and half-provisioned, began to stagger homeward across the wide Atlantic. On the way the Judith was lost, and took to the bottom with her all the proceeds of many months of trading and fighting and privation.

He went down with his boot full of blood.

So the expedition came back poorer than it went, and Spain laughed aloud but, as will be seen, somewhat too soon. Drake got home first and no sooner did he land at Plymouth than he took horse for London. It so happened that a little while before Spanish ships carrying a huge amount of money to pay Alva's army in the Netherlands had been driven into the Thames by the Protestant rovers lately mentioned, and Gloriana, who never liked to let a good thing go, had held on to it on one pretext or another until Drake came hot-footed and angry-hearted to tell of the treachery of Vera Cruz.

Gloriana wanted nothing better. Her buccaneering venture had been a failure and here was a way of paying herself for the two ships she had risked, so she turned upon the Spanish Ambassador and told him point blank that until the injury done to her "honest merchants" was redressed she would hold the treasure in pledge. Naturally after that not a groat of it ever got to Alva or his soldiers.

That year, which was 1569, Drake went to Rochelle with Sir Thomas Winter. The next summer he married Mary Newman and a month or two later he was again steering to the westward in two little vessels, the Dragon and the Swan. The next year he went again, with the Swan alone, and this time he came back with a certain idea in his head which was magnificent to the point of absurdity. The adventures of the last two or three years had deepened his contempt for Spanish prowess, and now he laughingly proposed to go back, not to kill the goose that laid the King of Spain's golden eggs, but to rifle the nest in which they were deposited. This was Nombre de Dios, the strongest city in the New World, and the richest to boot.

The means employed were, as was usual in this age of wonders, ridiculously inadequate to the end to which they were devoted. Of late years certain bold mariners have sought to win an ephemeral notoriety by crossing the Atlantic in open boats. Francis Drake set out on a serious and momentous expedition to the Spanish Main in the Pasha of 70 tons followed by the Swan of 25—that is to say in a couple of fishing-boats. These two cockle-shells were manned by seventy-three men all told, only one of whom had reached the age of thirty. It must have looked more like a parcel of lads going afloat on a holiday spree than an expedition with which all the world was soon to ring.

There is no space here to tell of all that befell these absurd adventurers on their devious and tedious way to Nombre de Dios, though no romancer ever imagined such a story as their adventures make. So it must suffice to say that on July 29th he started out across the Isthmus of Darien at the head of seventy-three men to attack a strong city as big as Plymouth, and with these he actually fought his way into the town, established himself in the centre of it and held it for some hours.

If his men had been the seasoned buccaneers of his later raids he would probably have taken it altogether, but they unhappily found in the Governor's house a stack of silver bars twelve feet high, ten feet broad, and seventy feet long. This was a little too much for the nerves of the Devon boys, but Drake would not let them touch it, since the town was not yet theirs. Then a fearful rain-storm came on just about dawn and put out their matches and ruined their bow-strings, and then a terrible misfortune happened. Drake had been severely wounded in the leg, but he had concealed his hurt until the supreme moment came, and then, as he was leading his handful of heroes to the last attack, he went down with his boot full of blood. Something very like a panic now took his men, not for their own sakes but for his. In vain he stormed at them, and cried angrily:

"I have brought you to the door of the Treasure-house of the World! Will ye be fools enough to go away empty?"

"Your life is more precious to us and England than all the gold of the Indies," they replied, and so by kindly force they carried him down to the boats and rowed away, having accomplished perhaps the most splendid failure in history.

The fame of this exploit instantly echoed through the whole Spanish Main and thence across the Atlantic to Europe. A few days later he avenged his failure at Nombre de Dios by cutting a big ship out from under the guns of Cartagena. Then he vanished, leaving no other trace behind him than the poor little abandoned Swan. For the next few months nothing was seen of him, though his hand was felt far and wide along the Coast. Spanish store-ships disappeared, dispatch boats were intercepted, and coast-towns were raided with bewildering rapidity and effectiveness.

But all this time the deadly tropical fever was playing havoc with his little handful of men. His brother John died of it and man after man was struck down till at last, out of the seventy-three who had sailed with him from Plymouth, he could only muster eighteen fighting men when he at length started to plunder the mule-train from Panama.

On the fourth day of the journey a very memorable thing happened, for that noon he reached the top of the dividing ridge of the Isthmus and lo! there before him, only a few miles away, lay the smooth, shining expanse of the Pacific Ocean, that long-hidden, jealously-guarded sea on which his were the first English eyes that had ever gazed. He did just what such a man would have done in such circumstances. He fell on his knees and, raising his hands to Heaven, cried aloud:

"Almighty God, of Thy goodness, give me life and leave once to sail an English ship on yonder sea!"

Years afterwards the prayer was granted, and not only did he sail on the Golden Sea, but crossed it while he was making the first voyage that an Englishman ever made round the world.

Were I writing a book instead of an article I could tell of the plundering of the mule-trains, of the taking of Venta Cruz, where, to the astonishment of the Spaniards, he would not allow a single woman or an unarmed man to be hurt, and Nombre de Dios, which did not resist him so well the second time. It must, however be enough to say that this time everything ended happily for the remnant that survived, and that on Sunday morning, August 9th, 1573, while the good folks of Plymouth were in church, they heard a roar of artillery from the batteries followed by an answering salute from the sea and, straightway quitting their devotions, they ran out to learn the good news that Gloriana's Little Pirate had come back safe at last and well loaded up with plunder.

His next venture was nothing less than that famous voyage of his round the world, with the fairy-story of which we have here nothing to do save to say that the fame of it, no less than the enormous treasure, the plunder of a hundred ships and a score of towns, with which the poor sea-worn, worm-eaten, wind-weary Golden Hind, staggered one Michaelmas morning into Plymouth Sound, at last convinced Queen Bess that in her dear Little Pirate—whom, by the way, she had never yet openly recognised—she had a champion who was worth a good many thousands of King Philip's soldiers and sailors.

But now the first of Drake's open rewards was to be his. The Golden Hind was hauled on to the slips at Deptford, and Gloriana and her court dined on board. When the dinner was over she bade her Little Pirate kneel before her, touched him on the shoulder with his own sword and bade him rise Sir Francis Drake. The Spaniards, by the way, had another title for him, no less honourable in his eyes, and this was "the Master Thief of the New World."

For some considerable time nothing happened beyond the failure of one or two trifling expeditions—which failure was Gloriana's fault, and not Drake's—and the setting of a price of £40,000 by favour of the King of Spain on the Little Pirate's head—an investment of which Drake was soon to pay the dividend in the craft-crowded harbour of Cadiz.

Meanwhile, matters between England and Spain were going from bad to worse. For a few months unscrupulous intrigue, backed up by wholesale lying, hampered Drake most sorely in the preparation of that great work which was nothing less than the establishment of the sea-power of England. Everything that the fickleness of his mistress, the weathercock support of so-called friends at court, and the still more dangerous machinations of English statesmen in the pay of Spain could do, was done. The fleet, to his unutterable rage and disgust, was even placed on a peace-footing, dispite the fact that the noise of the Armada's preparations was still sounding across the Narrow Seas.

But, at last, by some means or other, a certain Spanish spy had got himself suspected and stretched on the rack. Now the rack, as a means of cross-examination, is not an ideal instrument, but it certainly served its purpose this time, for the spy in his torment gave away all the details of a vast scheme which embraced an alliance between France, Spain, and Scotland, together with a general Catholic uprising in England, which was to take place simultaneously with the Triple Invasion.

Never had England, and with her the cause of liberty, stood in such great and deadly peril. Gloriana at last flung diplomatic dalliance to the winds, stopped her lying and chicanery, kicked the Spanish Ambassador out of the country and let her Little Pirate loose. Yet even now there was another lull before the storm and this lull Philip took advantage of to invite a fleet of English corn-ships to his ports, where he seized them to feed that ever-growing sea-monster which he was going to pit against El Draque.

This settled the matter. Drake, only half ready for sea, put out with every ship that could move for fear more orders would come to stop him and, with an insolent assurance which augured well for the great things that he was about to do, actually ran his ships into Vigo Bay and forced the Spanish Governor to allow him to finish his preparations in Spanish waters. Then he turned his eager prows westward, stopping on the way at the Cape Verde Islands to lay waste Vera Cruz and make Santiago a heap of ashes.

Five years ago young William Hawkins had been taken prisoner here and burnt alive with several of the crew, and this was his way of wiping out the old score.

Then he sped on again, spent Christmas at Santa Dominica, refitted his ships and refreshed his men, and then fell like a thunderbolt on the famous city of Santo Domingo, the oldest in the Indies, founded by Columbus himself and ruled over by his brother. It was this that the Little Pirate had been preparing for during those other mysterious voyages of his. The blow was as crushing as it was unexpected, and the prestige of Spain in the West never recovered from it. The town was utterly stripped and dismantled by the victors. Fifty thousand pounds in cash, two hundred and forty guns of all calibres, and an immense amount of other spoil was brought away, and the whole fleet, after living at free quarters for a month, sailed southward, completely refitted and re-victualled at the Spaniards' expense.

When the news got to Europe, it was said that Philip had had "such a cooling as he had never had since he was King of Spain." It is both interesting and instructive to learn that not the least part of the booty took the shape of a hundred English sailors who were found toiling as slaves in the Spanish galleys.

Reinforced by these, Gloriana's Little Pirate crossed the Caribbean Sea and fell on Cartagena, the capital of the Spanish Main, and now the richest city in the Indies. Paralysed by the insolence of the attack, it soon fell under its fury and real strength. The booty was enormous, but the moral effect was still greater. The new-born sea-power of England had vindicated itself with triumphant suddenness, and Drake, having picked up the unfortunate remnants of Raleigh's colony in Virginia—the time for colonising not having come yet—entered Plymouth Sound again in the Elizabeth Bonaventura at the head of his loot-laden fleet, and reported his arrival, piously regretting that on the way home he had missed the Spanish plate-fleet by twelve hours "for reasons best known to God."

"A great gap hath been opened which is very little to the King of Spain's liking," was the Little Pirate's own comment on the brilliant achievement which had ushered a new power into the world. He might also have put it another way and said that with his well-directed shot he had plugged the source whence flowed the golden stream of Spanish wealth, for indeed it was nothing less than this. The Spanish Colossus suddenly found itself with empty pockets, Spanish credit was ruined at a single blow, the Bank of Seville closed its doors and King Philip, trying to raise a loan of half a million ducats, was flatly refused.

How hard hit he was may be seen from the fact that instead of hurling the whole strength of his laboriously-prepared Armada on the English coasts, he asked for explanations. Gloriana, with an almost splendid mendacity, disowned her Little Pirate once more and swore she had nothing whatever to do with him. But this Drake expected and went on with his own plans, having no doubt honestly paid up the Queen's full share of the plunder.

A few months more of diplomatic dodgery followed and then came the final opening of Gloriana's eyes. A letter stolen from the Pope's own cabinet proved to her beyond all possibility of doubt that the Great Armada was intended for the invasion of England and nothing else. Then she called her Little Pirate to her again and took counsel with him, with the result that the next time he hoisted his flag he did so on board the great Merchant Royal at the head of twenty-three sail including five battleships, two first-class cruisers, seven second-class, and about a dozen gun-boats. Nor did he go this time as the Queen's licensed pirate, but as her Admiral of the Fleet, duly commissioned in her name to burn, sink, and destroy, and to use all means whatever to prevent the various divisions of the Armada coming together.

Even now, at the last minute of the eleventh hour, treachery almost did its work, for there was an Opposition and Peace-at-any-price Party in those days, as there have been in later ones. Drake seems to have known what was coming, for, when the Queen's messenger dashed into Plymouth bearing the fatal orders, he had gone.

Happily there was no telegraph in those days. If there had been it would probably have proved the ruin of England and the triumph of Spain. As it was the next news that came was from Drake himself, telling, laconically as usual, how he had "singed the King of Spain's beard in Cadiz." When the facts came out, the said singeing was seen to amount to the destruction by burning and sinking of 12,000 tons of shipping, including some of the finest ships of war that floated. The whole English fleet had, as usual, been revictualled at Spanish expense, and four large ships full of provisions were captured intact.

From Cadiz the triumphant Admiral raged up and down the terror-stricken coast, storming strongholds, and burning and scuttling the store-ships of the Great Armada. He went to Lisbon where Santa Cruz, said to be the greatest sea-captain in Europe, lay, and, after vainly challenging him to come out an fight, politely offered to convoy him and his fleet to England "if by chance his course should lie that way." The fact was that the Colossus was paralysed. Drake had struck out straight at its heart and so doing had proved two principles of no small moment to the making of the British Empire: First, the true frontiers of a maritime nation are its enemies' coasts. Second, the only effective method of defence for such a nation is attack.

It was on his way home from this expedition, storm-shattered and disgusted at missing the Plate-Fleet, which had once more slipped through his fingers, that the Little Pirate took the richest prize of his life. This was the San Felipe. She was the King of Spain's own treasure-ship and she came, not from the West, but from the East. Though he knew it not, Drake had that day done a very great thing for England and the making of her Empire, for not only did the San Felipe carry treasure and rich stuffs to the value of something like a million and a quarter of our money, but she had on board dispatches, letters, and account books which let the English merchants into all the secrets of Spain's East Indian trade and led to the almost instant formation of the Honourable East India Company, itself an Empire-maker of no small account.

The epic of the Elizabethan era was now beginning to hurry towards its climax. But Gloriana was still surrounded by traitors and even now temporising was the order of the day. She was cast down by remorse for the execution of Mary Queen of Scots, and she even reprimanded her Little Pirate for doing her too good service and told Philip that he was in disgrace for exceeding instructions.

It was in vain that Drake and the other friends of England prayed and entreated and stormed and swore. In vain they pointed across the Narrow Seas to Parma in the Netherlands at the head of 30,000 of the finest troops in Europe and to the ports of Spain and Portugal, once more swarming with shipping and echoing with the noise of warlike preparations. For a time the liars and traitors had it their own way again. Drake and Howard implored her to let them get their ships fitted and go and fight the Armada in its own ports. No, she would do nothing. And she did nothing till at last arrived that fatal evening on which:

There came a gallant merchant-ship full sail to Plymouth Bay.

Golden weeks and priceless opportunities had been wasted by the fatal lethargy of the Court. Drake and Howard, instead of falling as they longed to do, on the wind-bound Armada in Vigo Bay and doing with it as Drake had done at Cadiz, were kept on the defensive, straining like blood-hounds at the leash, knowing that every moment that the good wind lasted was heavily fraught with fate for England and perhaps the world.

At length the wind went round and Drake, marvelling in angry wonder "how God could have sent a south-west wind just then," found himself baffled and beaten back, while Medina-Sidonia with his released Armada sailed triumphantly for the Channel. There was only one thing now to do if England was to be saved. Valour and heroism, self-devotion and skill must repair the damage that treason, lying, and weakness of head or heart had done. By this time the Armada should have been a crushed and tangled mass of burning wreckage, and so it would have been if Drake had had his way, and now here it was stronger than ever, its ships covering the hitherto inviolate sea; and there was Parma, with his transports still undestroyed, only waiting to join hands with Sidonia to once for all strangle the Heretic in their pitiless grip.

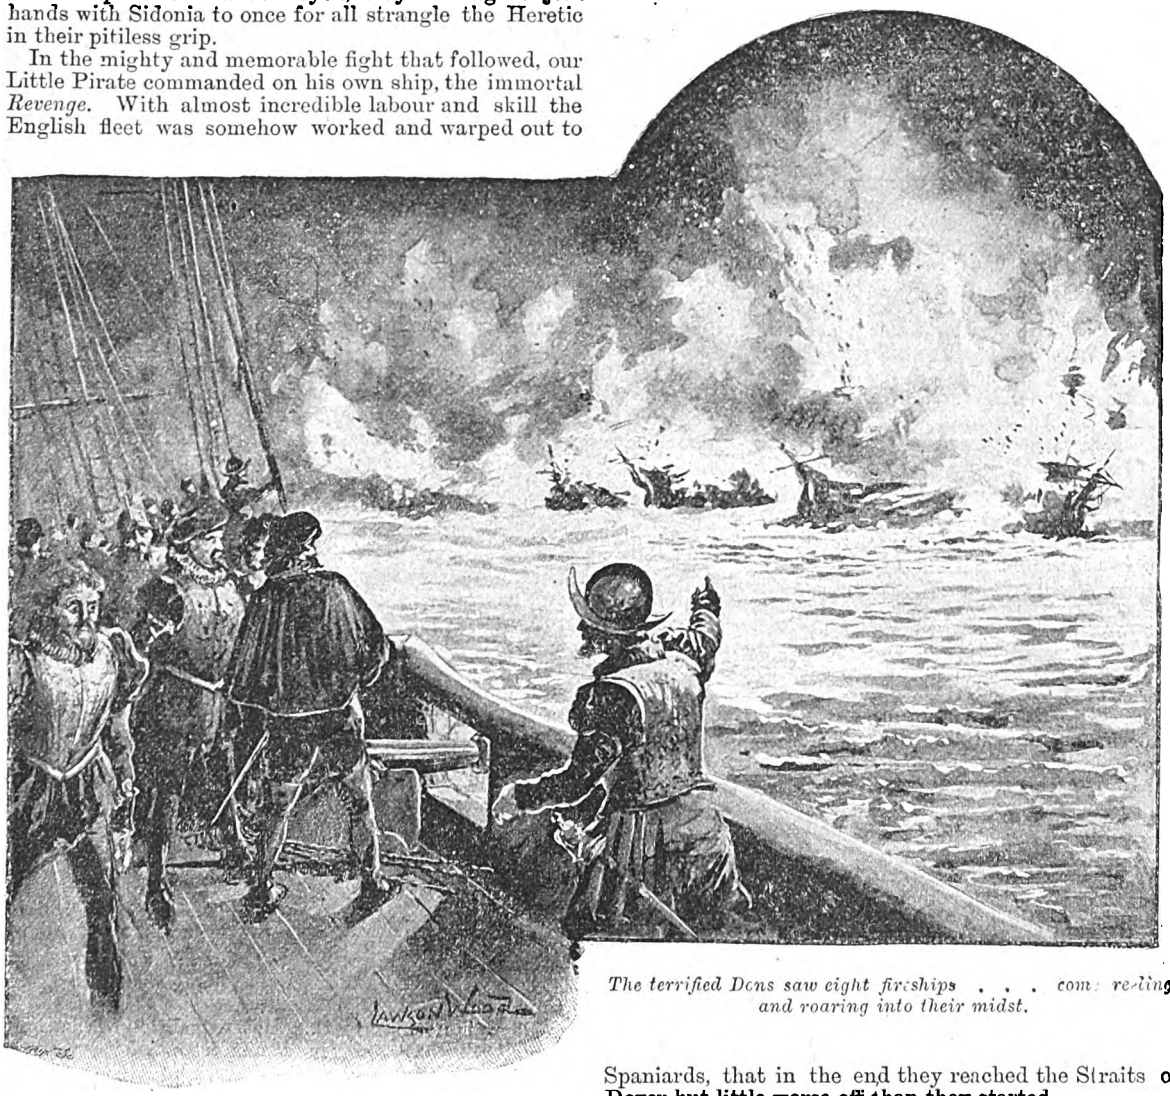
In the mighty and memorable fight that followed, our Little Pirate commanded on his own ship, the immortal Revenge. With almost incredible labour and skill the English fleet was somehow worked and warped out to the westward until, when that famous Sunday morning dawned, the sun looked, as has been truly said, upon a sight glorious for England. There was the great Armada, cresent-shaped, rolling up the Channel, and there, right in the wind's eye and on its rear, were two English squadrons, and a third was gallantly advancing out of Plymouth.

This one with true Elizabethan insolence steered right across the front of the huge fleet, firing into such of the Dons as came within range. Then it went about and joined the other English ships to windward.

Everyone has read of the long running seven-day fight that followed; everyone knows how the little, light-heeled English ships ran in and out among the great unwieldly galleons, tempting them out of their formation, and, having isolated one, fell on her like a pack of dogs on a wolf, and how, in spite of all that the English Admiral and his captains could do, the ever changing wind, and the ever succeeding calms so helped the Spaniards, that in the end they reached the Straits of Dover but little worse off than they started.



The terrified Dons saw eight fireships . . . coming reeling and roaring into their midst.

If Drake could have had his way these tactics would have been pushed farther, and every mile of the way would have been disputed, but Lord Howard, though a brave man, lacked the all-daring assurance of the conqueror of Santo Domingo and Cartagena. He would not fight until he had joined with Seymour and Wynter in the Straits. So it came about that on the seventh day—that is to say Saturday afternoon—the Great Armada, the poorer only by some dozen craft that had been captured or battered into wreck and ruin, was sailing gloriously past Calais with the French and English land well in sight and Dunkirk, the trysting place with Parma, only eighteen miles away.

England has never passed through such anxious hours as she did that afternoon and night. It seemed as though, after all, her new-found sea-strength had failed her, and that, despite all the brilliant exploits of Gloriana's Little Pirate in the West, he was powerless to protect her nearer home. What would have happened in the ordinary course of events no one now knows, for the Spaniards, stricken by some inexplicable madness, suddenly altered the whole course of events by what can only be called a freak of idiocy.

Medina-Sidonia, after having accomplished the most brilliant feat of seamanship that his age had seen, gave orders for the Armada to anchor! A few hours more and its work would have been done, with what results to England one scarcely cares to picture. So unexpected was this piece of priceless good fortune by the English captains that they had to drop their own anchors within range of the Spanish guns to save entangling themselves with the big Spanish ships.

All Sunday the two fleets lay within sight of each other, anxious councils of war were held on both sides, and so night fell without a shot being fired or anything done. By midnight the tide was swirling strong and swift from the English to the Spanish ships, and Drake was busy preparing his crowning piece of devilry for the edification of the Dons.

At about one o'clock on that calm, moonless morning patches of flickering, leaping flame began to show among the twinkling English lights, and these grew swiftly higher and broader, and a few minutes later the terrified Dons saw eight fire-ships, crowned mast-high with leaping flames, come reeling and roaring into their midst.

Then there was cutting of cables and slipping of moorings, and labouring with frantic haste to get the ships under sail. Galleon crashed into gallease, and gallease into cruiser in the wild haste and fatal confusion.

Marvellous to say, not a single Spanish ship took fire, but behind the fire-craft there was something more terrible and deadly still—El Draque and his guns. At the supreme moment Lord Howard weakly and foolishly turned aside to capture or sink a disabled gallease. If the rest of the fleet had followed him there might have been no Battle of Gravelines, no Trafalgar of the 16th century. But, as has been well said, it was the hour for which Francis Drake had been born. He set the Revenge on the wind, and, followed by the rest of the squadron, bore down in grim and ominous silence on the huddled, entangled Dons. Within pistol range of the great San Martin the Revenge burst into sudden thunder and flame and drove on enwreathed in smoke. In her wake ship after ship came on in perfect order, each raining her iron storm into the rent and splintering sides of the Dons as they passed.

Then from Dover way came the roar of guns telling that Wynter and Seymour had got to work, and so for three hours they went at it, the Little Pirate ever first, and revelling in the work that he loved to do for his dear England. He had forgotten all his mistress's slights and fickleness, all the harm that Court traitors had done him, all his suffering and privation on the windless seas and burning lands of the West. It was the hour of England's fate and his own, and there he was in the thick of it and was happy.

After three hours Howard and his laggards came up and the fight roared on flank and front and rear. Although the schoolbooks say but little about it, there had never been such a sea-fight in the world before, nor one on whose end such great issues hung. The Spaniards, caught between El Draque and the sands of Dunkirk—which to them was something worse than being between the Devil and the deep sea—fought with all their ancient valour, but ship after ship, as the battle roared on through the day, went down riddled with shot or took fire and blew up, till at length out of the forty battleships and cruisers which Sidonia had somehow got together to protect his rear, only sixteen were left, and they were little better than shot-shattered, fire-blackened hulks.

The powder on both sides was nearly done, but so too was the work of Drake and his ships. Fathom by fathom the north-west wind was driving the Dons on to the mud-banks of the Netherland shore, and the Little Pirate in his well-named Revenge was hanging on their weather quarter watching—and I doubt not praying—for the moment of their final ruin.

And yet he was not to see it, for when there was but five fathoms of water between the Spanish keels and the Dutch mud the north-wester dropped to a calm, a fresh south-wester sprang up in its place, and for the fourth time in seven days the Armada was saved from utter destruction by those fickle winds to which a pious sentiment has ascribed its ruin.

Down went the Spanish helms, and round came the dripping, labouring, Spanish prows, and ere long all that was left of King Philip's fleet was staggering away to the northward to begin that awful voyage round the north of Scotland and past the wild Irish coast from which so few were to return. Meanwhile the Little Pirate hung on to the heels of the flying Armada for two days and nights, until at length a tempest came rolling up over the Dogger Bank, and he ran in for safety under the Scottish shore, cheerfully leaving the Dons to the winds of Heaven, and the rocks that were waiting to finish what his own guns had begun.

With the victory of Gravelines, Drake's work as an Empire-maker comes to an end. The expedition to Portugal, for all its booty, was a failure and did nothing to enhance his fame. If his advice had been taken Spain might have been crushed and humbled for ever, but such was the hopeless weakness and vacillation at Court that, even after the Armada had shown her the true designs of Philip, Gloriana got into negotiations with him again. Over and over again her Little Pirate besought her to give him the means of striking the blow that should crush Spain and make England undisputed mistress of the seas, but it was not to be, and so at length, sick and sore at heart, he sailed away again to his beloved West, never to return.

There is nothing in this last expedition of his that is noteworthy save its continued misfortunes. It seemed that as though when the little Revenge went down, as she did in the midst of the fifty-three Spanish ships which she had fought "for a day and a night," she had taken her old commander's good luck down with her. At last on the deadly island of Escudo de Veragua the two guardian demons of El Dorado, fever and dysentry, struck him down with many another of his men. He lived to get away, but not for long, and six days afterwards, when his fleet came to anchor off Porto Bello, the heroic Little Pirate breathed his last and his gallant soul went to its account, passing away from earth on the very spot that had been the scene of his first sea-fight and his first victory.

A Broken Mask

BY JOAN BARRETT.

CHAPTER X.

Two Events.

The sun, as it fell upon the well-redded floor of the old dairy, made the smooth bricks yellow-red in colour. When it touched the earthenware pans of unskimmed milk the cream looked richer and yellower, and the tin skimmers and strainers hanging upon the walls gained in brightness. Di's hair caught the sunshine and imprisoned some of its lustre as she moved briskly from pan to pan and removed the cream with deft fingers to the big white churn.

One's heart may be heavy, but there is always work of some kind to help one to forget, and the harder one works the easier the pain becomes. No one who looked at Di's quickly moving figure and absorbed face would have thought that she had passed a restless night, and that while she was mechanically measuring the cream her thoughts were far away from her occupation.

Laying her hand upon his arm.

"Slop, slop," went the cream as Di turned the churn handle, and "cheep, cheep," called the sparrows upon the moss and lichen-covered dairy roof. Out in the garden the snowdrops and crocuses raised their pretty heads and peeped through the snow at the white-covered evergreens and bushy dead-looking rose trees. The snow had broken down the creeping rose that climbed to the upper windows, and one long bough trailed heavily upon the path. The little pieces of red cloth with which it had been tacked to the wall looked like red flowers or berries upon its dark branches.

"Don't think about it! Don't think about it!" said the cream now to Di. "It will all come right! It must come right! John Gillway is not a bad man, and Kitty can't be a bad woman! He said you should know before long! Wait! Wait! Learn patience."

The dairy door opened, and the Nabob entered quickly, and closed the door behind him. His face was grey and haggard. There was an expression in his face that Di had never yet seen. All the good humour and the sunny frankness had died in his bright eyes, leaving only their brilliancy—a cold, steely sparkle, as though some inner emotion had killed the warm enjoyment of life, and that look of "Hail fellow, well met," with which the Nabob had met the entire world. There were dark circles around them. The lids were heavy. When Di laid her hand in his it felt cold and moist.

"What a charming old dairy yours is, Di," said he in a tone of forced cheerfulness. "By George, what a lot of milk your cows give! We don't get a quarter of the quantity." He bent over a pan, turning his back upon Di. "Seen Kitty this morning?"

"No! She never comes so early as this," Di answered. "It is only nine o'clock."

"She spoke of coming to see you early. I thought the little woman might have turned out. Well, I'm off, Di. Only looked in to say good-morning on my way to the Admiral's."

He turned, extending his hand. His face had grown greyer, and as his eyes met Di's steady, penetrating regard, she saw them grow humid. A great terror gripped her heart.

"Oh, Bernard!" she cried. "What is the matter? I can see that you are troubled!"

"I in trouble! Not I! Don't you worry your head about me, Di," he said, making a movement to gain the door.

Di stopped him, laying her hand upon his arm.

"I feel sure that you are keeping something hidden from me—and it is something about Kitty."

"Kitty!" exclaimed the Nabob with a harsh laugh. "Well, I never did! How you women do jump at hasty conclusions! Kitty, indeed!"

"I know that something has happened, something to trouble you. If you don't tell me why you came here so early asking for Kitty, I shall go to The Towers and try to discover your reason."

The Nabob hesitated no longer. He spoke now with curt abruptness.

"Kitty isn't at home. That's all. I hoped she had come here."

"Not at home!" Di repeated. "Since—when?"

Her fingers tightened their hold upon the Nabob's arm.

"I don't know—her bed has not been slept in; her maid says she hasn't seen her since she left her alone in her room last night."

Di started. Her hand fell from the Nabob's arm, and dropped heavily to her side.

"Perhaps she couldn't sleep—and has gone for a walk—or a canter."

"She hasn't taken her horse. Her maid told me that some out-door clothing of Kitty's was missing; a seal jacket and cap and a muff, I think. If she has gone for a walk it is to meet that scoundrel, Gillway! Good Heavens!" cried the Nabob striding to the end of the dairy. "I have tried hard not to see things that must have made the whole countryside laugh at my blindness. I wanted Kitty to understand that I trusted her; I told myself that I would trust her, aye, in spite of my own observations. I saw how dull she grew when we were alone, and how she brightened at that fellow's approach! She never loved me, Di, never! God knows why she married me!"

He threw himself upon a stool, fixing his eyes upon the red bricks.

"When Gillway first came to the house, I spoke to Kitty. It was a difficult job; but I did it. I was wrong. I ought not to have said one word about him. She set up her back, and seemed to delight in meeting him, and in asking him to call, and to bring her things from Worley—books and music and wools! Then she used to meet him out in the fields and the lanes. I'm not a good horseman; I never hardly went with her, and then, it is so devilish hard to make oneself think ill of one's own wife, you know. Di, I thought I'd let her have her fling, and this is the result."

"Kitty has been thoughtless, very thoughtless," said Di tremulously. "But nothing more, Bernard. When she comes home presently from her walk—for, of course, she has gone for a walk—talk to her as you have to me. Tell her frankly that she is wrong to have so intimate a friendship with Mr. Gillway. She is very childish; but she will see how grave the matter is when you show her."

"And the end of it will be tears and a squabble. I haven't the power to make Kitty happy. I've done my best! I took that ghastly great house to please her; I've filled it with the people she liked to see around her, and what's the use? She was wild with excitement for a few weeks, and then everything palled upon her. We were never meant for each other, my poor little girl and I! Her tastes are so opposite to mine. I like the country, a plain and simple life without shams, and the eternal struggle to appear so many pounds richer than your neighbour, and Kitty revels in making people believe that she has ten pounds in her purse when it only holds five. Sometimes when I've thought over things I've found myself dreading the coming years, Di; for we must grow farther and farther apart, instead of becoming comrades and inseparable."

He covered his face with his hands, and sat in silence for a few moments. Di did not speak, her heart was too full for words.

"Well," said the Nabob rising and looking at her more cheerfully. "It's no good to worry. One can't go through life without finding a few small rough places. Depend upon it, Kitty finds it jolly hard, too, poor little soul! and she's so young! Just think, one can't expect much wisdom from a girl of twenty-one! I wonder, Di—I hardly like to ask you, it's such a delicate matter—but if you would speak to Kitty about these walks with Gillway. A woman," said he, with such pathos in his voice that the pain in Di's tender heart increased, "can do that kind of thing so much better than a clumsy man, and Kitty couldn't feel vexed with you."

"I'll speak to her, Bernard."

In the dairy doorway the Nabob turned. A shaft of sunlight falling upon his moustache turned it to gold, and accentuated the pallor of his haggard features.

"He can't have slept," thought Di, noticing the fatigue and worn look of his handsome face, and a feeling of indignation swept over her as she thought of Kitty, who might even then be flirting and laughing with John Gillway.

"I say," said the Nabob, very wistfully, "you'll forgive me for speaking like that about Kitty, won't you, Di? I've been bottling it up so long; I never meant anyone to know how I felt about it, least of all you. It seems a mean action to talk in that way of one's wife, eh, Di? It's like letting out a contemptible admission of one's own faults. After all, Gillway is the most to blame. It's a poor revenge for Kitty's slighting him to make people talk about her imprudence and to try to ruin her happiness; for I might have made her happy if he'd let her alone. That's his idea—a mean hound!"

Di's head dropped, and a mist gathered before her eyes. She felt the Nabob take her hand and press it, and knew that he had gone because of the sunshine that all at once had made a large patch upon the floor where he had been standing.

There was no sunshine in her heart. An awful foreboding of the truth oppressed her. She sat down and tried to think, and when her thoughts became unbearable she sprang up and recommenced her work.

The butter was ready for sending to market when Betty came "clack-clack" into the dairy upon her patterns, and with a great armful of fresh cabbage leaves to wrap round the pale yellow pats.

"The master's waitin' for the basket," said she. "Why don't you go to Worley 'long with him? Your cheeks are like that milk for colour."

Di rubbed her face with her apron. No, she could not go to Worley. She must go to Honeypots Farm and see John Gillway. She would make him explain his mysterious words of the previous night; she would tell him how wicked it was to foster Kitty's weakness, and if she met them together, John Gillway and Kitty, she would not spare either of them.

She waited until Farmer Strange had driven away in the light cart with the butter and apples and vegetables packed around his big feet, and at the back of the one seat, and then she hastened to put on her hat and jacket, and hurried across the fields to the farm.

She met no one on the way. A flock of gossiping starlings and a few sedate rooks were the only living creatures that crossed her path. Emily and Aunt Shales were not at home, for the house door was fastened when she reached it. Di had not thought to find the house closed; she had forgotten that it was market day, and that Aunt Shales and her maid might have gone to Worley. As she was turning despondently away a man appeared from the back of the rick where he had evidently been watching to see if anyone would open the door to Di's knocks. He was a smart, dapper-looking, thin little gentleman, with a clean-shaven face, and remarkably bright, penetrating eyes, that seemed to take in every detail of the girl's dress at one swift glance. His manner was very apologetic when he spoke.

"There seems to be no one at home," said he with a wide sweep of his soft felt hat as he approached Di. "I have knocked several times, and I can get no reply whatever."

"It is market-day at Worley," Di said. "I expect everyone has gone there."

"Then they may not return until late, as the market does not begin until one o'clock. How very unfortunate. I was directed here by a person at the station, of whom I made a few inquiries about lodgings," said the stranger, with a gentle rub of his well-gloved hands. "I am seeking apartments, and hearing that Mr. Gillway was a well-conducted, single young man, I hoped to induce him to let me a couple of rooms for a short period. I—I was at one time acquainted with some members of his family."

"Indeed," said Di politely.

"Mr. Gillway has succeeded beyond his expectations in making the farm pay, I hope?"

"I'm afraid not!" answered Di, glancing at the gate by which she had entered the farm-yard.

"How very unfortunate! And yet," said the stranger indicating a shed with a jerk of his head, "he appears to have purchased a great quantity of expensive machinery."

He glanced questioningly at Di, as if seeking an explanation of the circumstance from her. She felt that she was being cross-questioned, and her expressive face betrayed her dislike to the process. The stranger was quick to read her expression.

"I am quite unable to answer you."

"I would ask you to pardon my apparent inquisitiveness," said he blandly. "Seeing in you an acquaintance of Mr. Gillway, I presumed to gratify my curiosity about this son of my very dear friend. I fear that he has not made many friends in the neighbourhood?"

"I think not."

"He lives a very retired life?"

"Very."

"Has no visitors, I suppose, no gentlemen to visit him?"

"I believe not."

"Does he seem to—to—have much ready money at his command? I—I really would not venture to ask you all these questions if my anxiety concerning his financial position was not so great."

"I am quite unable to answer you," said Di haughtily. "Your best plan will be to put these questions to Mr. Gillway himself." She bowed stiffly and left him. The little gentleman looked after her ruefully, as though regretting his indiscretion.

On her way home, the stranger now mingled himself with the many worrying, torturing questions that filled Di's heart and head with pain. Who was he? Why did he appear so anxious for particulars of John Gillway's life?

No one had called during her absence, Betty assured her in answer to her eager inquiries. Di made a sorry pretence of eating her dinner, and feeling utterly incapable of work or rest, she got one of the farm lads to harness the pony in the smart little dog-cart that Kitty had left behind as a parting gift to her sister, and drove to The Towers. It was three o'clock before she drew up before the great hall door.

Did the footman who answered the door look at her oddly when she asked if Mrs. Eliot was at home? And was it merely her excited imagination, or did he answer her with a strange, insolent inflection in his languid drawl, as he informed her that Mrs. Eliot had been absent all the morning, and had not returned to lunch?

"And Mr. Eliot? Is he in?" she asked.

"No, m'm. Mr. Eliot has gone out on horseback."

Di lingered a moment in painful indecision. The footman's outer manner was respectful enough, and yet it struck her that there was an expression of familiarity in his smooth, fresh face, as though he guessed her uneasiness and its cause—aye, and knew some explanation of his mistress's absence.

"I'll leave a written message for Mr. Eliot," said Di after a pause.

The man bowed and ushered her into a costly-furnished morning room, lingering at the door while Di wrote a few hurried lines imploring the Nabob to send and let her know when Kitty returned, or to call upon her. As she laid the addressed letter upon the bureau, the footman advanced noiselessly into the room and stood looking at her expectantly.

"Give this to your master the moment that he returns," said Di. "You will not forget, will you?"

"No'm!" He was still regarding her in that perplexing manner, and Di flushed, drawing herself up as she went out to the trap. There was rude admiration in the man's eyes.

"Oh, Kitty, Kitty!" murmured Di, tightening her hold upon the reins. "That man knows."

She never knew how she reached home. Hedges and trees and landscape blotted themselves together into one thick mist. She was thinking of her old father and wondering how she was to break to him the news of Kitty's flight. For Di felt sure now that Kitty had run away from her husband. Dared she hope that Kitty had gone away alone?

The sure-footed little pony turned in at the farm gates of its own accord, and halted in the yard. A farm lad slouched forward to lead it into the stable, and Di hurried into the kitchen, her heart beating high with a new and delicious hope. She had caught the sound of voices. How foolish and wicked she had been ever to doubt Kitty's loyalty, or to have harsh thoughts of her. She had merely been for a long, long walk, and now she was at the farm.

How unreasonable fear made women! But on the threshhold of the kitchen Di paused, chilled with the cold pang of disappointment. A visitor was indeed seated in Farmer Strange's favourite Windsor armchair, with her little fat feet perched snugly upon the polished steel fender. And the visitor, resplendent in a very tight-fitting three-quarter length black jacket, trimmed with dilapidated, rusty black fur, and wearing a ridiculously small bonnet, filled with gaudy scarlet poppies, was John Gillway's housekeeper, Aunt Shales. She turned her grey head as poor Di advanced, and smiled in a very flurried manner, rising hastily from her seat to show that although admitted upon friendly terms with the young mistress of Greyhouse, she had not forgotten that a difference existed in their social positions.

"Well, there, now!" she exclaimed. "Seems as if it was to be, now don't it? As sure as eggs is eggs, if ever I puts my nose inside your kitching I'm safe to find you out, Miss Di. Not as one can bide in the house all the time, cold as it is. But as I say, it's seasonable for the time of the year, so it is, now, and I'm one of them as 'ud rather be friz up and perished to nothink with a good English frost, than be grilled to a cinder, as my po'r Bill says he's a-bein' done at this very minute in India, with the sun they've got out there. I've no doubt but what the po'r boy 'll come back as black as the niggers what lives in them outlandish parts, and him with a skin as fair as a lily when he 'listed in the army. Oh, he's a good-lookin' lad is Bill, or I should say he was. There's no knowin' what he's like now, what with gettin' his nose knocked to a pulp with a football when he was stationed at York, afore startin', and losing a front tooth at the same time! But it don't show in his photo. Oh, he do make such a nice photo, do Bill. He never did turn after 'is father, an' as I says, if he ain't got much to be thankful for in this world, he's got that—which is somethink, ain't it now?"

She appealed to Di, turning from her to Betty. The old servant was sitting facing the fire. She did not appear to have heard Aunt Shales, but stared into the red logs with a dazed, bewildered expression upon her rosy, withered cheeks that filled Di with terror.

"Does she know, too?" she thought, and turned to Aunt Shales as though for confirmation of her suspicion.

To her amazement Aunt Shales tapped her pocket, winked, glanced mysteriously at Betty, and then nodded her head towards the communicating door with the dining-room. So vigorously did she nod that the poppies in her bonnet quivered long after the motion had ceased.

"Betty," said Di, "will you let us have tea in the parlour?"

A fire was burning in the dining-room, throwing rosy shafts of light upon a large bowl of snowdrops that stood in the centre of the table. Aunt Shales paused in passing to admire them.

"Pretty things, they be, to be sure," said she. "An' good for sore eyes, so I'm told, not as I can speak from experience, never havin' yet bin bothered that way, though, as I said to myself this mornin,' it 'ud have been better for me and for somebody else if I'd been born blind, that it would! But there, I've long had my own ideas an' suspicions about things, for, as I've said many and many a time, where do the money come from to pay his way, seein' as he's no great hand at farmin', an' grumbles if everything put afore his eyes at meal times ain't of the very best quality, an' never gettin' any letters, an' out at all hours, an' all them heathenish books writ in some lingo unknown to honest folk, an' them trunks all locked up, it didn't look natshral, Miss Di, an' I'm not one to have dust thrown in my eyes for all as you never hears me say one word about nothink. Two and two don't make five *on*less you puts the one in, an' then, as we all knows, cases is altered. But right's right, and, as I've always said, wrong ain't no man's right, leastways it shouldn't ought to be, should it now?"

"I'm afraid," said Di feebly, "that I don't quite understand."

"Course you don't! As if anybody but them as lived under the same roof with him would understand; and Heavens knows it's hard enough for them, I 'spose," whispered Aunt Shales. "You knows the look of real di'mon's, seein' as you've wore 'em your own self an' have mixed with them as owns a-plenty?"

"Yes," Di answered, growing more and more puzzled.

Aunt Shales drew a bulky packet from her pocket, and handed it to Di.

"All bank notes!" said she. "I ain't to be deceived in them, an' they makes in all four hundred pounds!"

Again she dipped into her capacious pocket, pulled out a large leather case, opened it, and gave it to Di, drawing back a step or two to watch Di's face from her half-shut eyes.

Di looked at a diamond pendant that sparkled and flashed in the firelight. Upon the inside of the lid she read the following inscription:

To Mrs. Charles Lealter, upon the occasion of her silver wedding, a slight testimonial from her tenants and servants.

"Oh, Aunt Shales!" exclaimed Di. "What does it mean? How did you get these things?"

"I have bin wrongfully accused of tellin' lies, an' by members of my own fam'ly, as oughter have more respect for their own flesh and blood than to backbite them as is more innocent in the way o' lyin' than the lamb unborn," said Aunt Shales with deep feeling. "But a good conshuns 'ill carry you over a dirty puddle, Miss Di, and as I says you can't walk out in a muddy road an' not get a splash or two, no matter how careful-like you picks your footsteps, an' not bein' the Queen of England, I can't expect carpit laid down for me. He'd lef' the key in his writin' table—an' that's how I come by them things, Miss Di, and I do feel that grateful as that chatterin' magpie of a Em'ly didn't spy the key afore I did; for I knows what she is for a-peepin' and a-pryin' into things what ain't no concern of her'n, and couldn't be, not if she lived to a hundred! But them gals is like cats for creepin' everywhere an' sniffin' out things, that they be now, an' I knows it to my sorrer.

An' goodness knows as it's bad 'nough for me to carry inside me that I've bin in the employ of a house-breaker, an' no doubt he's a highwayman as well, without havin' that gal to carry the news all over Thorneydene, for them as ain't had no eddication to chuck in my face!"

Di drew a long, shuddering sigh as Aunt Shales paused to regain breath. Every flash from the sparkling trinket in her hand seemed a confirmation of the guilt of John Gillway.

AN "UNEXPECTED" GIRL.

Her chief beauty lies in her originality. She holds you by her variety. Her actions not only carry this out, but she looks, if I may use the expression, "various."

Her face reminds me of a house built at different periods, its architecture is so "new," though the tout ensemble is charming. Her forehead is Grecian; her nose—is there a period that expresses a retroussé nose? Her mouth is what I call "early English," the sort of mouth you see in pictures of Queen Victoria, when she gives vent to that classic remark: "I will be good." Her hair is pure Corinthian, twisted, you see, and fluted, and yet massive enough to suggest the analogy. On the whole, she is satisfying.

I went down to see her the other evening and, to my horror, she appeared on the verandah on crutches. She was very solemn.

"Good gracious!" I exclaimed; "what is the matter?"

I suppose my face expressed rather more alarm than I intended, for she waved me off with one of the crutches.

"No, no; it's all right," she said. "Miss Macklimp was here to-day and I was nasty and impatient to her; she's a cripple, you know; and now I'm punishing myself; I'm trying to see how it feels."

I wasn't in the least surprised when she said she intended to keep it up all that evening. I hate crutches, they are so distant, so I persuaded her to pretend she was blind instead. I said it would be just as salutary. She cast away the crutches and shut her eyes.

"Oh, I don't like it!" she cried.

"You'll have to do it," I remarked; "your behaviour to Miss Macklimp was abominable. Now you see what it's like to be afflicted. I wouldn't like to spoil the effect of your little lesson, so I'll lead you about the garden for a while, though, of course, its a great nuisance."

She opened one eye and looked at me with all the suspicion that can be thrown into a single optic.

"Are you quite sure it's a nuisance?" she asked.

"To be quite candid," I replied, "do you think it could be anything else? I'm really engaged to play lawn tennis with Miss Foot, but this is duty, and however disagreeable——"

"Oh, you can go," she said icily. "I dare say it will be just as effective and twice as pleasant if Jemima, the housemaid, leads me about. Good-night."

"No," I said heroically, for I was determined to see the thing through, "I'll stay. You must promise upon your honour to keep your eyes shut, because we're not having a game." She opened her eyes at once and looked at me indignantly. "There you go," I went on. "What is the use of going about it in that spirit? If you're in fun, of course I've nothing more to say, but if you're in earnest you really should try to exercise a little self-control."

"All right," she said quite meekly. "Go on."

"Perhaps you'd better hold my hand," I suggested.

"No, no. It's so much more awful to try without you—I mean—to go by myself," and she went down the verandah steps and ran into a rose bush.

"You might have told me," she exclaimed indignantly, sucking her finger, with her eyes wide open.

"Now, my dear girl," I said in a fatherly way,

"how can you realise the sensation of blindness if you open your eyes and stare at everything you run into? Take my advice and let me lead you. Most blind people have someone to guide them, a child or——"

"A puppy," she exclaimed in accents of delight. "Yes, I'm the poor blind Paper Man, and you are the puppy."

Perhaps she noticed something chilling in my silence, for she slipped her hand into mine and said:

"Are you bored? Do you want to go?"

Wild horses couldn't have dragged me from the spot, but it wouldn't do to tell her that, so I stifled a yawn, and said that as it was getting dusky it would be too late for tennis and I might as well stay. We went down the path into the shrubbery. She was keeping her eyes shut. I knew, because I was looking at her hard, and I knew I was looking at her hard because I stepped on two flower-pots and narrowly escaped a sunken water-barrel. She heard the crash.

"Where are we?" she asked.

"Don't look!" I cried. I was getting her nicely away from the house. "We're close to the dining-room window, and your Aunt Jane is on her way up to the summer-house."

"Let's go to Aunt Jane," she said. I don't think she believed me.

"All right," I said cheerfully, "but on no account open your eyes; you are doing very nicely." And I ran her carefully into a bush and then extricated her with my arm around her waist.

"You did that on purpose!" she cried, wriggling herself free. "It wasn't fair!"

"What wasn't fair?" I asked innocently, "and why should I do that on purpose? The path is confoundedly narrow." (It was eight feet wide where I stood.) "You can't seriously think it's any pleasure to me to go blundering about a garden like an intoxicated beetle. Look here—I mean don't look here—I'm going to tie my handkerchief over your eyes. I believe you've opened them at least five times."

She didn't deny it, and I tried to fix the handkerchief. When people have such soft hair they must expect it to be a nuisance to them. I like hair that is hard and bristly and can stand up for itself, but hers is simply impossible. It wasn't my fault that it got all twisted into the handkerchief and I had to cut off quite a large piece with my pocket-knife. I cut the handkerchief, too, which was much more serious, and will probably cost me half-a-crown to replace.

"And now," I said, "Aunt Jane is angry with you for your excessive unkindness to Miss Macklimp, isn't she?"

"She hasn't spoken to me all the evening," said the blind Paper Man pathetically.

"And you'd like to make it up, wouldn't you? Well, I have a plan. At this moment I can see Aunt Jane" (to the eye of the mind all things are clear) "standing at the door of the summer house at the top of the path. I will go away and you will walk up, just as you are, and give her a kiss and tell her you are sorry. Don't move the handkerchief, and she will see that you are really in earnest. Just go straight on; you can't miss her. Good-night, so glad to have been of use."

I couldn't say exactly how it happened. It just struck me that Aunt Jane might not be there after all, so I went round a side path to the summer-house to make sure. She was not there; she must have gone away during the interval. I never like to spoil an apology, so I thought it best to stand where Aunt Jane should have stood when the blind Paper Man came up the path. Of course it was a nuisance, but then——

REDUCTION OF SUPERFLUOUS FAT.

We have received a copy of "Corpulency, and the Cure," and a very useful and well-written little treatise it is, showing how from 3lb. to 14lb. of fat can be harmlessly removed in a week. We quote rather an amusing extract which was published on the subject by the European Mail. The Editor says: "I noticed the other day that someone had contributed a paragraph containing instructions for persons who wished to reduce their weight. I don't doubt but what, if the advice given were followed, the desired effect would result; but to follow it out properly one would not have much time left during the day. Care was to be taken not to eat this and not to eat that, while to dream of certain drinks was sufficient to increase the weight by about a hundredweight. Now, Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., is my man. His treatment does not consist of any starvation business. Quite the contrary, for the mixture he prescribes is an invigorating tonic, and improves the appetite wonderfully. He treats corpulence as a disease, and so long as his instructions are followed, no one need worry about dietary restrictions, but jog along in peace and continue the usual breakfast of half-a-dozen poached eggs, two or three gammon rashers, and a pound of steak. It is a good job for the success of the 'Pickwick Papers' that the book was written before Mr. Russell came upon the scene, otherwise it is doubtful whether we should ever have heard of those jovial characters, Mr. Pickwick, Mr. Weller, senior, or that truly wonderful being, the Fat Boy. The only case I can speak of personally in connection with this mixture, is a friend of mine, who tried it with remarkably good effect. He was enormously fat, and although he did not believe in Mr. Russell's treatment, when someone told him the mixture made a very pleasant drink in hot weather, he tried it for this purpose. This was in June, a few years ago. In September he had to be measured for a new suit of clothes, as those he had were getting very loose, and didn't fit at all. He continued with the mixture, and the tailor had to take fresh measurements at Christmas—well, he didn't quite have to put on a couple of overcoats so as to make a shadow, but the measurements round his waist were just half what they were twelve months before. Like a sensible man, he always recommends Mr. Russell now wherever he can. So do I." His book only costs two penny stamps, but is worth a guinea. Send to Woburn House for it.—Boston Independent, January 9th, 1897.

CORPULENCY, AND THE CURE—EIGHTEENTH EDITION.

The appearance of an eighteenth edition of Mr. F. Cecil Russell's now famous "Corpulency, and the Cure," constitutes an unusual phenomenon in the publishing world, such as suggests some curious considerations. What, it may be demanded, are the characteristics of the books whose popularity is so enormous as to enable them to run through eighteen editions within a comparatively few years? Some little time ago it became a favourite recreation—much to the advantage of certain publishers—to make out a list of "a hundred books" with which it was suggested all students ought to be familiar. How few of these, the results of the highest efforts of human thought, have reached an eighteenth edition before generations, sometimes centuries, after their original publication has passed away. It would seem, indeed, that immediate popularity can be gained—and, what is more to the purpose, steadily retained up to an eighteenth edition—only by ministering, in a remarkable and exceptional degree, to the requirements of stern utility. This, indeed, is what Mr. Russell has accomplished by the intr duction of the novel method of curing obesity, which is fully described in his book. This compendious little volume of 256 pages may be had (post free), we note, by sending two penny stamps to the author's offices, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. The enormous circulation represented by these eighteen editions is fully accounted for by a perusal of the book. It is quite evident that—as is proved by the evidence of thousands of cases successfully treated—Mr. Russell has completely revolutionised the treatment of corpulence. He has shown that any person may get rid of the superfluous fat carried on the body within, at the outside, a few weeks' time, and at such a rapid rate that 7lb. or 8lb. are frequently disposed of within a week. This is done, too, without undue interference with the ordinary habits of life in respect to eating and drinking, and—paradoxical as it may appear—the amount of food consumed is generally increased during the process of weight-diminution. The weighing-machine is Mr. Russell's ally, constantly appealed to, in order to place the results beyond doubt. Such conditions are so obviously suitable to the requirements of fat persons that their generally growing desire to study the book is easily explained.—Grantham Times, January 9th, 1897.

HOW TO CURE CORPULENCY.

The main feature of fat in the animal body has been made the subject of much spirited discussion: on the one hand, it was contended that satisfactory evidence exists of the conversion of starch and saccharine substances into fat by separation of carbon and oxygen. the change somewhat resembling that of the vinous fermentation; it was urged, per contra, that oily or fatty matter is invariably present in the food supplied to the domestic animals, and that this fat is merely absorbed and deposited in the body in a slightly modified state. The question has now been decided in favour of the first of these views, which was enunciated by Professor Liebig, the very chemist who formerly advocated the second opinion. By a series of very beautiful experiments. MM. Dumas and Milne Edwards proved that bees feeding exclusively upon sugar were still capable of producing wax. Dr. Ebstein advocates the use of fat in cases of corpulency, while other doctors, as high up the ladder of medical fame, recommend lean meats, while others worry the unhappy victims of obesity by insisting upon administering copious draughts of hot water, fasting, a most pernicious practice, we believe. Although so much has been written on this subject by the learned foreigners of the medical faculty, no theory is more effectual in the reduction of corpulency than the one advanced by Mr. F. C. Russell, the author of "Corpulency, and the Cure" (256 pages), an interesting little brochure, now in the eighteenth edition, which can, be bought for two penny stamps from the publishers at Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. He goes in for facts and not fancies, and practically says, first ascertain your correct weight; then drink three doses of a vegetable compound, perfectly harmless of a most agreeable flavour; then step upon a weighing-machine in twenty-four hours, and see if you have not lost 2lb. or more of unhealthy fat. The book is well worth reading.—Southport Visitor, January 19th, 1897.

Answers to Correspondents.

THIS number contains the last instalment of the Picture Puzzle Competition in Short Stories. Fasten the lower half of each sheet together, and inclose them in an envelope marked "Peers," to reach this office by the first post on Saturday, June 12th. As this number of Short Stories is published three days earlier than usual, this will give you ample time. In asking you to inclose a small subscription to the FRESH AIR FUND, I should like to say that on the last occasion readers of Short Stories responded liberally, and I hope that this time they will do even better.

B. S.—Wellington was taller than Napoleon by something like an inch and a half. The latter was 5ft. 7in. in height.

TIM.—The list of celebrities who do not smoke include such great names as Gladstone, Ruskin, Swinburne, Blackie, and Grace. On the other hand there are perhaps an even greater number of celebrated individuals who are scarcely ever seen without a cigar or pipe in their mouths.

G. T.—Before a foreigner can become naturalised in this country, he must first of all reside within the United Kingdom for not less than five years. Having accomplished this, he should apply to the Home Office.

CYRIL.—All books sent to the Queen with the idea of them being accepted must be specially bound and the Royal Arms stamped in the corner.

S.—THE seasons are supposed to commence on the following dates, although of course, we cannot guarantee their safe and punctual arrival:

Spring ..... March 20th.
Summer.....June 21st.
Autumn.....Sept. 23rd.
Winter .....Dec. 21st.

ALICE.—In the London Zoo, there are something like 2,563 animals, viz., 669 mammals, 1,427 birds, and 467 reptiles. Of course this number is constantly being added to.

ALEX has heard that many individuals are making handsome incomes at the present time by writing advertisements in an attractive and novel form, and asks us whether there is any truth in it.————Undoubtedly. Advertisers are always pleased to consider novel and smart ideas for advertising their goods, and, if any ever occur to you, submit them to some of the large advertisers, who, you may be sure, will pay handsomely, if they think the idea worthy of acceptance.

VOLUNTEER.—You must serve twenty years as a volunteer before you become entitled to a long-service medal.

CLAPHAM JUNCTION asks why all the porters on the South-Western Railway wear red ties. Because they have no option, CLAPHAM JUNCTION. It is part of the men's uniform, and red is selected so that in case of emergency the scarf my prove useful as a danger signal.

H. R. R.—Large, wide-spread nostrils are supposed to denote ample lungs and good health.

S. T. S.—Yes, it is quite true that a large amount was offered some years back by the Government of New South Wales for means of extinguishing the rabbit pest. The exact reward offered was £25,000, but we do not think it was ever gained by anybody.

CLERK.—I fully sympathise with you in your difficulty, but do not advise you to emigrate to either of the countries you mention, for although the employment of women in England has made good berths very much scarcer for men, the competition is still keener in Germany and Holland. Whenever girls can be employed they are taken in preference to young men; indeed, the clerks and bookkeepers of the Munich bank are nearly all women.

W. R. B.—It certainly does seem strange that the British Army should be almost the only one that does not employ trained dogs as spies and messengers. The Germans, French, Austrians, Russians, and Italians have all found them of great assistance in times of war.

NEWLY MARRIED.—By all means confide your difficulties to your wife. Her sympathy is sure to go a long way towards removing them. Have no secrets from one another, for if your union is to be a truly happy one there must be absolute trust and mutual confidence between you.

E. R.—Hamburg possesses the largest telephone exchange. It can accommodate 10,000 subscribers. No other exchange has more than 6,000 subscribers.

BOB asks which is the largest kitchen in the world.————The Bon Marché in Paris. This mammoth establishment gives employment to some 4,000 people. The smallest kettle in the building is capable of holding 100 gallons, and the largest 500, whilst each of the fifty roasting pans is big enough for 300 cutlets.

L. J.—On the average concert grand pianoforte, a note struck with a moderately hard blow will continue to vibrate audibly for about twenty-five seconds.

H. H.—The Prince of Wales was married at the age of twenty-two, the Duke of Edinburgh at thirty, and the Duke of Connaught at twenty-nine.

L. M. is about to be married to the "dearest little girl in the world," and candidly tells me that with the exception of one thing he would be the happiest man alive. But a little thing prevents this, for although for many years his character has been absolutely unstained, he regrets that in his earlier days he was once tempted to commit an offence which was followed by a brief term of imprisonment. He ever regrets that unfortunate time, especially at the present moment, for he scarcely likes the idea of marrying a girl who believes him to be the soul of virtue and honour. "What shall I do under the circumtances ?" he asks.————Make a clean breast of the whole affair to your fiancée who, if she loves you to the extent you describe, will not only forgive you, but think far more of you than if you waited until after the wedding-day to make the revelation.

ADA.—You should certainly not draw your conclusions of a man by what he tells you, but rather, as in the case of a watch, judge him by his works.

E. B. is engaged to a lady who, unfortunately, numbers a good many young fellows amongst her acquaintances. But it is not this that E. B. objects to, for, as he says, this fact only goes to show what a charming, irresistible maiden she is, but E. B. dislikes to hear her address them all by their christian names.————That is very probable. But surely you can prevail upon your sweetheart to drop a habit which gives you pain. Just tell her your feelings in regard to this matter, and we feel sure that if the young lady has any affection for you, she will take care not to continue the objectional practice any longer.

SILENCE ✲ IS ✲ GOLDEN.

A STORY OF THE MONMOUTH REBELLION.

MANY people have wondered why I set such store by this old coin. This old guinea of the time of Charles II. with the words "Silence is golden" so deeply graven on the reverse side, has aroused great curiosity and many are the questions that have been put to me concerning it. I have always considered it wise to decline answering those inquiries; but it now seems to me that I ought not to permit the story to die with me. I feel that an incident so intimately connected with the history of the country, an incident which might have altered the Succession itself, should be recorded. It was only known to four of us, and the other three have been dead these many years. So I will write it down and place the manuscript among my books and relics, where it will be discovered some day when I am gone.

I was a boy of six at the time, but the events which I am about to chronicle made an ineffaceable impression upon me. That which I did not then understand has become plain to me since, so that I am able to set down the story as a coherent whole.

It was in the year 1685; Monmouth had landed at Lyme Regis, raised his standard, and proclaimed himself king. My father, who lived near Sedgemoor, secretly favoured the Duke's cause, but he was quite against the Rebellion, which he considered ill-advised, and had declined to take part in it. I well remember the march of the rebels into Bridgewater, my father having taken me there; and I can even now see my father shaking his head, and I wondered why he did so—for to me it was a grand sight. Events proved that he had reason for sadness; and I, as I recall the scene, can well understand that dubious movement and grieved expression.

One evening—it was the evening of the day on which the fatal battle of Sedgemoor had been fought, as I afterwards learnt—my father and I were seated in the best room of our little house. It was dark and I should have been in bed, but all our men-servants and labourers had left us to join the Duke or to run away, and our one woman-servant had also fled, so my father had allowed me to sit up and keep him company for a while. Occasionally we heard the sounds of hurrying fugitives who had crept out of their hiding places and were trying to escape in the darkness. My father was sitting in an old chair and I had just left my own seat to climb on his knees. Scarcely had I nestled my curly head on my father's breast, than there came a knock at the outer door that startled us. It was a peculiar knock; as though someone were in a hurry and very anxious to gain admittance, yet half afraid to make a noise.

"Some poor fool wants to find a place of refuge," muttered my father sadly. "Well, I must help them."

"Perhaps it is Mary come back again," I suggested. I was just a little frightened at the unexpected visit.

"Perhaps it is!" exclaimed my father brightly. But boy as I was, I could see that he did not think so, but was pretending because I was afraid.

We went to the door, for I grasped his hand tightly.

"Who's there?" asked my father.

"Open quickly!" replied the stranger. "Open, if you are still a friend of the cause!"

I felt my father's hand tremble. He gently released himself from my grasp, and, drawing back the bolts, threw open the door.

"Enter, my lord! You are welcome!"

We could see two figures in the doorway. There was a whispered conversation between them which finished by one pushing the other forward.

"No! You go alone," said the one. "If they catch me, what does it matter? You will be more likely to escape in that case, as they will think that you are near at hand and not seek you so close to this accursed place. Waltham," he added in a higher tone, "you were right after all. Yet I beseech you to help his Majesty in his hour of need." And he was gone.

The new-comer hesitated a moment, but my father firmly and politely pulled him inside and shut the door.

"Come this way, sire," he said, "you may rely upon all the help I can give you."

"Call me 'James' or what you please, but not that!" replied Monmouth, for I knew afterwards that it was he. "Those who promised their help failed to keep their word. My cause is lost, and I am a fugitive on whose head a price will soon be set. Grey tells me that you are a friend and that you will hide me for a few days, and help me to escape. I can offer you no reward save the thanks of an unsuccessful man—a rebel!" The last words were spoken so bitterly—so bitterly!

My father made no reply, but hurried him into the room we had just quitted and very soon placed some food before the Duke, whom I had an opportunity of observing closely. I remember that I felt great pity for the dejected-looking man, whose general appearance took my boyish fancy. I did not understand what it was all about, why he should come to us; that he was hiding from somebody was plain, but I was too young and too tired to grasp the meaning of what was taking place.

Our guest ate hungrily and had soon finished the meal. My father and he then spoke together for several minutes, and at the end of the conversation he led Monmouth out of the room, I following them. We went through the passages towards the back of the house, where there was a large disused apartment—a place like a barn, in which, in fact, stores had been kept in past times. It had been shut up for years, ever since my father's mother had met with a fatal accident while mounting a ladder to reach the high ledge.

"The place is dusty," said my father, "but it is the safest part of the house. We can soon spoil the chance of tracing the footsteps by running a broom over the floor."

Attracted by a curiously-shaped piece of wood which I saw near the doorway, I stopped to examine it and so lost the rest of the conversation; when I looked up again with a yawn my father was shutting a door in the wall at the further end. It was a panel door, and when shut it could not be distinguished from the other panels.

Just at that moment, a faint noise—a succession of thuds, it seemed—struck upon our ears. My father ran swiftly on tip-toe along the passage, returning the next instant.

"They are here!" he exclaimed. "Quick! There is no time to lose!" He seized the Duke by the shoulder and hurried him back to the panel. In an instant it was opened and Monmouth had sprung from the ground into the hiding place, which was about four feet from the level.

My father took up a long strip of wood that was lying on the floor and raked the dust in all directions. Louder and louder became the knocking. My father extinguished the light, half dragged me out of the room and locked the door, taking the key with him.

Thud, thud, thud!

"Open in the King's name!" I heard a voice shout.

Hastily brushing the dust from his clothes with his hand, my father went to the door, grumbling very loudly as he shot back the bolt.

"What is the meaning of this?" he growled. I was surprised; I had never heard him speak in such a surly manner. "Isn't it enough to be——"

"Keep that surly tongue of yours quiet!" said one who was in front.

They pushed their way inside, about a dozen of them. Two of them held torches, which lighted up the passage in weird fashion. Two of the men were better dressed than the others and were evidently in command.

"Where are they?" asked one of these two. Then, as my father did not reply, he continued: "You have two rebels in hiding here, I say! Where are they?"

"There are not two rebels here," answered my fathe quietly.

"You shall suffer for this!" exclaimed the other furiously. But the first interrupted him.

"You can't make a horse drink if he is unwilling to do so; you know the proverb, and enough about human nature to understand that it is useless to waste time in talking to this man if he refuses to open his mouth. All this time the rascals are getting away from us, most probably. Let us search the place!"

The other bowed, gave orders to his men, and they marched along the passage, taking my father with them. I remained near the door, bewildered.

After standing there for two or three minutes, I began to grope my way in the dark towards the staircase with the intention of following them. I stepped upon something hard, close to the wall, and picked it up. It was a large key. I was fingering it, wonderingly, when the man who had seemed to be the chief of the little band came towards me with a light.

"Well, my little man," he said in rather a pleasant tone, "what have you got there? Oh, a key. It appears to be the one I am wanting. Your father opened that place at the back with a key like this when he went in there a little while ago, eh?"

"Yes, sir," I replied unsuspectingly.

"Ah! I thought so! Now you come along with me and show me all about the place, like a good boy!"

Completely won over by his pleasant manner and glad to be of use to such a gentleman, I went with him.

The key fitted the lock and we were soon in the place which my father and I had entered with the fugitive Duke only a few minutes previously.

"H'm! I think I am on the right track!" he muttered, half audibly, as he looked on the floor. "So he is hidden here, eh?" he inquired, turning to me. "Ha, ha! Your father is a clever man! I'm sure nobody would have guessed that a man was hiding in this big room. Now I wonder if I could find where he is hiding, eh? You know, don't you? Silly man to hide away when I want to give him something! Where is he?"

Don't blame me. I was only a child. I did not understand what it all meant; I was tired, excited, charmed by the man's pleasant way of talking, and proud that I knew something that he did not.

"I'll show you!" I exclaimed. And without waiting for him, I ran across the dusty floor and pulled at the lower end of the panel.

"So he is in there!"

Struck by the change in the tone of voice, I looked up at him in surprise. He paid no further heed to me, but drew his sword and tried to force open the panel. It opened suddenly and the Duke jumped down in front of his pursuer.

"I should not like to see you break that sword, my dear uncle," he said with a touch of irony, "so I spare you any further trouble. Had I known that you were so near, I would have awaited your arrival."

The man called "uncle" stepped backwards in the direction of the door and began to cry out for the others, but Monmouth shot quickly past him and flung the door to.

"No, no!" exclaimed the Duke. "We have a little account to settle quite privately. It seems to me that you have gone a trifle too far in your desire to catch me. Fancy His Majesty the King of England turning rebel-catcher! Now listen! Two years ago, there was a plot against my father and your brother—the Rye House Plot, it was styled—in which you were kind enough to say I took a leading part. On that occasion also you put yourself to some trouble to seek for me. You were always against me! We met in the open and we fought a duel, or, I ought to say, half a duel. I am recalling the circumstance, lest you have forgotten it. It was agreed that we should fight with pistols; that we should toss for the first shot and that if the other were able to fire, he should have his turn. You were fortunate; you fired first—and missed! Before I could raise my pistol, some of the Royal troops appeared—it may be that they should have arrived sooner!—and I thought it prudent to take my departure without delay. I have had to wait for my turn, but it has come now and I mean to avail myself of the opportunity!"

By the feeble light of the lantern, which he still held, I could see that the King's face had grown pale.

"Hand the light to the boy," continued the Duke. "Ah, would you!" he exclaimed as the King made another attempt to get to the door. He snatched the lantern from him and pointed the pistol at his head. The King shrank back and Monmouth bade me hold the light.

"Take your stand against the wall or I will shoot you where you are! That's right! Twenty paces was it not? Well, I will give you the full distance! Now, boy, stand on that piece of wood and hold the lantern above your head. So! That will do."

He raised his arm and pointed the pistol at the King. I looked first at one then at the other of the actors in this strange scene. I saw that Monmouth's hand trembled.

Bang!

I uttered a cry of terror and dropped the lantern. I heard an oath, followed by a rush of footsteps, a scuffle and the clash of swords. I fled into a corner and hid my face; but something impelled me to look round at the two foes. By the light of the moon which gleamed through the only window in the place, I could see them engaged in a desperate fight; oaths mingled with the ring of the blades, and even to me it was evident that they were in deadly earnest. But they were destined not to finish the struggle.

The door was thrown open and my father rushed in, holding a torch. He seemed to grasp the situation immediately. Stooping down, he placed the flaming torch against the woodwork. He clutched me by the collar and pushed me through an opening into a place which I know now was our garden. I saw him run back, upset the King, and drag Monmouth out. The next thing I remembered was that my father had me in his arms and was running hard, he and his companion panting for breath. In the distance I could see the flames leaping up into the sky.

"We have a good start," my father jerked out. "That old house will burn like tinder; and as they do not know their way about it, they will have enough to do in looking after themselves for a minute or two. That is our chance."

"May the King be burnt!" exclaimed the Duke savagely.

"The King!" said my father in surprise.

In a few words, Monmouth explained. My father made no reply.

On they went; not keeping to the road, but forcing their way through holes in the hedges, running in all directions, until thoroughly exhausted. Then they sat down in a dry ditch and rested.

The Duke and my father began to talk earnestly and in whispers as soon as they had regained breath sufficiently. Worn out with fatigue, I fell asleep.

I was awakened by something touching my forehead; it was my father kissing me. I was lying on a bed, where they had placed me just as I was, for fear of disturbing me by taking off my clothes. My father and the Duke, dressed as peasants, were about to leave the room.

"You will stay here with good Master Methold, Edward," said my father, seeing that I had woke up. "He will take care of you. I must go away for a while. God bless you, my boy!" Tears stood in his eyes, and I heard him say in a low voice: "He alone knows whether I shall ever see the boy again!"

I clung to him, crying bitterly. He kissed me again and again, and then led me to Master Methold. Monmouth drew from his pocket a guinea—this guinea—and placed it in my hand.

"Take this, my child," he said sorrowfully. "It is all I have to give you to compensate you for the loss of a father's love and care. I do not blame you; but when you grow up, remember that 'Silence is golden.'"

For more than three years I remained with Master Methold, who treated me with great kindness. I heard that the Duke had been caught and executed, but I had no tidings of my father for two years, when Master Methold told me that he was living somewhere across the sea, and would be able to fetch me one day. It was more than a year after that ere I again saw my dear father. He was much altered and greatly affected by the meeting. He had prospered abroad; and now that the King was dead, and the Monmouth Rebellion nearly forgotten, he considered that he would be safe in England if he lived in another part of the country under an assumed name.

* * * * *

I, James Harlow, grandson of the writer of the foregoing, found the manuscript covered with dust among some old books. I have transcribed it.

My grandfather directed that an old guinea which he possessed should be buried with him. Not until this manuscript was found did anyone understand the reason of this strange request.

My grandfather was always a very quiet man.

BY GEORGE GRIFFITH.

"HE is perhaps the only example which history affords of one man having governed the most opposite events and proved sufficient for the most various destinies."

No man's character was ever so completely and so tersely summed up as the great Oliver's is here in these few words of a critic belonging to another race and nation, and, as regards his varied destinies, it may be added that no man ever was raised up and set to work by the Controller of human destinies as opportunely as he was.

History shows no parallel to it, not even in the oft-quoted story of Cincinnatus, and certainly in all the long array of our rulers there is none other whose story is so crammed with wonders or who crowded so many notable and pregnant acts into the busy days of a few years as this gentleman-farmer of Huntingdonshire, who at forty-three left his farming and vestry-meetings and the like and girded on his sword to go and fight the good fight of freedom, and who at fifty-two laid it aside to prove himself as good a statesman and ruler as he had been soldier and general.

His claim to a foremost place among the Makers of Britain is a twofold one, for he was a restorer, a re-invigorator, as it were, of this realm, as well as a very considerable widener of it. When the futile and inglorious reign of "the most learned fool in Christendom" came to an end, all the brilliant promise of the Elizabethan age had been woefully obscured, and the glories of the great Queen and her pirates looked like those of a summer sun setting behind a bank of fog.

In the words of Macaulay: "On the day of the accession of James I. England descended from the ranks which she had hitherto held and began to be regarded as a power hardly of the second order. . . . He began his administration by putting an end to the war which had raged many years between England and Spain, and from that time he shunned hostilities with a caution which was proof against the insults of his neighbours and the clamour of his subjects."

How different this from the gallant days of Gloriana and her knights! And yet this poor crowned and sceptred ninny aspired to be a despot even as his son after him did. It is true that these realms were beginning to need a despot and that badly, but not such a one as could ever have been born of that hopeless House of Stuart. A despot who is a strong man may be good or evil as he uses his opportunities and his powers, but the whole stage of history has not yet held a despot who was also a weak man who did not prove himself at once a curse to his country and the world.

The story of the feeble violence and silly cunning with which Charles the First sought to enforce that ridiculous theory of his about the Divine Right of Kings has been too often and too variously told for us to need to trouble with it here. There is a Divine Right of Kings, as the great Oliver was very soon to show with most unmistakable and most unanswerable logic, but the kind of king who really has divine rights, does not usually have them because he is the son of his father, and especially of such a father as James the First of England and Sixth of Scotland.

Our present concern is with the fact that this Empire of ours, in a most critical state of its process of making which came very near to one of unmaking, was saved and transformed from weakness to strength by the substitution of the real despotism of the Lord Protector from the sham of histrionic despotism of Charles the First.

The fact was that the body-corporate of this infant empire was assailed by the worst of all national disorders, internal disintegration. England, the very heart and centre of it, was about to be rent in twain by the frenzied and pitiless talons of civil war, and that is a war in which the right side—which of course is always the best side—must not only win, but utterly crush and pulverise the other unless wreck and chaos irretrievable are to follow.

This was the central idea that the Great Oliver grasped just as Edward of the Longlegs had grasped his brilliantly premature idea of the United Kingdom. He was the last of that series of iron-handed men that had begun with William the Norman. The watchword of his whole public life was "healing and settling." The wounds of his country had to be healed and its disorders settled, no matter by what means, but it had to be done, and in this deep-rooted conviction we see at a glance his kinship with the other Empire-makers who had gone before him.

Of his early life there is little to be said, though it is noteworthy that he was once fined £10 for neglecting a summons to appear at the King's coronation and receive the honour of knighthood. He little thought then that he would one day find it his duty to refuse the crown and sceptre of England.

Everyone who has read even the school books knows that when the war actually began all the apparent advantages were on the side of the Royalists. Though the first battles afforded the extraordinary spectacle of mere conflicts of amateur soldiers, few of whom had ever seen a real fight before, the Cavaliers, trained to horsemanship and the use of arms, and versed in all manly sports, made far finer fighting material than the raw levies of the Parliament. Had this difference continued victory must have remained, as it began, with the Royalists, with results to the nation that could hardly have failed to be of the very worst sort. This is what Cromwell himself says on this all-important subject:

"At my first going out into this engagement I saw our men were beaten at every hand. Your troops, said I, are most of them old, decayed serving-men, and tapsters and such kind of fellows, and, said I, their troops are gentlemen's sons, younger sons and persons of quality. Do you think that the spirits of such base, mean fellows will ever be able to encounter gentlemen that have honour and courage and resolution in them? You must get men of spirit and, take it not ill what I say—I know you will not—of a spirit that is likely to go on as far as gentlemen will go, or else you will be beaten still."

These wise words, which, by the way, were said to no less a man than John Hampton himself, form a key to all the battles of the Civil War. No sooner did Oliver come on to the field as a plain captain of yeomanry horse than his keen, if untaught, eye instantly recognised the one great virtue and strength of the Royalist party. They had an Idea, a devotion, a principle for the sake of which they were ready to sell their lands, melt their plate, beggar their families, and lose their own lives, and men so equipped could only be successfully met and withstood by men who, as he himself put it in that quaintly eloquent phraseology of his, "made some conscience of what they did," and thereupon he set himself to find such men and make soldiers of them.

How well he succeeded the following extract from a contemporary news-letter written some ten months after the outbreak of war will sufficiently tell:

"As for Colonel Cromwell"—promotion, it will be seen, was somewhat rapid in those stormy days—"he hath two thousand brave men, well disciplined. No man swears but he pays his twelve pence. If he be drunk he is set in the stocks, or worse. If one calls the other Roundhead he is cashiered; insomuch that the countries where they come leap for joy of them and come in and join with them. How happy it were if all the forces were thus disciplined!"

On the field of Marston Moor, Prince Rupert nicknamed Cromwell "Old Ironsides," and from that day to this the most invincible troops that ever marched to battle have been named after him. Years afterwards, when his work and theirs was done, their leader was able to say of them: "From that day forward they were never beaten and wherever they were engaged against the enemy they beat continually."

This is literally true. Whether in skirmish or battle, at home or abroad, whether pitted against the disorderly chivalry of the Loyalists or the rigid discipline of the finest Continental troops; whether storming a breach or bearing the brunt of a half-lost battle, these psalm-singing, hard-hitting Crusaders of the new Church Militant not only were never beaten, but never once failed to hurl the enemy back in confusion and disaster.

In them, in short, that stubborn English valour which has since pushed its way all over the world was first disciplined. They formed the first model ever seen of an English regiment, a combination of many units of strength and valour moving and fighting as one, and the fact that "Old Ironsides" was the first man thus to add discipline to valour is in itself no small portion of his title to fame as an Empire-maker.

The first occasion on which these Ironsides made their mark in battle is one of even greater importance than the battle itself, for it marks the entrance on to the stage of history of the first regularly disciplined English regiment, the parent of those who, on a thousand fields since then, have proved themselves worthy of their grim but splendid ancestors. It was the first time, too, that they had a chance to try conclusions with Rupert and his Cavaliers, hitherto unconquered and irresistible.

It was July 2nd, 1644, on a dull and storm-threatening afternoon, that Cavalier and Roundhead first met in a really serious fashion. Compared with what was now to be done Edgehill and all that had come after it had been trifles, for so far the conflicts had been those of amateurs at the art of war, each engaged, as it were, in licking the other into shape, and the conclusion that they now had to try was which of them had got into the best shape. There were about four-and-twenty thousand each of them as they stood through the anxious hours of that summer afternoon on either side of a ditch running across Marston Moor, each watching for a chance to attack, but feeling, no doubt, that the doings of the next few hours would decide an issue which needed a certain amount of thinking over.

The two armies were drawn up upon what is now the regulation pattern, right and left wings and centre. Cromwell with his Ironsides on the left of the Parliamentary army faced Rupert on the right of the Royalists, and he was supported by the infantry of what was then known as the Eastern Association. The King's centre was held by Newcastle, and against it was the Parliamentary centre reinforced by nine thousand Scots Infantry. The Royal left wing was composed of Goring's cavalry regiments and was faced by the Parliamentary right wing under the two Fairfaxes.

During the afternoon there was an exchange of cannon shots which doesn't seem to have done very much harm on either side. Prince Rupert, with his usual impetuosity, had been for some hours wanting to get over the ditch and try conclusions with the Ironsides, who were posted on a little eminence amidst standing corn, and who had wiled away the anxious hours of waiting with mutual exhortations and psalm singing, not a little to the amusement of Rupert and his gallant scapegraces, who were yet to learn that these close-cropped, grim-visaged Puritans could ride and fight a great deal better than they could sing.

The King's older generals, no doubt contemplating Continental etiquette, had decided that it was too late to fight that evening and had withdrawn to their quarters Cromwell, laughing at etiquette as he did at everything else that was not of practical utility, saw his chance, jumped the ditch and went hot-footed and hot-handed into Rupert's ranks. A bullet scored his neck, and hearing someone cry out that he was wounded he shouted: "All's well. A miss is as good as a mile," and charged on. Whether or not he was the first to use this now favourite expression I am not able to say, but at least it was characteristic.

The charge was met in a fashion worthy of Rupert and the gallant gentlemen who followed him, and we learn that after the first onset the Ironsides reeled back, but it was only for a moment. Some Scots cavalry came up behind them, they surged forward again, discipline and valour did their work, and a few minutes afterwards Prince Rupert and his merry men had met more than their match, and, ere long, to use his own words, Colonel Cromwell "had scattered them before him like a little dust." The remnants of them were chased and cut down with ruthless severity, which was then part of the Puritan character, almost to the gates of York, eight miles away.

But Cromwell, profiting by the mistakes which Rupert himself had made in his headlong charges, kept his men well in hand, and when once the Royalist right wing was broken, led his men round to see how the battle had gone on the Parliamentary right and centre.

If he had not done so Marston Moor might have replaced Charles Stuart on the throne of England. Goring had broken up Fairfax's cavalry as completely as Oliver had broken up Rupert's. He had flung them back upon their infantry supports, breaking these in turn, after which he flung himself with the seemingly triumphant Royalists of the centre on the Scots Infantry, taking them in flank and almost routing them, too. Only three regiments of them out of nine held their ground, the rest had broken and fled, and the Earl of Leven, their leader, was already making the best of his way towards Leeds.

The battle at this moment presented one of the strangest spectacles in the history of warfare. On the one side Prince Rupert with his broken brigades was flying towards the North, on the other Leven and Manchester and Fairfax, believing the day hopelessly lost, were making equal haste towards the South. Such was the juncture at which the Man of Destiny arrived. He was in command of the only really disciplined force on the field.

Mr. Frederick Harrison, in his excellent monograph on Cromwell, thus graphically describes what happened: "In an hour the genius of Cromwell had changed disaster into victory. Launching the Scotch troopers of his own wing against Newcastle's Whitecoats, and the infantry of the Eastern Association to succour the remnants of the Scots in the centre, he swooped with the bulk of his own cavalry round the rear of the King's army, and fell upon Goring's victorious troopers on the opposite side of the field. Taking them in the rear, all disordered as they were in the chase and the plunder, he utterly crushed and dispersed them. Having thus with his own squadron annihilated the cavalry of the enemy's both wings, he closed round upon the Royalist centre, and there the Whitecoats and the remnants of the King's Infantry were cut to pieces almost to a man."

Such was Marston Moor, and how completely it was the work of the one man of destiny may be seen in the fact that, complete and crushing as the victory was, its advantages were almost entirely negatived by the incapacity and imbecility of the Parliamentary leaders in the West and South. Everyone of any consequence wanted to be supreme leader; no one had either definite plans or the capacity to carry them through; and when at last there was a prospect of bringing matters to an issue on the field of Newberry, the Royalist forces, though half-beaten, were allowed to get away with all their guns, stores and ammunition in spite of the fact that Manchester was in command of a very superior force.

This was as good as a defeat for the forces of the Parliament, for it was the cause of dividing their councils. Manchester and those who sided with him had apparently begun to fear the terrible earnestness of the Captain of the Ironsides, and were for making peace with the King and patching matters up somehow. But Cromwell, with deeper insight, saw that the quarrel had now gone too far and that it could not stop till one side or the other had had a thorough and decisive beating, and that side he was fully determined should be the King's.

The dispute ended in the fall of Manchester and the triumph of Cromwell. Then came the re-organisation of the Parliamentary forces under what was at this time the New Model, and this New Model, be it noted, was the first standing army of professional soldiers that the United Kingdom had ever seen. Its nominal Commander-in Chief was Sir Thomas Fairfax, but its master spirit and guiding genius was Oliver Cromwell.

But meanwhile the tide of Royalism had been on the rise again, sweeping up from the West and South. The armies faced each other on the borders of Leicestershire, but Cromwell was not there. Fairfax, no doubt knowing his own weakness, entreated that he might come and command the horse. He came, and then, as Clarendon pathetically remarks, "the evil genius of the Kingdom in a moment shifted the whole scene," and it is related that when, after rumours had been for some days flying through both armies as to his arrival, "Old Ironsides" at last came upon the field of action, all the cavalry of the Parliament raised a great shout of joy.

The battle that he came to fight was Naseby, and, saving for the superior discipline displayed on both sides, almost exactly the same things happened as at Marston Moor. Cromwell this time commanded on the right wing, but Rupert was placed at the Royalist's right, and was therefore opposed, not to Cromwell, but to Ireton, his son-in-law and second self. Once more the left wing of the Parliament was broken and scattered by the furious charge of the gallant Cavaliers, once more the centre under Fairfax was "sore overpressed" and thrown into confusion, and once more Cromwell and his Ironsides, having ridden down everything that opposed them, swung round behind the rear of the victorious Royalists, swooped in a hurricane of irresistible valour and determination on their flanks and rear, turned defeat into victory and snatched triumph out of disaster.

It is true that even then there seemed so great a chance of the Royalists retrieving the day that Charles, who had put himself at the head of the flower of his cavalry, had thought himself warranted in crying: "One charge more, gentleman, and the days is ours!" But while he was thinking about this, Cromwell, Fairfax, and Ireton had, by the exercise of almost superhuman energy, reformed the whole of their army, horse, foot, and artillery, into complete battle-array on a new front, and against this the fiery valour of the Cavaliers dashed itself in vain.

Once more valour with generalship had conquered valour without it. The defeat was utter and crushing. For fourteen long miles the pursuit went on and only stayed when the walls of Leicester were in sight. The King's army was utterly destroyed and he himself never again appeared at the head of a force in the field.

During the twelve months that followed we see the erstwhile Farmer of Huntingdon in a new light as the beseiger and reducer of strong places. His methods were logical, effective and, we may fairly add, pitiless. Those days were not these any more than William the Norman's or Edward Longlegs' were Cromwell's, and moreover we must remember that he had set himself with all the strength of his mighty nature to stamping the plague of civil war out of the Three Kingdoms with such dispatch as was possible, and it had got to be done speedily, for outside were the enemies of Britain waiting to take advantage of the weakness that this plague might leave her with.

First he summoned the stronghold to surrender, threatening all with the sword. If this is refused he selects his point of attack, batters away at it till he makes a practicable breach, then he gives another chance of surrender, this time with somewhat better terms, but this is the last grace. Refusal now means wave after wave of his irresistible iron and leather-clad soldiery pouring into the breach, till at last all opposition is beaten down and then massacre for which, it may be added, he and those with him are never at a loss to find a biblical precedent.

The victories that he won by this method were simply amazing. In about sixteen months he was engaged in some sixty battles and sieges, and took fifty fortified towns and cities with over a thousand pieces of artillery, forty thousand stand of arms, and between two and three hundred colours. The end of this wonderful campaign was the Storm of Bristol. This happened on the tenth and eleventh of September, 1646. As a feat of warfare it is almost incredible. The second city in the kingdom, defended by properly constructed earthworks and fortifications, and garrisoned by four thousand troops with a hundred and fifty pieces of cannon, was stormed and taken with a loss of under two hundred men!

The King's infantry were cut to pieces.

It reads more like one of Drake's insolently valiant attacks upon a Spanish treasure-city than a desperate conflict between Englishmen and Englishmen. There can only be one explanation of it, and that explanation is summed up in the two words: Oliver Cromwell. We are bound to grant that the valour was equal on both sides, but equally we are forced to admit that all the genius and generalship were on one.

Looked at from our point of view, there were terrible blemishes on these triumphs. Every advantage was pursued with the unsparing ferocity which was possible only to religious bigotry fired to a white heat. It is only reasonable to suppose that these Puritan champions of the new faith were fired with just the same furious and pitiless zeal as that which inspired the Israelites in their attack on Canaan, or the first armies of Islam in their assaults on the idolators of the East. They slew and spared not, they hewed their enemies in pieces as Samuel hewed Agag "before the Lord," and they honestly believed that the Lord looked down with approval on them and their bloody work.

Priceless treasures of art were destroyed, not only without remorse, but with grim exultation. To them they were abominations of the heathen, just as the Canaanite idols of silver and gold were to the armies of Israel. But however ferociously it was done, the work was done thoroughly, and by August, 1646, the fall of Ragland Castle following on the surrender of Oxford, brought down the curtain on the first act of the Civil War. Charles gave himself up to the Scots at Newark, and Oliver turned to fight the enemies of his own household.

The chief of these enemies, curiously enough, was that same Parliament in whose name he had won all his brilliant triumphs, and a conflict, very interesting to the student of humanity, now began between the Man of Action and one of those Talking Machines which the good Earl Simon some four centuries before had found so singularly ineffective.

There is no need to tell in detail how the struggle went. Everyone knows how Cromwell preached and prayed and stormed at the self-sufficient busybodies who thought themselves a power in the land because they called themselves a parliament. Then, seeing that no other method would stop their gabble, he brought in his soldiers and turned them out to talk in the streets or wherever else they could get anyone to listen to them, while he went on with his work.

It is not very many years since Thomas Carlyle, who perhaps understood Cromwell better than any other man not living in his own age, was walking over Westminster Bridge with a very distinguished British officer one night, when the mother of Parliaments was busy tearing her hair and rending her garments over some wordy futility or other, and, jerking his thumb towards the lighted windows, he said: "Ah, my lord, I should like to see the good day when you would go in there with a file of Grenadiers as old Noll did with his dragoons, and clear that nest of cacklers out. Maybe the nation would get some of its business done then instead of only getting it talked about."

From this there is a certain moral to be drawn by the wise. For my own part I should dearly love to know with what words old Noll himself would have answered the Sage of Chelsea.

The payment of the Scots' arrears by the Parliament, their surrender of the king—who, by the way, was a great deal stronger in helpless captivity than he had ever been at the head of an army—and his seizure by Cromwell through the instrumentality of Cornet Joyce and his troop of horse, now led up to a very singular situation. Cromwell, the conqueror, went over to the side of Charles Stuart the captive, and if it had not been for that fatal twist in the king's moral nature, there is no telling but that he might have been re-seated on a throne supported and surrounded by the pikes and sabres of the Ironsides.

But unhappily for him, it was not in Charles Stuart's nature to "go straight," and, in the end, after Cromwell had faced and quelled a mutiny among his own men on his account, he discovered that the king was playing him false, that he did not honestly wish to follow his policy of "healing and settling," but only to regain his freedom and try the hazard of battle again.

From that moment Cromwell was his unsparing enemy. Now he saw in Charles "The Man of Blood" who, for the sake of a personal aspiration and for personal profit, was eager to once more set his subjects by the ears and light the flame of war from end to end of the country.

West and South and North the Loyalists were arming and rising again and the Scots were marching across the Border, so the Man of Destiny stopped talking and preaching, buckled on his sword and strode out to battle once more.

The first rising was in Wales, and that he crushed as promptly as he did pitilessly. Then he turned with a weary and war-worn army of some seven thousand men, so wasted with marching and privation and sickness that, as a record of the time tells us, "they seemed rather fit for a hospital than a battle," to face the invading Scots in the North.

He met them at Preston. They were three to one—or rather, to be more exact, twenty-four thousand to seven thousand—well armed and found and confident of victory. Yet never did the military genius of the great Oliver shine out more brilliantly than now. What followed was not a battle; it was an onset, a chase, and a massacre which lasted three days and extended over some thirty miles of country. When it was over Cromwell wrote in one of those marvellous dispatches of his: "We have quite tired our horses in pursuit of the enemy. We have killed and disabled all their foot and left them only some horse. If my horse could but trot after them I would take them all."

The next act in the swiftly-moving drama was the trial and execution of him who to this day is considered by some to have been a royal martyr, who only exchanged an earthly for a heavenly crown, and by others is looked upon as the man who deliberately made himself guilty of the worst of all national crimes, the crime of civil war. That is a matter for each one to decide according to his own convictions, which, be it noted, some two and a half centuries of argument have not yet altered. Here we are only concerned with Cromwell's share in it.

There can be no doubt to an unbiassed mind that at one period he honestly tried for a monarchical settlement of the difficulty. It is equally undeniable that he considered Charles's double-dealing responsible for what he held to be the unpardonable crime of the Second Civil War and therefore as having incurred for a second time the guilt of blood. That the execution, or murder, of the king met with his entire approval cannot be doubted, since before it happened he said to Algeron Sidney: "I tell you we will cut off his head with the crown upon it."

So, whether crime or act of justice, it was done, and Cromwell, perhaps more than anyone else, was responsible for it.

The next act is the Dictatorship, and the first scene in it the re-conquest of Ireland, with its massacres and bitter, pitiless persecutions in revenge or punishment, as you will, for other massacres which had gone before. It is a piteous story, and one of no great credit to anyone, but, to borrow the maxim of Strafford, the former tyrant of Ireland, it was "thorough." In nine months with about fifteen thousand men, the Dictator had stamped the Irish rebellion out and made "the curse of Cromwell," a phrase that will dwell on Hibernian lips for many a generation.

But no sooner was the Irish revolt drowned in blood and flame than Prince Charles, afterwards Charles II. of infamous memory, took the Oath to the Covenant, and the Scots rose to support him. Cromwell crossed the Border on July 22nd, 1650.

As it happened the Scottish general was Leslie, the old comrade who had fought at his side at Marston Moor. For some weeks the Scots played a waiting game, and Cromwell, with his men wearied and falling sick, and with no other base than his ships on the coast, hurled texts and biblical harangues at the enemy. In fact, as Mr. Harrison cleverly puts it, "it was not so much a battle between two armies as between two rival congregations in arms."

Leslie and his preachers fired other texts back at him and kept out of his way until the fatal 3rd of September came. By this time Cromwell had only eleven thousand men capable of bearing arms and they were in no great state for fighting. Leslie had twenty-two or three thousand Scots and all the advantage of the position, but the Fates had already taken the matter into their own hands. On the afternoon of the 2nd Cromwell saw that the wary Scot, as some say, driven by the frantic exhortation of the preachers, had forsaken his post of vantage. "The Lord hath delivered them into our hands!" he cried, and straightway began to set his battle in order.

The next morning, while it was yet moonlight, they came to blows. In an hour or so it was all over. The Scots fled in utter panic and confusion, "being made by the Lord of Hosts as stubble to our swords," to use Oliver's own words. When the rout was at its height the sun rose, scattering the morning mists. "Let God arise and His enemies be scattered!" he shouted exultantly through the roar of the battle, and then—how characteristic it was of the man!—he halted his army in the very moment of triumph and sang the one hundred and seventeenth psalm, beginning: "O praise the Lord all ye people for His merciful kindness is great towards us!" Then he unleashed his bloodhounds again and the rest was massacre.

Another year passed in miscellaneous fighting and arguing, slaughter and psalm singing, and once more the sun of the 3rd of September, Cromwell's Day of Fate, or, as Byron puts it:

His day of double victory and death, dawned, this time over Worcester, the scene of "the Crowning Mercy." The same miracles of generalship were accomplished, the same tremendous victory was won at a ridiculously small expense—under two hundred men to conquer an entrenched army of fifteen thousand—and this was the end of the fighting at home.

But meanwhile there was fighting abroad, and, more than that, the fame of the great Oliver and his marvellous doings had been ringing from end to end of Europe. As Clarendon, the historian of the Royalists, candidly admits: "His greatness at home was but a shadow of the glory he had abroad." The mastery of the seas was wrenched out of the hands of the Dutch by Drake, the sea-power of England was organised as its land-power was, and Britain rose at a bound from the degradation to which she had sunk under the first Stuart to the proud position of the first naval and military Power of the world, and the greatest ministers and monarchs in Europe, even the Pope himself, were forced to respect the prowess and cringe for the friendship of the Farmer of Huntingdon.

If, as has been aptly suggested, the great Oliver could have lived to an age which is now a normal one for statesmen, the disgraceful and ruinous interval occupied by the reigns of the second Charles and the second James might have been spared with all their infamy and national loss, and William of Orange might worthily have continued the work which Cromwell so well began. But the time was not yet and so it was not to be. The great ideal of his life, a Protestant alliance, was never realised. His last days were days of darkness and suffering, social, mental, and physical.

Once more the Day of Fate came round, and between three and four in the afternoon the watchers by his bedside heard him sigh deeply and heavily. Some say that he whispered: "My work is done"—and then he died. This may be fact or fancy, but, be that as it may, no man had a better right to pass out of the mystery of the things that are into the mystery of the things that are to be with such words on his lips than Oliver Cromwell, General, Statesman, and King in everything but the empty name.

Author of "A Boyar of the 'Terrible.'"

SUMMARY.

The story is told by a 'Varsity man, who, seeking adventure, joins Jameson in his raid against the Matabeles. During a brush with the enemy, Joe Wright, a fellow trooper, meets with his death-wound, and, before expiring, bequeaths a satchel containing his life history and the revelation of a wonderful secret to the narrator, who continues the story in the words of the written confession of his dead comrade. Some years previously, Wright had been a private in a Royal Rifle regiment, stationed in Rajpore, India. He and three companions made a midnight raid on a Hindoo temple, in order to steal a diamond of exceptional value and beauty, situated in the forehead of an idol.

CHAPTER IV.

A Fearful End.

Johnny laughed when he drew the winning lot, and said that luck had come in his way for once.

"Give us the chisel, Alf!" he said, "and I'll have the thing out in two shakes."

"Be careful, Johnny," I warned him; "remember what Miles told us about this idol. He says it's generally known that the Joss can take good care of itself; there may be something in it!"

"Rot!" exclaimed Johnny contemptuously. "The priests spread a report of that kind about to save themselves trouble. Why, don't you see they'd have to watch the blooming thing night and day if it wasn't for the funk they've established about it? They're paid for watching, too, you may bet, and they prefer going home to bed. I'm not afraid. Give us the chisel, Alf!"

"There isn't smoke without a fire somewhere!" I persisted.

"Rats!" said Johnny irreverently; whereat we all laughed, and Hitchins gave him the chisel.

Whether I live for fifty years or but one night from the moment I write these lines, I shall never forget the next scene. That dark heathen temple, and the hideous, cross-legged gods squatting around and about us in every direction—some scowling savagely at us, others seeming to smile with malicious delight as we stood and plotted against the well-being of their principal and chieftain, and everyone of them looking all the more diabolically malevolent and repulsive in the dim light that our lanterns shed about the place.

Johnny did not seem to realise any of the creepiness and horror that I felt. His was a joyous, devil-may-care kind of temperament that would never give way even for a moment to "the blues." He never knew what fear was, did dear old Johnny Phelps, but took one thing with another, accepting everything that destiny brought him with a laugh and a joke, and making light of the most dangerous and difficult matters that others would look grave over. Lord! you should have seen him, as I did, in some of those little frontier wars we were engaged in at that time—fasting, hemmed in in passes—it was all the same to him; he was the life and soul of the rest of us. Poor old Johnny! But my thoughts are running away with me, as they do sometimes, and I must get back to that Joss-house and the idol.

Johnny took the chisel and mallet.

"How am I going to get at him?" he said, laughing.

"Go carefully up and stand on that kind of prayer-carpet in front of him; that's probably where the Johnnies kneel before him," said Jake. "Go carefully, though, in case he lets out at you when you come near."

"Yes, go carefully, for goodness' sake!" I added. I don't know how it was, but my heart was full of a kind of terror, and I wished a hundred times that night that we had never come out on this godless job.

"Oh, I'll go carefully, right enough, don't you make any mistake about that!" laughed Johnny.

"Be ready to jump backwards if you hear any kind of a rumble or creaking!" said Alf. "I'll bet the old boy won't move much without his machinery creaking; it isn't as if chaps came and woke him up every day."

In deference, I suppose, to our advice, Johnny felt his way step by step towards the pedestal on which sat the big idol; he did so with apparent caution, though I do not believe he felt any anxiety. Still, he crawled on, pressing down each foot in turn with a "Woa, Emma!" or a "Steady along, there!" and making sure of each foothold before trusting the whole weight of his body to it.

So he reached the little prayer-carpet that lay before the pedestal, and stopped upon it a moment to pass us a comical bow and a wave of the arm.

"Safe, so far!" said Johnny; "now then, you ugly old varmint, how'm I going to get at your third eye?" he continued; "guess I'd better gouge it out best way I can, what say you, mates?"

"See if it's firm in, or only in a sort of setting," suggested Alf; "it looks to me as if it sat in a kind of hole, pretty loose, and the stone around not touching it."

"Lord! so it is!" said Johnny, looking closer; "there's a rim of space all round it—my! don't it glitter! What'll we do with it when we've got it?"

He fell over me.

"Keep jolly quiet till we get to England!" said Jake, whose whole frame shook with excitement, as I could plainly see; as for myself, my teeth were all a-chatter; but then I felt in a real old superstitious terror, such as I had never experienced before.

"Well, here goes!" said Johnny.

He inserted his chisel in the chink that encircled the diamond, feeling here and there for resistance, but finding none.

"It seems to be set in a kind of tube or something," he said, "running straight down into the old boy's head; what's the object of having it that way? Probably if I press it, it'll disappear down the tube; that's where the secret is, depend on it! You touch it and it's gone—and not a bad plan either!"

"Press it gently with your fingers and see," said Jake; "what if it drops down into his stomach? We'll hack the Joss into a jelly but we'll find it again!"

Johnny placed his thumb on the great flashing stone. I remember the moment as though it were yesterday. I remember the feeling of intense excitement that had begun to lay hold of me, the offspring, I dare say, of the example of Jake and Alf Hitchins, both of whom stood by, pale and trembling, fidgeting with impatience and agitation. I remember Johnny laughing as he pressed the diamond with his thumb, and I remember thinking how differently he approached this matter from ourselves—he being full of fun and lightheartedness, regarding the thing as a good lark, and no more, while we were terribly in earnest. I remember thinking all this as he touched the diamond, and then there was a sudden quick movement of something, a slight whirr or grating sound that made us all start back in guilty terror, and where Johnny had stood but a moment before there was no sign of him.

"Good Heavens!" ejaculated Jake hoarsely. "What's happened? Where's Johnny?"

"The trap, the trapdoor!" I muttered. "I saw it open under his feet—under the prayer carpet—God have mercy upon us all, let's get out of this awful place!"

"What, without the swag, and without Johnny?" said Jake. "Not I! Lift the prayer carpet, Alf, and we'll prize the thing open—we may be able to get the poor chap out."

"Lift it yourself," said Alf, who was all of a tremble, whether with horror or agitation. "I won't go near the blamed thing."

"Give us a hand then, Joe," resumed Jake—"we shall be all safe if we stand outside the carpet—quickly, the poor chap may be suffocating for all we know!"

We tore up the carpet. Underneath it was a wooden square of about four feet each way let into the tiled floor, but there was no handle to it, or anything that could be grasped to pull it up by. We put the chisel under the sides, here and there, and tugged at it, but in vain—we could make no impression upon it.

"What's to be done?" I gasped. "Will you wait while I run home and fetch a pick or something?"

I looked up as I spoke, and it was as well that I did, for over me stood a tall priest in the act of bringing a curved sword down upon my neck as I knelt at the trapdoor. I don't know where the fellow came from. The others saw him at the same moment, and each—as I dare say I did, too—shouted something inarticulately, and sprang back.

The priest's sword descended, but I had slipped out of the way. He struck at me again, but I darted in this time, and grabbed him round the knees. He fell over me, and we struggled together on the ground.

Whether he lost his sword as he fell or whether Jake Daws possessed himself of it as the Josser and I rolled about I do not know, but Jake got the sword, and presently brought it down upon my antagonist's head just as I had shaken his hands from about my throat, and was on my knees over him ready to scrag him in return.

The priest ceased to struggle. He opened and shut his mouth once or twice, then his legs and arms straightened out, and his jaw fell—he was dead.

"You've killed him, Jake," I said. "Lord forgive you!"

"You fool, it was the only thing to do!" said Jake savagely. "You didn't want him to remain alive and give us all away, did you?"

This certainly would have been awkward.

"Still, it's murder," I said. "You can't get out of that, Jake. Besides, what are we going to do with him now?"

"Why, send him after Johnny," said Jake.

"Stop!" cried Alf. "Don't do anything in a hurry. I've an idea. Why shouldn't we make use of this blamed Josser, Jake, now we've got him? We'll lie him along the prayer carpet, first tying him to the idol with a sash so as he doesn't disappear; then one of you chaps climb up behind the Joss—it'll be safe from there—and press the blooming jewel; down'll go the trap-door, and the priest'll go half way down and stick there with the trap-door half open and half shut. Then we can look and see where Johnny is, and we can fish out the jewel at our leisure, for the blamed thing can't work its spring, or whatever it is, when it's jammed."

"Why, you're a genius, Alf, you infernal coward, after all!" said Jake, with a coarse laugh, and a coarser oath.

"And what's more, we can leave the chap half in and half out, and they'll think he took the diamond and dropped it down the hole when he was caught," I added, forgetting the murder and everything else in the desire to save my own skin.

"And that's true, too," said Jake; "so come along, my gay sportsman, and do your part in this 'ere play!"

With the words, he dragged his victim to the trap and laid him across it.

"Hold on to him, you Joe," he said, "that's better than tying him up, for we might make a mess of it, and forget to untie him afterwards, so hang on to his foot, and see he don't drag you down. Now, Alf, you blamed funkstick, climb up behind and touch the button, and the figure will work."

"Not I," said Alf, shrinking back, "there may be some infernal murdering trick from that side as well."

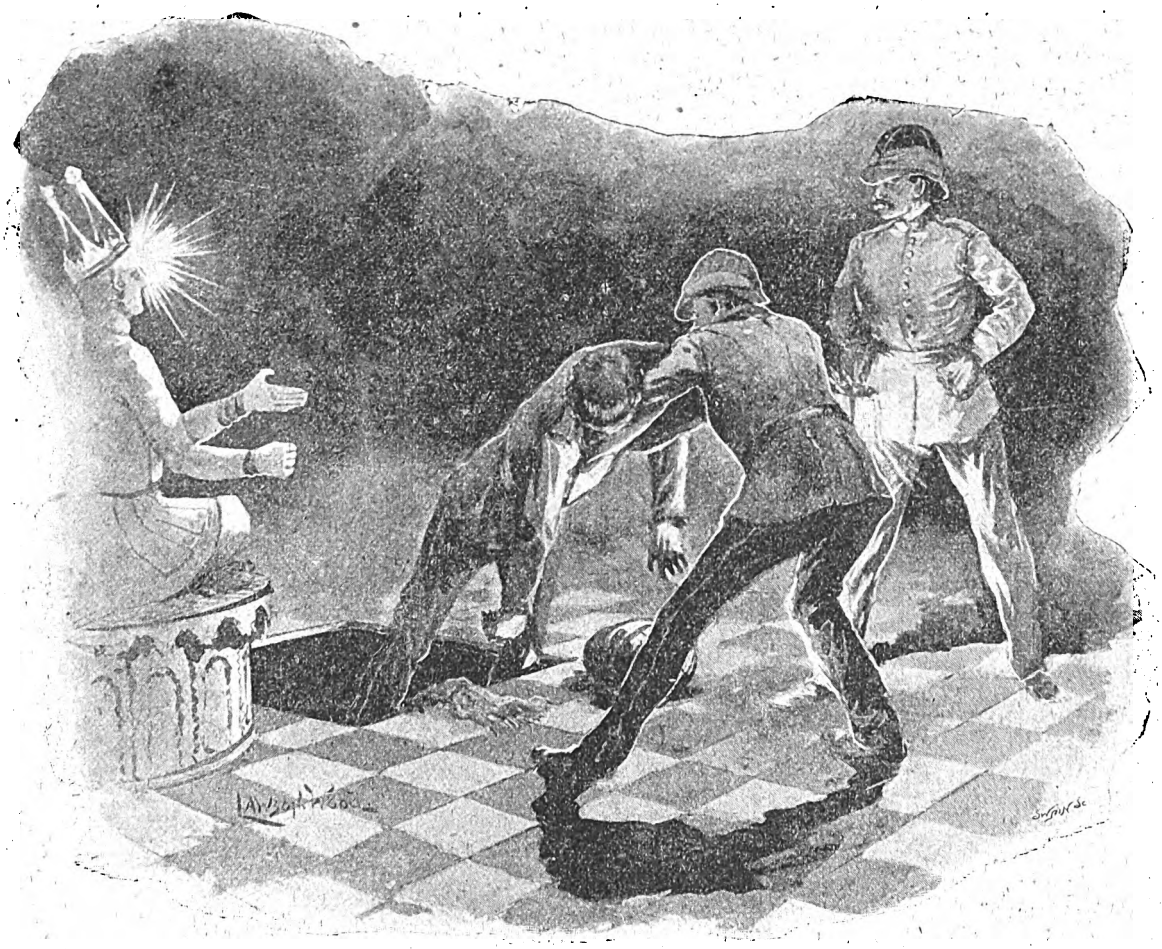
my voice sounded hollow and echo-y, as the voice of a man who speaks down a well.

But there was no answer from Johnny.

CHAPTER V.

THE REAL ARTICLE AND THE SHAM.

JAKE took one of the priest's shoes and let it fall through the half-open trap-door, placing his finger to his lip to enjoin silence. It seemed to me that several seconds passed before I heard anything. Then came a splash.



He fainted, even as I pulled his legs out.

"Oh, I see," said Jake, "so that's why one of us was to do the job, is it? Upon my soul, Alf, I'd kick you blue if you was worth it; here, give us the blamed cask-hoop! Hold on to the Josser, Joe, for all you're worth!"

Jake took the sword, and reaching over the carpet, made little dabs at the diamond till he touched it with the sword-point.

Instantly there was the same whirr or creak, the trap opened and the body of the priest slipped downwards, but I had him tightly by the leg, and held on; then the door came back and jammed him fast, leaving an aperture of a foot or so at the side.

I quickly seized a lantern and peered down, hoping to see or hear Johnny. I shouted his name over and over again;

"Ah," said Jake, "I thought so; it's a well. Poor old Phelps; so he's gone. Well, anyway, there'll be one less to divide."

"Oh, he can't be dead, Jake," I cried, all the horror of the thing suddenly overwhelming me. "Dear old Johnny can't be dead, so suddenly and so horribly. For Heaven's sake let's do something to save him. Raise the alarm and get some ladders. I'll go."

I was up, and half-way to the window before Jake laid hold of my shoulder and stopped me.

"Don't go playing the fool, Joe Wright," he said, "or we shall know where to put you, and that's where poor Johnny is. He's drowned as dead as a cat by this time, man. You aren't going to sink the ship for a dead man, no, nor for twenty Johnnies, alive or dead. Now you know what Alf Hitchins' and my game is; we've got to keep our necks clear of the rope, sonny, and so have you, so no bloomin' nonsense!"

"I'm as good a man as you, Jake Daws, and perhaps a little better," I said, "and as for Alf, he'd be a good man in a fight if his tongue was a weapon, so I'll have you know that I'm not to be dictated to. Johnny Phelps has got to be saved, I tell you, if he's alive."

"Lord, man, what a fool you are to-day!" said Jake. "Shout down the well again, if you like; do you suppose the chap wouldn't answer if he heard? I tell you he's drowned as dead as the Armada; come, go risking our heads, and your own, too, for a dead man. Johnny Phelps was a good chap, and I'm as sorry for him as you are; but dead he is, and that's certain. So be sensible, and we'll have this bloomin' jewel and divide the proceeds, and the Josser here shall get the blame. What say you, Alf?"

"Of course he's dead," Alf assented. "Come, be a man, Joe, and not an infernal fool; you've insulted me to-night, but I forgive you because we can't afford to quarrel now. Besides, if you was to run out like a blooming idiot, and give the alarm, why, I'd have you notice that I've got the sword and would stop your little game in a jiffey!"

I turned contemptuously from Alf Hitchins, and bent over the trap door once again. I called repeatedly down it, entreating Johnny to answer and promising to come down and fetch him if only he'd give tongue; but there was no answering voice, and I was compelled to conclude that he was drowned, or dead some other way, as no doubt he was. At last I abandoned the task.

"There, you see!" said Alf, "now be a sensible chap and stop that rot; what's the next move, Jake—you be skipper, and we'll take our orders from you."

"Well, out with the diamond then, first!" said Daws. "Where's the chisel?"

But the chisel had absolutely disappeared, and I make no doubt that it went down into the oubliette with dear old Johnny.

"Take the sword then, you Alf, and dab gently with that; here—stand off the carpet in case of accident—go carefully, and don't chip the jewel; hold on to the Josser, Joe Wright!"

It was as well that I was by. Hardly had Alf touched the big diamond with the point of his sword, than the machine responded instantly. The body of the priest was not thick enough to jam the trap so wide that it would open no further. Alf Hutchins, in sudden terror, overbalanced and stepped upon the priest's body. To save Alf I let go of the dead man, a piece of whose garment came off in my hand, and gripped the live one, nerveless and senseless with abject terror, perhaps pardonably so, for as a matter of fact, he would have followed the priest had I not gripped him just in time, and he was, indeed, half in and half out of the pit. He fainted, even as I pulled his legs out and allowed the trap to close with a bang, having let the sword fall down the well as he stumbled and fell over. Jake laughed aloud.

"By Gum, Joseph, that was a near shave!" he said. "It looked like as if you and I were to divide the swag, my son! Lord! what a fool the man was! Why must he lose his head and the sword too, plague take the idiot! How are we going to get the thing out without it—and the chisel gone too—yes, and the priest, that was going to take all the blame off us! What are we going to do, Joe Wright?"

It was perfectly clear, the idol had beaten us. "We must go home without it!" I said, "and as for the priest, it's just as well he's gone, Jake, for anyone could see that you, or some other murderous villain, had bashed his head in."

"I call that grateful, now!" said Jake, "considering that I saved your life from him!" This was not true, for I had the fellow at my mercy when Jake struck. "However," he added, "it's true the wound would have been seen, and I don't suppose the other Jossers believe that the old idol could have let fly at him, though the general public might."

"Anyhow, there's a bit of his robe sticking out of the trap now!" I said, "so he'll be the suspected party after all!"

"Good!" Jake assented; "then come, let's clean up a bit, and as soon as Alf revives we'll be off for the present; but we'll have that diamond one day, sonny, you see if we don't!"

Hitchins came round presently, and having tidied up the place we all three took our departure, Jake turning to shake his fist at the idol before he climbed to the window:

"Ah, you infernal old villain!" he said, "we're a-coming back, don't you make any mistake! We ain't done with you and your bloomin' one eye yet, not by a longish bit!"

We had no difficulty in getting safely into quarters after this escapade that ended so tragically for poor Johnny; but there was necessarily considerable excitement in the regiment over the disappearance of our unfortunate companion. It was very awkward for me, personally, because the Colonel, knowing that Johnny was a particular friend of mine, examined me pretty closely as to whether I knew anything about him.

Naturally I was obliged to say that I did not know what had become of him, though I supposed he must have deserted for some reason of his own. I trotted out this theory because it was the popularly received explanation of his disappearance, as held by the regiment in general.

"But why—why should the poor fellow desert, and the regiment so soon going home again?" asked the Colonel, puzzled—and no wonder—to account for the mysterious affair. "Was anything wrong with him? Was he discontented? Did he imagine himself unfairly treated? Was there any love trouble?" The poor colonel fired a whole string of suggestions at me in his desperation. I caught at the last. I said Johnny had got himself into rather hot water, having promised—in one of his reckless moments—to marry a native Mohammedan girl whom he pretended to adore and who adored him without any pretence at all. This girl, I said, had lately worried him to carry out his promise which, as a matter of fact, Johnny never had the slightest idea of doing, and had threatened to make things pretty unpleasant for poor Johnny with his officers if he did not act up to his word before leaving the place for Bombay and England.

This proved a good idea on my part, and seemed to satisfy and somewhat amuse the Colonel, who nevertheless gave orders for a hue-and-cry to be raised, in hopes of finding our poor drowned Johnny. The girl was also questioned, but had nothing to disclose as to her faithless swain, and eventually the search was abandoned and the usual notices issued describing Johnny's appearance, and calling upon all men to hand him over, if found, to outraged authority.

Meanwhile my confederates and I consulted often enough as to our next move, for I may as well confess that, greatly as I now hated both Jake and Alf for the cold-blooded murderers they were, yet I quite realised that I was myself an accessory, and therefore as guilty as they, or near it, and as much in their power to destroy as they in mine. Moreover, in spite of the horror I still felt whenever I acted over again that night's work in the temple, and thought of poor Johnny precipitated into that hideous pit and drowned without hope of succour, yet whenever I recalled the splendid, flashing gem in the forehead of the idol, that evil thing that had been the cause of all this horror and crime and misfortune, I felt that, in spite of everything, I must return and renew the attempt to possess myself of it.

Both Jake and Alf Hitchins were at least equally fascinated and determined to achieve where we had all failed, and many were the consultations we held as to how and when this was to be effected.

One afternoon I walked with Jake through the native bazaars of the town close to which our barracks were situated.

Suddenly Jake jogged my arm.

"Look there, Joe! See the little idol on the bracket there?" he whispered. "That's a miniature of our sportsman up at the temple!"

I looked, and with a shock I recognised it immediately; there it sat, a little, devilish, complacent idol of six inches in height, but fashioned beautifully, in exact imitation of its huge original, down to the very expression of the face, and to the gem in its forehead, which was, of course, a minute specimen, by comparison, and probably a dummy diamond at that.

"Lord, I must have that!" said Jake.

We asked the price of the idol, and inquired what it represented.

The native, whose property it was, then launched out and gave us, in mixed language, a long account of the great idol of which this was a copy. He informed us that there was a mystery connected with the god, who was known to punish instantly and terribly those who attempted to touch the magnificent diamond, which was the pride of the temple, and was placed, just like this little one, in his forehead.

"Only lately," he continued, speaking mysteriously and in a whisper, as though he imparted to us a secret which no one else should be privileged to hear, "only lately one of the priests in charge of the temple had been guilty of an attempt to rob the idol, for which sacrilege he had been instantly slain by the god." I asked how this was known. "Because there was nothing left of him but a portion of his garment," said the man, "and a stain of blood on the floor; the rest of him, it is said, disappeared utterly; truly it is an awful thing to offend this great god!"

"That must be a wonderful jewel to tempt a priest to risk his own destruction," said Jake, who never turned a hair, though I felt that I was pale and trembling; "what is the size of it?"

The man produced a saucer filled with counterfeit gems of the exact size and appearance of the real diamond, for the possession of which we were already bartering our souls.

"There," he said, "these are the fac-simile of the Eye of the Sun" (these are not his exact words), "I sell hundreds of them. Every English Sahib that comes to the town carries one away with him."

"I'll take one," said Jake, and take one he did, choosing a lovely specimen; and—as I hope to be forgiven—no one who was not an expert could have said it was not a real diamond. We did not buy the model of the idol, however, being too absorbed by this new thing to remember it.

The artificial gem cost us, I think, a rupee and a half—it makes me laugh to think of it, in spite of everything!

CHAPTER VI.

WE LIFT THE BIG JEWEL.

"WHAT did you buy the thing for?" I asked Jake as we walked down the street.

"Why, to make a swop, to be sure, with the real article. This one will suit the old Joss equally as well, and we'll take the liberty of having the other. As for the sportsmen that go there to pray and clean up the place and so on, they'll never know the difference, I lay a dollar; they won't suspect it's a dummy, and if they did find out, we should be thousands of miles away by that time."

This was a pretty good idea of Jake's, who was no fool, though a first-class rascal.

That night we two and Alf held a serious consultation. There was but a week now before we should leave the place for ever and sail for England; it was time we made our coup.

Therefore the following evening was fixed upon for our renewed attempt, for which we had gradually prepared during the past few weeks, Jake having collected; that is, certain articles and hidden them in the grove that surrounded the temple. There was a large sack, full of rubbish, designed to perform the part of victim to the god's diabolical mechanical revenge. Then there were powerful pincers and a chisel and a brace, all of which we took with us, and lastly, a sword-bayonet which Jake insisted upon wearing.

"Come now, Jake," I said, "no more murders; one's enough."

"Oh, rats!" said he. "Self-preservation's the first law. The Jossers had best stay away, and not come poking around on tiptoe from nowhere, if they want to preserve whole skins. What would you do, mate, if one came around while you were there? Not leave him with all our secrets in his hands, I know. You'd stab him as soon as I would."

"I wouldn't!" I said. "No murdering for me!"

"All right, then," said Jake, "we'll see. Perhaps there'll be another Josser, and perhaps there won't. I shall be interested to know how you propose to act if he does turn up, supposing he's not to be knocked on the head."

"Sufficient for the day," said I weakly, for, as a matter of fact, I did not see any way out of the difficulty excepting that which Jake indicated—always supposing that another priest should turn up; but, as Jake presently suggested, probably for my consolation, it was likely that no watch would be kept upon the idol since his last achievement, for it was now abundantly evident that the god was quite able to look after himself!

That night found us safely within the temple—Jake, Alf Hitchins, and myself—together with the paraphernalia we had brought with us, including two steel bars of some eighteen inches in length with which we proposed "to hold the Joss's mouth open, so as he couldn't bite," as Jake picturesquely expressed it, meaning by this that we purposed to hold the trap door wide with them while we worked away at the diamond.

Something struck my legs from under me.

However, since—with all our precautions—there would still be some risk for the actual worker, we drew lots for the post of honour. We did this with three matches, each cutting off a piece of a match and placing it in a cap; then having shaken the cap to mix the matches, we each drew one, the shortest to have the dangerous job.

Jake and Alf both drew before me, and I have always thought, though I said nothing at the time, that they cheated me, pretending to feel about in the cap for the matches while in reality they were measuring them by the touch; anyhow, I was left with the shortest, and the job fell to me.

I did not like it, for besides the danger of the thing itself, I had no confidence in my associates. I felt that they doubted and distrusted me, and would not be sorry if something were to befal me akin to that which befel Johnny; therefore I kept a sharp look-out the while I worked.

First I went behind the idol, and pressed inwards his jewel-eye, the "Glory of Rajpore" as we now knew it was called, as well as "The Eye of the Sun."

Instantly the trap opened, sank, and closed again with a snap.

"Woa, a bit, sonny!" cried Jake, "I wasn't quick enough!"

I repeated the performance. This time Jake slipped his sack in, preventing the reclosing of the trap, which now yawned wide, and remained so. Alf handed the steel bars, and with these Jake quickly jammed the thing in its present position.

"Glory!" he ejaculated, when this was done; "now work for all you're worth, Joe Wright, for the thing's as safe as a church."

I now stood close to the trap, but beyond it, and touched the spring a second time, but there was no result; Jake's arrangement had succeeded in rendering the diabolical machinery of the god harmless.

Then I started working in earnest. I was pretty nimble with my fingers, and presently I had loosened the diamond by working under it with my chisel. Very soon after this I had it safely in my hand. It had rested, I now saw, in a kind of cup at the upper end of the tube, which communicated with a spring which worked the infernal machinery. I cannot describe the thrill I felt, holding that diamond for the first time in the palm of my hand; it seemed to set me afire, head to foot.

"Hand down the swag!" said Jake, "and take this dummy gem."

"Lord!" he continued, as I obediently handed down the glorious jewel; "Lord! why, it's as exactly like the other as two peas. See, here, Alf—ain't it a wonder! Take the dummy, Joe, and stick it in where this one was!"

While I was doing this Jake and Alf conversed, but in such very low tones that I could catch nothing of their observations.

I succeeded in fixing the dummy jewel easily enough. It was a simple arrangement, and all I had to do was to push the base of it well into the socket, and then jam the edges of the tubing over it. I had the whole thing fixed up in a few minutes.

"Hold on a minute and see if the blooming mouse-trap works first," said Jake.

He removed the supports, and the trap banged up to the floor level. I touched the diamond and the machinery worked easily, that is, the trap opened and shut again with a whirr and a bang, just as it had when it swallowed poor Johnny.

"Try it once more, so as to be sure," said Jake.

Just then, even as I placed my finger upon the spring to work the trap, it occurred to me what a fool I had been to let Jake hold the big diamond while I stood in this position; if I had held it or put it in my pocket until the job was finished, I should have been perfectly safe against any murderous tricks he might play me, whereas now—if it were to occur to him—he had me more or less at his mercy. He and Alf together could easily push me suddenly upon the fatal spot as I touched the spring, and in a moment I should be dashed to the bottom of the pit, like Johnny.

It has taken several minutes to explain this sudden terror of mine, but the idea flashed through my brain in the thirtieth part of a second.

At the very same instant something struck my legs from under me, and I fell forwards, knocking my forehead against the idol's pedestal, and subsiding on the floor with a large part of my body across the trap-door. Owing, I suppose, to the inspiration of terror that had darted through my mind, or mistrust of Jake, I had not pressed the spring, and to this fact I doubtless owe my life.

I sprang to my feet and confronted Jake, catching hold of him by both shoulders and shaking him to and fro.

"Explain, if you can, you infernal blackguard," I said, "before I smash you."

"Let go, you fool," said Jake, laughing, but looking very wickedly. "You were standing with a foot on the trap, wasn't he, Alf? You'd have been in in another second if I hadn't pulled you back."

Alf assented.

I knew it was a lie, and that the blackguards had meant to murder me, but I thought it better to pretend that this explanation satisfied me. After all I had gained much by the episode, for I now knew for certain that this precious pair were minded to get me out of the syndicate and divide the proceeds of our enterprise by two instead of three parts. And since this was the state of affairs it was just as well to know it.

So I stared him in the face a while, as though weighing his words, and presently let go of him with a laugh, and said if that had been so it was all right, and I begged his pardon.

"Granted, mate," he replied, "but, Lord love you, what a fellow you are to suspect a friend. Why, what should I gain by murdering you, do you suppose?"

"Well now, upon my life it struck me that you might be doing it for the sake of a bit of extra gain," I laughed, "but I see, now I think of it, that it couldn't have been that, for a third part of the value of this little Glory of Rajpore will keep a man nicely for the rest of his days without his having to murder a friend to make it a half!"

"Why, that's the very truth, my son!" said Jake heartily, "and you go and suspect an innocent party of a crime he'd scorn to commit, and hadn't had no idea of committing. It's too bad."

"Well, shake hands on it!" I said. "It's all right now," and so I shook hands with my would-be murderer, knowing him to be so, but making belief I had no suspicion; and presently, having left the place as tidy and clean as we had found it, and the big Joss grinning away as complacently, with the dummy in his forehead, as though he still wore the Eye of the Sun there, we took our departure and got safely home to quarters with our big prize in hand.

I spent the remaining portion of that night in pondering deeply upon my position. I may say that I honestly wished to Heaven that I was out of the whole business with its horrible tale of dishonesty and crime and the detestable evil conscience that attended such things. But in it I was and in it I must remain, and since I could not escape the disagreeables of the position, I was determined that I would see to it that I reaped my fair share of the advantages of it.

Now I was convinced before everything that Jake's ultimate intention in this matter was to have the entire profit to himself, and that he would either rid himself of me or of my company as a preliminary step to that end, and I racked my brain to devise some plan by which to defeat his projects, as I understood them.

The upshot of my cogitations was an odd one. I visited the bazaar on the following morning and bought a second fac-simile of the Eye of the Sun.

One Sinner Repenteth.

We paused upon a ledge of rock and looked down into the valley. A beautiful valley looked away from the great world by mellow ranges of encircling hills. Soft symphonies in colour, chain upon chain they rose and linked themselves with the uncertain blue of east and west. Green meadow slopes led to a shining upland, bright with autumn's harvest.

As we seated ourselves upon the trunk of a tree, felled by lightning in a recent storm, Charles Dysart began this story:

"Three years since my wife and I wintered in the South of France; on our way home we stopped at Paris. The evening after our arrival we attended a ball given by friends at their new house in the Bois de Boulogne.

"The affair was notable: everyone of wit, wealth, birth or beauty was present; the drawing-rooms were thronged with representatives of every creed and clime. In the midst of this brilliant assemblage my wife was conspicuous for her loveliness, and her rare gifts of language drew about her a score of diplomats.

"Next morning, the papers contained elaborate descriptions of the function and dwelt with admiration upon my wife's dress—her jewels inspired especial comment.

"I laid aside my paper and looked out of the window. My eye rested upon the tender green of early budding trees. The spirit of spring was everywhere—it seemed to tincture my very soul—and there came upon me a longing to leave the town.

"'Louise,' I said, 'let us spend the day at St. Cloud.' She acquiesced with an almost childish show of pleasure, and soon we were on our way to the lovely spot.

"The end of a happy day found us back in the capital, aglow with happiness. Something, however, followed, close upon our return, which diverted our thoughts.

"We found our apartment as we had left it. The morning papers lay in confusion upon the table, our books and other paraphernalia were undisturbed.

"As we contemplated dining out, my wife at once went to her room to prepare her toilet. She was slightly fatigued and said, as she left me:

"'I dislike to wait upon myself; it was a mistake to send Alphonsine on ahead;' and I was coward enough to answer:

"'I told you so.'

"Then she left me with reproach written upon her face, and I picked up some unanswered letters with a determination to do my duty. In a few moments I was aroused from my task by a stifled scream. I hurried to the door crying:

"'What is the matter?'

"Louise stood in the centre of her room, pale and trembling, scattered about her in all directions lay the contents of two empty trunks.

"'My jewels!' she gasped.

"'What of them?'

"'They are all gone!'

"For a moment I stood transfixed and mute before her.

"My memory is not quite clear as to what we did during the ensuing hour. Of course, we summoned the manager of the hotel, who behaved very well and offered to do all in his power to facilitate the recovery of our chattels.

"He, however, pointed out the fact that we had neglected to deposit our valuables in the safe which the hotel provided for that purpose, and called our attention to notices to that effect in all the rooms of our suite. He declared that the hotel could not be held responsible. The notice of our loss was sent to police headquarters, and detectives were immediately set to work upon the case.

"Louise and I were late for dinner. The evening was a blank to me.

"The remaining days of our sojourn we devoted to seeking our belongings. A suitable reward was offered and a description of the missing trinkets telegraphed to all parts of the country, but at every point the police were baffled, and in the end we came away without a clue or the least hope of recovering our property.

"A month later I was seated in my den in Park Lane when the butler informed me that a man wished to see me.

"'His card,' I said absently, not raising my eyes from the magazine before me.

"'If you please, sir, he is not the kind that would have a card, sir.'

"'A beggar?'

"'Looks like it, sir.'

"'Why did you let him in? Have I not told you that I cannot receive such people?'

"'I did not let him in, he said he would wait upon the steps.'

"'It is impossible for me to see him, Caulkins. In future you must be more careful.'

"'But he seems very anxious and worried, and says that you alone can save his soul, sir.'

"'Distress,' I exclaimed, flinging the book from me, realising with impatience the feeling of selfishness which had at first prompted me to turn him from the door—'distress shall always find a friend in me.' I advanced to the hall, bidding Caulkins admit the man.

"He came in, shuffling and shy. He was undersized and ill-favoured, having a motley collection of strangely assorted features. He wore shabby clothes of the coarsest make. When he spoke I was struck with the singular beauty of his voice, which was refined and musical, like a skilfully-tuned stringed instrument.

"'Pardon me for intruding upon you,' he began, 'I come to make a sad heart happy by giving to a worthy man his own.'

"His words surprised me.

"'What do you want?' I asked.

"'To speak with you alone.'

"There was a persuasive quality in the tone that made his request a command.

"I assented, and led him into the billiard-room. When he entered, he looked hurriedly around him with a mistrustful glance, then he abruptly closed the door and locked it.

"'May I examine the cupboards?' he asked, slowly and sweetly, like an obedient child suing for some trifling indulgence.

"I was too stupefied to reply. He opened the cupboards, inspected them, and then investigated the wide fireplace, after which he seemed entirely satisfied.

"'Mr. Dysart,' he said, 'now that we are alone I can speak. I feared to approach the subject before any one, as it is of a purely confidential character.'

"He leant forward with both arms upon the billiard-table and looked at me very earnestly. I then noticed that there were tears glistening in his eyes.

"'Mr. Dysart, I am—a thief.'

"My heart throbbed violently, not from fear, but from a sensation of poignant pain which his voice awakened. The announcement ended in a muffled sob. Instinctively I murmured: 'Poor soul.'

"'Thank you, God bless you, for those words!' The way in which he uttered this would have softened a stone.

"'I have come to you, because you are honoured among men, because in my darkness, in the depths of evil, I have watched your unselfish devotion to mankind; and for years I have longed to come once, face to face with you and pour out my soul. Others have tried to help me, but they have failed. Their narrow charity and intolerant virtue stung into life my worst passions, and rebellious, unredeemed, I left them—still a sinner.'

"His voice broke with emotion.

"'Charles Dysart, you can save me. Listen: I was born in a hillside hamlet of Berkshire, on an old farm where my people for generations had dwelt in peace and consecrated their simple lives to honest toil. I was one of many children, and my boyhood was mainly spent in taking honey to market, as my father owned an apiary. I suppose you never heard of Silverdeen honey? Ah! it was sweet as innocence! I was a shiftless lad and wayward, but never wicked. When I was sixteen my father died, and some of us went to work. That was the beginning of the end. A country lad, I came to the city to get employment, and I went to the bad. Evil companions, bad examples, and my own weak nature, have made me what I am.'

"Here a violent cough seized him, and when he had succeeded in controlling it he was pale from the wrenching he had sustained. In acknowledgment of some proffered remedy, he smiled faintly and said:

"'Oh, no matter about the cough, it is an old story. I have a weak lung.'

"After a pause he went on. 'My mother is still living, and I want to see her—you can't know how much I long to hear her voice. She is very old and blind, and she has prayed all these years that her lost sheep might be found. Some weeks ago I wrote to the postmaster and asked for news of her. His answer made me wish to go home, for in it he said—he is a good man and verger of the old church where I prayed as a child—"There is joy in the presence of the angels over one sinner that repenteth."'

"I went forward and held out my hand. 'Let me be a friend to you,' was all I could say. There was a strange yearning look in the man's face, as he checked his impulse to take my hand, replying: 'Don't tempt me. I cannot take your hand until I have earnt the right to touch it, and I have not yet finished my story.

"'Six weeks ago you were in Paris. I stole your wife's jewels.' His voice rang out in a plaint, then silence fell between us. When he spoke again, it was thus:

"'Your wife lost a diamond and sapphire bracelet, an emerald ornament for the hair, a watch crusted with brilliants, two stars and a crescent of diamonds, a dragon fly of opals, a pendant of turquoise and a pearl necklace of seven strings. My partner, Slim Sanxy, and I took them. It was a big haul and we managed it with professional finish. Some second-rate bunglers would have taken the traps out of the city, but we knew they were safer in Paris. Some novices would have picked out the stones, but we realised that the pieces were more valuable intact, and that time would make it possible to pawn or ship them. In all this we showed the skill, born of good training.

"'We divided the spoil; I got the whole kit except the necklace, which more than balanced the rest. Slim has a weakness for pearls, and he cheated me in that deal. While you had the best detective talent of half-a-dozen cities at work, your jewels were lying in a little trunk in a back attic in the Rue Garrol. The pearl necklace is still there. I have quarrelled with Slim and we have dissolved partnership. We were a celebrated firm, Sanxy and Meridan. Some of the small pieces of jewellery are here in town, the others are in a Safe Deposit in Manchester, so I can't restore them to-day. I will fetch you the watch and bracelet in half-an-hour, and everything else shall be given back before I am a week older. I ask nothing from you, I only beg you to help me to be an honest man in future.'

"He was out of breath from his rapid recitation and another fit of coughing came upon him. Bewildered as I was I found voice to say:

"'I will help you. Bring me back the bracelet if you can, my wife values it more than all the rest of her ornaments. I gave it to her when we were engaged.'

"'I knew,' he sighed. 'I saw the inscription inside of it, "Louise from Charles." I once had a sweetheart of my own, and, had she lived, I would have been a better man.'

"'The necklace, can I recover that also?'

"'Yes, telegraph to Scotland Yard for a man to go to 87, Lockspur Street, and ask for Casper Meridan—that's my name—Meridan will not be in, then ask for Slim Sanxy. If he is out, let the officer go to the back attic—the house is only three storeys—and in the back room, under the bed, he will find a little trunk with one hinge off and a broken lock; round it is tied a thin rope, knotted in six places. In the bottom of the trunk is a newspaper package which contains the case of pearls.'

"'You say you can get the bracelet and watch to-day?'

"'Yes, here are the pawn tickets.' He drew them from his pocket.

"'Have you the money to redeem them?'

"'Not at present.'

"'How much do you need?'

"'Ten pounds. I can get that amount from my friend Wilkes late this afternoon.'

"'But I want my wife to have her bracelet as soon as possible. I will give you the money.'

"'I cannot accept your offer. Remember, Mr. Dysart, I am a thief by my own confession.' I handed him the money.

"'I will be back in half-an-hour.'

"As he unlocked the door he turned, and, noting some half defined expression on my face, burst into tears, then he laid the money upon the billiard table.

"'I see you don't trust me,' he cried his voice husky from humiliation. 'Take back the money, I will leave you the tickets, and you can send one of your servants for the things.'

"The man groaned aloud: 'Charles Dysart, you do not trust me,' the words vibrated through the room like an accusation and I felt like a criminal before his judge.

"'Good-bye,' he added, hurrying into the hall.

"I followed him in haste and drew him back into the room. In my heart rang the sweet old text, and, as I laid my hand upon Meridan's wrist, I whispered:

"'"There is joy in the presence of the angels over one sinner that repenteth." I have confidence in you, and I insist upon your taking the money. I will try to help you to a better future. Bring my wife's things here in half-an-hour, I will wait for you. I shall also telegraph to Scotland Yard. I believe everything that you have told me.'

"A look of great joy overspread his face and for a moment the whole man seemed transfigured. Reverently he took my hand and touched it with his lips. Then he murmured: '"There is joy in the presence of the angels over one sinner that repenteth."'

"The music of the words will linger in my memory for ever.

"When he was gone I told all to Louise and we fell to making plans for his redemption.

"The clock struck—our half-hour was over.

"An hour went by and still we waited. The shadows deepened and waned.

"At eight o'clock Meridan had not returned. Torn by conflicting emotions, I passed the night between doubt and belief, between hope and fear; at heart despising myself for my lack of faith.

"In the morning I decided to call at Scotland Yard. The Inspector received me in his private office, blandly smiling and politely interested. I related to him in detail every incident of the previous day.

"When I had finished, not a muscle of his face betrayed his thoughts. He rose and walked to a cabinet, from the second drawer of which he took a photograph. Handing it to me, he said pleasantly:

"'That is your man.'

"'Yes.'

"'Robert Bolton, aged forty-one, a native of Lancashire. One of the most audacious rogues in Great Britain. Commonly known as Silvertongue.'"

Frederico's Revenge.

Under the cherry trees, hung with their red and scarlet spheres, the stranger cantered his tired steed wearily. He inhaled the sweet fragrance of the berries with the subtle aroma of long-dry meadows moistened by recent rain. A dreamy breeze stirred the leafage and shook down sundry of the ripest fruit to the soft grass at his horse's feet. The inharmonious notes of the locusts and katydids mingled in chorus in his ears.

At the laburnum tree near the gate the stranger tethered his horse, and lifting the latch, passed in under the white sprays of the Cherokee roses with a sigh. His smooth black hair and piercing eyes—fine still, in spite of his forty years—his flowing moustache and rather ostentatious attire proclaimed him a Spaniard, and being a Spaniard, it irked him to exert himself so near the hour of siesta. But there was that in his mind that overcame his lassitude, though the house he approached through the avenue of laurels was in fair Virginia, and it was the month of June.

In the open space before the door, where a low chair was tilted tenantless against a tree, he hesitated a moment and felt for something in the breast pocket of his bright-buttoned coat. There was a sharp "click," that scared away one or two of the fowls feeding there, and reassured, he went up the two stone steps.

The door stood ajar, but was hastily drawn open as his foot scraped the top flag, and a girl in cool white and blue stood in his way.

"What do yuh want hyar?" she asked somewhat aggressively.

The weary caballero stood still a full minute before he framed words in answer. Never before had he seen such lustrous eyes, such a delicate olive face, so handsome a head of hair. Never? Yes once—years ago—he had seen a face like that, the very reflex of that, though scarcely quite so fair—seen it and loved it. The fire of a sudden animation awoke in him.

"Is Señor Harding at home? I have a wish to see him," he finally said.

"He iz mendin' hiz hay-ricks tuh-day, sir," replied the girl, eyeing the handsome stranger curiously, while she deftly twined a red sash round her waist. "but ef yuh pertticklerly want tuh see him, yuh kin wait. Yuh kin sit thya', while I tidy." And she pointed to an old rocker opposite the window.

Without another word she bustled about her "tidyin'" duties, flitting about the large room with a certain easy grace and anon stealing sidelong glances at the stranger. His eyes followed her everywhere, and when her shapely little head came in the path of the pattern of light that crept in between the fluttering clematis of the window, she looked so radiantly lovely that the visitor half repented of his errand.

The old-fashioned clock announced noisily that half-an-hour had gone, and the girl busied herself laying a white cloth on the table and bringing out the dinner, and he saw, with a vague wonder, that she set out three plates, and placed a knife and fork and spoon by each.

"Dad'll not be long now," she vouchsafed him abruptly. "I'll call him."

She went to the doorway and trilled out: "Coo-ee! Coo-ee!" in a sweet if penetrating voice. "I reckon that'll bring him hyar, moughty quick!" she said.

The stranger, regarding her southern, almost Spanish beauty, with very open admiration, said slowly:

"Creo mio!—believe me—no man could decline a summons from one so fair!"

"Yuh're tol'able complimentry, stranger," she laughed, not ill-pleased, "but I ain't s'posin' yuh think compliments ez new to me?"

Federico Vadés comprehended her full Virginian idiom perfectly. It reminded him—as did her face, her eyes, her rich brown throat—of a time long past, a bitter-sweet amour upon the plaza of a house in far Seville.

"Of course not, Señorita," he said, in his best English, "your beauty commands it from men, as it must provoke envy in women. But is that not the padre—Señor Harding?"

"Hyar he iz—en dead tired, too; ain't yuh, dad?"

"That's so, honey," broke in a strong masculine voice. "Fyah tired out, en ready for a glimpse of your pret'y face, en a taste of dinner."

The iron-grey man—old in work and worry, if not in years—picturesque in his soft felt hat, rough suit, and cowhide boots, had got thus far in his observations when he caught sight of the stranger—who had risen and stood with hand in his pocket—on the opposite side of the table. He started violently, as though the car of memory had jogged suddenly over a deep rut in life's road, and looked keenly at the unbidden guest. His hand sought his hip pocket, and on his face was something like the queer expression on the other man's.

He was silent awhile, and the Spaniard never spoke while the girl glanced from one to another in surprise. At last his lips moved, and he said deliberately:

"So yuh've found me out, hev yuh? Well, yuh know Eph Hardin'—you did know him"—with a grim relaxing of the features—"en you don' expect Ephraim Hardin' tuh go back on eny trouble ov his own creatin'?"

The tone, though low, was one of concentrated earnestness, and the last syllables conveyed a defiance, a menace.

A red flush mounted to the Spaniard's brow, and his arm moved as though he would withdraw his hand. He caught the girl's swift glance upon him, and paused, irresolute, unnerved.

"Why don' yuh speak?" asked Harding. "Yuh may ez well get through with what yuh hev tuh say, en let me sit down."

"You know well what I might say," replied the stranger significantly. "I have not come all the way from España (Spain) for a little purpose. I was accounted a good marksman in the army twenty-five years ago."

"So yuh wuz," said old Eph, recovering his usual complacency and helping himself to bacon and greens as he sat down. "So yuh wuz, ef I 'member right. As fur that, Eph Hardin' wuz never reckoned a slouch when shootin' wuz concerned. Eph Hardin' hez been reckoned considrabul smart as a shooter—cert'n'y."

The quiet assumption of superiority implied in this speech nettled the other, and with a Spanish oath he drew something bright and shining from his coat and laid it on the cloth before him.

"If you have one to match that," he said, "we will finish our disagreement now and have done with it. I would have shot you like a dog as you came in, but for your daughter here—she is so much like her mother. For her sake we will fight our quarrel fairly."

Quick as lightning Ephraim whipped his revolver out and laid it opposite the other.

"Thank yuh fur nothin!" he said. "Ef yuh hadn't been so pow'ful dil't'ry, I shud hev plugged yuh orf ez soon ez I seen yuh—what's that fur, Evely?"

For the girl, pallid-faced and wide-eyed, had sprung forward and placed one hand on each implement of death.

"Yuh've no right to fight hyar, before me," she cried. "Leastways, 'thout tellin' me the why and wherefore ov it."

"Yease, honey, yuh're right. Yuh shud know. En ef yuh kin wait, señor, I'll tell her now. Its cert'n'y pertickler she shud know."

The other nodded; his eyes once more wandered to Eveline's southern features and furry hair. She rose from the table and went and stood with her hands behind her in the dappled sun and shadow of the window.

Harding slowly laid down his knife and fork and twisted round his chair. Then he cleared his throat once or twice.

"Yuh remember yo' mother, Evely? Yuh remember how sweet she wuz—jes' like yo'self, darter?"

Eveline acquiesced quickly.

"En yuh kyarnt rec'lect me being bad in no way, Evely? Yuh don' know enybody ez kin p'int tuh enythin' ez old Eph Hardin's done ez he oughter be 'shamed ov, do yuh? Yuh kyarnt say ez I've ever been mean, kin yuh?" asked Ephraim confidently.

"No dad," said the girl, wondering what connection there was between the two queries. "Yuh've aluz been straight, yuh've never been a crook."

"No, yuh never heard of Eph Hardin' bein' mean, Evely—neyther yuh nor enybody else hyar hez heard that. But I wuz mean once, en it wuz fur yo' mother's sake, honey. Don't shift from where yuh are, Evely—yuh look jes' like her, so,—en I'll tell yuh how it wuz.

"It's a long time back now, when I wuz a foolish young cub, en had been sent out tuh Yewrope tuh see the sights. It wuz gettin' time fur to come home, en I had fetched up in sleepy Seville — Sayveelyay, they call it thyar—whah yo' mother wuz bawn. She was of'en at a house whah I visited, en this hyar young fellar—he wuz young, then, yuh mind—wuz engaged to mah'y her when she came ov age.

"I don' know how it wuz, but I envid him at ferst, en then I came tuh lovin' her, en the thing wuz done. She loved me, as yuh know, honey, but dar'n't go agenst her folks while Federico held her tuh her bond, en nacherally I wuzn't goin' tuh allow ez a Yankee shud give in tuh a lazy Spaniard ez wuz fit for nothin' only tuh sit under orange trees and smoke cig'rettes from sun-up till owl-time. It riled me, darter, tuh think ov, en besides, tho' I wuz young, I loved yo' mother 'nough fur twice my age."

Ephraim paused a moment, reflectively. He was outwardly as unmoved now as though he was alone with the white-clay pipe he twirled in his fingers with the deftness born of long habit.

"I've never tol' this tuh enybody befo', en I don' like it now," he pursued slowly, "but I s'pose it hez tuh be done. Well, tuh make it short, I pertended for a while tuh be indifferent tuh yo' mother an' great pards with Federico hyar, so's I could find out somethin' about him ez wud give me a lead in gettin' him outer my way. En I hadn't long tuh wait fur that somethin'. I found ez he wuz a big polertishun—a Republican—en wuz plottin' agenst the crown, en so—but shuh, darter, yuh kin see now what I did, sure-ly?"

"Yuh split on him tuh the Guv'n'ment, so's he got impris'n'd, en then, hidin' yo' part in it, yuh came express tuh hyar with yo' wife—with mother."

"Hit's right good guessin', is yo's, Evely! Hit's jes' what I did, en since then till now I've never seen nor heard of Federico hyar."

"En now he's cum—en about time he did come!" said Evely, carried away by her strong sense of justice. Her father was silent.

"Now you know why I am here, señorita," said Vadés, impatiently. "It is time we ceased talking, and came to deeds. I have suffered long and bitterly, and travelled far to find your father out, and my horse is waiting at the gate. I have sworn to have vengeance on the man who has ruined my life, and we Spaniards never forego a revenge."

His hands clutched the revolver. His fingers rested on the trigger. Old Ephraim made a swift move as though to raise his weapon, too, as he left his chair, then suddenly let his hand fall, and stood there motionless, not speaking. Federico Vadés levelled his weapon full at his adversary's heart; the muscles of his face contracted grimly.

"Yuh sharn' kill him, stranger!" cried the girl. her love reviving in an impulse. "Yuh sharn' kill him 'thout killin' me ez well. He's my father, en my mother loved him—en tol' me to take kyar ov him fur her sake. Yuh kyarnt tuch him now!"

Her strong arms were round the old man's waist; her pulsing form betwixt him and the threatening death.

"Don't make me look a fule, gyrl," said Ephraim angrily, struggling with her. "I'm one to stand up fur my own misdoin's. Lemme go, honey"—in a softer tone—"Yuh kin arsk Federico hyar whether he'll be likely to st›p shootin' fur yuh."

A day ago the Spaniard would have ridiculed the suggestion that he would have felt any qualms in such a position. Now he hesitated, muttered indistinctly, dropped his right hand, and stepped back a pace.

"I can wait," he said sullenly, folding his arms.

Eveline disengaged herself from her shame-faced parent and regarded the stranger curiously.

"What 'ud yuh say ef I cud tell yuh how to have yo' revenge 'thout killin' dad—en me?" she asked. "Ef yuh cud take somethin' from him ez he kyars fur more than his life?"

The man returned her gaze steadily, thought a moment, and decided:

"If I could do that, señorita," he said, "it would be a keener pleasure, if there is anything that——"

There came a queer gleam—an admixture of self-abnegation and mirth—into the girl's clear, round eyes, and her red lips framed the words:

"Yuh'll mah'y me, en take me away. Yuh're in love with me now, else yuh'd have fired."

Her face was radiant, she was altogether lovely—the very image of her mother. Federico stepped forward, letting his revolver fall from his nerveless fingers. He drew closer and took her hand, and as she bent towards him, kissed her on the lips.

"As you say, Evely. You are dearer to me than his own life. Come, my horse is waiting."

The girl took his hand without a tremour, and followed him into the sun-glare of the doorway. The iron-grey man left by the table neither moved nor spoke until their shadows fell across the white-flagged floor to his feet. It was all so sudden, so entirely unforeseen.

"Say, Federico," he said, turning quickly, "hit's scarcely so pertic'ler that yuh take Evely 'thout her dinner. Kyarnt yuh wait a few minnits—bein' ez we're quits?"

His voice was steady yet, but there was a suspicious glisten on the lower lids of his eyes.

He spoke to Vadés, but he was looking past him at his daughter. Señor Vadés looked into her face likewise, read consent there, and turned back into the room.

"Yes, Ephraim," he said. "I can wait now I find revenge so very sweet!"

Harding grew even graver than his wont, and the hard lines on his forehead puckered into painful distinctness.

"This iz all very well," he said "but I want to arsk yuh each a questyen. En answer me straight, both ov yuh, er things stands ez they did befo'. Do yuh love her, Federico, same's yuh loved her mother, same's I loved her?"

"Si, señor. She is her mother young again."

"En yuh, Evely, does yuh love him, same's yo' mother loved me?"

"Yes, dad."

"Yuh ain't playin' with me, darter? It's a fac'?"

"Yes, dad. I'm ready tuh mah'y him when the hay's got in."

Ephraim was satisfied. Even a katydid cleaning its long thin legs on the window-sill, escaped his usually ruthless fingers.

"Yuh cert'n'y air sweet, sugar," he said, seizing her hand and drawing her towards him. "Yuh air. But yuh ain't goin' from hyar tuh-day, nor tuh-morrer, ef I guess right. Yo' dad'll be thya' when yuh air wed, er there'll be some moughty pow'ful ructions in this part ov old Virginy!—En yuh ain't goin' jes' yet, son-in-law prespective!" he added.

Nor did Federico. Sounds of quiet talk and sundry peals of laughter came from the house at intervals the rest of the day, and later, the glow of lamplight through the warm red curtains. The sun went down without the silence of the avenue of laurels being broken by the noise of horse-hoofs on the soft grass, and it was quite dark when the pointers of the Great Bear, shining through a rift in the breaking night-clouds, saw the Caballero come out to feed and stable his weary steed, and then go in again, bolting the door behind him.

on Jubilee Day; of that there can be little doubt. The crush in the streets will be tremendous, and as there is little possibility of your being able to obtain a vehicle from the station to the seat which you may have engaged, you will have to force your way through the seething mass.

The most sensible thing under the circumstances, therefore, will be for you to carry in your pocket a copy of Pearson's Weekly, dated June 26th, with the special insurance coupon signed. Then, in the unhappy event of your meeting with a fatal accident, your next of kin will receive £100, which is the amount guaranteed by the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation, Limited.

This valuable number of the paper will be published on Friday, June 18th, and will contain full particulars of the conditions under which the claims will be met.

It goes without saying that you, yourself, will not disregard this advice. Do your friends who are going to the Jubilee procession in London a good turn by telling them about this.

CHAPTER XI.

A VERIFIED SUSPICION.

FROM the kitchen came a cheerful clatter of tea-things as Betty arranged them upon the tray. Aunt Shales pricked up her ears at the sound, sucking in her full lips as she watched Diana's pale face.

"As you knows," said she, "them di'monds was stole from that po'r Mrs. Lealter two nights ago, an' a sore way she was in, as you may have read in the paper. An' them there bank-notes belongs to Mrs. Caffyn, an' must have been stole when she was at The Towers, for I read the numbers in the paper an' cut 'em out jest for cur'osity like, an' they tallies ev'ry one, for I counted 'em the minit as I see them di'monds."

"Where is—Mr. Gillway?" Di asked. Oh, it was possible that he might be able to explain his possession of these inculpating things, she thought with a passionate fervour that would have surprised her had she been capable of analysing her emotions just then.

"Ah, that I couldn't tell; no, not if you was to drag me up hill an' down dale with wild horses, an' pay me in untold gold. All I knows is as he didn't come home las' night, an' me a-waitin' up till nigh on ten by the kitching clock for him, an' I ain't set eyes on him to-day, not as there's anythink surprisin' in that, seein' as he thinks nothin' of stoppin' out nearly ev'ry night in the week, as you may say, an' lets hisself in with one of them there lash keys, as I never did abide, an' never shan't, for if you drops off to sleep how can you tell when anybody as has one o' they things comes home, an' some folks 'ud take advantidge o' that an' swear as they come in early by the clock, an' not bein' what you'd call a light sleeper, havin' so many worrits in the day, I never did know when he come in, an' that's the Gospel truth, Miss Di, an' glad 'nough he must have felt that that Em'ly slep' so sound as well as me, an' I feels that thankful, too, for you may depend upon it he'd have thought nothin' o' murderin' that po'r gal an' me in our blessed beds if we'd a sin him comin' home with his pockets all stuffed out with gold and di'monds, an' his arms full of brick-brackt!" said Aunt Shales, delivering herself of the last word with an air of consequence, and inwardly proud of the memory which enabled her to add bric-à-brac to the various gleanings she had gathered from newspaper descriptions of robberies and weddings.

"Aunt Shales," said Di. "Have you shown these things to anyone but me, or spoken about them to anybody?"

Aunt Shales blinked at the ceiling, at the glowing fire, and the snowdrops upon the table. Her little twinkling eyes looked at everything but at Di.

"Lawks!" she answered. "As if I should. 'Tain't likely as I'd let on to folks about what I looks on as a personal disgrace."

"I am so glad you think like that. I wouldn't say anything. Mr. Gillway may be able to explain their presence in his desk, and if he can, it would be very unpleasant for you if he heard that you had shown them to people, and had talked about them, and that in consequence people regarded him as a—a thief," said Di, the ugly word sticking in her throat.

Aunt Shales looked serious, and wrinkled her grey eyebrows.

"You see," continued Di. "We have no proof that Mr. Gillway has stolen these things. He may have a proof that he has not."

"He'd have to give the p'lice a good big proof," said Aunt Shales with reviving energy. "Seein' as I found 'em in his very own desk; oh, I did, an' if I was put to tortures like any of them po'r marters I couldn't say no diff'rent, not if I tried till I was black in the face, never having had no practice in lyin'."

As Aunt Shales spoke of the police, a cold thrill ran down Di's back. What if they were already upon John Gillway's track? she thought, suddenly remembering the smooth-voiced little man who had questioned her about the tenant of Honeypots Farm.

"When I called at the farm this morning I went to see you. I found a gentleman in the yard. He spoke of being an old friend of Mr. Gillway's, and he wanted apartments"—Di began. Aunt Shales interrupted her in excitement:

"There! If our Poll didn't up an' tell me as she'd seen him a-hangin' about agin. Not as I dares speak after Poll, for if ever there was a twin sister to Sapphiry, it's our Poll! Wanted 'partments, did he? That's jest what he tried to make out as he wanted afore. Shortish and thinnish, an' with eyes like gimlets?" and as Di nodded, Aunt Shales added: "Oh, it's him, right 'nough. How I do wish as I'd seen him. I'd a 'partmented him! He didn't show you the photograph of Mr. Gillway, did he, Miss Di?" and upon Di answering in the negative, Aunt Shales proceeded to give a glowing account of the stranger's visit to the farm, relating with keen enjoyment how her master had taken down a horsewhip to the man, and had given him to understand that he was trying to "give up bein' a thief," and would brook with no interference; "which sounds as though at one time he didn't keep his fingers none too straight, as our Poll said to me then and there."

"You are quite sure that he said he was trying to give up being a thief?"

"As sure as eggs is eggs, an' I dunno who could be surer than that. What they said to each other out of my hearin', I can't answer for, an' wouldn't; but 'pend upon it, that there 'partment man knows some'ut dark about Mr. Gillway. Why!" exclaimed Aunt Shales, struck all at once with a brilliant idea, and opening her little eyes to their fullest extent. "He might have bin a detective in disguise!"

She was so overcome with the awfulness of this thought that her mouth remained open as she stared fixedly at Di.

"All clean-shaved, too!" she added jerkily. "The very picture of one in the P'lice News! An' to think as that Poll was right!"

"You don't know that she is right. The gentleman spoke of being a friend of Mr. Gillway's family."

"An' a friend as they'd be on'y too glad to do without!" declared Aunt Shales in evident pity for Di's seeming simplicity. "Friend, indeed! As much a friend as the hangman is to them as he puts the halter round their po'r necks, you may be sure of that. Oh, I see'd what he was, Miss Di, the d'rectly minute as I clapped eyes on him. He couldn't take me in an' do for me, an' Mr. Gillway, too! Many's the time as I've said to friends when they're dropped in for a cup of tea, as there was some'ut hid up about him. I never do trust people as locks up everythink. As I says, it don't look square an' open like, do it, now? An' him that gloomy! There, livin' right in front of a fillin' up fast cemet'ry, couldn't have bin no gloomier; an' knowed no more about farmin' than my best bonnet!" she said conclusively, as though this ignorance on the part of John Gillway was a proof of his wickedness.

Di opened the letter with trembling fingers.

As Di looked in deep distress at the bank-notes upon the table, Aunt Shales gave a quick jerk of her head over her shoulder, started, and cried:

"Lawk's! If I didn't think as I'd heard somethink, an' my heart right up in my mouth as you may say, with the fright of it, sir."

The cause of her fright was the Nabob; a very pale, dejected-looking Nabob, whose attempt at smiling was a sorry failure, though his pleasant voice had a cheerful ring as he said:

"I'm awfully sorry, Mrs. Shales, for alarming you. I only wonder that you didn't find me out before. I came into the room some time ago; I've heard nearly everything. Let me look at the things, may I?"

"'Course you may, sir. You can look at 'em till you're blind with starin,'" replied Aunt Shales very affably, and dropping a flurried curtesy, but eyeing the young man rather severely. She might be guilty of listening at keyholes herself, but that did not lessen her contempt for others who did the same.

"Oh, Bernard," cried Di, "I am so glad you have come. What are we to do? Ought Aunt Shales to replace these things in Mr. Gillway's desk?"

"For them p'lice to find 'em, an' me to lose my character, Miss Di! Not me! I brought 'em here, thinkin' as you'd take care of 'em. I couldn't get a wink of sleep if I know'd that they was in the house!" exclaimed Aunt Shales.

"But when Mr. Gillway returns he will miss them."

"Seein' as they don't belong to him he's got no right to cry over their loss," retorted Aunt Shales. "Have he now, sir?"

"No. I think," said the Nabob, after he had examined the pendant and the bank-notes, "that your best plan is to keep perfectly silent upon this matter, Mrs. Shales. If you talk of your discovery, you will certainly get into trouble. A man like your master will spare no means to clear himself. If he can throw his guilt upon you, he will. You wouldn't like to find yourself in a police cell?"

"Me in a p'lice cell! Goodness gracious, sir, you can't mean it?"

"I should be very sorry to see you there, but a great many innocent people do get placed there. If John Gillway finds that you have betrayed him, his first wish will be to injure you, out of revenge, you know. He will accuse you of being his accomplice, and how are you to prove that you are not?"

"But, Bernard, the fact of her bringing these things to me would clear her of any complicity in the robberies," said Di, as Aunt Shales gasped and remained speechless.

"He will say that she knew the police were after them, and that she pretended innocence, and acted the part of betrayer in order to clear herself. Didn't you say that you had seen a man who appeared to be a detective, at the farm? John Gillway may declare that the fact of that man being there induced Mrs. Shales to hurry here to Miss Strange with these proofs of his guilt."

"An' me more innocent than a' unborn lamb!" ejaculated Aunt Shales, quivering with indignation.

"That will have to be proved; anyhow, I'll stake all I have upon one thing: talk of your discovery and you'll get into prison, Mrs. Shales. You may come out cleared from the charge, but the stigma of having been implicated in the robberies will cling to you as long as you live. Your friends alone will believe in your innocence!"

Aunt Shales sank into a chair and clasped her hands together in dismay. The picture of her future, as the Nabob drew it, filled her with alarm. Mentally she began to review her friends, and picked out from the number those who would certainly rejoice in her downfall from the very high pedestal of respectability upon which she had stood herself. To appear in a "police case" as a criminal! She, Ann Shales! And no doubt, her portrait would be given in the weekly supplement of the papers! Her little fat hands grew quite moist with perspiration.

"The best thing to do," continued the Nabob, watching Aunt Shales with bright, watchful eyes, "is for all of us to act as if we had never heard nor seen these things. I'll return them to their owners anonymously. That can do no harm, and will deliver you and Miss Strange from a dilemma. Mrs. Caffyn and Mrs. Lealter will believe that the robbers have returned the bank-notes because they were valueless to the thieves, and the pendant through some chivalrous feeling for its pretty owner. If Mr. Gillway returns, he will ask you no questions about the disappearance of these things from his desk. He will be too clever for that, and you can leave his employ, Mrs. Shales."

"An' on'y too thankful, sir!" said Aunt Shales, wiping her damp forehead with a very large cotton handkerchief. "To think as I——"

The entrance of Betty with the tea-tray caused her to pause, and to rise in a flutter. She refused to stay to tea, and departed in great haste, evidently with the intention of swearing those people to secrecy to whom she had shown the pendant and the bank-notes. Di heard her whispering to Betty in the kitchen.

"Why did you frighten her so, Bernard?" she asked.

The Nabob drew a letter from his pocket.

"Because I don't want the police to track that scoundrel down! Oh, not for his sake, don't think that, Di; it's for—Kitty's sake! I—I—read this—I found it in her desk."

Di opened the letter with trembling fingers. It contained few words:

I have gone away with the man I love. You never made me happy. KITTY.

CHAPTER XII.

DISHONOUR.

"I NEVER thought that Kitty would do that!" said the Nabob bitterly. "She didn't give me a long trial, did she, Di?"

He took the paper from her trembling fingers, folded it up, and made a movement to replace it in his breast pocket; but his face darkened as though some new idea had entered his brain with the touch of his fingers upon Kitty's letter. With a gesture that was full of disgust he crumpled it savagely in his hand, and tossed it into the glowing fire.

"There's the end of it for me," said he, when the letter had flared up and was reduced to black tinder. "But what will be the ending for Kitty? Shame and disgrace, and perhaps that scamp will leave her, the villain! Women like Kitty so soon lose their good looks. That man can never make her happy. She says I couldn't, did you read it, Di?—and how can he if I failed? I should have made her happy if he had given me a chance. Oh! Di, I daren't think about it, my brain feels on fire!"

He sank heavily into a seat, bowing his head, and hiding his face in his hands. Di saw his shoulders heave. She went to his side and very gently touched his hands with her cool, soft fingers.

"We must find her," she said. "Kitty must be brought back."

The Nabob sprang to his feet and laughed. It was the laugh of a man who felt himself to be impotent.

"Bring her back," he repeated. "You forget that she went away early last night. It was not nine when her maid bade her good-night. They went to London yesterday, be sure of that, and by this time they're on their way to America as man and wife. The scoundrel only waited to secure a good big haul before taking Kitty away." He walked to the window and returned to his seat. "Kitty will have her jewels again," said he in the same harsh, bitter tone. "The jewels that I gave her, and he stole! Do you remember Christmas Eve, Di, and his face at the conservatory window? I thought that he was after Kitty; I never dreamt he was after anything else. I wonder what he has done with your bracelet? Perhaps he'll give it to Kitty and she'll wear it."

Di's overcharged heart gave way. So much had happened in that long eventful day, that it seemed now as though she could bear no more. Her head drooped, and as the Nabob rose restlessly again from his seat, and turned to pace the room once more, perhaps with some bitter invective against Kitty or John Gillway upon his tongue, he saw the big tears slowly coursing down Di's pale cheeks.

"Don't cry," he said. "Don't. They're not worth it, Di."

She answered with a sob, so full of distress that the muscles of his set face twitched. As she put up one hand to her face, groping with the other for her pocket-handkerchief, the Nabob went quickly to her and took the hand that sought her pocket.

"I'll say no more about them, dear Di," he murmured in boyish contrition. "I'll only hope that he may make her happy."

"You must find them," she said through her tears.

"I'll try, but—I can't go about asking blunt questions at the station. I'll go to London and ask at the shipping offices. But if I do find them and Kitty refuses to come back to me, what am I to do? Sue for a divorce, and break the old dad's heart, Di?"

"No, no," she faltered, shaking her head.

"Let her go, and hope that some day she will return to me of her own free will."

"Would—would—you take her back?"

The Nabob dropped her hand, and resumed his uneasy walk from one end of the room to the other.

"No, by Jove, that I couldn't!" Di heard him mutter. "It would be an act of madness! People would laugh at me for a fool." The ornaments rattled upon the chiffonnier as he strode past it. "Put an advertisement in the leading dailies: 'To K. E.—Come back. All will be forgiven,' and feel in my heart that I could never kiss her lips or touch her hand, or look into her eyes without remembering. Would that be forgiveness? Or to start afresh, if she returned, to live separate lives beneath the same roof—that would feel to each of us that we were chained to a dead body. How could I take her back? Oh! my poor little Kitty! To think that I can speak like this of her. After all, she is that man's victim. He terrified her. Don't you remember how frightened she always was of him, Di? He has had a deadly revenge; it is upon her that it falls!"

Outside in the big yard they caught the sound of Farmer Strange's cheery voice as he gave directions to one of the farm hands. He had just returned from market. As Di heard the echo of his heavy boots in the kitchen, she rose to her feet, found her handkerchief, and hurriedly wiped her eyes.

"Dad mustn't know," she whispered, trembling from head to foot. "Help me to hide it from him. I am pale—I know I am. Is that better?"

She rubbed her cheeks violently with her hands, pinching them until two hectic spots burnt hotly beneath her eyes.

The Nabob nodded, picked up the roll of bank-notes and the jewel case, and thrust them into his coat pocket as Farmer Strange entered.

"I'm glad to see you, my boy," said he, stretching out a great cold hand to his son-in-law. "How's Kitty?"

"Jolly. She's gone away for a little while—on a visit to a friend's—she hadn't time to wish you good-bye, so I've come in her place."

"Ah, gone on a visit, is she?" said Farmer Strange, placing his broad back before the fire. "And why ain't you with her?"

There was nothing unusual in his tone; but the Nabob paled, and an uneasy expression flitted across his face.

"I am going to-morrow. Couldn't get off to-day. Wanted to send away all my valuables to the bank before going. Have you heard of the robbery at Mrs. Lealter's? Makes one feel a bit nervous. Kitty's grown no end timid since that affair at our own place, and now these other robberies have added to her fears. I'm afraid I shall have to give up The Towers. Luckily Lord Powers only let it to me for two years, so I shan't be much the loser."

"Where d'you think of going?"

"I hardly know. In fact, I haven't actually made up my mind about leaving The Towers, but I can see it will come to that."

"Kitty's looked poorly, of late," said Farmer Strange, rubbing his scrubby chin reflectively. "She wants the town air, does Kitty! Why don't you get a place at Leigh for her?"

"Too much of a town. I fancy she'd like a house near London, Richmond or Pangbourne," answered the Nabob.

He smiled at Di, who had seated herself at the table. "Have you got a cup for me, Di? Lots of cream, please, and not much sugar."

As he took the cup from her shaking fingers, and while her father was building up the fire, he whispered under cover of the clatter of the fire-irons:

"If she comes back, I'll take her, Di."

When the day was ended—that dreadful day that stood out for ever in the memory of Diana Strange, distinct and separate from every other day of her life—and she could go to her room without fear of awaking suspicion in her father, Di sat by the fire and went over every detail that she could remember in the story of Kitty and John Gillway.

Huddled in a white dimity-covered chair.

First, there had been the arrival of Gillway at Honeypots Farm, and the sensation that his white hands and gentlemanly appearance had caused. No one knew anything of his past; he had made no confidant, not even of Kitty, for Di had heard Kitty speak of the young farmer's reticence.

Poor Kitty! Did she know now what manner of man she had entrusted with her happiness? Then came the advent of the stranger, the man whom John Gillway had threatened with the whip. He must know the secret of Gillway's past.

And then Di thought of her first interview with Gillway after her return from Capri, and his bitter words about Kitty's faithlessness. He had told her that when he was struck, he returned the blow; harder if possible. That admission betrayed his revengeful disposition. Kitty's return followed, and her childish terror of the man she had deceived. Clearly Kitty had known that John Gillway did not easily forgive; her terror had not been unfounded.

But had not some better sentiment stirred in Gillway's heart when Di had asked him to see Kitty, and he had replied that he was afraid! She had shown him her contempt for this assertion. How wrong she had been. He had tried to draw back, and she had pushed him onward with her taunts. Perhaps he had gone to The Towers with the determination to be strong, and association with Kitty had stirred up his evil passions. He had questioned her about the people who would be at The Towers; of Kitty's jewels, and he had spoken of Lady Rivers' emeralds, wishing that some of them were in his possession. Why had he asked these questions unless it was with the idea of profiting by the information? She had seen him hiding about the grounds before the robbery had taken place.

There was the loss of the flour sacks from his granary, and his command to Aunt Shales to keep silence respecting that loss. The value of the sacks was slight; Di could think of no motive for his desire to keep the loss unknown except a fear that some connecting link might be formed to prove him the author of the robbery.

Then followed his gradual access of power over poor weak Kitty. Their stolen interviews culminating with her own last meeting with them, and Kitty's wish to confide some secret to her sister. Was that secret the arrangement that Gillway had made for taking Kitty away? It must have been, and Kitty, ever impulsive, volatile, and unthinking, would have told Di their plans for flight had not Gillway forbidden her to break silence.

"There is no need to make her unhappy yet; she must learn everything before long," he had said, speaking of Di; and again: "You will ruin us, Kitty, if you break silence until no harm can come of speech."

No other possible explanation of these words occurred to Di, and did not the subsequent event verify this theory? Kitty and John Gillway had gone away together; Di had read Kitty's admission to her husband, that she had thrown in her lot with the man she loved—with the man who loved her; with the man who was a thief! The pale moon, looking in at the window of Di's room, saw a crouching figure, huddled in a white dimity-covered chair staring into a dead fire, as long as it shed its light in that direction. There was only the moon to see, and only the stillness of night to hear the broken-hearted cry that fell once from Di's cold lips:

"Why are we punished so cruelly? Dear God, why?"

When the morning dawned she rose from her seat, stiff and aching with weariness and the uncomfortable position in which she had passed the long hours of the night, and bathed her face, and looked almost with a stranger's eyes at her pallid, haggard reflection in the glass. She had aged in the night. She would not have felt astonished had she discovered that her hair had turned grey.

Outdoors the birds were wishing each other good-morning in cheerful twitters, the ducks were already debating among themselves whether it was yet too early to walk to the pond, and the cocks had long warned all listening creatures that morning had come, and that it was time to throw off sloth and slumber and arise to the duties and pleasures and the cares that the day brings.

Then there came the rattling sound of pails, and the wheezy response of the yard-pump; the neighing of the horses as they recognised some familiar voice or step, and the plaintive "moo" of the cow, mingling with the "shur-shur" of the chaff-cutter.

Di went down the steep, narrow stairs, and opened the house door. It was still grey; but in the east a deep red flush, like a fog-veiled fire, told that the sun was rising.

"The sun will shine presently; it will be a fine day," she thought mechanically.

She closed the door, for the early air was cold, and with gentle courage and patient hope she began her morning duties. To herself she said once or twice, as she moved about the house:

"The sun will shine presently!" and there was comfort in the thought.

CHAPTER XIII.

A Mysterious Encounter.

The Nabob sent Di a letter from London two days later. His surmise that Kitty and John Gillway had left England immediately for America had been verified. he told her

The fugitives had sailed early upon the morning that Kitty was missing from home. They had booked their passages in the names of Mr. and Mrs. John Dark; the booking-clerk who had answered the Nabob's inquiries concerning the passengers had given an unmistakably accurate description of Kitty and her companion. There could be no error in believing that Mr. and Mrs. John Dark were the people whom the Nabob sought.

"There is nothing to do," wrote the Nabob, "but to wait. I feel sure that Kitty will return to me. When she comes she shall find that, if she has lost her husband, I am still her friend."

The servants were dismissed at The Towers; the butler and housekeeper not being able to procure immediate situations, gladly fell in with their master's suggestion that they should remain as caretakers until a better chance of establishing themselves at the head of another household occurred.

The Nabob gave the same excuse to his friends in the neighbourhood for his abrupt departure that he had given to Farmer Strange. His wife had accepted a pressing invitation to spend a month in Rome with some friends, and he was joining her. There was no telling when they would return. In all probability they would travel in Italy after bidding good-bye to their friends at Rome.

About a fortnight after the departure of the Nabob, Di received a letter from Mrs. Caffyn, telling her that her lost bank-notes had been returned to her.

"I wish they had kept the bank-notes—for the bank would have made good my loss—and given me my dear diamonds and those lovely moonstones. But that is a little too much to expect, isn't it? Give my love to Kitty. Tell her I'm off to Spain with the Costellos, and will write to her when I am settled."

Di felt grateful for this last piece of news. She had dreaded Mrs. Caffyn's comments upon Kitty's silence, and her demand for Kitty's address. In Spain, where the postal regulations are so lax, and eleven out of every twelve men employed have the seemingly well-merited reputation of being thieves, Mrs. Caffyn might not feel deeply concerned at getting no letters from Kitty in response to her own.

About the same time that Di heard from Mrs. Caffyn, a paragraph in the local paper made known the startling fact that Mrs. Charles Lealter had had her diamond pendant returned to her anonymously through the post, and, while commenting upon the robber's gallantry, the writer stated that a warrant had been issued for the apprehension of a resident at Thorneydene, whose peculiar behaviour had long made an object of suspicion, and who there was every reason to believe was connected with the three large robberies that had taken place in the neighbourhood. The resident referred to was clearly John Gillway. Aunt Shales had long been sowing the seeds of mistrust in her master's honesty, and now those seeds had ripened into maturity.

But John Gillway did not return to be taken into custody, and when March came in with its cold winds and clear, keen sunshine, and its promise of green leaves and budding flowers, Aunt Shales cleared her few possessions out of the farm into a little cottage in the straggling village, and Emily departed to a neighbouring farmhouse. John Gillway's landlord locked up the farm; the men were dismissed, and a notice was inserted in the newspapers warning John Gillway that if he did not return by a stated time the farm implements would be sold by his landlord to defray the rent.

Oddly enough, Farmer Strange, who had never appeared to care greatly for the young man, raised the only dissenting voice in the bar parlour at the "Hare and Hounds" when local opinion declared in strong language that the missing tenant of "Honeypots" was a housebreaker. He would not agree to popular belief, and upon his return home from these gatherings he related the bar-parlour conversation to Di with his own observations upon it, watching her furtively from the corners of his grey eyes, to gather her impression as she listened.

He was not blind to her pallid cheeks and heavy-lidded eyes—the poor old father—nor so dense that he could not trace them to a certain cause. She might go bravely about her duties, never complaining, cheerfully accepting whatever the day might bring; but her voice was never raised in song, and she seldom laughed, and that was sad to observe, for Di had hitherto found so much at the farm to make merry over.

"Kitty ain't much of a correspondent," he remarked one day to Di when the postman had passed, bringing them no letters.

"She never cared for writing letters, daddy," answered Di, bending her head low.

"She likes it less than ever now, my gal! There must be a sight of things to see in Rome that she could write about."

"I've been to Rome, you know, with Aunt Caffyn. Kitty thinks there's no need to describe what I've seen, and—no news is always good news—dear."

Her father puffed at his clay pipe, looking at her beneath his over-hanging shaggy eyebrows.

"Like to go to Rome again, Di?" he asked after a pause.

"No, no," she answered hastily. "I am very happy here, daddy. I don't want to change; home is best."

"Home's all right for a place to come back to when you're tired of jogging about all over the world; but it's a good thing for young birds to stretch their wings, my dear, and if you'd like a change——" She rose from her seat, and threw herself at her father's knees, clasping her arms around them and looking up into his face.

"I don't want a change, daddy dear," she said with a quiver in her voice. "Is it because I'm so dull and quiet that you think I want to go away? I am dull, dad, not with weariness of this dear home and you, oh! no. I won't be dull any longer. I'll be so cheerful that you'll hardly recognise me," she declared with a piteous little laugh that had no mirth in it. "Shall I play you something? I haven't opened the piano since Kitty went—away."

Her father nodded, and Di went to the piano. She could hardly see for the tears that blurred her vision; they fell upon the keys as she played a lively Irish jig, to which her father kept time with his foot.

Slowly, very slowly, the days passed into weeks, and then those weeks that had appeared so leaden-footed seemed to wake into life and skip into months, and spring made room for summer, and summer had to withdraw to give place to autumn, and, looking back, one sighed over the marvellous rapidity of Time.

One evening in October Di walked in the prim old garden with its broad flower borders where the sunflowers now drooped their heads, and the tall hollyhocks presented a drunken and woe-begone appearance. The bushes of blue starry Michaelmas daisies and pale yellow chrysanthemums sent out a strong perfume as she paced up and down the gravel path. The sky was very blue, with bright rosy streaks and dappled with fleecy white clouds. From the adjoining yard came the lowing of cows, and the whinnying of horses. An atmosphere of peace pervaded the garden, the beauty of the rose-flecked sky and the calm of the early evening seemed reflected in Di's face.

As she paced up and down she thought of Kitty, wondering where she was, and if she thought sometimes of her old home and its inmates. Only that morning her father had commented upon Kitty's silence with unusual bitterness.

"'Twas I that drove her from The Towers," he said. "Her pride couldn't bear to have me pointed out as Mrs. Eliot's father. She couldn't bear her smart friends to know that I was only a poor farmer. Bless you, my gal, I'm not blind. But there's no reason for her not writing to you. You're as much a lady as she is; but no doubt it's the butter-making that's set her against writing to you."

Di had faltered some feeble excuse for Kitty, but Farmer Strange refused to accept it. And Mrs. Caffyn, long back from Spain, had written again, peremptorily demanding Kitty's address and complaining of her odd silence.

Di was greatly perplexed to know what reason she was to give Mrs. Caffyn. She did not know where the Nabob was; a long time had elapsed since he had written to her.

The sharp click of the latch of the garden gate made Di raise her head. The shadows were falling, and at the first glance she could not recognise the person advancing towards her.

She knew who her visitor was the very next moment. It was Aunt Shales, not quite so rosy, and certainly more downcast of expression than Di had yet seen the worthy soul.

"Lawks, Miss Di!" she exclaimed, putting both hands to her breast. "What a startle you did give me with that there white gown of yours! I do declare as my heart stopped clean dead, I felt that frit." She looked round the garden and made a few flurried observations about the flowers and the weather in a manner that plainly betrayed the slight interest she took in them, and the anxiety to be thought polite that prompted the remarks. She carried a small basket upon one little plump arm. Di noticed that it was empty.

"I came to beg a few pot-herbs, Miss Di, if so be as you've any to spare," said Aunt Shales. "I allays did fancy my meals tasty-like, an' I was never one of them sort as chucks a bit of scraggy neck o' mutton into a pot full o' water an' leaves it to dish its own self up, with never a scrap o' onion or thyme to take away the taste of the pot. If I had bin one o' them sort I shouldn't ha bin alive now, seein' what a man Shales was for his stomach, and would have it dished reg'lar to the minute by the kitchen clock, or he'd know the reason why. Not as it's any use to cockle up one's appitite, Miss Di, seein' as we ain't here for long, an' many's the time I used to tell him so, but there, what I allays says is as men will be men, an' nothin' short of a miracle 'll ever make 'em anything else!"

Di had directed her steps towards a border of sweet herbs that grew beneath a south wall.

"Take as many as you like, Aunt Shales," said she kindly; "you must miss the farm garden very much."

Aunt Shales straightened her short back, looked steadily at Di for a moment, and then giving a queer gulping sound as though she was swallowing something disagreeable, she glanced behind and around her, and edging up to Di, she whispered:

"I've just come from Honeypots, an' if I'd on'y known what I was a-goin' to see there, the Lord Mayor and all his wile horses wouldn't have got my ten toes inside that kitching garding! Miss Di, as sure as eggs is eggs, an' never can't be nothin' else in this wicked, sinful world, I seed my master's sperit!"

Di raised her eyebrows, and looked so unimpressed by the statement that Aunt Shales hastened to add:

"I knows as some folks 'ull scream out at sight of haystacks an' cows an' other innocent animals, an' think if they on'y sees their own shadder as it's a ghost; but I never had nothin' to do with the likes of them. But I seed him, well, there, my own hand couldn't be plainer, an' he never said a word; he on'y jest looked at me so sad an' mournful like as if he'd jest got up from a deathbed, an' afore I could do so much as cry out, he was gone!"

"Where did you see him?"

"He was standin' by the little garding gate as opens from the farmyard. An' I was jest a-stoopin' down for a handful of thyme with never a blessed thought in my head but a wonder if the bit of scrag I was goin' to bile long with 'em was as fresh an' as sweet as it ought to be, for though I salted it the very day as I bought it, gettin' it cheap an' havin' my doubts about it, an' not bein' able to eat it through not having finished up my bit of roast pork, I didn't feel too sure about it. My heart was up in my mouth when I looked up an' saw him lookin' at me with eyes like yaller lamps jest a-goin' out! I didn't stay long after that. I was up an' out of that garding like a long dog, an' now," she added, with a gloomy shake of her head,

"I knows what the sut meant by fallin' and puttin' out the fire, an' the meanin' of that great black dog as walked into the kitching las' night an' glared at me in a way as showed pretty plain where he come from. I'm sure my back felt jest as though I'd a iced worm a-sprawlin' all over it, an' as I said to our Poll, who was there at the time, my flesh never creeps for nothin'. But how I'm to lay him I don't know, an' till he is laid, there'll be no rest nor peace for me, Miss Di."

"Laid!" repeated Di, not understanding the allusion.

"That's what I've allays heard as sperits wanted when they come back; I never heard of one as wanted anything else, but, as I says, how I'm to lay him, bein' as innocent as the lamb unborn of what's happened to him, an' never doin' him a ha'porth of harm, seein' as I've never bin one to cackle 'bout what I seed and heard, beyond jest mentionin' it to a friend, or to you, Miss Di, an' allays feelin' as safe as a barn-door, as it 'ud go no further. It may be as "An' I was jest a-stoopin' down for a handful of thyme."

it's the warrant bein' out for him," she said, wiping her eyes and sniffing, "an' he may hold me responsible for that, seein' as I've bin tole by many folks as it's all through me as it was done an' the rob'rys laid to his door. Not as I ever did feel proud of it, Miss Di! Oh, no, that I didn't, seein' more shame than glory in it, an' livin' in constant dread of bein' dragged into a witness box or a p'lice cell through it; but I never dreamt as I was goin' to be haunted through the dreams as I've had, 'nd make your hair stand on end on'y to hear tell on!"

"I don't believe in ghosts," said Di very quietly, but with firmness in her full, sweet tones. "You saw someone—a farm hand or a tramp very likely—and in your agitation you thought the man was your master. It is all a mistake, Aunt Shales, and if black dogs and falling soot were evil omens, I'm afraid everyone in the world would get a very big share of ill-fortune. The soot often falls in the kitchen."

Aunt Shales shook her head and sighed, evidently seeing evil in what Di intended for a comforting assurance.

"If I on'y knew what he wants!" said she. "Not as I wishes that they could speak, po'r souls! There, it never so much as entered my head when I've bin talkin' about him, as all the while he was dead and buried, no, that it didn't, or I'd never have said what I have, seein' how unlucky it is to speak ill of 'em!"

"Unkind, you mean. Oh, Aunt Shales, don't bother yourself about imaginary ghosts and omens! I thought you were too sensible to believe in such nonsense!"

Aunt Shales sighed and used her handkerchief again.

"Them ugly black dogs don't come into the houses for nothin', Miss Di, and if he ain't murdered an' his po'r body hid away, where is he?"

"That I cannot say! But it is foolish to think that Mr. Gillway is murdered. Why should you imagine that just because a stray dog happened to enter your kitchen?"

"But where can he be, Miss Di? The p'lice can't lay hands on him."

"It isn't likely that he would return to Thornydene, knowing that a warrant had been issued for him. No doubt he has gone abroad."

"I on'y wishes as I could think you was right, Miss Di, that I do. But if ever I seed anybody as plain as a pike-staff, it was Mr. Gillway this very night. I can see him now in my mind's eye. He'd a black coat on an' a little dark cap jest as he used to wear. An' his face was whiter than a lily—ah, Miss Di, when I puts two an' two together like that, they on'y makes four, no matter how I twistes 'em about, an' if you'd sin him, you'd say the very same thing!"

Farmer Strange came home before Aunt Shales had finished exclaiming over her story. He listened with unusual patience to her long account of the fright that she had received, saying very little himself, and rubbing his chin reflectively. When Aunt Shales had departed, and Di with her father sat alone at the tea-table, Farmer Strange stirred his tea slowly and in meditative silence.

"I had a queer turn to-night, Di," said he abruptly. "As I was passing Honeypots, the old mare shied at a man who was crossing the road right under her nose. If I hadn't felt so cock-sure that Gillway 'ud never run his nose into a trap, I should have sworn that it was the fellow himself. I never saw two faces so much alike!"

Di paled, staring at her father with wide startled eyes.

"Oh, daddy!" she said. "It couldn't have been him! Didn't you speak—or cry out to the man?"

"I sung out: 'Hulloa, Gillway!' but the chap didn't take any notice. He was off and out of sight as sharp as a ferret after a rat. Queer that Aunt Shales should have seen the same man. Looks as though he really is in the neighbourhood!"

Di said nothing. If Gillway had indeed returned from America, where was Kitty? Her mind was so occupied with this question that she started when her father said:

"Course it wasn't Gillway! He'd never come back unless 'twas to clear his character, and if 'twas to do that, he wouldn't turn tail and run at the sound of his own name when a friend called it. 'Twas but a chance resemblance, depend upon it." Di's heart grew big with compassion for her father as she tenderly waited upon him. She told herself that if he knew the secret that she and the Nabob had concealed from him, he would not have looked upon the man's running at the sound of his voice as a sure sign that the person who resembled John Gillway so greatly had not been John Gillway himself. To Di, that very circumstance pointed to the possibility that it was the missing tenant of Honeypots Farm, and no other, who had crossed her father's path that night.

Answers to Correspondents.

P. E. asks: "What is the height of the Queen? My chum and I have taken a wager upon it, and we intend to abide by your decision."——This question has already been answered several times before, but it still comes to this office with the regularity of the postman's knock. The height of Her Majesty is 4ft. 10in.

T. F.—Stand your boots in a dish of boiled linseed oil, allowing it to thoroughly saturate the soles. This will stop your boots from squeaking.

Pol.—Mr. Gladstone's longest speech took three hours and three-quarters to deliver. It was on the occasion of his first budget, and "held the House" to the last.

Liverpudlian.—Yes, although it is not a pleasant thing to say, there is no doubt that Hamburg has been disputing the supremacy of Liverpool very successfully of late years. The following figures will give you some idea of the progress shown by the two ports in the space of ten years:

	1885. Tons.	1895. Tons.
Liverpool	4,270,000 ...	5,966,000
Hamburg	3,700,000 ...	6,256,000

The Manchester Ship Canal can scarcely be blamed for this result; as a matter of fact, but for this undertaking, Liverpool trade might have progressed even less rapidly.

O. P. P.—The Chiltern Hundreds—Burnham, Desborough, and Stoke—is an estate of the British Crown on the chain of chalk hills that pass from east to west through the middle of Buckinghamshire. The stewardship is a nominal office with a salary of twenty shillings, conferred on members of Parliament when they wish to vacate their seats, as, by accepting an office under the Crown, a member becomes disqualified unless he be again returned by his constituents.

E. J.—A million pennies placed side by side would stretch 18 miles 1,653 yards 1 foot.

F. V. asks: "What becomes of all the smuggled tobacco?"——We have made inquiries and find that a large proportion is sent to Broadmoor for the use of the lunatic criminals. The officials there manage to restrain many a refractory lunatic by threatening to withhold the tobacco unless a more placid disposition is shown.

S.—The only country where a tax is laid on cats seems to be Saxony.

Brixton.—The oldest Board School in London is Old Castle Street, Whitechapel, which was opened on July 17th, 1873.

E.—St. Paul's Cathedral is the ninth church that has stood on the site. The first one was erected in the year 223.

J. T. asks: "At what age does a child give its parents the least trouble?"——This is rather a large order, for so much depends upon the nature, health, and disposition of children individually. On the whole, I should think the first three months of a child's life is the time when it gives the least trouble, for during that happy period it cannot run about and get into mischief by falling into the fire, tumbling down the stairs, or upsetting crockery to the distraction of its mother; neither can it talk, and thus worry its paternal relative with a multitude of questions upon every conceivable subject; and, moreover, unless it is of an exceptionally restless disposition, it will sleep most of the first three months of its life.

P. G. K.—Strange to say, there are only three words in the English language ending in "dous." These three are "hazardous," "tremendous," and "stupendous."

C.—Land is probably more valuable in London than anywhere else on the face of the Universe. Some years ago a site in Old Broad Street, City, measuring 42ft. by 30ft., was sold for £37,000, or at the rate of £1,260,000 per acre.

Player.—It has been estimated that there are something like 635,000,000 different hands in the game of whist.

H.—Jericho in the time of Henry VIII. was the slang word for prison. Hence the origin of the expressive saying "Go to Jericho."

A. H.—People are foolish to disfigure themselves by tattooing. There is no way of ridding yourself of the marks to our knowledge.

Reader, writing from Paris, tells us of a curious fact regarding the beggars who thrive within the gay city, which says much for their impertinent enterprise. They have, it appears, established a journal which, every week contains articles on the best methods of pursuing the calling to which they devote themselves. If this is really a fact, the Parisian beggars have certainly stolen a march over their London brethren.

Ethel.—It is not considered good form for a bride to wear any but a high-necked and long-sleeved dress unless she is a member of the Royal Family.

Alf wonders how he can obtain the freedom of the City of London, and thinks that probably we may be able to assist him on this point. We can. There are three ways: (1) By Patrimony, i.e., a son of a freeman born after the father has acquired his freedom. (2) By servitude: that is, by serving an apprenticeship of seven years to a freeman. (3) By redemption by purchase.

Weekly Subscriber wishes to know which are the three most expensive head-dresses in the British army.—Presumably you mean those for which the country has to pay. In this case the reply is as follows: Staff-Sergeant, Grenadier Guards, £10 6s.; Scots Guards, £10 3s. 10d.; Scots Greys, £9 19s. 2d. Officers' head-dresses are much more expensive.

Smokers will no doubt be pleased to hear that during this time of general rejoicing they have not been forgotten. Messrs. Vuillard and Strauss have forwarded me a sample of the "Diamond Jubilee" pipe. This pipe is ornamented with the Queen's head stamped upon the face of the bowl by a new process; it may be obtained at all the leading tobacconists' at the by no means exorbitant price of 1s.

Free Sampler.—I cannot agree with you in your opinion that the giving of free samples by post is an advertiser's dodge, and that only a few of the general public who apply for samples receive them; no respectable firm would be guilty of such a practice, and, as a rule, business houses are only too pleased to have the public answer their advertisements by the thousand. Nowadays it is hard to get a new article introduced on the market, and to push the same many smart ideas have lately been introduced. You are perfectly correct in assuming that articles when given free as samples are of good quality—it is scarcely to be expected that any person would be foolish enough to foist a worthless article on the public in this manner. If you care to apply to the following named houses I think your request for samples will be attended to in a manner that will lead you to alter your opinion on this subject: Dr. Tibble's Vi-Cocoa Ltd., Laurence Pountney Lane, E. C.; The Herbuline Co., 54, Bow Lane, E.C. (samples of their cure for Toothache, Neuralgia, Rheumatism etc.); and the Glebe Sugar Co., 86, Wilson Street, Glasgow., who tell me they will be glad to send you samples of their syrups and sugars.

Notice to Competitors.

In all Prize Competitions the Editor's decision is final. No correspondence will be entertained when once a competition is finished and the result published.

The Fact is, the Proprietor of "BEECHAM'S PILLS" has, by the publication of filled a long-felt want. The majority of the people have only a vague idea of the beauty of their own country, as until now, reliable photographic view reproductions have not been within the reach of the people. The series has been published in book form, each book containing 24 choice views (5in. by 3¼in.) in local combination; artistically printed on specially prepared English-made paper, to be sold for ONE PENNY each volume. The placing of an order for a first issue of "BEECHAM'S PHOTO-FOLIO" of over FIVE MILLION BOOKS is the main reason that they are such "marvellous value for the price."

The Proprietor of "BEECHAM'S PILLS" has been found fault with by interested parties for giving too much for the money, but the public will not mind this, neither does he. Tourist Agents, Secretaries of Excursion Clubs, Schools, Choirs, Picnic Parties, etc., should get specimens of "BEECHAM'S PHOTO-FOLIO" VOLUMES. The following are now on sale:

Men Who Have Made the Empire.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

V.—WILLIAM OF ORANGE.

IT is perhaps one of the most curious facts of our history that the Empire-Maker who, as it were, finally completed the work begun by his namesake, William the Norman, should, like him, have been a foreigner, should have sprung from similar ancestry, and should have been his exact reverse in every mental and physical quality save one—an inflexible determination to do the work which he was appointed to do in spite of every conceivable kind of obstacle.

It is noteworthy also that this man should have come from those same Low Countries from whose shores our Saxon ancestors had first come on their plundering forays to do their share of the work of making the English people. The ancestry of the great-grandson of William the Silent stretched far back, probably even into those remote and turbulent times, and it is within the limits of possibility that some stalwart ancestor of the ancient House of Nassau may himself have had something to do in the early making of that Realm, over which, a thousand years later, his descendant was to rule during one of the most critical and perilous periods of its existence.

Be this, however, as it may, the central fact which stands out in the story of William III. is this: Whatever his country or ancestry, he was, so far as we have any means of judging, the one man in the world just then who could have accomplished the difficult and, as it must often have seemed even to him, almost impossible task which had to be performed if the work of the other Empire-Makers who had gone before him was not to be sadly marred, if not altogether undone.

William of Orange may perhaps be most truthfully described as an overcomer of difficulties. Probably no other man ever had so many difficulties to conquer as he had, and his triumph over them is one of the finest examples of irresistible will-power and purely intellectual force that all History has to show. Mentally he was a giant, and as such he acquitted himself in what was undoubtedly a battle of giants fighting for the spoils of Europe. Physically he was a miserable weakling, shattered by disease, seldom free from bodily pain, and foredoomed from his youth by an exhausting and incurable malady.

Yet even his sports and pastimes were those, not only of a healthy, but even of a robust constitution. His pale, sickly, small-pox-pitted face never flushed save under the stimulus of battle or the chase. He fought his fight with Fate and won it by sheer intellectual force, yet none of the pleasures of intellect were his. He knew nothing of science, little of literature, and less of art.

Fitted, apparently, by Nature only for the pursuits of the study, he found his rare moments of real happiness when riding down a stag or a boar in the forests of Windsor or the woods of Flanders, or, sword in hand, leading his men wherever the battle was hottest or the danger the greatest. A creature of contradictions, in short, determined to make himself that which Nature had seemingly not made him, and to do that which he appeared least fitted to do.

No one possessing an intelligent grasp of the deplorable state of affairs which obtained in England, and the threatening aspect of matters on the Continent during the last decade but one of the 17th century, would have guessed for a moment that this "asthmatic skeleton," as Macaulay somewhat roughly describes his hero, was the man to turn England's weakness into strength, and even in defeat to grapple successfully with the colossal Power which was threatening the liberties of Europe.

In England the weakness and baseness of the two last Stuart kings had more than undone the work of the great Oliver. He had, as has been shown, made England one of the first Powers in the world, strong at home and respected and even courted abroad. Charles II. had sold his country, or at any rate his independence and what should have been his royal honour, to France. He had, in fact, exhibited to the world the disgraceful spectacle of an English king who was the pensioner of a foreign monarch.

The for-ever infamous Treaty of Dover had brought the prestige of England to its lowest ebb. For the first time in nearly seven hundred years the Isle Inviolate had been seriously threatened with invasion, and for the only time in their history the citizens of London had heard the sound of hostile guns. Now this of itself, taking the whole history of these islands into consideration, is a fact of absolutely unparalleled infamy, and yet if such infamy could have been equalled, the brother and successor of Charles II. would have done so. Indeed, from one point of view it may be said that he excelled it.

The guns of William's countrymen were heard in the Thames because Charles II., having his brother James for Lord High Admiral, had so scandalously wasted the funds which should have been devoted to the maintenance of the Navy that no adequate defence was really possible; but it was left for James II., the last and most contemptible, if not in all respects the worst king of the royal and miserable House of Stuart, to be the only British monarch who ever brought a foreign army on to British soil for the purpose of coercing by force the will of the British people. More than this, too, it must be remembered that these foreign troops were Frenchmen supported by regenade English, Irish, or Scotchmen, who had deliberately deserted their own country to serve under the standard of a man who was to the 17th century what Phillip II. of Spain had been to the 16th.

So low, then, had Britain sunk in the scale of nations when William of Orange made his entry upon the stage of British history. The fact which made his entry possible is hardly of the sort that would commend itself to people of a romantic turn of mind, although few romances have been really more romantic than his own life-story.

He could never have become King of England, nor is it likely that he could even have been offered the rôle of the protector of English liberties, had it not been for the fact that he was married to the daughter of James II., and of this marriage Lord Macaulay truly says: "His choice had been determined chiefly by political considerations, nor did it seem likely that any strong affection would grow up between a handsome girl of sixteen, well-disposed, indeed, and naturally intelligent, but ignorant and simple, and a bridegroom who, though he had not completed his twenty-eighth year, was in constitution older than her father; whose manner was chilling, and whose head was constantly occupied by public business or by field sports."

His marriage was, in short, "a marriage of convenience," and yet, in defiance of all the rules that are supposed to govern the most intimate of all human relationships, it was one of the best and, in the end, most devoted unions that History has to record. It is hardly possible to doubt that William of Orange married Mary Stuart because he saw with that keenly penetrating foresight of his that such a union would strengthen him in his life-long combat with the arch-enemy of his faith, his family, and his nation; and this enemy was that same Louis of France who had made Charles II. his pensioner, and was soon to make James II. his dependent.

To quote Lord Macaulay again: "He saved England, it is true, but he never loved her, and he never obtained her love. . . . Whatever patriotic feeling he had was for Holland . . . yet even his affection for the land of his birth was subordinate to another feeling which early became supreme in his soul, which mixed itself with all his passions and compelled him to marvellous enterprises, which supported him when sinking under mortification, pain, sickness, and sorrow . . . and continued to animate him even while the prayer for the departing was read at his bedside."

It was this hatred of France and her king which nerved him to do for the liberties of Europe and Great Britain what Francis Drake had done for England against Phillip of Spain, and in the doing of this he won the conspicuous glory of forcing the paymaster of the two English sovereigns whom he succeeded to make peace with him on equal terms, and this, too, although he lost more battles than he won, and had to surrender more strong cities than he took.

It is comparatively easy for a conqueror to take triumph out of victory, but it is a higher quality which patiently endures defeat and confronts disaster, and by sheer genius wins triumph in the end. This is what William of Orange did, and it is from this fact that he deserves his title to be ranked among the Makers of that Empire to whose throne he came as an alien, and whose honour he restored and upheld, as one might say, in spite of herself.

So far as England is concerned, the male line of Stuart came in with a fool and went out with a coward. One does not even care to imagine what would have happened if James II. had remained on the throne; or if William of Orange, with his hereditary and deep-rooted hatred of Louis XIV. and his policy, had not come to take his most miserably vacated place in the nick of time.

The sentimentality which makes such a fuss about loyalty to persons as distinguished from loyalty to country, and the lawyer-quibbles which occupied men's minds in the dispute as to whether James II. was King de facto or de jure, or both, of the country from which he had run away like an absconding debtor, may be dismissed, just as Harold the Saxon's claims had been some six hundred years before. It is merely a question of the Fit and the Unfit, and James was Unfit.

James deserted his post as ruler of these realms because he found himself assailed by difficulties which the most ordinary ability ought to have overcome. William assumed the same position in the face of difficulties which only the highest qualities of kingcraft and statesmanship could have enabled him to successfully grapple with. In a word, James possessed no ideal that qualified him to be a king, much less an Empire-Maker. William did possess such an ideal, and that is the only reason why he became King of England, vice James Stuart, absconded.

Next, perhaps, to Henry VII., William was the most business-like sovereign who has occupied the British throne. With him all men and things, all beliefs and sentiments were subordinated to the achievement of the one great end—the curbing of the power of France, and consequently the furtherance of political and theological liberty in Europe. He was, in fact, only incidentally an Empire-Maker, although without him and without the broad and firm basis of popular liberty and national strength which he laid down, as it were, in the doing of his greater work, the building up of the Imperial fabric would undoubtedly have been long delayed and seriously impeded.

He got himself made King of Great Britain and Ireland, not because he wanted to occupy the throne, but because from that eminence he would be able to look the Grand Monarch more equally in the face. We get a luminous insight into the character of the man in his reply to the Convention or conference of the two Houses of Parliament which had proposed that his wife as actual and lawful heir to the throne which James had forsaken, should occupy it as queen, and that he should reign by her authority as a sort of Royal Executive.

"My lords and gentlemen," he said, "no man can esteem a woman more than I do the Princess, but I am so made that I cannot think of holding anything by apron-strings, nor can I think it reasonable to have any share in the government unless it be put in my own person and that for the term of my life. If you think fit to settle it otherwise I will not oppose you, but will go back to Holland and meddle no more in your affairs."

That was the kind of man William of Orange was. He had come to be a king, and a king he would be or nothing. And so king he was, and it was not very long before he was to show how well his self-confidence was justified. He had scarcely seated himself on the throne before the Parliament, recognising the fact that his work was something other than merely filling James's place, deliberately suggested that he should resume as King of England the hostilities which he had begun against Louis as Stadtholder of the Netherlands, and he on his part showed how ready he was to take up the task by exclaiming, in one of his rare bursts of exultation, after reading the address:

"This is the first day of my reign!"

This address, however welcome as it was, was somewhat belated. For more than a month before it was presented, Louis, under the pretence of helping the runaway, whom for his own purposes he affected to believe still lawful King of England, had committed the gravest of all acts of war, and James had crowned the disgrace of his flight by the infamy of heading an invasion of British territory by foreign mercenaries. On the 12th of March, 1689, he landed at Kinsale as enemy and invader of his own country, convoyed by fifteen French men-of-war, and supported by 2,500 French troops.

Making the best of his way to Dublin.

The story of this Irish war needs no re-telling here, save in so far as it brings out the contrast between William and James as the Fit and the Unfit for the doing of that work which had just then got to be done if England was not to sink back to the degrading position of a French dependency, and if the way of future progress and Imperial expansion was to be left open. William no sooner saw that the scene of the fight for constitutional liberty and religious freedom had shifted for the time being from the Low Countries to Ireland than he sent Marshal Schomberg, who was then one of the most skilful soldiers in Europe, with an army of sixteen thousand men to the scene of action.

Meanwhile the heroically stubborn resistance which has won immortal fame for the men of Londonderry had proved, not only to James and his foreign mercenaries, but to Louis himself and all Europe, that the struggle which was just renewed was no mere war of dynasties, and that something very much greater than the mere question as to who should be King of England had got to be decided before the trouble was over.

James in Ireland and Louis in France stood for the already discredited and exploded doctrine of the divine right of kings to rule as they pleased because they were the sons of their fathers; for the dark tyranny of Rome, now almost equally discredited; and for the domination of Europe by the French autocracy. In Holland and England and Germany William and his allies stood for the very reverse of all this, so that it was not only the destinies of the United Kingdom, but those of the greater part of the civilised world that had to be decided, and it was by procuring through mingled victory and defeat, confronted by powerful enemies abroad and by conspiracy and threatened assassination at home, that the worthy descendant of William the Silent proved his real right divine as king of these realms and champion of those principles of which the British Empire of to-day is the concrete expression.

It was really on the shores of an insignificant Irish stream that William fought and won the battle of European liberty. But before he did this he had another battle to fight, as it were, in front of his newly-given throne.

His reign, unhappily, saw the commencement of that system of government which an intelligent Chinese Minister to the Court of St. James once described as "the election of one party to do the business of the nation, and of another to stop them doing it." In other words, it was William's fate, among all his other difficulties, to have to contend with the bitter and usually dishonest strife of Parliamentary parties, and so keen did this strife become after the foreign enemy had actually landed on British soil, that he was even then on the point of throwing up the whole business in disgust, and going back to Holland to fight his battles out there

What would have happened if he had done so is anything but a pleasant subject for speculation. Happily, at the eleventh hour he refused to acknowledge himself beaten. Sick of the strife of words, and longing for the reality of deeds, he announced his intention to place himself at the head of the English forces in Ireland, "and with the blessing of God Almighty endeavour to reduce that kingdom that it may no longer be a charge to this." In this we may see more than the expression of a pious hope. As statesman and soldier William had seen that Ireland was the back-door of Great Britain, and that so long as it remained open, so long would the whole kingdom be vulnerable to foreign invasion, and so he went to close it.

It was a strange position for any man to be placed in. He was going to fight for everything that he held dear. He knew that if he lost in Ireland he must lose also in England and the Netherlands, but he was also going to fight against the father of the woman whom he had now come to love so dearly that her death, when it happened, came nearer to wrecking his imperial intellect than all the other trials and troubles of his laborious and almost joyless life. He had no feeling of personal enmity against James as he had against Louis, and it was duty and duty alone which took him to the Irish War. Almost the last words that he said to his wife concerning the enemy that he was about to meet on the battlefield were:

"God send that no harm may come to him!"

Mr. Traill has thus tersely summed up the condition of affairs at the moment: "Ireland in the hands of a hostile army, the shores of England threatened by a hostile fleet, a dangerous conspiracy only detected on the eve of success, a formidable insurrection imminent in the country he was leaving behind him . . . ." And yet, gloomy as the outlook seemed, his spirits rose as they ever did when he saw the moment for doing instead of talking draw near, and Bishop Burnett tells us that he said to him on the eve of his departure: "As for me, but for one thing, I should enjoy the prospect of being on horseback and under canvas again, for I am sure that I am fitter to direct a campaign than to manage your Houses of Lords and Commons."

Digitized by Google

These were words well worthy of the man who, not many days later, quietly sat down to breakfast in the open air beside Boyne Water, within full sight of the enemy and within easy range of their guns. Breakfast over, he mounted his horse and was promptly fired at. The first shot from two field pieces which had been trained on him and his staff killed a man and two horses. The second grazed his shoulder, and made him reel in his saddle.

"There was no need for any bullet to come nearer than that," was his remark on the occurrence. Certainly not many bullets have ever come nearer to changing the history of Britain, and therefore of the British Empire, than that one.

After the wound had been dressed, instead of taking the rest which a good many strong men would have taken, this consumptive and asthmatic invalid remounted his horse and remained until nightfall in the saddle, making his dispositions for the battle of the morrow, and attending to every detail himself. His prudent uncle and father-in-law, apparently bent on fulfilling William's pious wish, was meanwhile taking very good care to keep himself out of harm's way.

On the day of the battle, which, as everyone knows, was the 1st of July, brought out with startling clearness the contrast between the man who was king in his own right and the man who called himself king because his name was James Stuart.

"Men of Enniskillen, what will you do for me?" he cried at the critical moment of the fight, when Caillemot and Schomberg, his two best captains, had been killed, and he, drawing his sword and swinging it aloft with his wounded arm, led his trusty Dutch guards and Ulstermen against the Irish centre. James, meanwhile, having watched the first part of the fight on which all his fortunes depended from the safe eminence of the Hill of Donore, had already given up for lost the day which he had done nothing to win, and was making the best of his way to Dublin, whence, in due course, leaving the beaten and demoralised rabble that had once been his army to its fate, he fled to the congenial ignominy of his safe retreat at St. Germains and the fostering care of his country's worst enemy.

The Battle of the Boyne not only settled the fate of the Stuart dynasty for good; it decided the question whether this country was to be ruled by a feeble despotism under the patronage of France, or by that constitutional monarchy under which Great Britain has so worthily proved her title to be called the Mother of Free Nations, and in winning this battle and deciding this all-important question, William of Orange won the right to be counted among the wisest and strongest of our Empire-Makers. The disgusted Irishmen, too, had some reason on their side when they said to the victors after the battle: "Change leaders and we'll fight you again!"

The story of his wars in those countries which have been aptly termed the cockpit of Europe is the story of the continuation of that work which he came to England to do; not, as has already been pointed out, for England as a country, but for the establishment of those principles for which the British constitution, of which he was one of the makers, stands. Ignorant or prejudiced critics have accused him of sacrificing English blood and treasure to the furtherance of his own ambition. The fact is that he employed them upon the best and most necessary work that there was for them to do just then.

"Look at my brave English!" he said to the Elector of Bavaria one day during the siege of Namur, while a British regiment was carrying the outworks on one side of the city. But they were doing more than carrying earthworks. They were fighting for the principles which their descendants crowned with everlasting glory at Trafalgar and Waterloo. They were showing the soldiers and generals of France, then held to be the best in the world, the sort of stuff that they were made of, and giving promise of future prowess that was soon to be splendidly redeemed at Blenheim and Ramillies, Oudenarde and Malplaquet.

It was a singular war, and by all the rules of warfare the issue should have been the reverse of what it was. But again and again William's wonderful genius and indomitable persistence snatched victory out of defeat, and turned disaster into advantage, until at last the Grand Monarch himself had to confess the power of the enemy whom he had once thought so insignificant, and the signing of the Treaty of Ryswick left William triumphant if somewhat dissatisfied.

The results would no doubt have been much greater if William could have had his own way, and if the strife of parties in the British Parliament had not so sorely crippled him. But at least he had the satisfaction of knowing before he died that, whereas a few months before the French men-of-war had with impunity insulted and threatened the English coasts, and landed a small army on Irish soil, a few months afterwards every invader had been driven from British ground, and the French fleet almost destroyed, while the Mediterranean, on which British ships had sailed only by sufferance, was now well on the way to becoming a British lake.

And yet, in spite of all the triumphs that he had won over so many difficulties and so many dangers, and in spite of the consciousness of work well and nobly, if quietly and unostentatiously done, William's last days, like those of many another man who has deserved well of the world, were full of sorrow and suffering.

The death of his now adored queen had so shaken his mighty nature that for some days his reason was despaired of, and there can be no doubt but that it hastened his own end. And yet, weak and far advanced in disease as he was when he went out for that fatal ride from Kensington to Hampton Court, he was even then going a-hunting. The brutal Jacobite toast: "To the little gentleman in black velvet who works underground!" still serves to remind us of the mole-hill over which his horse stumbled and fell, breaking his rider's collar-bone, and inflicting the death-wound which he had escaped on a score of battle-fields.

His death was worthy of his life, for it was the death of a brave, patient man and a Christian gentleman. No doubt he himself would have preferred to have died at the head of a charge, or in the thick of an assault on a French fortress, but his destiny ordered it otherwise, and the man who had a hundred times faced death in the most reckless fashion for the purpose of inspiring his followers with his own courage and enthusiasm, died quietly in his bed, leaving behind him the greatest work ever done by an individual British sovereign and a fame which, but for the one dark and inexplicable blot of Glencoe, is as fairly entitled to be called spotless as that of any man who ever sat upon a throne and accomplished great things with such means as came to his hand.

TOWARDS the close of the reign of Victor Emanuel, the number of poachers in the Aosto, Cogne, and Soana Valleys had increased to such an extent, that the King adopted the expedient of enrolling some of them in his corps of gamekeepers—guardaboschi, as they were called. This gave them an opportunity of getting some game from time to time without the risk—for the King found it advisable to wink at such offences.

These converts, knowing the tricks of the poachers, made it difficult for their former friends to carry on the old trade.

A deadly feud existed, therefore, between the keepers and poachers, and many a fight took place on the heights above. Frequently a cry of pain, which re-echoed faintly in the valley, and made the women's hearts beat more quickly, came from a human throat.

Those who were acquainted with this state of things would naturally have been surprised had they seen, early one morning in the summer of 1877, a notorious poacher in earnest and confidential conversation with one of the keepers. They were speaking for about ten minutes, the result of their talk being evidently satisfactory to both.

"What about the game, Luvoni?"

"You shall have time to get it. I shall shoot all the game I want for one day!" replied the keeper with a meaning smile. "I owe both Amoretti and his Caterina a grudge. She was partial to me till he came. We'll see who'll get the best of the bargain! Twelve o'clock, you say?"

"Yes, we shall up above at twelve," replied Bettini.

And they parted.

At eleven o'clock that same morning, Vicenzo Amoretti was bidding his sweetheart good-bye in the street of the little village in the Cogne Valley. Caterina had endeavoured to persuade him to give up this expedition; there had been a sharp fight between keepers and poachers on the preceding day, and she had gloomy forebodings of danger for her lover; but Amoretti only laughed at her fears and kissed her.

"You are nervous, little one!" he said gently. "If we leave it till to-morrow the offer will not hold good. It is a good price to pay for three or four animals, and it's worth risking a little for."

He left her trying to keep back the tears which rushed to her eyes, and hurried forward to join his comrade, Bettini, who was waiting for him.

The two men ascended the mountain leisurely, keeping a sharp look-out for keepers. There was one place where there was always good shooting; that was on the Cogne side of the Gran Paradiso, an awkward spot to get at. In form it resembled a great horseshoe, looking down on a path known as the Pass. Neither huntsmen nor poachers often ventured so far, and the deer fed practically in safety. But Amoretti and his companion were the most daring poachers of the district and they were bound for that spot—the Nuova ridge.

As they drew near the ridge, the fresh tracks in the thin layer of snow (which always cover the mountain except on the very hottest summer day) gave promise of good sport. They cocked their guns and trod silently and cautiously forward. They had barely set foot on the Nuova when a startled cry rang out in the morning air, and about a dozen chamois, scared at the appearance of the men, ran hither and thither on the ridge in vain search for some way of escape.

Four shots from two double-barrelled guns. Four of the animals tumbled over the edge of the Nuova into the Pass beneath; three were hit and one tumbled over from fright. The others, mad with fear, made a desperate rush past the two men and escaped. It was a splendid haul! They were spared the trouble of getting the creatures down the mountain! No wonder the men smiled contentedly!

Amoretti walked to the edge, and resting on his gun, looked over into the Pass. A second later a shot resounded on the heights, and with a cry of pain he sank down on the very edge of the Nuova. He half raised himself with a groan, and clutched fiercely at his gun.

He saw his companion scrambling down the uneven ground, leaving him to his fate; then he fell back again, insensible.

It was two hours later when Amoretti came to himself. A bullet had struck him in the leg, and he had lost a quantity of blood; but the intense cold had congealed the blood around the wound and so saved him from bleeding to death. He was benumbed with cold and could hardly move his limbs, but he managed to grope in his pocket for a small flask of brandy, a draught of which sent the blood tingling in his veins. He dragged himself, not without considerable pain, to a piece of rock and propped himself against it.

He tried to realise his position. Where was Bettini? Surely he had not left a comrade in such a plight—to die from exposure and exhaustion on the snow-tipped mountain? No! He would not be so black-hearted! The keepers had left him, too, which was not usual; they generally tried to capture the poachers, and more than one of the guardaboschi would have been glad to catch Amoretti red-handed. But Bettini would come back! He had gone for help, of course!

He began to feel cold; his leg was throbbing and causing him great pain. He chafed his limbs and did what he could to keep warm, but every movement seemed to make his wound more painful. Why was Bettini so long? Hark! Someone was coming behind him! He tried to twist round to welcome Bettini, and to his surprise the keeper, Luvoni, stepped in front of him.

The two men looked at each other for a second, intense hatred plainly visible on each face.

"So I've brought you down at last!" said Luvoni, with a triumphant smile.

"Well?" asked Amoretti, assuming an indifferent air.

"I swore to have revenge on you for taking Caterina from me," said the keeper, "and at last my opportunity has come."

"I did not take Caterina from you," returned the wounded man. "She acted of her own free will. Do you think that sweet creature would mate with you?"

"I could have killed you," hissed Luvoni, stung by his rival's words, "but I had a better plan. Death in that way was too easy. I want you to suffer, to die by inches! And you will! You are helpless here; Bettini will not come back! You will die by inches, I say—do you hear? And to-morrow Caterina can have her lover if she wants him!"

And with an oath he left the wounded man to his fate.

Left to die like a dog! He could see it all now; it had been planned between Bettini and his rival! Oh, the treacherous hound! Oh, for one grip at his throat, just one minute! Was there no help for him? Where was it to come from? His heart sank within him at his utter helplessness. Caterina's forebodings were realised. He writhed in rage and agony. Could he do nothing—nothing?

In his desperation he dragged himself again to the edge of the Nuova and screamed aloud for help, in the hopes that someone might hear him in the Pass. He saw a man's form with a load on his shoulder. The man stopped abruptly and looked upwards; then he began to run off. At first Amoretti's heart leapt for joy, but the next instant it sank like lead. The form was that of Bettini; he was sure of it—and he was carrying away the game! Lost! lost!

For hours Amoretti lay on the icy-cold Nuova, alternately imploring the help of Heaven and reviling the two men who had plotted against his life. Night came on, his body was benumbed, the pain of his wound was almost unbearable. He became delirious and raved aloud. His sufferings culminated in the early hours of the morning when, in a frantic attempt to descend the ridge, the mental and physical agony drew from him a horrible, inhuman cry, and he fell senseless.

* * * * *

It was nearly midnight when Caterina retired to her room. She made no attempt to undress; rest and sleep were out of the question. Amoretti had not returned! He had promised to meet her in the evening, but he had not come, and she could gain no news of her lover or his companion. Had they been caught she would have heard. Had her presentiment come true? Had anything happened to her lover?

Luvoni, the keeper, who lived in the next village, had met her in the street and had begun a conversation with her, but she had quickly closed it. She now remembered, with a pang, that as she had left him she had noticed something like an expression of glee—of triumph even—in his eyes. Something had happened to her lover.

She sat by the window, staring into the darkness, conjuring up all kinds of horrors, her eyes blurred with tears, her brain on fire, unconscious of the flight of time.

What was that? A faint wail struck her ear. Was it fancy? No! She sprang up, her whole frame trembling. It was her lover in distress—she was sure of it—up there on the Nuova! She would save him! She did not stop to consider the difficulty of the task; she quickly put on her hat and cloak, seized a stick and a small flask of brandy, and ran out of the house.

The ascent of the mountain was rough work for a woman, but this was no ordinary occasion. Fear and devotion gave her strength. Several times she had to stop, but she went on again in the grey light of dawn, keeping ever on the watch for some trace of Amoretti. At length, after many slips and narrow escapes, she caught sight of a prostrate figure, and with a mingled cry of joy and terror she hurried to the side of her unconscious lover.

* * * * *

Bettini felt very uncomfortable as he made his way home on the following afternoon. The Pass, reputed to be haunted, was now doubly so for him, and he hurried onwards to get through the dread place while the light lasted. His superstitious fears increased as he neared the spot where he had seen Amoretti's head as the deserted man had peered over the top. He quickened his steps almost to a run. He had traversed half the length of the Pass, his head bent lest he should see something, when a rustling sound caused him to look up. He dropped his gun, his hair stood on end, and his blood seemed to freeze in his veins; for there in front of him stood the ghost of the man he had betrayed. For one moment he stood paralysed with horror; then with an indescribable yell he turned and fled.

Amoretti smiled in ferocious glee. He was sitting on a piece of rock, where Caterina had left him to go forward for help. All day long they had toiled at the descent, a few steps at a time, taking the longest way because it was the easiest. Caterina would get him to the bottom before going for help.

She had brought him to consciousness, bound up his wound, and given him food which she had found in his wallet; then, when he felt able to move a few steps, the wearying descent had been commenced. Neither could ever properly describe what they had gone through, but it was sufficient for them that they had accomplished the task.

It was two months before Amoretti was able to get about, and then Caterina persuaded him to join the guardaboschi. Luvoni disappeared from Cogne; Bettini lost his reason after that meeting in the Pass, and is now in an asylum.

THAT WHALE.

"No, sir," he said, "I was not always so low down in the world as this. There was a time when I conducted the orchestra in a menagerie! Ah! To think that I should come to this! But it was all through that whale!"

He was a poor wretch, who came to the café from time to time and scraped his violin until the customers, in self defence, gave him a few coppers to get rid of him. I had been extra liberal on that occasion, for the reason that I was in a thoroughly bad temper; but instead of going as usual, he ordered some absinthe and seated himself opposite me.

I uttered a growl in reply to his observation. He evidently regarded it as a sign of approval, for he continued in the following terms:

"Yes, it is all through that whale. When I finished my studies at the Conservatoire, where I won three first prizes for music, I set out to look for a first-class position. There was not one vacant; but after waiting and trying for a time, I succeeded in obtaining the post of conductor—h'm—at Mesuron's menagerie. You should have seen me there playing the 'Indian March' whi'e Mesuron—he was a lion tamer—put his head into the lion's mouth! It was grand! It was my music that drew the people! And Mesuron, who was a go-ahead man, knew how to make the most of my genius. I was starred on the bills as an Italian first of all; then he turned me into a German when the fashion changed; and no doubt he would have Russianised my name in time if he had lived. But he died!"

He heaved a big sigh and took a sip of absinthe. I let him go on; I wanted to hear about the whale.

"One day Mesuron bought a whale; not a large one—a medium whale, so to speak—as an extra attraction for the menagerie. He was always on the look-out for novelties. The creature was a great nuisance whenever we shifted our quarters, but there is no denying that it proved an attraction.

"Soon after this, Mesuron caught a chill which carried him off, and the menagerie became the property of his brother, who had been a partner in the concern. Alfredi—his name was Alfred, but that did not sound so well—had never been favourably disposed towards the whale; in fact, the two had nearly quarrelled about it, but the elder man had had his way. The whale had remained Mesuron's own property; he paid for its keep and took an extra share of the profits, which he regarded as additional takings due to the attracton of the 'cetacean,' as he was fond of calling it.

"When Mesuron's will was read, it was found that he had left the whale to me. Alfredi was furious; he had expected to have it, no doubt because he knew that it brought money to the business. He tried to persuade me to give it up to him, but I refused unless he took me as a partner. He would not agree to this, and gave me notice to go—with my whale. It was not a written notice; it was in very bad language."

He stopped and took another sip at his absinthe. He began to feel more at ease presumably; he dived his hand into his pocket and drew out a cigarette, which he lighted and smoked with an air of enjoyment.

"I hired a shed on a piece of waste ground and had my legacy removed to this structure, while I made arrangements to dispose of it. I did not want it myself; if I could get someone to give me a lump sum for it, I thought that I should do better than trying to run a show on my own account. I used to go every day about twelve or one o'clock to feed it.

"About a week after it had been removed to the shed, I went as usual to feed the animal—I suppose it's an animal?—I found the doors broken in and the whale gone, tank and all.

"When I recovered from my surprise, I rushed off to the police station as fast as my legs would carry me and stated what had occurred.

"'Mr. Inspector,' I said, out of breath, 'I've been robbed.'

"He took his pen from behind his ear wearily, and said: 'What have you lost?'

"'A whale,' I answered.

"'A what? You mean whalebone,' he exclaimed.

"'No, I don't!' I replied angrily. 'It's a real whale.'

"'Stuffed?'

"'No, a live one! At least it was alive yesterday.'

"The intelligent officer opened his book and prepared to make notes.

"'Stolen from your bedroom, eh?' he observed.

"'From its own bedroom,' I cried. 'From a big shed where I had put it.'

"The officer made a note and continued:

"'I must have a full detailed description of the stolen object.'

Digitized by Google

"That upset me entirely. I know a whale when I see one, but to give a full description of a creature which you have only glanced at as it played about in the water is an entirely different thing. I said so.

"'That complicates matters very much,' said the inspector; 'we really must have a full description or I'm afraid we can do nothing. There are such a lot of whales about; and if we take up the wrong one, the newspapers will make no end of a fuss—they always do. Well, well! At what time was the robbery committed?'

"'I left the shed at one o'clock yesterday,' I replied, 'and when I went there to-day at twelve, the whale was gone.'

"'Twenty-three hours start!' grumbled the inspector. 'Why they may be out of the country by this time! You can get a long way in a day.'

"I tried to point out that the robbers could not make much progress when encumbered with a whale in a tank, but the intelligent inspector interrupted me by a wave of his hand.

"'I think it highly probable,' he continued, looking thoughtfully in front of him, 'that your whale strayed away of its own accord.'

"'What! A whale?' I asked. 'That's very improbable.'

"'Not at all!' answered the inspector sharply. 'People do all kinds of wild and improbable things.'

"I ventured to suggest that the tank might embarrass it, but he took no notice.

"'Is it the whale or the robber that you wish to get hold of?' he asked.

"'The whale, of course; but it seems to me that if you find one you must find the other.'

"'Oh, dear, no!' he exclaimed. 'In murder cases, for instance, we find the bodies, but not the assassins.'

"I agreed with him that they did not find the culprits in such cases, but I thought it better not to say so. I left him after a few more words, feeling very much grieved! for I was convinced that the police would never discover my treasure.

"That evening I strolled instinctively towards the old show. As I drew near, I saw a large poster. I read it and gasped for breath. It was an announcement that the whale was being exhibited! It was my whale, I was sure of it! What was I to do? At first I felt that I must rush in and claim it, but I reflected that I might get into trouble for making a disturbance. Finally I resolved to wait until the morning and go to the police.

"I went to the station in good time on the following morning and saw the inspector. But before I could say a word, he growled out:

"'You're a nice one! Coming here and talking about having a whale stolen from you. Why, you stole it from somebody else! You had better be off or you may find yourself in a tight place!'

"And in spite of of my protestations, I was obliged to get out of the station or he would have run me in for stealing my own whale! Alfredi had been at work, that was clear. In my rage I committed a foolish act; I went to a lawyer. The end of it was that I began a civil suit against Alfredi to recover possession of my whale."

The narrator stopped, and I said "Well?" for want of something better. He gently pushed his glass towards me, but I affected not to notice it.

"The suit came on about a month afterwards. The judge listened to my side of the case with evident disbelief. When the defence began, the solicitor produced a sworn document to the effect that the whale had died on the previous afternoon. The judge said he thought that the best way to settle the dispute now was to dismiss the case and make each pay his own costs. That decision apparently suited Alfredi, and I had no money to appeal.

"So the result was that I was ruined by the payment of the costs. And that is why you see me playing in this café. I cannot get a situation; all the impresarios are down on me on account of my suit against Alfredi—I know it is so, although they pretend that they won't employ me because I can't play. I, the one who held the audience spell-bound with my 'Indian March' in Mesuron's menagerie! And it's all through that whale. I thought it was to make my fortune, and it ruined me."

I waited to hear no more. As I left the café I heard a big sigh, and something that sounded like "that whale."

THE EYE OF THE SUN

By FRED WHISHAW, Author of "A Boyar of the 'Terrible.'"

SUMMARY.

THE story is told by a 'Varsity man, who, seeking adventure, joins Jameson in his raid against the Matabeles. During a brush with the enemy, Joe Wright, a fellow trooper, meets with his death-wound, and, before expiring, bequeaths a satchel containing his life history and the revelation of a wonderful secret to the narrator, who continues the story in the words of the written confession of his dead comrade. Some years previously, Wright had been a private in a Royal Rifle regiment, stationed in Rajpore, India. He and three companions made a midnight raid on a Hindoo temple, in order to steal a diamond of exceptional value and beauty, situated in the forehead of an idol.

In the attempt the soldiers kill one of the guardian priests. A trap-door in front of the idol opens under the feet of Johnny Phelps, who disappears, and the party return to the barracks without having obtained the gem.

Later on, they buy a fac-simile of the "Eye of the Sun" from a merchant in a bazaar. With this they return to the temple and substitute the dummy for the genuine jewel.

CHAPTER VII.

THE FOX OUTFOXED.

THE following day friend Jake began to talk to me after parade.

"We did that business pretty cleverly t'other night!" he said; "you and I."

"And Alf!" I added.

"Alf!" repeated Jake scornfully; "it was a rotten day for us, my son, when we took that idiot into partnership; he's no good to us—only a danger! I wish to Heaven he was out of it! Let's chuck the fool altogether; there's enough to make two men rich, fair and square, in this little lot. We don't want a third hand in it! What's he ever done to share it with us?—Nothing!"

"No, no, Jake; none of that!" I said. "I don't like Alf, and I think him a poor spirited creature, but, dash it all, man, a share of the profits is his own and he has as much right to his as we to ours!"

"I was only joking," said Jake forcing a laugh.

"What about keeping the Glory?" I asked presently; "you see, you've rather given yourself away, Jake, by suggesting that we should swindle Alf out of his share of our find; how am I to know after this that you and he won't plot against me?"

"What, I!" exclaimed Jake in accents most indignant; "I'd scorn the action, Joseph; you ought to know me better than that; and as for the Glory, why here it is, and you may have your turn at keeping it!"

To my surprise, Jake actually produced the diamond and placed it in my hand.

I say I was surprised, because I had not thought that the fellow would make this move, and I did not understand it. I never made the mistake of supposing him to be even temporarily honest, but I could not discern his game.

"I've been talking it over with Alf," Jake continued, "and we have agreed, subject to your opinion as an equal partner with ourselves, that the fair and square way with this here diamond is that each of us should have the keeping of it for three days at a stretch, taking turn about, and bound to produce it when asked to show it, if asked," added Jake with a leer, "though I hope none of us will be so mean as to suspect one another of fraud."

"It wouldn't be much good, would it?" I said with a laugh, "suspecting one another of parting with the thing here, where it's known; the only chance would be to get clean away with the diamond, and that would not be so easy."

"Pretty nigh impossible, I take it!" he said.

"Well, Jake, I should certainly keep a goodish look out on you, you know, or on Alf, while either of you had the jewel; and I dare say you'd do the same while I had it! Hang it, man, let's be natural, you're not so blooming high above suspicion as all that; I know you pretty well, Jake Daws, and I'm going to keep my eye on you and Alf, too, for I wouldn't trust either of you into the next street!"

"Right," said Jake, smiling very disagreeably; "then that's it, is it, and we arn't to be friendly and trusting, as partners should be, but suspicious and unpleasant? So be it then, sonny; and as it is to be so I'll just tell you this: Alf and I are afraid that you are one of those pious, white-livered idiots that do the devil's work with a prayer on their lips and a mouse's heart underneath, that makes them afraid of what they've done the moment they have done it; it's men like you that turn Queen's evidence and hang their friends, and Alf and I are not sure about you, because, as I say, we consider you a darned fool. But we have you, sonny, on toast; for since you murdered that priest——"

"I—I murdered the priest?" I stammered. "You infernal liar, Jake! What are you driving at now?"

"Where's the lie?" he said; "if anyone's the liar it's yourself, and you know it! You murdered that Josser, and you know it well enough, and so does Alf, and so do I; and what I say is this, that we don't stand no nonsense, Alf and me, and though we want to live on good terms with you, the first time you show yourself nasty or dangerous—well, we have you in hand and we shan't spare you."

"I see," I said; "all right, Jake, you needn't be afraid; I should gain nothing by giving you and Alf away; you'd better see I don't run away with the diamond, that's more to the point, as I've got it in my pocket. I'm not going to split if I did, we should all hang for that priest, my friend, whether you killed him or I."

"That may be or may not," said Jake; "meanwhile you can be sure we shall take care you don't give us the slip while it's your turn to keep the swag. You are such a darned fool, you see, that there's no knowing what you mightn't try to do. To-day's Sunday, and on Tuesday coming your keep of the jewel's over and Alf's turn begins. Lord help you if you try any games with us! I'd chuck the jewel for the pleasure of seeing you hang, any day!"

"Oh, no, you wouldn't, Jake!" I said. "You'd sell your soul for the thing, and you know it. Well, you shall see it again on Tuesday night, don't fret; I'm a partner in this business and I'm not going to wreck the ship while the cargo's in it."

"Right," said Jake; "we shall have an eye on you, though we mayn't seem to."

"There's just one more thing I wanted to say, Jake Daws, before you go," I said.

Digitized by Google

As I turned a corner in the road, two men rushed at me.

"Well, what is it?" he growled.

"I wish to say that of all the infernal liars and blackguardly scamps I ever saw, you're the worse by a big bit!" I said.

Jake did not reply, but turned and marched away in the middle of my sentence as soon as he gathered the drift of it.

In thinking over this conversation—a true interchange of civilities from start to finish—I have since come to the conclusion that Jake must have had a motive in giving me the charge of the diamond, and I think it was a double one.

I believe he wished, in the first place, to disarm any suspicion I might entertain as to the purity of his intentions, in order that he might afterwards carry out something he had in view and to the success of which a too keen watch on his actions, by me, would be prejudicial; and, in the second place, that it had struck him there was danger, during the first few days, of our theft being discovered and a hue and cry raised; in which case it would be as well that the stolen jewel, if traced at all, should be found in my possession rather than in his.

However this may have been, it was exceedingly convenient for me that Jake decided to give me the keeping of the diamond just at this crisis, for—suspecting Jake as I did to be ready for every conceivable villainy that opportunity might offer him to commit—I made sure that next time the jewel came into his hands it would remain there, and that he and Alf, or he without Alf, would disappear with it before the day fixed for our departure to Bombay.

Therefore I had no hesitation in substituting my imitation jewel for the real Eye of the Sun; and when the time came to deliver it up to Alf, the next holder, I gave that pallid and foxy individual the dummy, while I kept the real article locked up in my desk.

Alf leered as I gave him the packet; he looked into the envelope and grinned:

"Lord," he said, "don't it make you feel funny to put a thing like that in your pocket—fifty thousand pounds, I dare say it's worth; what do you think?"

"I dare say it is," I said, "quite that, and perhaps more; take care what you do with it—and see Jake doesn't get hold of it before Friday night!"

I don't know why I said that, unless it was to draw Alf out. He instantly assumed his most foxy expression, half looking round suspiciously, and listening before he replied, which he did in a whisper.

"Ah!" he said; "I see you suspect him; well, so do I, and I wish to Heaven we were clear of the scamp, you and I. Couldn't you think of any way of getting rid of him? What if you and I were to desert, now, to-day or to-morrow—with the swag, of course. I don't know how it is, Joe Wright, but dash it—I'm afraid of this devil Jake; there's no other word!"

I laughed aloud.

"Upon my soul, Alf, I'm not in the least surprised," I said, "for you know you're a most infernal coward, my man, and there's no mistake about it. And what's more, you're quite right; beware of Jake, Alf, as you would of the devil, for he's just as bad; don't you cross him, as you value your life!"

"What d'you mean? You don't think I'm in any danger, do you?" said Alf, looking desperately white.

"Not so long as you don't cross him!" I said. "Now, if I was to skoot with you and the diamond, as you suggested just now, he'd be after us in a jiff and wouldn't be standing on any ceremony, once he found us!"

"Lord help us, he's a desperate chap, I know!" said Alf, shuddering.

"Well, keep in with him, if you're afraid of him!" I said. "I don't care a hang for the fellow one way or another, myself, and I intend to have my rights. I'm not a quarrelsome man, but anyone who wrongs me had best keep a long way out of my sight, that's all I know."

Alf went away rather scared, as I meant him to be. I was dealing with a fox, so I had put on a fox's dress myself. What I wanted out of Alf Hitchins was that when Jake proposed to him to skoot with the Eye of the Sun he should consent to go, and should go a long way; I wanted them both cleared out of the place, and the sooner the better.

I succeeded admirably.

Jake and Alf deserted on the Wednesday night, carrying the diamond with them, as they thought; but as a matter of fact the Eye of the Sun was safe enough in a hiding-place that I knew of, and none else in the wide world.

We were to leave on the Saturday, but before we went I took the precaution to buy another model of the Glory in case of emergencies which I could not at present foresee, but which might of course supervene at any moment.

CHAPTER VIII.

On the Rack.

My regiment duly reached home and I with it, and in the course of time I was allowed leave to visit my old mother down in South Wales, near Fishguard in Pembrokeshire. There I spent a pleasant time, during which I never parted from my treasure, which I carried with me wherever I went.

It makes me laugh to think how few of those I met ever suspected that here was a man lugging about with him a king's ransom, and literally treading it under foot as he walked!

For the Glory of Rajpore lay hidden securely in the heel of my left shoe, and that shoe I wore night and day, sleeping and waking. I had myself hollowed out a place for it in my heel, placing it most carefully within, tightly fixed in a hole smaller than itself, well wedged into the tough leather and securely plugged in afterwards.

I had not yet made up my mind how to dispose of the gem, or laid satisfactory plans as to the story I should tell to account for my possession of it. These things required plenty of thought, and very cautious moving, and a false step might bring me into great trouble.

After all, there was no particular hurry; I was well enough off just at present, with no work to do, and plenty of time to amuse myself and to pay court to my best girl, who lived in the neighbourhood some five miles away inland, at a farm-house near Trefgarn, on the road between us and Haverfordwest.

My girl, Nest, was a bonnie young woman of about eighteen, and I was fond enough of her at that time, and she—as I thoroughly believe—of me. I used to walk over of an afternoon, take tea with her and her folks, and walk back at night—ah! what nights those were, and what scenery she lived in! I admired it all then beyond everything; I should hate the sight of it now!

Well, one night I had been up as usual. Nest was frolicsome, and when I met her and offered to kiss her she said:

"Ah, you're not the first, my man, that's offered to kiss me to-day!"

"I'm the first that's done it, I'll lay!" I said. "Who are you talking of, Nest?"

"And a handsome man, too, and offered to walk out with me!" continued Nest, laughing.

I laughed too, for I knew there was nothing to fear: Nest could take care of herself as well as another.

"You went, of course!" I said.

"I said I had a lover," she continued, "and as for the kiss he might take it if he could."

I laughed and kissed the girl, and was about to speak of something else, but Nest held me to the subject.

"You've not heard the best of it yet!" she said.

"Go on, then," I said, "you fetched him one in the chops and ran home, I'll be sworn!"

"No, I didn't," laughed Nest, "for he was very polite and didn't offer to touch me. 'He's a lucky chap any way, that other one!' he said, 'and if ever you should want to make a little change, why, you've only to let me know; a young farmer, no doubt, belonging to these parts, and a Welshman your lover is, and I'll bet half-a-crown I'll guess his name in three shots—if he's a Welshman he's an Evans, or a Jones, or a Williams, come now?'

"'Well, you've lost your money this time,' I said, 'for he isn't a farmer, and he isn't a Welshman, but a soldier of the Queen's and an Englishman, and his name isn't one of the three you said.'

"'Why, lord! then I've lost my money!' he laughed. 'I'll owe it you, and that'll give me another opportunity of seeing your pretty face; why, I am a soldier myself and so is my friend here'—he had another man with him, I forgot to say—'and maybe I've met your bloke out in the world; now what may his name be if it isn't Evans, nor Jones, nor yet Williams?'

"Well, I told him your name, since he was so polite and pleasant about it all, and you'd have laughed to see the effect! 'Oh Lord!' said the other man, and my man immediately hit him in the mouth.

"'My friend's astonished,' he said laughing, 'and so am I, to speak truth, for this is a kind of coincidence—we know your man well, we're in the same regiment—you'd hardly believe it, but it's true; and we've lived together in India five years, and are now living together at the regimental depôt; we were, at least, till we separated for leave. You can tell him you saw Tom Weston and Bill Hanley; we're living at Goodwick, near Fishguard, where my people are staying; so shake hands, miss, if you will, and may we be better acquainted soon—shall you be seeing your man to-day?'

"'This evening,' I said, 'for sure—he comes every other night.'

"'Then you tell him you saw Tom Weston!' said my friend, and with that they both set off walking fast towards Goodwick along the Fishguard Road."

"Well," I said, when Nest had finished, "that certainly was a bit of a coincidence, just as Tom said, and I'll look up him and Billy to-morrow at Goodwick, and I don't know but what we'll have a drink together; they ain't bad chaps, either of them, and they're as thick as soup. I didn't know Tom had friends down here, though, and how it is I never heard of it is what beats me!"

"Come down to the seaside for a bit of change, like enough!" said Nest, and there the conversation ended.

Well, that night, after saying good-night to my girl and watching her back along the road, I started to walk homewards to Fishguard, and I had not gone half a mile when suddenly as I turned a corner in the road, two men rushed at me and bore me to the ground before I could raise a finger in my own defence; it was so dark that I could not see their faces, and it was not until they began to speak that I recognised the rascals.

One of them had fetched me such a whack on the head with some hard stick or knuckle-duster, that I hardly resisted as they bound me hand and foot; and it was only after this had been performed that either of them spoke.

"There," said one, at last, "that has the joker safe, I think, blast him; now then, Joe, you thieving, lying rascal, what have you to say for yourself? Tighten that thong round his ankles, Alf, and see that the sneak don't kick you in the mug."

There was no doubt as to the identity of the speaker. It was Jake, of course; Jake, whom I fondly imagined to be far away in India, raging—together with Alf—over their dummy diamond, or still rejoicing in fancied possession of the real article; the very last two persons I should have expected to meet in Pembrokeshire this night!

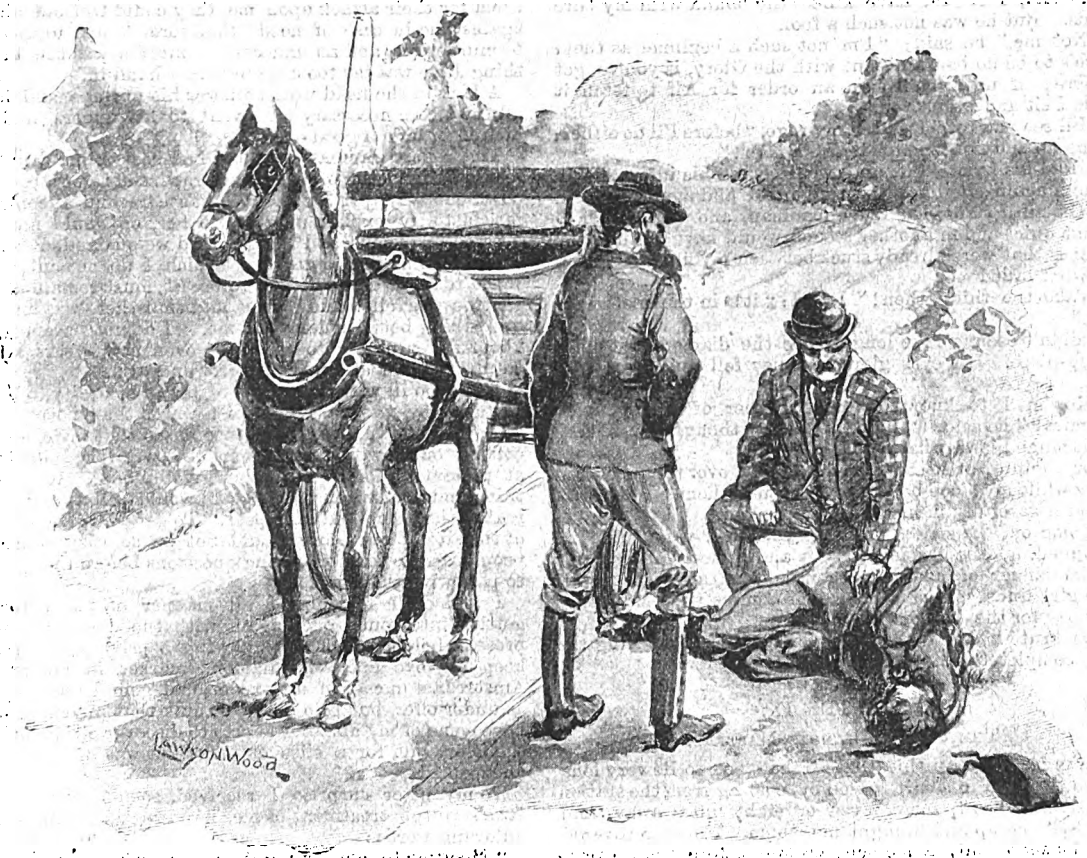
"So you thought you were a bit too clever for us, you rascal, did you?" he said, kicking me with his foot as I lay; "you infernal, swindling, thieving blackguard—robbing honest men of their share of the swag, and putting them off with a dummy thing that any fool would know to be a fraud at the first glance—a pretty sort of partner you are!

"Then where is it?"

"Find out, if you're smart enough!" I said, laughing aloud in bravado, though, as a matter of fact, I didn't feel greatly amused by the turn events had taken.

"Oh, we're not to know, aren't we?" said Jake; "right you are, sonny. Hand us over the matches, Alf, and don't stand shivering there like a blooming telegraph wire!" Jake turned me over on my face—I could not imagine what he intended to do with me, but if I had known I could have done nothing to prevent him, for my hands were bound so



Two men in a cart passed by, coming from the station.

Come, hand over the Glory and be hanged, and we'll see what's to be done with your infernal carcase afterwards!"

"The honest men cleared off pretty sharp with the false diamond," I laughed, "and thought it was the real one, even though any fool would know it! None of your infernal hypocrisy, Jake; speak up straight, like a man, and let's know what you want of me; I was a bit too sharp for you, and you know it well enough; you thought to have me and I had you instead."

"That may be," said Jake, "but we've got you now, and we're going to score the King, my son; we've been on your track for a fortnight, and now we've got you we don't intend to let you go till the account's squared, and perhaps not then; skulking, swindling rascals like you aren't fit to live, and are better under the sod than above it. Now, what about this yere diamond; is it sold? You'd better tell the truth, you know, for we intend to put the screw on till you do; we have you fair, and you know it. Now then, is it sold or not?"

"No, it isn't," I said.

tightly behind my back that I was as helpless as a babe. He turned me over, as I say, on my face, using his foot to do it, and doing it roughly, too; I swore and abused him, but he only laughed.

"Hold his wrists tightly, Alf, you lubber," continued Jake.

Alf caught hold of my wrists to keep my arms motionless, and I then discovered what the hound Jake intended to do with me.

He lit matches and stuck them between my fingers. I have since learnt that this was a favourite practice, in the old days of inquisition and torture, among those who desired to obtain a confession or some secret from their victims.

"Now we shall soon know all about it, sonny!" said Jake.

In less time than it takes to describe it, the matches set burning between my fingers had burnt down and began to cause me the most excruciating agony. I dug my toes into the ground and bit the earth under my nose for a second or two, resolved to bear the pain and utter no sound; I felt that I would give worlds, if I had them, to be able to defy this unspeakable rascal, and Heaven itself—if I had it—to get the better of him. But I could not stand the pain; I twisted and yelled and shouted to Jake for the love of God to blow out the matches.

Jake instantly did so.

"Aha!" he said, "so you're going to be wise in time, are you? that's being a sensible man instead of an 'idiot. Let go his wrists, Alf. Now then, what about this Glory—where is it?"

"Loosen my hands and legs and I'll tell you!" I said. If he had, I should have killed the hound with my bare hands. But he was not such a fool.

"Not me," he said; "I'm not such a beginner as that; there's to be no bargain; out with the Glory, if you've got it here; if not, you'll sign an order for Alf to fetch it while I sit and watch you."

"I'll see you rot," I said in my rage, "before I'll do either; let me up and fight me for it like a man!"

Hold his wrists, Alf, and we'll scorch his infernal skin for him again; he likes it!" said Jake; and again Alf held me, though I struggled like a madman, and together they got me quiet and in another second would have lighted the matches that were already stuck between my fingers. Then my heart failed me.

"Take the thing, then!" I said; "it's in the heel of my boot."

It didn't occupy Jake long to dig the diamond out of its hiding-place. His eyes glared as they fell upon it, so did Alf's.

"How'm I to know it's not another of those cursed dummies?" he said. "Lord! it can't be though, can it, Alf! See it shine! lord, what a gem it is!"

For a minute or so the two men gloated over the recovered Glory while my blood boiled as I watched them. Then Jake placed it carefully in his waistcoat pocket.

"Come on," he said; "I'd kill you, Joe, you thief," he continued, addressing me as I lay and fumed, "if it wasn't for the danger of hanging; as it is you can lie there till your girl finds you, or someone else, curse you, and here's your pay for the diamond!"

The brute kicked me violently on the head, knocking the sense completely out of me, and made off.

CHAPTER IX.

The Glory Changes Masters.

I was fortunate in this that: I had not to lie very long before two men in a cart passed by, coming from the station at Haverfordwest, some seven or eight miles away, and they took me up and brought me home. I had recovered consciousness only a moment or two before they came; perhaps the rattle of their wheels had roused me, but I was silly, so to speak, all the way home, and unable to answer satisfactorily the questions they put to me.

As a matter of fact I could not at the time recall very clearly what had happened to me. I said I had been robbed, but I had the sense to remember I must remain silent about the diamond. The necessity to be silent on that topic had become a law of nature to me. I fancy my friends imagined that I was drunk; but the fact that I was bound hand and foot and with but one boot on (for Jake had pitched the other away after cutting the gem out of it) puzzled them immensely.

"Why, where's the other boot, lad?" they asked me.

"I had all my money in it," I had the sense to reply, "and the blackguards found it and took the whole boot."

"Who were they?" I was asked a dozen times.

"Lord knows!" said I.

"Yes, and you too!" one of the fellows laughed; "you've been drinking, sonny, with a friend or two, that's what's the matter, and you ain't going to give 'em away; well that's your affair, not ours!"

No, I was not going to give them away, nor myself either; and though the pain in my head from Jake's savage kick was bad enough, and kept me pretty silly all through that drive, I'm glad to say I had the sense to keep my own counsel.

Why did not Jake murder me right out?

Well, he wasn't such a fool; that's the plain English of it. He had the whip-hand of me and he knew it; he had the Glory safe in his pocket; he had evidence against me, he and Alf together—that is, they could manufacture evidence between them—that I had murdered a Hindoo priest, and in the remote contingency of my denouncing them for their attack upon me, they could trot out all this against me in case of need; therefore it was unnecessary to murder me, and an unnecessary murder was the kind of thing Jake was far too cute to take a hand in.

A kick in the head would answer his purpose and let off all the steam necessary for a vent to his anger; and that kick I got, and a good one too!

The report circulated that I had been found drunk and mauled, the victim of a drunken brawl, and I got a bad name down our way. It came to Nest's ears and I could not satisfactorily explain matters to her, or would not. She became suspicious, and I angry, and we quarrelled over it.

This is a part of my history which I do not intend the world to know details of, therefore it must remain at this, that we quarrelled and parted, and that there was an end of everything between Nest and me. I do not care to write about it for others to read, for even now, years after, I think of the break-up with regret and pain.

I was too ill with the effects of Jake's brutality to be able to take any very active steps towards the recovery of the "Glory," but though I now recognised that my chances of coming out a winner in this matter were very faint indeed at present, I did not altogether give up hope. A thousand things might happen before Jake would sell the gem and realise the value and disappear. To get rid of a diamond of the size of our Glory would not be so easy a matter; people are so fond of asking questions before they consent to part with their money.

I had half formulated all manner of plans towards getting into touch once again with the diamond and its present holders, such as employing a private detective to keep an eye upon the diamond market in London and Amsterdam in case of an exceptional gem being reported as under offer, but I do not now think that anything would have come of my amateur efforts to discover either Jake or the Glory but for a slice of luck that was as welcome as unexpected.

To my utter surprise I received, some few days after Jake's savage treatment of me, a post-card containing the following words:

"Meet me to-morrow night at nine where you saw me and Jake; have a most important communication to make; don't fail.—Alf."

Needless to say I kept the appointment.

I took the precaution however to take with me, loaded, a huge clumsy revolver that my mother kept in the house, a treasured possession of my dead father's; this was a weapon that carried a bullet of the size of a crow's egg, or near it, and the drum contained four chambers; a wonderful pistol, indeed, and I cannot imagine where my father could have picked it up. However, it was just as well that my mother had it in the house, for I did not relish meeting either of these two rascals—and likely enough both—unarmed.

I also took with me my second dummy diamond, which I still had by me in case of emergency. I did not anticipate that I should get a chance of successfully substituting the sham for the real a second time, but something prompted me to take it on the chance, and I carried it in my pocket.

I had not to wait long for Alf. He came down the road towards our rendezvous, and I could see, even in the dusk, that he was alone. The sight of him made me very angry, for I could not forget that he had assisted Jake in the villainy of the other evening. If I had done as my fingers itched to do, I should have run out at the fellow and administered to him the very finest thrashing he ever had in his life; but I was curious to learn the object of his coming.

"Well, Alf, you infernal rascal," was my greeting to him; "what villainy's on hand now?"

"Lord, Joe, how you frightened me!" he muttered, starting violently back at my first words; "my nerves have all gone to the eternal dogs through living with that arch-devil Jake."

"Oh, so Jake's an arch-devil is he?" I said; "yet you seemed quite content to be his partner and help him in his cowardly villainies. What d'you mean by abetting him in his attack upon me in the dark, and aiding him to torture and rob me, you rascal you! D'you know what I've a mind to do? I've a mind to take and give you the soundest thrashing a man can get without needing to be buried. Now, what have you brought me here for?"

"Not to quarrel, Joe," said Alf. "On my life I'd have taken your side t'other night, if I could; but Jake carries the arms, he'd have shot or stabbed me in a minute, and you too. I'd rather be on your side than on his, and you know it. I told you so in India, but you wouldn't take me on."

"Well, what is it now?" I said coldly.

"I was going to tell you," he replied; "I've come to consult you. I'd as soon be below as living with Jake, and that's the truth; no one knows what a devil he is, but I. I'd kill the hound if I dared, for the things he says to me, and the things he threatens. Now would you, for half the Glory, which we'd share, join me in an attack on him? it would be easy enough to get him out here any night; I could lead him by one of these rocks just as you passed by us t'other night; but this time you'd be the one to pounce out and he'd be the one to drop; with you to help I wouldn't mind risking the rest. I tell you neither you nor I will ever touch a pennyworth of our diamond while that chap's upside of the sod!"

"Come, stow that, Alf!" I said; "I don't go in for murder, you know that well enough. I'd go as far as partnering you to get back the gem, and of sharing the proceeds with you if we can sell the infernal thing, but when you begin to talk about putting this chap Jake away after your own particular cowardly and generally blackguardly fashion, I tell you straight that you're an infernal villain, Alf, and I'm not on. You bring me the Glory and we'll give Jake the slip together, if you like; but mind you, once we've sold the big diamond and shared the money you'll go and live in one hemisphere and I in another, for I'll never look at your infernal face again."

"You're polite to-night, I must say," said Alf.

"Well, what about the Glory?" I continued. "Can you get hold of it and bring it? I'll protect you from Jake afterwards. Lord! he isn't likely to catch me napping a second time. Where is Jake now?"

"Down at the farm house talking to the girl Nest," said Alf, "he sent me out to walk about a bit while he went in; he sees her every day; it's for her sake we stayed down here; he said Haverfordwest would be the last place you'd look for us; he's going it with your girl, I can tell you, Joe; that's one of the reasons why I thought you wouldn't mind stretching a point—you're so bloomin' conscientious, you are—and helping to get him out of the way; that, and the kick on the head, and the matches, and so on!"

I sat down a moment to think. If murder was ever justifiable, I should surely be justified in aiding Alf to get rid of this hound of a Jake! Did ever barefaced effrontery equal this of his?

"Where's the Glory at this moment?" I said presently, speaking hoarsely from pass on.

"I've got it here," said Alf most unexpectedly.

"What?" I shouted, springing upon him in an instant, "you have it here? Hand it over before I throttle you—quick!" I shook the wretch as a terrier would a kitten. His teeth chattered in his head.

"Oh, I can't," Alf blubbered, "not till I know what you're going to do about it, I daren't!"

"Hand it over, I tell you, before I murder you right out; don't you see I'm desperate, you fool? Hand it over before I count three!" I took my revolver from my pocket.

"Here, take it, take it—don't shoot," cried Alf; "take it and come away off the road and consult. I'm afraid of Jake here—I want you to have the Glory, I swear I do, you and me together!" Alf drew me up the hill at the side of the road; we scrambled along for a hundred yards or more. I had the Glory safe in my waistcoat pocket. Then we sat down, breathless with our hurried move.

"Now, what's to be done?" panted Alf. "What do you propose? This cursed diamond will be the death of me in the end, I feel it!"

I could see the wretched man's face shining in the dusk with the sweat of terror; but the Glory was in my pocket, and I was going to triumph over Jake, and my anger was consequently evaporating fast.

"Here's my plan, Alf," I said; "you're such an infernal coward that you're not worth helping out of this mess, properly speaking, but I'm going to help you all the same. Lord knows why, unless it is that I loathe Jake even more than you. See this?" I placed the sham stone in his hand.

"It's the Glory," said Alf; "aren't you——"

"No it isn't," I laughed; "you don't touch the Glory again, my beauty. Here she is, look at her!" I now produced the real gem. "That other's another dummy like the first. I bought two. The other took Jake in nicely: this one will deceive him also until he tries to sell it."

"Lord!" was all that Alf could say.

"Now you take this dummy back," I continued, "and put it where you took the other from; Jake won't suspect—why should he? And to-morrow night meet me here, exactly here, at nine. Is it business?"

"Lord bless you for this, Joe!" he said, "I shall be saved yet. I'll come to-morrow—without fail; he's sure to want to see the girl to-morrow, the same as to-night—lord! to think you had a second of these things—talk of plans! You're a genius, Joe, and you're going to save me out of the devil's hands. I'll never forget it—I swear it!"

At this moment a whistle came from down in the glen and Alf hurried away; it was Jake signalling for him.

A Learned Turkey.

The oatfields were cropped bare as a convict's head. The corn was in the shock and there was a touch of winter in the winds which blew over the hill pasture. The months had gone by since the thoughtful turkey had been brought in squawking from the lane. He had grown large and portly and carried himself with dignity.

Fortune, which had appeared to him in the guise of Hilda, had been very kind to him. He had been permitted to share the lawn with an aged peacock of great personal beauty, from whom he had learnt gentle manners and deportment. He had dined daily at the kitchen door. In the evenings he had stood near the doorstep, where Hilda and John—John is the farm servant—sat and talked.

Their conversation was not instructive. They talked chiefly about themselves and a cottage and love and other foolish topics, but it afforded the turkey food for thought. He would stand soberly on one leg, as the shadows deepened and the stars came out, and watch the working of their minds.

"It is plain," he said one evening, "that they are thoughtlessly optimistic."

He was watching them closely, John had taken one of Hilda's red hands in his brown hand and was looking particularly and fatuously happy.

"When the corn's in, Hilda," John was saying, "I'll ask the old man if we can have the little wooden house."

"He'll be only too glad," said Hilda.

"I fancy he's expecting it," said John.

"It'll be big enough for us," said Hilda.

"For the present," said John, and looked so particularly foolishly happy that the turkey turned away in disgust. He strolled across the lawn in deep thought.

Like all those who are solitary or have the society only of inferiors, he had fallen into the habit of talking to himself.

"It is evident," he said, speaking his thoughts aloud, "that these two people will marry. They will move into the little wooden house. They will live there. They are such poor, dull creatures, they will not even know they are unhappy. They will have children and in their simple way be happier still. Poor things! It is bad enough to be unhappy and know it. How much worse is the state of those who are unhappy and think they are happy! Poor things!"

He stood on one leg and thought.

The moonlight streamed down and made a silhouette of him in black shadow on the whitening lawn. He stood there for an hour, immovable; only his brain kept turning, turning and evolving thoughts.

"It is really very ridiculous," he said, "but I can't think of any way of putting an end to this wretched state of affairs. I am not at my best to-night."

"What seems to be the matter?" asked the peacock, who came up, trailing a yard of rainbow plumage behind him.

"I am thinking," said the turkey rather disdainfully. "It is an operation which will not interest you."

"Ah, perhaps not," said the peacock. "What were you thinking about? And why were you doing it?"

"I was thinking," the turkey replied—for he was always willing to talk—"I was thinking, or, to be more accurate, I was trying to think, of some way of stopping this silly habit people have of coming into the world, eating, and going out of the world again, leaving behind them a certain number of 'understudies'—to use a phrase taken from the slang of the theatre—to repeat the ridiculous operation."

"So you've begun to think about that, have you?" said the peacock laughing. "Well, I should think you would."

"What are you laughing at?" the thoughtful turkey asked sharply.

"Oh, nothing," said the peacock; "of course you are interested in the question. I am not, you see."

"Well, I don't see."

"You don't see? Well, you're particularly slow-witted even for a turkey," said the peacock.

"Perhaps you'll explain," the turkey rejoined sarcastically.

"Certainly," said the peacock; "why not?"

"Go on," said the turkey.

"Well, they come into the world, don't they?"

"They do," said the thoughtful turkey, "though I've never yet thought to think where they come from. I'll do it to-morrow. Go on—people come into the world."

"What do they do?" asked the peacock, with growing triumph.

"What do they do? Eat," said the philosophical turkey.

"Eat what?"

"Oh, all sorts of——"

"You!" screamed the peacock in a burst of triumph, "you. They eat you. They pick your bones. They suck the marrow out of your thigh bones. Some of 'em prefer white meat, and some of 'em dark, and some of 'em say, 'It's immaterial, thank you.' So it is to them. But it's not to you. Oh, no, it's you they are eating, and——"

"Stop! stop!" cried the thoughtful turkey. "This is too horrible. It is some ghastly, grim, and fearful jest. Eat me?"

Digitized by Google

"Eat you," said the peacock more calmly! "They eat you, my learned friend, after you have been roasted to a beautiful brown."

The thoughtful turkey groaned aloud.

"You seem to be in earnest," he said after a pause.

"I am," the peacock replied. "Why are you here? Have you thought of that?"

"I have often pondered upon it—why am I here, where did I come from, and why did I come?"

"Well, I'll tell you. You were brought here to be fattened. The maid supplied the food, and your reckless gluttony did the rest. You are fat."

"I'm no fatter than you," retorted the turkey.

"Ah, that's a different matter," the peacock chuckled. "I am not food; I am beauty. No, my poor friend, we shall have to part—you to the table and I shall remain here. It is your fate to be done brown and eaten; I walk here fancy free. I have seen ten generations of you eaten. You are the eleventh, my young fellow."

"It is impossible," groaned the thoughtful turkey.

"Time will tell," said the peacock.

For a long time the turkey was plunged in thought. He strode to and fro, and at last paused in his walk in front of the peacock.

"It must be done," he said grimly. "Listen, my friend. I have no desire to be eaten. I have an instinctive feeling that it would be unpleasant. Therefore I refuse. But I can see only one way to escape this fate. I must do as you have done."

"What?" asked the peacock breathlessly, for he had forgotten his own remark.

"I must be beautiful," said the turkey.

The peacock looked dubious.

"Yes," said the turkey firmly. "I must be beautiful, very beautiful, far too beautiful to be eaten. Leave me! I would think."

* * * * *

Haggard and pale from his long night vigil the thoughtful turkey lifted his eyes to the east. Already a band of greyish light lay close against the earth, and above it the darkness was thinning. Slowly the sun pushed up a red and inflamed shoulder and the light spread. The birds began to twitter, for it was day. The turkey bathed his burning brow in the dew and shook himself once or twice.

"Courage!" he muttered, "courage!"

He walked briskly across the barnyard, through the gate and on down the lane. At first he met no one. Tears came to his eyes. He was very lonely, and his nervous system was shattered. The sun was higher by this time, and the light was dancing and shimmering on the fields and breaking in curious refractions of pale purple and pink among the poplar trees. Although he knew that the admiration of crude and natural nature was bourgeois, and even a trifle vulgar, he could not help being touched with a sense of satisfaction at the beauty of the scene.

It was, he felt, a crude imitation of Monet, but, after all, there was in it a hint of Monet's genius. He was in a mood of æsthetic satisfaction; the moment was one of those which lay one open to new impressions. Then he saw her. She was young and slim and walked with grace and dignity. Her eyes were on the ground, and her wings trailed indolently as she sauntered towards him in the pale multicoloured sunlight. The thoughtful turkey had an impression of æsthetic delight in her sensuous beauty, and then two thoughts passed through his mind. The first was:

"How much more beautiful she is than the peacock!"

and the second was: "I hope she is not my sister!" He went up to her boldly and gave her the salute of the morning. She started as though she had not seen him—perhaps she had not.

"You are very beautiful," he said.

She held down her head.

"I have heard so much about you," she said, when the ice was broken. "You live up at the house, and are very learned."

"Yes, I think a great deal," he said.

"I am your cousin twice removed," she explained later in the conversation.

"You are very beautiful," he replied.

They walked on. Much later in the morning she said; "You, too, are beautiful, dear one, very beautiful!" She sighed. The thoughtful turkey started, as though for a moment he had hardly taken the measure of her words.

"I am beautiful?"

"Very beautiful, my own," she whispered.

He cried aloud in his joy and flapped his wings and pawed the turf.

"It is because I love you," she added.

He became thoughtful.

* * * * *

The snow was on the ground; the snow hung on the trees; the snow sifted through the air and fell softly everywhere. The thoughtful turkey, with a firm tread and a look of resolution on his intelligent features, walked rapidly down a narrow turning that led to a little wooden house set in one corner of the farm. As he came near the door he paused. He crept closer and listened. He could hear them talking.

"I've always said," one of them was remarking (that was John), "that there's nothing better for a Christmas dinner——"

"In your own house," put in Hilda.

"In your own house," said John, "nothing better than a cut of nice pork out of the side——"

"Cooked by your own wife," said Hilda.

"Of course," said John, "with the crackling on and apple sauce."

"Next year," said Hilda, "we'll have a turkey. I'll set the eggs under the speckled hen."

"Yes, next year," said John, "but not that I don't like pork."

"Oh, dear, no!" said Hilda. "The idea of not liking pork!"

Outside in the snow the thoughtful turkey smiled sadly.

"Poor fools," he said, "even now, I dare say, they imagine they are happy—and they have been married a month. Poor things!" And when the door was opened he stalked in and stood in the middle of the floor.

"Good gracious!" cried Hilda. "It's my turkey."

"The one the farmer gave you?" asked John.

"Yes, the one that ran away."

"We'll have him for dinner to-morrow."

"Of course," said Hilda. "Isn't it lucky?"

"Of course," said John. "Whoever heard of eating pork on Christmas day?"

"It's ridiculous," said Hilda. "And won't he be beautiful when he's browned?"

"He's rather thin," said John; "but he'll be beautiful when he's cooked."

The thoughtful turkey smiled sadly; he knew much better. He was only beautiful while she loved him.

A Desert Magician.

THE little party about Calkins' camp fire consisted of the theosophist, a dried-up little man with pinched features and a waxy complexion, the old lady with the black mits, and myself. The theosophist had been discoursing on occult matters in general, as was usual with him when a patient audience was available, and had but just concluded a little dissertation on the nature of elementals, "those strange, almost unknown, creatures of the astral light," as he expressed it.

Calkins had been listening with apparently the deepest interest, and shook his head impressively as the theosophist concluded. Then, as though framing an unalterable conclusion, derived from dire experience, he remarked confidentially to the old lady with the black mits: "The less you and me, ma'am, and these here gen'lemen or anyone has to do with them there slippery bein's, the better for 'em," and he sighed profoundly as at some sad retrospect.

"You don't really mean to say, Mr. Calkins, that you have personally had any knowledge of those marvellous beings of whom my brother has just spoken?" exclaimed the old lady, pausing in her knitting, with open-mouthed astonishment.

"P'raps not, ma'am; maybe I've mistook the kind of bein's the gen'leman was referrin' to; p'raps I'm all wrong," responded Calkins. "Like enough. I'm no scholar, and don't pretend to it. But the ones he described just now is so near like them as I once run against that it looked like they must naturally be of the same breed, anyhow. It's perhaps best just to give you the story of my singular meetin' with 'em, and then you can judge about the whole thing for yourself, ma'am." And without waiting for further invitation, with an air of dreamy reminiscence, Calkins began:

"Ten years ago come July, I was workin' in off the desert from a prospectin' trip south and east of the Carga Muchacha country, where I'd been stumpin' about chippin' rock all the spring without strikin' anything that'd anyways do to tie to. My provisions had about given out; it was growin' too hot to work, and the water was gettin' low in the tanks, so I thought I'd give it up for that year, and was comin' in to potter around about a little dry ranch I owned near the 'Duatre.'

"I was travellin' by peaks and a little pocket compass, by night mostly, on account of the heat, and the country I was goin' through was new to me. I'd been five days makin' seventy mile, and had that many more to get over before ever I'd strike 'French Joe's,' the nearest place where there was any white man reg'larly livin' so far as I then knew. This was why I was kind o' surprised when we was windin' up the sixth night's travellin', it bein' just before sunrise, to see smoke risin' from a little granite butte about a mile ahead, and a figure movin' round a camp fire. When I was a few hundred yards away the tall, thin man by the fire looked up for the first time, and seein' me comin' he hailed, and the sound of his voice brought it right back to me who he was. I'd met him some years before down about Tucson, where he'd set himself up for a 'bad man' and went by the name of Dutch Pete.

"He was as ugly to look at as ever I've seen a man. He had small black eyes, close together, a thin, waxy, big-boned face, and thick, straight black hair, just grizzlin'. He'd had considerable schoolin' so 'twas generally reported, havin' been something like a doctor in his own country, and he could speak a dozen languages like he was born to 'em, and when he was in camp he was always experimentin' with herbs and minerals, boilin' and mixin' and monkeyin' with 'em generally, so folks said.

"He looked at me without speaking at first, when once I'd got up to the fire, but he didn't no ways seem to recollect meetin' me before, and I didn't let on that I'd ever seen him. Then, when he'd looked me over, he was no end obligin' and told me where to get water for my burros from a big tank just by camp, and suggested I'd better settle down with him for a day or two and rest up and look over the claims he was developin' over on the next butte about a mile away. There was plenty of fry cohete grass all about the camp, and havin' a long way yet to go, I concluded to fall in with his idea and stop awhile before tacklin' the rest of the trip.

"That same morning, I went over with him to the other butte to look at his claims, and they all showed up very promisin', bein' every way the best prospects I'd seen in some years; and when in the evenin' after we'd got back to camp, he proposed my holdin' on where I was and workin' in with him for grub and a third interest in everything after I'd put in a year's time, it ended by my comin' to terms. I didn't much care for such a partner as Pete, but the idea of gettin' an interest in them claims stood off all such like objections, and I started in to work next day braced up and cheerful at the prospect ahead of me.

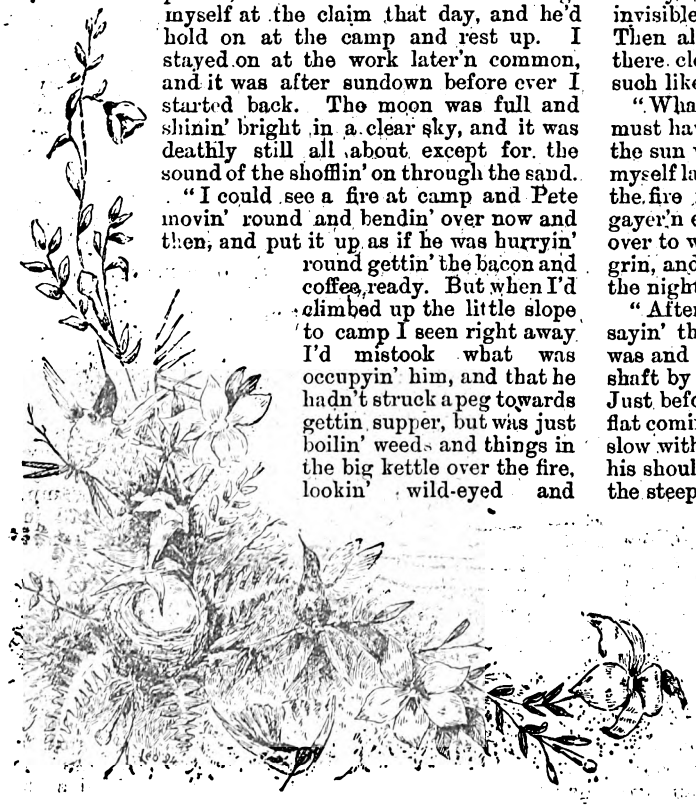
"Pete was a sullen, notional kind of man, and his goin's on was generally so altogether out of the common that I'd begun to put him up as being just a little 'loco,' and while the idea didn't make me noways comfortable when we was together, it brought me somehow to make allowances, as you might say, for some of his singular behaviour. Sometimes after supper he'd set for hours not replyin' to things I'd ask him, but talkin' in a low tone to himself, lookin' off over the desert like he was gazing at something miles and miles away.

"Then, gen'rally, about the full of the moon, he'd cook up messes of desert herbs and bottle up the juices from 'em, and when I'd inquire what he was tryin' to get at he'd just give a low chuckle way down in his throat and stare at me without saying nothin'—and that was all I'd ever get out of him. He had a dirty lookin' old book, bound in spotted, black leather, with curious lookin' writin' on the yaller pages, like I'd never seen before, that he set a heap by.

"He'd get this old book out and read it by the fire of an evenin' for an hour at a time, and then he'd take a stick and draw queer figures on the sand-triangles, circles, and sech like, lookin' at the book now and then, like he was follerin' some partic'lar directions, and mumblin' to himself in a sort of sing-song way all the time. I felt sure from all this business that it was a clear case of him being crack-headed, and I never felt noways easy when them queer spells was on him.

"One mornin' when I was startin' out for the shaft Pete made excuse about him not feelin' up to work, sayin' he'd slept bad, and that I'd have to run things myself at the claim that day, and he'd hold on at the camp and rest up. I stayed on at the work later'n common, and it was after sundown before ever I started back. The moon was full and shinin' bright in a clear sky, and it was deathly still all about except for the sound of the shofflin' on through the sand.



"I could see a fire at camp and Pete movin' round and bendin' over now and then, and put it up as if he was hurryin' round gettin' the bacon and coffee ready. But when I'd climbed up the little slope to camp I seen right away I'd mistook what was occupyin' him, and that he hadn't struck a peg towards gettin supper, but was just boilin' weeds and things in the big kettle over the fire, lookin' wild-eyed and mutterin' to himself like he always did when he had one of them spells on.

"His black book was lyin' open on a flat rock by the fire, and every now and then he'd look at it and then drop a pinch of somethin' into the kettle. He was so took up with his work that he didn't seem to know that I'd got back to camp, and didn't make no answer when I asked what was up.

"Seein' how he was occupied I reckoned I'd best not disturb him, and so lighted a fire for myself a little ways off from where he was doin' his boilin' and experimentin'. I was turnin' away to fetch the coffee pot and fryin' pan when Pete screeched out: 'I've got it. Mein Gott!' He was dancin' round the fire like a wild man, wavin' his arms in the air, snappin' his fingers, and all the time half singin' to himself. 'You have got it,' thinks I, 'and terrible bad this time sure.'

"I'm comin' now, ma'am," continued Calkins with an impressive air of frankness, addressing the old lady with black mits, who had paused in her knitting and regarded him with an expression of mingled perplexity, interest, and irritation, "to a statement of them partic lar facts as made me sort of hesitate to give you this here sing'lar experience, and I'm free to allow that what I've got to tell comes pretty nigh passin' all belief. I felt right away that somethin' strange and startlin' was comin' off just then and there.

"The stuff in the kettle was hissin' and snappin' and sendin' up silvery sparkles, and a thin blue column-like mist rose up from the top, wavin' into the air and growin' all the time higher and bigger, and kind of takin' form as it rose. Then came a sound like a swishin' of great wings through the air all about us, and you could feel the cold draught they made as the invisible bein's, they belonged to swung round the fire. Then all of a sudden it grew ice cold, though I stood there close to the blaze, and, bein' naturally rattled by such like goin's on, I just toppled over like.

"What happened next of course I don't know, but I must have been as good as stone dead all that night, for the sun was well up when I looked about, and found myself layin' on my blankets with Pete potterin' round the fire fryin' bacon. He was powerful cheerful and gayer'n ever I'd seen him; but when I got up and went over to where he was cookin'; he just looked up with a grin, and made no kind of allusion to what had gone on the night before.

"After breakfast he surprised me considerable by sayin' that, bein' as I looked done up, I'd stay where I was and hold down the camp, and he'd go on up to the shaft by himself. Then he went off hummin' a tune. Just before sundown he showed up again way out on the flat comin' in from the claim, and I seen he was travellin' slow with some heavy weight in the ore sack slung over his shoulder. When he got his wind after climbin' up the steep slope to camp he told me to fetch out the canvas layin' under my beddin' and he'd show me somethin' worth seein'. When I'd laid it out near the fire he emptied the ore sack into it, and laughed when he seen my eyes widen out. There was at least two dozen clean gold nuggets of all shapes and sizes, from as big as a plum to the size of my fist. I was that took aback at this showin' that I just couldn't speak for a minute.

"Then at last says I: 'Where did them come from?' And he says, still laughing: 'Them comes from the claims!' 'Whose claims?' then says I. 'Whose but my own?' replies he, kind of short like; and then I quit askin' questions and got right away down to thinkin' what a third of them nuggets and the claims they come from was worth, that bein' the share I was to have, under our contract, as you'll recollect, ma'am.

"Ever since the night I'd been knocked out, Pete had gone off on a new lead altogether. He'd leave camp first thing after sun-up, and would never allow of me goin' with him up to the claims, givin' out some reason or other for wantin' to go up alone.

"This had gone on for three days runnin', each night Pete comin' back, like he had the first time, with a sack full of nuggets; and naturally I begun gettin' riled at bein' laid on the shelf that way, and my curiosity got to workin'. I more'n half suspicioned that Pete's big luck was some way related to them queer goin's on that night by the fire.

"Then I made up my mind that I wasn't goin' to get wiser by just mopin' round camp, and concluded to rustle about on the quiet and inquire into things. So next morning, Pete havin' gone off as usual, I hung round a couple of hours after doin' my chores, and then filled my canteen, and takin' along a snack of my noonin', started out on the trail to the claim.

"The sand was hot and the air stifflin', and I had an uncomfortable feelin' somehow that I was out on a dangerous errand, and that I'd be up to my neck in trouble before ever I'd make the round trip. I'd shuffled along through the sand not more'n quarter way to the butte, when on a sudden I heard what seemed like a hurricane blowin' high up in the air, but though I looked up in the sky I couldn't see nothin' to account for the sound, and I just stopped short where I was, wonderin'. Then, off towards the butte towards which I was headin', I could see at first tens and then right away hundreds of little wavin' columns of sand, each one in a whirl, growin' all the time higher and higher, and bigger and ruslin' on towar's me.

"Then the sand whirls, which first along jostled each other, all joined together and came sweepin' on in a swayin' wall like waves on a beach. Blasts of hot, with-rin' wind parched the air, and deep clouds of dust spread over the sky like a curtain and blurred out the sun. Then it grew dusk, and close all round me I could hear the same sound of flappin' and rustlin' I had heard that night by the fire, and low chucklin' sounds, like lunatics laughin', and strange blammering voices, and mixed in with them all the shrill sound of Pete's, like he was there flyin' round in the air with them other invisible jays and enjoyin' the circus.

"All this had come on in less time than it takes me tell it—and talk about stampedin' and panics! I was that panic-struck and scared clean through and through that I just tore back to camp like Old Nick was let loose behind me—askin' your pardon, ma'am, for that manner of speakin'. My burros was there standin' close side by side with their noses together and tremblin'. Half blind with the sand and my heart bumpin' hard, my breath about gone, and my head in a whirl, I had just one idea left, which was that the sooner I got out of that there part of the country, away from Pete and his invisible pards with the wings, the safer I'd be.

"I felt, as you might say, out of my el'ment somehow with such like surroundin's. I bridles a burro, threw on and clinched up my saddle in less'n a minute, snatched up a canteen, and was off with a short pitchin' lope, not much knowin' or carin' which way I was travellin'. The wind and the sand and the gen'ral whoop-up I've spoke of followed me up for a little time, but died out at last when I'd got clean away, and the sun showed up bright once again in a clear, cloudless sky. I had a rough time gettin' in, but worked on to French Joe's, and after restin' there for a day went on in by slow stages.

"I consulted my lawyer, Colonel McVey, as to what my rights were under my contract with Pete, and gave him, the best way I could, the queer facts in the case; but he wouldn't take no pay for consultin' and wouldn't give me no advice.

"I've never seen Dutch Pete again, but I heard of him in less'n a year as rollin' in coin and gamblin' and breakin' all the games wherever he travelled. Then next I was told he'd been killed down in Texas.

"Now, I leave to you to judge, ma'am," concluded Calkins solemnly, "whether I wan't right in suggestin' that I'd run against some of those mysterious, shadowy bein's the gen'leman was referrin' to, and that it wan't noways desirable to be mixed up in any kind of dealin's with 'em. There's them burros broke out of the corral again," and Calkins left us on what seemed to me quite an imaginary alarm.

"Well, I never!" exclaimed the lady with the black mits, after drawing a long breath as Calkins departed. I echoed this indefinite sentiment. The theosophist was serious and silent.

THE TRAITOR OF STUTTGART.

A Story of the Siege of 1286.

"This is the last night of peace, Mechild," said her lover, as he tenderly pressed her hand. "To-morrow King Rudolph and his army will encamp before Stuttgart."

"What will be the end of this struggle against the King?" asked Mechild Berge, the armourer's daughter, with a sigh.

"We shall win, and teach the King that Eberhard of Würtemburg is not to be frightened!" said Martin enthusiastically.

He kissed her tenderly, and was about to depart when she detained him.

"Martin——"

"What is it, sweet?"

"Oh, Martin, do be careful! I fear that Junker Anselm will seek every opportunity of injuring you for——"

"For interrupting him when he had entered your father's house while you were alone, and tried to force his suit on you!" broke in Martin. "Luckily, I saw him enter, and was in time to spoil his plan. It was well for him that you thought it best not to tell Master Berge! Never fear for me, dearest!"

And with a kiss he left her.

On the following day, the 23rd of September, 1286, the army of King Rudolph encamped in front of Stuttgart, the King pitching his tent under an old oak, since known as "King's Oak." It will be useful here to state in a few words how the King and his powerful vassal came into a conflict.

In the year 1273 there came to an end, by the election of the Count of Habsburg as the monarch of the Petty States of Central Europe, that turbulent time known as the interregnum. When the Count of Habsburg found himself fairly settled in his new position and greeted as King Rudolph, he set to work to introduce order into his kingdom, and to undo, as far as possible, the mischief done during the preceding lawless period; and in pursuit of this object—and, it may be, in his own personal interest—he issued a decree that all Crown land and property which had been appropriated by the nobles during the interregnum should be surrendered to the King.

The proclamation of this decree naturally angered some of the German Princes and Counts who had been busy in that direction, and they refused to comply. The Count of Würtemberg, Eberhard's predecessor, was among the number. The King was soon able to bring them to reason, and peace was patched up. Not many years afterwards the King was again in conflict with the house of Würtemberg (in the person of the young Count Eberhard) and others, and again peace was concluded.

But the King had scarcely returned to the seat of Government when hostilities again broke out, and this time Rudolph decided to act decisively by besieging Stuttgart, and crushing his most powerful opponent, the Count Eberhard. A few of the citizens of Stuttgart had at first thought it advisable not to uphold the Count in his defiance of the King, but these doubtful ones had been won over, and Eberhard believed he could reckon on the assistance of his burghers.

Every possible preparation had been made by the people of Stuttgart. Walls, towers, and moats had been carefully overhauled and repaired where necessary; on the walls and towers the slings were placed in position and stones and logs heaped up near them; and all the gates of the city were barricaded except one. Large stores of provisions were available in the city, and the burghers awaited the attack with confidence.

Early next morning the King began the siege in earnest. The besieged defended themselves vigorously, and at each attack the King's troops were repulsed with heavy losses.

The primitive weapons of the period were manipulated with great skill by both sides. The King's warriors, under the cover of a shed-like protection on wheels, filled in a part of the moat and plied the heavy, iron-tipped battering-ram against the wall; the besieged let down sacks of wool to stop the force of the blows, endeavoured to catch the besiegers in rope loops, and showered heavy stones down upon them. At last the besiegers made a hole in the wall and uttered a cry of triumph; but the gap was quickly filled up by a living wall of warriors and citizens, and after a sharp fight they were again repulsed. About two o'clock Rudolph gave up the fight for the day and retired amidst the triumphant shouts of the defenders of Stuttgart.

Martin Bahaim, although he had been foremost in the defence and had formed one stone of the living wall to fill the gap, had escaped uninjured, to the great joy of Mechild. He had dragged a banner from one of the besiegers in that hand to hand encounter, which he afterwards presented to his sweetheart. His bravery gained for him the admiration of his fellow-craftsmen, who had chosen him as the leader of the detachment formed by the Smith's guild, and it won words of praise from the Count.

The gap in the wall was barricaded with heavy beams, and preparations made for a renewed onslaught by the Royal troops. It came on the following day, with the same result; and then the King decided to wait for a few days till reinforcements arrived.

A week had elapsed since the beginning of the investment of the city, and Martin was on duty near the gate. As he paced to and fro, his thoughts wandered to Mechild and then to the scene between Junker Anselm and himself in Master Berge's parlour; he recalled the look of hatred in the young man's face, and Mechild's words of caution. He felt certain that Anselm would take any opportunity to avenge himself, but that opportunity would be difficult to find.

Stopping at one end of his walk, his attention was arrested by an arrow sticking in a beam which had been placed there ready for emergencies. It had the appearance of having been shot there from outside; this must have been done quite recently; it could not possibly be one of those used in the attempt to storm the stronghold.

Martin looked from the wall over the ground to the tents in the distance; no one was to be seen. He jerked the arrow out of the wood and examined it mechanically at first, but his interest was suddenly awakened when he noticed a strip of parchment wrapped around the shaft. He unwound it; something was written on it. What mystery was this? He gazed at the parchment, and read these words: "Martin Bahaim, remember your oath. At midnight we shall be ready."

Martin stared at the characters as if he could not believe his eyes. He had received some education and could read well; there was no deception. What devilry was this? So intent was he that he heard nothing; he was aroused from his reverie by a harsh voice behind him:

"So, ho, Martin Bahaim! This is the way you keep watch, and receive messages from our enemies!"

Ere he could turn, the parchment was snatched from his fingers by Count Eberhard, with whom were Anselm and two other nobles.

Martin stood before them, bewildered at the turn of affairs, unable to utter a word, while the Count read the message aloud.

"What ho! guards!" shouted the Count, his face distorted with rage. "What ho! Seize this traitor!"

"I am no traitor!" cried Martin, now alive to the position. "I am a true citizen and have fought for Stuttgart!"

"And the only one in the front rank who did not get wounded at the breach in the wall!" said Anselm sneeringly.

"By Heaven! The stratagem was cleverly done!" cried the Count. "A trick to gain our confidence. But you are outwitted! Seize this traitor!" he added, turning to half-a-dozen men who had arrived.

The men looked in amazement, but at a second order from the Count they surrounded Martin and hurried him away in spite of his struggles and vehement protests.

The news soon spread that Martin Bahaim had been caught in the very act of communicating with the enemy and had been cast into a dungeon to await a fitting punishment. It was soon conveyed to Mechild, who was utterly cast down at the success of what she felt to be a vile plot against her lover, and gave way to a paroxysm of grief which her mother was quite unable to calm. Gradually she became calmer and tried to think how she could best assist in proving Martin's innocence. That it was a conspiracy on the part of Junker Anselm she had no doubt; but how to prove it?

It was nearly dusk when Master Berge returned home. His honest face wore an expression of anxiety.

"Father," cried Mechild before he could speak, "what have they done with Martin? It is not true! It cannot be true!"

"Nothing as yet, my child," replied the armourer, answering her question. "It looks black against him, but I can't believe the boy would do that. He never sided with the malcontents."

"Father, he would not do such a vile thing; he is too noble! What can I do to save him! It is a plot against him!"

"The Count is furious," continued Berge, sinking into a chair. "He was nearly giving orders for Martin to be executed."—Mechild uttered a cry of despair—"but we spoke for the lad, and Count Eberhard agreed to wait and see whether any attack is made to-night. I spoke up so boldly for the lad that it somewhat angered Eberhard; and I was obliged to hold my tongue or suspicion might have fallen on me too. They all know that I looked upon the lad almost as a son."

Mechild buried her face in her hands.

"We are all to be ready for an attack to-night," continued Master Berge. "If none is made, we may induce the Count to let the lad go, but he will have to quit Stuttgart. If an attempt is made to-night to capture the city, the Count will be convinced of Martin's guilt, and he has sworn to hang him by his neck from the wall, so that his 'friends' may see the fate of the man who would betray us into their hands."

Every soldier and citizen in Stuttgart was ready for battle that night. It was a time of fearful anxiety for Mechild Berge, for if by any chance the King should make a night attack, Martin's life would be forfeited. She could not rest indoors, but wandered about as near the walls as women were allowed to be. Slowly—oh! so slowly!—the hours crept round, and Mechild's anxiety increased until the pain at her heart became almost intolerable.

At length the midnight hour arrived. Master Berge, who was on guard, fancied that he detected some noise in the King's camp, and his heart seemed to stand still. Was there to be an attempt? Was Martin Babaim really a traitor? He peered into the darkness and strained his ears, but nothing further was heard. And so the night wore away and the dawn came.

Martin's life was safe yet, but the Count would not release him nor allow any of his friends to see him.

"I think," said Master Berge, when he brought this information to his daughter, "that Martin is lucky in having a friend in Junker Anselm, who is in high favour with the Count and has said a good word for him. Heaven grant that it may all come right," added the armourer, not noticing the expression on the child's countenance. "I must get some rest now—and you, too, my dear."

"Do you expect any attack to-night, father?"

"We do not expect one, but it is impossible to be certain. Anselm will undertake the charge of the watch to-night on the eastern side, and will himself be at the gate, which is the only one not barricaded—a most important post. The Count is well pleased with his willing service. The other walls will also be well watched."

Mechild tried to follow her father's example and get some sleep. There was nothing to be done at present for her lover, and she might want all her strength ere long for his sake. But she lay wakeful on her bed, pondering over her father's remarks about Anselm. He was high in favour, and Martin was in a dungeon—the victim of Anselm's plot. Could she do nothing for him? She racked her brain for some plan until, completely exhausted, she fell into an uneasy slumber.

Fantastic dreams came to disturb her rest; all the events of the twenty-four hours, distorted and exaggerated, presented themselves to her. Junker Anselm had been arrested, Martin was guarding him, and she was trying to induce the latter to leave his post that she might release Anselm. Then she saw the two men struggling together. Anselm had led a storming party against Stuttgart and Martin was at the head of the defenders; the air was thick with arrows and missles, and resounded with the shouts of the combatants. All the visions were indistinct; but the scene changed with the rapidity of a dream and another scene was presented to her mind with startling vividness.

It was the eastern wall of the city with the unbarricaded gate; the time was night. She saw the form of Junker Anselm; he was looking cautiously around as though to make sure that he was not observed. He took from his tunic a strip of parchment on which was written in letters of fire the word "Midnight," and twisted it round the shaft of an arrow, which he fitted into a bow and shot towards the distant camp. She could see the word of fire as it sped along, and at the same time there appeared above Anselm's head a tongue of flame which resolved itself into the word "Traitor." It was all so vivid that Mechild awoke with a start.

She was surprised to find that she had slept so long; the day was waning, so it was about five o'clock. The dream troubled her. What did it mean?

"There can be no meaning in it," she told herself. "It is merely the vain imagining of a troubled mind. Yet——"

Might it not be some warning? In those ages such dreams were commonly regarded as premonitions; and although Mechild was not without a small share of culture, nevertheless the superstitions of the times had a great hold upon her. She felt that the dream or vision was intended in some way to benefit her if she paid heed to it, and she resolved to do so.

Her mind was quickly made up as to her course of action. She sought her father, explained to him the vision and her plan, and asked for his assistance. The armourer looked aghast, but the dream, intensified by Mechild's earnestness, made an impression upon him, and he finally consented with some reluctance.

"Have your wish, Mechild," he said gravely; "but I cannot see what good can come of it, and the risk is great for you."

After dark, father and daughter made their way to the house of Konrad Strohm, a friend of Martin, who was now acting as leader of the guild.

"You cannot take the place of one of the sentinels," said Strohm, when Mechild had ex lained, "because Junker Anselm has chosen them specially. If you are determined to carry out your idea of watching him, you can only do it by hiding. It is dangerous, and also foolish, because there is no reason for what you have in your mind. But since you say it is for Martin's sake, I will do my part. We cannot be near you; that would arouse suspicion."

"I thank you, Konrad. I will take the risk," replied Mechild quietly.

* * * *

Junker Anselm stopped abruptly; that was the second time he fancied he had heard a noise not far off. He peered about, but could see no one.

"Fancy!" he muttered. "I am becoming as nervous as a woman. They are all in bed now, sleeping in safety!"

The figure crouched down in the shadow of the gate cautiously arose after a few seconds and watched him again. It was the figure of a youth of slender build, the slight form being well concealed in the angle of the gate and the wall.

Mechild (for she it was, disguised in a suit procured for her by Konrad in order to facilitate her task) had been on the watch now for nearly an hour, and had twice nearly betrayed her whereabouts in shifting her position for a better one. The movements of Anselm during the past few minutes had left her in breathless expectation. What was he doing? Where was the sentinel who should have met him at a certain distance?

His back was turned to her, and she crept cautiously from her corner to get a better view. She saw him lift a lantern and lower it over the wall, then he drew it up and laid it down by his feet.

Heavens! Was her dream really a warning? Had she been sent by a protecting Providence to thwart the schemes of a double-dyed traitor? Her brain reeled and she sank down in the angle. She could do nothing yet; there might be some mistake; she must wait.

Anselm did not move; he was intently watching. Minute after minute passed slowly, each one seeming an hour to the armourer's daughter. Not a sound could be heard; all was as quiet as the grave.

A movement on the part of Anselm made her shrink back into her corner; at the same time she thought she detected something like a dull murmur. Anselm descended and came towards the gate. Would he detect her? She held her breath as she crouched down and grasped her dagger. Nearer and nearer he approached her and she involuntarily tried to crouch lower at each step. Had he seen her? What was he about to do? She answered the last question in her own mind, but she scarcely dared believe it. But all doubt was set at rest when Anselm strode to the gate and lifted the beam out of the socket—the bolts had been already undone—and began to pull open the heavy gate.

The city was betrayed! Roused to action by the thought, Mechild sprang to her feet, and blew as loud a blast as she could on the little horn which Konrad had given her.

With an oath, Anselm rushed upon the supposed youth and grappled with him.

"Help! Oh, help!" cried Mechild, as she struggled desperately with the baffled Junker. The thought of Martin and the betrayed city gave her extra strength, but it was of little use against the powerful young noble. She heard the shouts of men streaming through the gate, the rush of men, and Konrad's voice in answer to her signal, the clash of arms, and the cries of the wounded, and she lost consciousness.

* * * * *

When Mechild came to herself she was in her own bed, and around her were Martin, her parents, and the doctor. She was too weak for an explanation, and it was nearly a week before she could relate her experiences and hear what had taken place afterwards. The enemy had been beaten back after a sanguinary encounter, and with heavy losses. Junker Anselm had been killed, and thus had escaped a traitor's doom. She had been rescued by her father and Konrad at the head of the smiths; only just in time, for she had fallen with a wound in her shoulder from Anselm's dagger.

The smiths kept the enemy at bay till help came, and the King's troops were driven back with heavy loss. Martin had been released and the Count had endeavoured to make amends by giving him an appointment. Anselm had been found in a dying state and had confessed. The disloyal citizens who had helped him were either dead or gone with the enemy.

The King finally raised the siege and thought it prudent to forget about the Crown property, for others were preparing for hostilities.

From that day the eastern gate was known as the Dream Gate, and the memory of Anselm has been prepetuated in the story of the "Traitor of Stuttgart."

A BROKEN MASK

BY JOAN BARRETT.

CHAPTER XIV.

A STRANGE DISCOVERY.

Di resolved to go to the Towers the following afternoon and ask the caretakers for their master's address. It was quite impossible that Mrs. Caffyn would continue to accept the only excuse that Di had hitherto been able to give her as an explanation of Kitty's silence. Kitty could not be always supposed to be flitting from one Italian village to another, nor could the supposition of her having no settled address for any length of time be given as a good reason for her negligence in writing to the woman who had taken her mother's place, and loved Kitty so devotedly during her childhood and happy girlhood.

Would the Nabob suggest that Di should take Mrs. Caffyn into their confidence, and tell her the truth? Or would he prefer to leave Mrs. Caffyn in suspense, forcing her to believe in Kitty's chilled affection for her? One course or the other must be taken. When Di ordered the pony carriage she was told that the pony had a shoe loose.

The farrier lived at the extreme end of the village, between two cross roads, in a position that was certainly calculated to bring him custom from outsiders, but that was decidedly inconvenient for the farmers of Thorneydene. Luckily a carrier was returning to Leigh that afternoon, and Di took a seat in the low, tent-covered cart with a promise from Betty to send the pony trap after her to bring her home.

The carrier was a long time in reaching The Towers. It had been a bright afternoon when Di started, but before she got to her journey's end the sky was covered with grey clouds, and the shadows cast by a coming storm mingled with the dusk of the November evening.

The lodge at the entrance gates was empty when she passed through them into the grounds. There was a neglected look about the garden, and the house with yellow blinds shrouding all the windows had a dismal, cheerless appearance. The great brass knocker was dull and tarnished; a few weeds had pushed their inquisitive heads between the stones of the terrace steps, and a blue clematis trailed its long branches untidily from the columns of the verandah.

Di pulled the bell and caught its tinkle. It sounded strangely loud in the dead stillness. No reply came. She gave a longer and a harder pull, with the same result. Absolute stillness pervaded the great house. Thinking that the Marshalls must live in the servants' quarters right at the back of the house, Di made her way through a shrub over-grown path, dank with weeds, through a small green gate round to the back door. No answer succeeded her knock. With growing impatience she opened the door and stepped into the wide passage. Upon her left hand were the housekeeper's room and the servants' hall, that she knew; and upon the opposite side of the corridor were the kitchen, pantries and sculleries. She knocked upon the door of the housekeeper's room, and receiving no reply she went in. The cosy room showed signs of recent occupation. A bright fire was burning, and a kettle stood on the round trivet. A half-knitted sock laid upon the table, gay with a crimson cloth. Raising her voice she called, "Mrs. Marshall!" Outside she saw that a fine snow was beginning to fall, the grey shadows were stretching their mistiness over the ground, and among the almost barren branches of a tree the wind was sighing, and fluttering down some of the few remaining yellow leaves.

Di crossed to the kitchen. That was also empty, and there were no signs of recent occupation. The great room, with its high cupboards, big empty fireplace, and chilly-looking stone floor, felt like a vault. There was no one in the servants' hall. The long forms had been left around the dining-table that stretched its unpolished length from one end of the room to the other, bare and unlovely, and suggested a schoolroom, minus maps and globe.

Di went up a short flight of stairs, where a green baize-covered door shut away all sounds and opened into a corridor, where began the living rooms. She peeped into the dark, shrouded dining-room, then the drawing and morning rooms. The grey-white holland covers upon the chairs gleamed white, like grotesque ghostly apparitions in the silent, dusk filled rooms. Clearly no living creature was in the lower rooms. Di lingered a moment at the foot of the servants' staircase, and then, gathering her courage together, she sped quickly up the stairs. She paused at the head of the last step, impressed unpleasantly with the cheerless look of the dark, uninhabited house, and again she called: "Mrs. Marshall!"

She heard a mouse scamper away terrified at the sound of her voice. It gave the only sign that her voice had been heard.

With a shiver Di hastened to the far end of the corridor. The best bedrooms were in this part; she hoped that Mrs. Marshall might be found in one of them. Right at the end of the passage she came to an abrupt halt before a door—the door of Kitty's bedroom. The handle had been removed, but the key was in the lock, and its appearance suggested that someone had recently been in the apartment. Di wondered softly with that gnawing pain deepening at her heart, if Kitty's room was just as its late occupant had left it when she had abandoned all in her love for John Gillway. And that morbid pleasure that most women take in hoarding love letters that have been penned by fingers long stiffened in death; of peeping with tear-blinded eyes at wee garments, whose tiny owners once beautified and invested with a loveliness that can never be blotted from a mother's memory; of treasuring relics that revive pain and sweet-bitter recollections, made Di turn the key and enter Kitty's room. Her step was very slow, almost reverential, as it crossed the thick pile of the carpet to the window. The blind was not drawn at one of the windows, and a pale grey shadowy light filtered through the panes. It was as though Kitty lay dead upon the large satin and lace-covered bed, and Di had come to weep over her cold, beautiful body.

There were no holland covers in this room. The pretty gold and white furniture seemed to have been untouched by housemaid's hand. Their mouldings were dust-filled; a delicate tracery of silken cobweb stretched from ceiling to chairs, and around the window-frames and over the door others hung. Upon the low mantel-board, Kitty's face, fresh and radiant in its youth and smiling beauty, looked across at a portrait of the Nabob, whose frank, laughter-filled eyes met his wife's pictured regard from the wall. On the dressing-table a dead bouquet of brown flowers spoke mutely to Di of the hand that had once held them.

There were bonnet pins, a brooch of Kitty's, and a little pair of enamelled scissors resting on the broad frilled pincushion.

She threw herself upon her knees by a couch.

Di passed into the dressing-room. Here everything was prim and neat, but a hundred trifles recalled Kitty. Photographs, fans that the girls had bought together, a gay tambourine from Capri, shells, little souvenirs of birthdays, all stared at Di, and spoke to her of Kitty.

"Oh, Kitty," said Di aloud in her pain; and because she felt so miserable, and her heart yearned towards her sister, she threw herself upon her knees by a couch, and burst into futile tears.

Bang! It was the bedroom door. A gust of wind had slammed it. Di sprang to her feet, rushed into the bedroom and found that her fear had been realised. The door was shut, and there was no handle to open it!

Her first impulse was to shake it violently, then she kicked the lower panels, and shouted for aid at the very top of her voice. The wind had gathered in strength and fury. She heard it hissing through the corridor and moaning around the house like a lost soul sighing and lamenting for its dead past. The room was growing darker, the grey shadows seemed to have huddled together in the corners and behind the bed. An inexplicable terror seized Di. She who had ridiculed the visionary fears of other people felt herself growing cold. She renewed her attack upon the door, she screamed and shouted for assistance, and the wind mocked her efforts, and drowned them with its own shrill complaint.

"Hoo—hoo—hoo—hooh" it went, and then it laughed as only the wind can laugh.

Di went to a window, opened it, and put her head outside. The chill air almost took away her breath, the wind darted in, rustling the curtains and raising the pictures from the walls.

"Mrs. Mar—shall!" shouted Di.

A fan fell behind her, a fold of the lace curtains blew roughly in her face, and made her turn with a beating heart. Her voice sounded impotent and weak, but she called again and again. The sleet had turned to rain. It came in at the open window, beating rudely upon Di's hands and head, pattering upon the carpet with malicious pleasure. She could see the dim outlines of shrubs and trees through the sheet of driving rain and gathering darkness. Night had fallen, the night that she must pass alone in Kitty's abandoned bedroom.

"Oh, they must hear me! They shall hear me!" she cried aloud, and pulled down the window with an angry jerk.

She grew tired at last of shaking the door and of calling. Her arms ached with the violence of her exertions; her throat felt sore. But at the thought of her father's distress at her disappearance, new courage and strength filled her veins. Again she opened the window, and again the wind mocked with long drawn sobbing wails at her efforts to attract attention. The shadows deepened. Through the open window the rain drifted in. Kitty's portrait seemed to be the only white blot in the darkness. Di knew its exact position upon the mantel-board, and by some strange fascination her eyes obstinately riveted themselves upon that white-grey smudge.

Again she thrust her head from the window and shouted. Her voice wandered away and lost itself in the storm. If the caretakers at the back of the house heard it, they might well be pardoned for attributing it to the wind.

Something swift and cold and light touched Di's forehead as she drew her head into the room. It was like the touch of ghostly fingers, an eerie touch that made her shiver with nervous dread. Bah, it was only the curtain! How foolish she was! And yet, that growing terror kept her feet glued to the floor. She could not move them. In the surrounding shadows she heard the rapid throbbing of a heart. Was she not alone? Over her head she felt a cold wave pass; it ran from the nape of her neck down her back. She shrank nearer to the open window, cold with inanition and fear. There were candles upon the dressing-table, plenty of them; but she could not move a finger to light one and dispel the murkiness that made the room so ghostly.

"Di!"

What whisper was that? Did it pass her, or was it only the sob of the wind? And could the wind chill the warm blood in her veins, and send those awful tremours over her body? She was not superstitious. She tried to tell herself so.

"Di!"

The whisper came again, infinitely sad and soft. Oh for the courage to creep to the dressing-table and to light one of those candles! Strange faces seemed to leer at her in the darkness, hurrying footsteps raced through the corridor, the curtains rustled at her back and touched her as though they were endowed with life. She was vaguely aware that the back of her dress was wet, and that the rain had turned to snow.

Did something glide past her then? And why did Kitty's portrait gleam so white when other objects were only shapeless forms in the rooms? How foolish she was! Yes, that was the right name for her conduct—foolish, but not superstitious; she, Di, who was considered to be so practical and sensible, could not be superstitious. Yet, if that were indeed so, why did she crouch there upon the floor, palpitating with nameless terror? Of what was she afraid?

She was waiting for something. She did not know what that something was; but a strange new instinct that appeared to have taken the place of reason in her bade her wait.

Gruesome churchyard stories flitted like ghosts themselves through her brain. Old Betty's narratives of weird dogs that crept stealthily from yawning graves to revisit the world, of haunted chambers where no man or woman dared sleep, of visions more wild and awful even than these unfolded their shadowy forms to Di.

"I ought to pray," she said to the heart whose loud throbs seemed to fill the room. "I am not superstitious, but I ought to pray."

"Di!"

A great wind wave, more rude and boisterous than any that had yet swept into the room, rushed in. Di's scream mingled itself with the crash of fallen china and the peevish rustling of the stiff silken bed hangings.

"Help! help! help!" screamed Di frantically from the window. She did not remember springing to her feet, but the spell was broken with the movement that she had made.

There followed a faint lull in the storm. It was as though Nature had ceased sobbing from very weariness, and in the hush Di caught the far-away sounds of church bells. The ringers were practising for Christmas.

A great calm came over the girl as she listened. She felt as though she had been out in the black night and the storm, and had just entered a warm haven of refuge.

"Ding-ding-dong-dell. Ding-ding-dong-dell!" went the bells, gladly and merrily, as they rose and fell upon the wintry air.

Di groped for the matches. She found a box in the tray that held a candle-stick, and with shaking fingers she struck one. She had not closed the window, dreading to lose the cheery voices of the bells. A puff of air extinguished the flickering light in a second.

It needed all her courage to close the window. But she was proud of the action, and now the match burnt readily and communicated its yellow-red flame to the many candles about the apartment.

Di lit them all. The light might attract attention, and through it her release might come. She drew up the blinds at the second window. The room looked cheerful and pretty in the soft candle light. She had not worn a watch, and the clock on the chimney-piece was not going. Mentally, she began to count the time that had elapsed since she had left home. The carrier had left Thorneydene at half-past one. He could not have reached The Towers earlier than half-past four. How long had she been in the room, half-an-hour, an hour, or more? Judging by her sensations she might have been a prisoner for ten. What would her father do when Alec returned with the empty pony carriage? He would perhaps think that Alec had not made proper inquiries at The Towers, and he might return to ask himself if she had not called. Mrs. Marshall would answer that she had not been there, and then Farmer Strange would go systematically from one friend's house to the other, asking for her, unless, in coming to The Towers, he saw the blaze of light in the upper storey and commented upon it to Mrs. Marshall.

Di rattled and kicked the door, and screamed until she had no strength left. Then recognising the utter futility of her exertions, she looked about the room for a book.

Kitty had always been a great devourer of novels. But the books that delighted Kitty did not interest Di, still she went into the dressing-room in the hope of finding something to pass the time.

In all the old rooms at The Towers great wardrobes were built into the walls. There were two in the dressing-room. Di opened one of them and closed it hurriedly. The collection of garments looked like headless ghosts suspended from the pegs.

No books were to be seen upon the tables. Thinking that they had been packed into a trunk that stood between the wardrobes, Di opened it. Like the wardrobe it was filled with clothes. As she slid her fingers between the garments, they came in contact with some soft, furry object. Kitty had bought a fur-lined cloak not long before her disappearance, and Di's chilled condition induced her to pull out the intervening garments to get possession of it. So warm a wrap was not to be despised upon such a cold night.

Di lit them all.

The garment was twisted into a rough bundle. It felt very heavy. Di unrolled it, and gave a little exclamation. It was a sealskin jacket. Kitty had but one seal jacket, and in that jacket she had gone away! Yet this was clearly the same jacket. Had her maid made a mistake in telling the Nabob that her mistress had gone away in her new furs? Had Kitty worn the cloak?

At the bottom of the trunk Di saw a second rudely-twisted bundle. She took it out and opened it. A little seal toque, a muff to match, a thick pair of long gloves with seal cuffs, a green cloth gown, and a little pair of walking shoes fell upon the carpet, forming a complete costume. They were creased and crumpled, the dress was torn in one or two places, and all the garments looked as though they had been hastily rolled together and thrust out of sight.

Di examined each article separately, marvelling at her odd discovery. She opened the nearest wardrobe; it was quite empty. In the second one she found the new fur cloak. How had the maid committed such a strange error in describing the costume that Kitty had worn? But had she described it? She had not seen her mistress upon the day that she was missing. Evidently she had failed to discover the clothes in their usual places and so had jumped to the conclusion that her mistress had gone out in them. What had Kitty worn? And how came these garments to be rolled in these unsightly bundles when there was ample room in the second wardrobe to suspend them?

Di shook out the dress. The gathers at the back had been torn from the band, and the pocket hung by a thin shred of silk lining. It had been roughly used, and yet it was quite new!

That she felt frightened was evident.

The jacket bore no marks of ill-usage, and the cap and muff were in a similar condition. Who had hidden these things, and why? What had been the motive? The answer came as suddenly into Di's brain that it was almost as though a voice in the room had uttered it aloud!

"To lead people to believe that Kitty had gone away in them."

In her perplexity Di stared around the room. A strange thing met her eyes. The bell-pull near the dressing-table had been cut right away at the top.

She had not thought of ringing the bells, and now in this fresh access of alarm that chilled her, she ran eagerly into the bedroom, only to pause, with sharp terror and suspicion coursing through her mind. There was no cord. Like the pull in the dressing-room, it had been destroyed. Why?

CHAPTER XV.

Di has Suspicions.

Early upon the following morning the man who came to do an occasional job in the garden saw a white face at an upper window in the big house, and heard a girl's voice calling passionately for aid.

The man went to the housekeeper, who slept in a former pantry adjoining her room. She stared at him in mute, wild-eyed amazement when he related what he had seen and heard.

"It's rather early in the day to see sights like that, Reuben," she said sharply. "A girl at the window, indeed! You must be either drunk or daft, man, to say that to me."

"A man wi' good eyesight ain't obliged to be drunk or daft, Mrs. Marshall, to see things. I tell you there's a gal upstairs in one o' the rooms by the old wing, an' I heard her call, jest as plain as I sees you now, to be let out, an' what's more, she was wavin' a handerkercher, an' you'll see if you goes up."

The housekeeper's florid face paled. She caught her breath sharply, so that it hissed between her teeth. Such a terrified look came into her staring eyes that Reuben, being of a forgiving nature, suggested going upstairs with her. She waved him roughly aside.

"Upstairs! with them shoes all caked up with snow and slush! I wonder what next you'll want to do! Do you think carpets were meant to be walked on by the likes of you? Just go about your work, and don't let me hear another word of your nonsense!" she cried indignantly, and as Reuben declared that it was not such nonsense as she supposed, and that he knew what he had seen, she deliberately closed the big door in his face.

"He's as mad as a March hare!" she muttered, hurrying hastily up the stairs. She went straight to the door of her late mistress's room; the key laid upon the floor. Picking it up, she inserted it in the lock, and pushed the door open. The next moment she fell back with a shrill, terrified scream, as Di advanced towards her, pale and heavy-eyed with the long sleepless hours that she had passed.

"Good Heavens! Miss Strange, how did you come here?" the woman exclaimed in shaking tones.

Di explained, and asked if her father had not sent to inquire after her.

"A man did come about five o'clock last night, and wanted to know if you'd been here, and I told him that I hadn't seen you. He said that you'd perhaps taken a short cut across the fields home, and that he might overtake you where the field path ended! To think that you've been here all night! How frightened you must have been, Miss Strange. I never heard tell of such a thing, never! It's very odd that you didn't see me, considering that I never left my room from the time Marshall went away to see a sick friend at Leigh till Reuben came just now and told me that he'd seen you," said Mrs. Marshall very resentfully.

She had sunk helplessly into a chair, and she now looked at Di with the expression of one who felt aggrieved and injured. Perhaps she was blaming Di for the terror that her appearance had occasioned her. That she still felt frightened was evident; her lips twitched nervously, and her hands were shaking upon her lap.

"I looked in your room, and it was empty. I called your name a great many times, both down and upstairs. I should have rung a bell had there been one in Mrs. Eliot's rooms. Why have they been taken away?"

Mrs. Marshall glanced at the small remnant of cord hanging quite close to the ceiling, and the pallor of her cheeks deepened.

"I'm sure I don't know, Miss Strange," she answered sharply. "No doubt, Mr. or Mrs. Eliot could tell you; it's beyond me."

"It seems such an extraordinary action to cut off both bell-pulls."

"Some folks are apt to do extraordinary actions, Miss Strange," retorted Mrs. Marshall, with a glance that hinted plainly to whom she referred.

"If you will give me Mr. Eliot's address I shall feel greatly obliged," said Di, in her quiet voice. "I am anxious to return home; my father must feel very anxious about me."

Something in the girl's calm manner seemed to soothe the housekeeper's agitation. She glanced sharply at Di and then around the room. A broken vase upon the floor caught her attention.

"It fell down last night. I had the window open and was calling for help when the wind blew it from the table," said Di, reading the question in Mrs. Marshall's eyes.

"The wind was rough, Miss Strange. No wonder I didn't hear you, being so far off, too, and such a stormy night as it was! You must have heard a lot of queer sounds with the old wing so near this room, and I'm sure it must be full of rats and mice and bats, for it's never been opened in my time."

"I heard no noises."

"And you weren't frightened, miss?"

"Well, yes, I was at first," Di admitted. "But I soon got over that."

"You didn't sleep in the bed, miss? Why, how cold you must be! Didn't you wrap yourself up in nothing?"

"I got a cloak from the wardrobe."

"Well, I'm glad you weren't cold and frightened, that I am!" said Mrs. Marshall, with increasing composure and kindness. "It feels enough to freeze one up here. If you'll come down to my room, I'll give you some breakfast and find you Mr. Eliot's address. He wrote to me a few days ago asking if we'd got a situation to suit us, as if so, he'd put another couple in. But good places are hard to get, especially when you're two, and a bit particular about the family being all it should be, and Marshall and me have never been separated since we married, Miss Strange, and we don't want to take separate places if we can help it."

As she rose from her seat, Di saw her deliberately slip her handkerchief upon the floor. The action was done with intention, and although Di immediately averted her eyes, she knew that the woman was watching her.

"If it hadn't been for the wind slamming the door and cracking the handle, you wouldn't have been shut in here all night, miss," said Mrs. Marshall. "Mr. Eliot told me not to have any little repairs done until he'd been over the house himself with a man to give an estimate. There's a lot wants doing considering the short time we've been here. The men and girls are so careless!"

She followed Di from the room and down the stairs; at the foot she paused and thrust her hand in her pocket.

"Bless me!" she exclaimed. "I've dropped my handkerchief. Do you mind going on to my room, Miss Strange? There's a good fire, and I'll soon have a plate of buttered toast ready. I was getting my breakfast when Reuben came with his tale of seeing you and scared me out of my wits. Ugh, how chilly it is; don't stand still, miss, you will catch your death of cold."

"I'll go on," said Di. "It is awfully cold."

The baize-covered door closed noiselessly behind her tall figure. Mrs. Marshall waited a moment, listening with bated breath, and then, turning, she hastily retraced her steps to Kitty's room. She had barely disappeared when the baize door opened cautiously, and Di's head appeared. Having satisfied herself that the housekeeper was out of sight and hearing, Di ran rapidly and silently back to the corridor. The door of Kitty's room was open. With the courage of determination Di entered. It was empty. She passed into the dressing-room, not pausing to think of the excuse that she must necessarily make to the housekeeper if she were there. No one was in the room, but the doors of the empty wardrobe were wide open. As Di stared wonderingly in, she caught the sound of a far away click, and a rumble that seemed to be much nearer. It sounded like the rolling of a piece of furniture over bare boards, and it appeared to issue from the back of the old wardrobe.

But the next moment Di saw the back of the wardrobe move an inch or so; four broad red fingers peeped around the aperture clutching it. Di turned and raced down the stairs, through the green-covered door, helter-skelter into the housekeeper's room, where she threw herself upon her knees before the ruddy fire, and tried to tell herself that the baize door had made no noise, and that it never swung backwards and forwards after one had passed hurriedly through.

Mrs. Marshall coming into her snug little apartment a few minutes later with her handkerchief held ostentatiously in her hand, found Miss Strange in the same position. The heat from the fire had put a fine colour into the girl's cheeks, and one long coil of chestnut hair had escaped from its pins. Beyond that, there were no outward signs of flurry about Di, and Mrs. Marshall never suspected how hard it was for Di to say in a natural manner that she was dying of hunger, and longing for a cup of tea. Still less did the housekeeper guess with what difficulty Di sat quietly facing her, and ate and drank as though her sole idea was to satisfy her hunger and thirst.

Mrs. Marshall called Reuben and explained matters to him while Di was breakfasting. She ordered him to prepare a trap to take Miss Strange home to Greyhouse, and about half-an-hour later Di left by Reuben's side with the Nabob's address in her pocket, and her brain whirling with wild thoughts whose seeming madness and improbability terrified and bewildered her.

It was not yet nine o'clock. The sharp keenness of the frosty air retained the roses in Di's cheeks; the horse's hoofs rang out cheerily over the hard road, where little drifts of snow had frozen, and the hedges were white and glistening.

"Are you the only man at The Towers, Reuben?" Di asked.

The man shook his head, lightly flicking the horse with the whip. "There's Marshall, miss," he answered, "and there's Clayton, the groom. I only comes now an' then to do a turn in the garden. The Towers is altered to what it was. Mr. Eliot don't seem to be spendin' any money on nothing"—he broke off as though suddenly remembering that Di was Mr. Eliot's sister-in-law. "The garden's a reg'lar wilderness," he added dejectedly. "An' in usual they keeps five men on day by day, an' then there wasn't none too many hands for the size of the place. Lord Powers, he won't know it when he do come home!"

"Perhaps it will be put in order before his return, Reuben," said Di, nestling among her furs and trying to think collectedly.

Why had the door-handle and the bell-pulls been removed from Kitty's rooms? And what was concealed at the back of the wardrobe? Clearly there was something hidden away there, and Mrs. Marshall had feared that Di had discovered it. Then those bundles of Kitty's clothing? Di's head began to ache with thinking over so many problems.

"I'll write to Bernard," she told herself, "and tell him everything. He knows little about those Marshalls; he had them from a servants' registry; I remember his saying so at the time of the robbery. And the police suspected Mrs. Marshall—and she cried when she was afraid that

Di saw the back of the wardrobe move an inch or so.

Barnard thought she was connected with it. I always liked her until this morning. I never saw her so agitated, or so rude before. She was afraid that I had found out something in the room. I wonder what there is to find?"

She turned to see who had startled her.

Old Betty was waiting at the garden gate with a face all puckered up with concern. She broke out into joyful ejaculations at sight of her young mistress.

"And dad; is he dreadfully upset, Betty?" Di asked eagerly, when she was at the old servant's side.

"It's a good thing as he didn't know anything about you stayin' out all night like this. One of the cows was took ill, and he's watchin' her all night long. The vet. thinks she'll die," answered Betty, "so I didn't say nothin' about you to him, an' I tole that Alec to bide his own business an' keep a still tongue; one worry's 'bout enough for the po'r man at a time, but wherever have you bin, Miss Di?"

Di told her, and then left her to seek her father. She found him in the yard looking so worried and anxious that her heart ached in sympathy with his trouble.

"Clover's dying, Di," he said; "no hope for her. There goes twenty-five pounds out of our pockets!"

"We'll sell the pony carriage and the pony too, and buy another Clover, daddy," whispered Di, laying her cold cheeks against his. "I never hardly use them."

"Kitty'll scold, my girl, if we do that," said her father.

"No, she gave them to me; I can do as I like with them."

Di returned to the house and exchanged her dress for a morning gown, before beginning her duties. It was Friday, and the bedrooms had to be turned out for red-armed Sally to scrub under Betty's superintendence, and every pot and pan and candlestick that could be polished had to be cleaned by Betty herself, while Di brushed the old silver, and dusted the rooms, and rubbed the oak furniture in the parlour until her arms ached with the energetic movement. And all the while those same puzzling questions kept tormenting her as she worked. Why had the bell pulls been cut and Kitty's clothes torn and hidden, and what was concealed at the back of the wardrobe?

Her duties were not ended until late in the afternoon. She wrote a long letter then to the Nabob and went out to post it. The post-office was quite half a mile from the house. It was the largest general shop in the village, and Di had to wait some time before she was served with her one penny stamp. As she came outside, thoughtfully putting the stamp in the corner of the envelope, a man, very much bent, and wrapped in a faded Inverness cloak, passed the open door, stared swiftly at Di, and followed her to the box in the wall. She was in the act of dropping the letter in the slit when the man coughed. Di started, the letter slipped and fell into the box with a faint, hollow rattle. She turned to see who had startled her, and as she turned the man drew himself up and pushed back the broad brim of his rusty felt hat. A faint cry of surprise and aversion fell from Di's lips. The man was John Gillway.

"Best cure I have had for Toothache."—E. H. WILLIAMS, 22, St John's Avenue, Manchester.

"I was very bad with Toothache, but HERBULINE cured me instantly. A better remedy not known—a good cure."—F. TUCKER, 36, Rose Head, Liverpool.

"I could find nothing to excel this valuable remedy. I was cured of Toothache after suffering for a whole year, when nothing else would cure it."—LIZZIE CAMPBELL, 41, Burnside Street, Glasgow.

PRESS.

"There are certain home remedies which should always be kept at hand in every household, and one of these is HERBULINE. Wherever it is tried relief is quickly gained, especially in the cases of those suffering from rheumatism, lumbago, sprains, toothache, and other complaints of a like nature. A piece of cotton-wool, soaked in HERBULINE and placed in an aching tooth produces magical relief, as all who have used it when suffering from toothache have discovered to their satisfaction. Cyclists should always have a bottle in their possession, for a little rubbed in the back and front of the chest will prevent cold. Mothers should always keep it in the nursery, especially those who have children liable to croup. HERBULINE, not being an expensive remedy, comes within the reach of everybody's pocket, and it is one of the best external remedies that have yet been discovered."

PUBLIC.

"St. Kilda, August 15th.

"SIR,—Your note of 14th July found me on my return to my island home, which reminded me of my promise to you. Our supply of HERBULINE has been exhausted some time ago by the natives of St. Kilda, and, as a result of its virtues, I am never without a supply. Some of my people who were afflicted with Rheumatics found immediate relief from its application. Indeed, in every case to which it was applied, the result has proved HERBULINE to be a valuable remedy for removing pain. The St. Kildean's are loud in their praise of its virtues. You are at liberty to make what use you may of this. With kindest regards,

"(Signed), ANGUS FIDDES, Minister."

What Can It Do?

HERBULINE can and does cure. All that is necessary is to follow the instructions given with each bottle. Its merits are manifold. One trial convinces. Just try it.

TESTIMONY.

"I certainly was very dubious about HERBULINE when I tried it, but I found it cured my Neuralgia in less than thirty minutes."—C. E. STERMAN, 32, Perth Street, Belfast.

"A most valuable preparation and for want of knowledge of which many suffer cruelly from Neuralgia."—F. HARRISON, 67, Princes Street, Manchester.

"I have been under treatment for four years with three of the best professors in Glasgow and Edinburgh, and only found relief in trying HERBULINE. The cure was complete in twenty-five minutes."—W. S. ROSS, Marchfield, Edinburgh.

Answers to Correspondents.

STUDENT.—Procure from your bookseller some handbooks on Bimetallism. The subject is too vast a one to be discussed here.

S.—The cheapest restaurants in the world are to be found in Germany. For threepence an individual may obtain a capital meal of meat, bread, and coffee. Perhaps, however, it may be well to mention that the meat consists of horse-flesh.

W. S. P.—The sunflower crop is one of the best paying in Russia, where the seeds are greatly valued by the peasants. They are sold at the rate of 12s. a pound.

BOB.—Your patent leather shoes will require very careful treatment if they are to last for any length of time. To keep the leather soft, rub it occasionally with sweet oil, and then wipe the boots thoroughly with chamois. When the glaze becomes cracked apply a little varnish; it will go a long way towards hiding the deficiency.

A. D.—The opal is the only gem that cannot be successfully counterfeited.

H. O. P.—The Suez Canal shortens the voyage between London and Bombay by 4,265 miles.

BAB.—As the Bank of England receives the interest on the National Debt paid, and transacts other Government business, practically it might be termed a national institution.

S. H.—It has been estimated that a shrimp will produce 6,800 eggs annually; a prawn, 8,800; a lobster, 21,600; a herring 36,960; and a mackerel 454,651.

W.—The Government always withhold the fractions of a penny in their periodical distribution of dividends on account of the National Debt. From this source the State has accumulated the sum of £150,000.

Q. is a diligent reader of magazines and periodicals, but he says that he never yet remembers reading an interview with the Prince or Princess of Wales. "How is this?" he asks ———Simply because members of the Royal Family make it a rule never to grant interviews for newspaper reproductions. It may interest you to know that some time ago a reporter was dispatched to this country by the proprietors of an American newspaper in order to secure, if possible, an interview with Her Royal Highness. If the enterprising reporter proved successful, his reward was to be £500. Unfortunately for him his mission proved, as might have been expected, an utter failure, and he was forced to return to the States copyless.

MUSIC.—The organ is certainly by far and away the finest of instruments. No music is so grand and inspiring as that produced by a good musician upon an equally good organ. No, the instrument to which you refer is not the largest in the world. This distinction belongs to the organ in the Town Hall, Sydney, N.S.W. It was built by a London firm, and took three years to complete.

SWEET NINETEEN is engaged to a young fellow who is everything that is good with one exception. His great failing is his thirst after drink, and although SWEET NINETEEN has done her best to reform him in this direction he still goes on in his wild career. He is in a good position, earning good wages, and my correspondent wonders whether it would be wise to marry him.———Do not think my advice unkind and unfeeling, but I certainly think you would be throwing your happiness completely away if you marry the young fellow you refer to whilst his intemperate habits exist. No matter how much you may love him you may be sure that if your influence is not sufficient to curb him now it will be even less when you are married.

J. G. was recently attracted to a certain place of amusement by a placard which was overflowing with the names of talented artists, but greatly to his chagrin not a single one appeared, their places on the programme being taken by what appeared to be only inferior amateurs. "Is there no law to stop such roguery?" J. G. asks wrathfully.———I am afraid not. It is quite a common thing for the managers of places of entertainment to lure visitors by these unscrupulous methods. We might well follow the example of Italy, where a manager is made liable to a fine of £100 if every act on his printed programme is not fully performed.

E. asks rather an interesting question: "Why are Londoners so unsociable?" ———This is a point rather difficult to answer. To the countryman born and bred, the unsociability of the metropolitan resident must be very marked, and I have heard of one family who lived in one particular house for over ten years without even knowing their next-door neighbour's name. Whilst I do not hold with the too forward party who wants to shake hands with you simply because he sends his shirts to the same laundry as you, I certainly think that Londoners might copy with advantage the social characteristics of their country cousins.

TENBY.—It is said to cost the railway companies thousands every year to keep down rats. It is not that the rodents relish railway travelling; the provisions to be conveyed by railway are more in their line of business.

CLERGYMAN.—The Archbishop of Canterbury receives £15,000 a year, and the Archbishops of York and London £10,000 each respectively.

E. V.—Nearly double the beef is consumed in England as compared with mutton.

B. R.—Curiously enough the Duke of Devonshire does not own a single acre of land in the county from which he takes his name, although his estates are scattered over fourteen counties and cover more than 198,000 acres.

A.—Which Newton do you mean? There are no fewer than ten places in Great Britain bearing this name.

MATER.—The biggest baby show ever held was probably promoted at Melbourne, some years ago, on which occasion no fewer than 300 little cherubs were on view, and 30,000 people were attracted to the exhibition hall to see them. I quite agree with you that such exhibitions ought not to be encouraged.

G. S.—There are twenty monarchies and twenty-five republics in the civilised world.

QUERY asks: "Where can the cheapest railway ride in Europe be had?"——In Hungary, where you can go from Buda-Pesth to Kronstadt, a distance of 457 miles, for which the fare, third class, is only six and eightpence, or at the rate of six miles a penny.

H. T.—Toothache is certainly one of the most racking pains the human frame is called upon to endure. There are heaps of alleged remedies, but none like having the tooth out. The nearest approach to a genuine salve is a little Herbuline. You should saturate a piece of cotton with it, and place it in the aching tooth. Moreover, I believe that Herbuline is quite excellent for cyclists to rub into the back and the chest. It will prevent cold if used after you get very wet. Don't drink it. The address of the company is 54, Bow Lane, E.C.

SINCE the introduction of the letter-card, a great deal of ingenuity has been expended in producing novelties in this line. Quite the most charming I have seen up till now are those sent me by Messrs. Langley and Sons, of 23, George Street, N.W. They are specially got up to commemorate the Diamond Jubilee. Some are named "the new valise shape," and others "the new saque shape."

THE NEW LEMONADE.

Many people suffer from extreme thirst during the hot weather. Messrs. Foster Clarke & Co. have supplied the want that has long been felt by making a concentrated lemonade. It is made from the finest lemons, and the great advantage is that it is partly manufactured in Italy, in the midst of the lemonade orchards. The lemons are taken direct from the trees to the factory to commence their transformation into the Eiffel Tower Concentrated Lemonade. You can get thirty-two tumblers (or two gallons) for fourpence halfpenny. If you cannot get it from your Grocer, send sixpence to G. FOSTER CLARK & Co., 290, Eiffel Tower Factory, Maidstone.

KOKO

FOR THE HAIR

ROYAL TESTIMONIAL.

"Berlin, Alsenstrasse,
"February 25th, 1896.

"'KOKO' for the Hair is the best dressing I know. It keeps the head cool, promotes growth, and is in every way excellent.

"PRINCESS HOHENLOHE."

ORDER FROM ROYALTY.

"Detmold-Lippe, Germany.

"I beg you to forward by return 6 Bottles of 'KOKO.' It is for H.R.H. Princess Victoria of Schaumburg-Lippe"

(Grand-daughter of Queen Victoria and sister to the German Emperor.

MISS ELLEN TERRY,

The Great Actress, writes:

"I have used 'KOKO' for the Hair for years, and can assure my friends that it stops the hair from falling off, promotes growth of the hair, eradicates dandriff, and is the most pleasant dressing imaginable."

The Celebrated Authoress,

MRS. E. LYNN LINTON,

"Brougham House, Malvern.

"Dear Sir,—I have used your 'KOKO' now since June last, and I have not only stopped the falling out, which has been excessive after a severe illness, but I have an entirely new growth of hair, while the old hair is longer. As I am not a young woman, but an old one, I think this is a convincing test of the value of your preparation."

J. EDGHILL COLES, ESQ.,

A wealthy retired City merchant, writes:

Arundel House, Putney, July 9, 1896.

"Gentlemen,—I am now convinced that, without exception, 'KOKO' is the best preparation possible for restoring hair. I was quite bald on the front, top, and back of my head, and I have now a fine crop of hair. I am strongly of opinion that if the Duke of Cambridge, the Prince of Wales and his good brother knew your 'KOKO,' they would use it. . . I am willing to answer any question from anyone on the subject.

"P.S.—I enclose my photo, just taken, and I consider it a marvellous recovery of my hair, especially as I am over 60 years of age. It is also a splendid specific for headache, and an excellent tonic."

JOHN STRANCE WINTER,

Author of "Bootle's Baby," writes:

"Most decidedly use 'KOKO.' It will stop your hair from falling off. I happen to know, because I have tried it myself. It is a nice, clean, preparation — not sticky or greasy."

1s., 2/6, and 4/6, of all Chemists, Hairdressers, etc.

1s., 2/6, and 4/6, of all Chemists, Stores, etc.
